THE HISTORY

OF THE

CHURCH,

From Our LORD'S Incarnation, to the Twelfth Year of the Emperour MAURICIUS TIBERIUS or the Year of CHRIST 594. As it was written in Greek, by EUSEBIUS PAMPHILUS Bishop of Cæsaria in Palestine; SOCRATES SCHOLASTICUS Native of Constantinople; and EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS born at Epiphania in Syria Secunda.

Made English from that Edition of these Historians, which VALESIUS published at Paris in the Years 1659, 1668, and 1673.

Also,

The LIFE of CONSTANTINE in Four Books, Written by EUSEBIUS PAMPHILUS; with CONSTANTINE'S ORATION to the CONVENTION OF THE SAINTS, and EUSEBIUS'S Speech in Praise of CONSTANTINE, Spoken at His TRICENNALIA.

VALESIUS'S Annotations on these Authors, are done into English, and set at their proper places in the Margin; as likewise a Translation of His Account of their Lives and Writings.

With Two Index's; the one, of the Principal Matters that occur in the Text; the other, of those contained in the notes.

Ἡ γὰρ περὶ τούτων [τῶν τὰς ἐκκλησίας γενομένων] γνῶσις, καὶ τοῖς πολλοῖς καὶ εὐκλεισν φέρει. αὐτὸν δὲ τὸν ἐπισάμενον ἀσφαλέσερον ἀπεργάζεται. διιδάσης δὲ μὴ σαλεύεσθαι, πενοφωνίας τινὸς ἐμπεσούσης ἐκλέξεων. Socrat. Eccles. Histor. Lib. 1. Cap. 18.

CAMBRIDGE,

Printed by John Hayes, Printer to the University; For Nathaniel Rolls, at his Auction-House in Petty-Canons, near the North-end of St. Paul's Church-yard; and are to be Sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster 1692.

The Publisher of this ENGLISH Translation to the READER.

VALESIUS has spoken so fully and satisfactorily concerning what He has done in His Edition of these following Ecclesiastick Historians, as to His Amendments of the Greek Text, as to His Latine Version of them, and as to His Explanation of the obscurer passages that occur in them; and besides, has added such compleat Accounts concerning the Lives and Histories of these Authours: (all which particulars, because they were judged necessary to be made known to the English Reader, are done into His own language, and prefixed before each Writer whom they concern:) that 'tis needless to give the Reader any farther trouble here, than barely to acquaint Him, for what reason this English-Translation was at first attempted, and by what Helps and Assistances this attempt has at length been finished.

It can't be supposed a thing unknown to any person, though He may have been but meanly conversant amongst Books, that this is not the first time wherein these Church-Historians have appeared in English. For 'tis now almost a Compleat [a] Century, since Meredith Hanmer Doctour of Divinity, first published His Translation of them all; excepting onely Eusebius's Four Books concerning the Life of the Emperour Constantine, and the Two Orations subjoyned thereto: which, by a Dedication to S^r John Lambe Knight, Doctour of Laws, and Dean of the Arches of Canterbury, seem to have been made English several years after Doctour [b] Hanmer's death, by one M^r Wye Saltonstall.

[b] He dyed at Dublin, of the plague, anno 1604. See Fuller's Worthies of Wales. Flintshire. pag. 39.

After Four Editions of Doctour Hanmer's Translation, a fifth, whereto was added M^r Saltonstall's Version of the Life of Constantine and the Two Orations, was published in the Year 1650. Which Impression being sold off, and the Book become Scarce; the person whose propriety D^r Hanmer's Translation was, some few years since resolved to reprint it. This resolution He communicated to some friends, whom He knew to be able Advisers and Directers in an affair of that Nature. From them He received answer to this effect: that in Doctour Hanmer's Translation they saw many things that wanted Correction, which they supposed were not so much to be attributed to the Doctour, as to the imperfection and mistakes of the Greek Text and those Latine Translatours, which the Doctour had made use of: that now there was a fair way opened, whereby the errours in the Doctour's Translation might be Corrected, in regard the Original Text of these Historians, after it had been compared with several Ancient Manuscripts of the best Note, (whereby the imperfections in it were supplied, and the faults committed in other Editions amended;) was, together with an excellent Latine Version thereof, published at Paris by Henricus Valesius, a person of such eminent Learning, that by the unanimous consent of the Arch-Bishops and Bishops of the Gallican Church, He had been pitcht upon and employed as the fitteſt man to undertake a work of this Nature: and therefore their adviſe was, that the Doctour's Tranſlation ſhould be compared with that Edition of theſe Hiſtorians which Valeſius had publiſhed, and that, whereever it differed, it ſhould be made to agree with the Greek Text thereof.

After receipt of this adviſe, 'twas reſolved it ſhould be followed. And accordingly a Reverend and Learned Divine was prevailed with to undertake this Work. Who, after He had done ſome few Chapters onely of the Firſt Book of Euſebius's Hiſtory, for reaſons beſt known to Himſelf deſiſted. But by this Tryal of His it plainly appeared, that (beſides its being an invidious attempt to go about to interpolate what another perſon had long ſince put his laſt hand to;) it was a work of far greater labour to bring Doctor Hanmer's Tranſlation to an agreement with the Greek Text of Valeſius's Edition, than to make a New One. On which account this latter was reſolv'd upon; and by Divine aſſiſtance being now finiſhed, is here preſented to the Reader's view.

The Reader having been acquainted with the Reaſon why this New Tranſlation was at firſt attempted, 'tis fit He ſhould know farther, by what Helps and Aſſiſtances this attempt has at length been finiſhed.

This Verſion, as has been intimated, was taken immediately from the Greek, according to that Edition which Henricus Valeſius ſet forth at Paris: whence this advantage will accrue, that whatever errours are found in it, will be errours but of one deſcent. Beſides Valeſius's Edition, That which Robert Stephens Printed at Paris in the year 1544, was likewiſe all along conſulted. Nor were the Latine Tranſlatours of theſe Hiſtorians refuſed or neglected: namely theſe four; Muſculus's Verſion Dedicated to Edward the Sixth, King of England, and Printed at Baſil in the year 1549; the Tranſlation of John Chriſtophorſon (heretofore [a] Maſter of Trinity Colledge in Cambridge, afterwards Biſhop of Chicheſter;) Printed at Coloigne. in the year 1570; John Curterius's Verſion, or rather his Emendation of Chriſtophorſon's, Printed at Paris in the year 1571; and laſtly Grinæus's Tranſlation, ſet forth at Baſil in the year 1591. All which Verſions were all along inſpected; and in all places that required it, their Diſagreements or Conſents are (as the Reader will find,) taken notice of; unleſs the Learned Valeſius's diligence had made thoſe Remarks needleſs.

As for the Notes they are in a manner all Valeſius's: nor is any Remark of his left untranſlated (though perhaps ſome times made ſhorter;) that was judg'd of uſe to an Engliſh Reader, and becoming an Engliſh Tranſlation. If the Reader does, as now and then He will, meet with a Note that has not Valeſius's name ſet at the bottome; He may conclude that not to be Valeſius's; however, He generally meets with ſome intimation or other, whereby notice is given him, on what authority ſuch a remark is grounded. But whereas in Valeſius's Edition, His Notes on all theſe Hiſtorians are placed together in a Body by themſelves, at the latter end of each Authour whereto they belong: here the Reader has them embodied with the Text, and by the Letters of the Alphabet He is ſhown the paſſages in the Hiſtory, whereof they treat. In which method the Reader's eaſe was conſulted, that He might not have the trouble and interruption given Him, of turning forward and backward, from the Matter to the Notes, and from thence to the Matter.

How

To the Reader.

How far this Tranſlation is beholding to That done by Doctour Hanmer, will quickly be diſcovered by any, that ſhall take the pains to compare them. It need not be diſſembled, that the Doctour's Verſion has been ſeen; and 'tis as needleſs to detain the Reader in ſhewing Him by tedious inſtances, that He has not been, nor could have been followed, without a departure from the Original Greek as publiſhed by Valeſius.

It onely remains, that the Reader be entreated, before He peruſes this Tranſlation, to mend thoſe faults in it that are mentioned in The Errata; and to pardon all others He ſhall meet with. Which that He may the eaſier be perſwaded to, He is deſired to be mindful of this excellent ſaying:

Μηδὲν ἁμαρτεῖν θεῖ θεῷ, καὶ πάντα κατορθῶν:
'Tis God's property to miſtake in nothing, and to correct all things.

Chap. 2. An Address to the Church, and to his Hearers, that they would Pardon and amend his mistakes. 636

Chap. 3. That God is both the Father of The Logos, and the Framer of the whole Creation; and, that it were impossible for things to consist, if their Causes were diverse. 637

Chap. 4. Concerning their Errour who worship Images. 638

Chap. 5. That Christ the Son of God framed all things, and has appointed to every thing the term of its Existence. ibid.

Chap. 6. Concerning Fate; that what is discourst of it, is false; and this is demonstrated, both from Humane Laws, and things created; which are moved, not disorderly, but in a regular manner; by which order of theirs, they demonstrate the Command of the Creator. 639

Chap. 7. That, in things which we can't understand, we ought to glorifie the Creator's wisdom; nor must must we suppose Chance, or any thing else, save God, to be the cause of them. pag. 641

Chap. 8. That God does plentifully supply men with those things that are usefull; but, with such as are for delight, He furnishes them in an indifferent manner only; bestowing both sorts, so as may be agreeable to their profit and advantage. ibid.

Chap. 9. Concerning the Philosophers, who, because they desired to know all things, erred as to their Opinions; and some of them were exposed to dangers. Also, concerning the Opinions of Plato. 642

Chap. 10. Concerning those men, who do not only reject the Dogmata of the Sacred Scriptures, but them of the Philosophers also; and, that we either ought to give the Poets credit in all things, or in nothing. 643

Chap. 11. Concerning our Lord's coming in the flesh, what it was, and for what reasons it has hapned. ibid.

Chap. 12. Concerning those who knew not this Mystery; and, that their ignorance is voluntary; and, what great blessings await those who know it, and especially them who have died in Confession. 647

Chap. 13. That a difference of the parts of the Creation is necessary; and that a propensity to Good and Evil, springs from the will of men; and therefore, that the judgment of God is necessary, and agreeable to Reason. 648

Chap. 14. That a created nature is at a vast distance from an Essence which is uncreated: and, that man approaches neareſt to God, by a virtuous Life. ibid.

Chap. 15. What Precepts our Saviour delivered, and what Miracles he wrought; and how beneficial He hath been to those who own a subjection to Him. 649

Chap. 16. That the Coming of Christ is foretold by the Prophets; and, that he was appointed for the destruction of Idols, and Idolatrous Cities. 650

Chap. 17. Concerning the wisdom of Moses, which was emulated by the Wise men amongst the Heathens; also concerning Daniel, and the Three Children. 651

Chap. 18. Concerning Sibylla Erythræa, who propheſied in an Acroſtick of verſes, manifeſting our Lord and his Paſſion. The Acroſtick is this; JESUS CHRIST, SON OF GOD, SAVIOUR, CROSS. 652

Chap. 19. That this Propheſie concerning our Saviour, was not forged by any of the Chriſtians; but was written by Sibylla Erythræa, whoſe books Cicero rendred into Latine Verſe, before the coming of Chriſt. And, that Virgil makes mention of this Sibyll, as alſo of a Virgin delivered of a Child: but He ſang of this Myſtery, obſcurely; out of a fear of thoſe then in power. 654

Chap. 20. Other Verſes of Virgilius Maro's concerning Chriſt, and the interpretation of them; in which 'tis ſhown, but obſcurely, as the uſage of Poets is, that The Myſtery is diſcloſed. 655

Chap. 21. That 'tis impoſſible for theſe things to be ſpoken concerning a meer Man: and, that unbelievers, by reaſon of their ignorance of the Divine worſhip, know not even whence they have their being. 657

Chap. 22. The Emperour's Thanksgiving, wherein He aſcribes his Victories, and all his other Bleſſings, to Chriſt; alſo a Reproof of Maximinus the Tyrant of thoſe times, who by the ſeverity of his Perſecution had increaſed the Glory of the Chriſtian Religion. 658

Chap. 23. Concerning the Polity of the Chriſtians: and, that the Deity rejoyces in thoſe who lead Virtuous lives: and, that we ought to expect a Judgement, and a Retribution. 659

Chap. 24. Concerning Decius, Valerianus, and Aurelianus, who ended their lives miſerably, becauſe of their Perſecution of the Church. 660

Chap. 25. Concerning Diocletian, who with infamy reſigned the Empire; and, by reaſon of his Perſecuting the Church, was ſtricken with Thunder. ibid.

Chap. 26. That God is the cauſe of the Emperour's Piety; and, that we ought to ſeek proſperous events from God, and to impute them to him; but muſt aſcribe faults to our own ſloth and negligence. 661

Euſebius Pamphilus's Oration in praiſe of the Emperour Conſtantine, ſpoken at his Tricennalia, is divided into XVIII. Chapters, without Contents.

ANcient Writers were wont, before their Books, to ſet an Index [or, Contents] of the Chapters; to the end, the Readers might know, at firſt ſight as 'twere, what was treated of in each Book. Now this was uſually done by them two ways. For they either prefixt the Contents of all the Books together, before their whole work; as Plinius Secundus has done in his Books of Natural Hiſtory. Or elſe their uſage was, to ſet the Contents of the Chapters before each Book; as Our Euſebius has done in His Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. For 'tis not to be doubted, but Euſebius did Himſelf make theſe Contents or Titles of the Chapters, and ſet them before His Books of Hiſtory, as they now occur. We may indeed obſerve, that in theſe Contents Euſebius does always Speak of Himſelf in the firſt perſon. For inſtance, after the Contents of the Chapters of the Second Book, theſe words occur; Σημ. ὅτι σωθὲν ἡμῖν ἡ βίβλος, ἀπὸ τῆς Κλήμεντος, Τερτυλλιανοῦ, Ἰωσήπου καὶ Φίλωνος. That is, Note, that this Book was collected by us, out of the Writings of Clemens, Tertullian, Joſephus, and Philo. Beſides, in His Seventh Book, theſe are the Contents of the laſt Chapter. Περὶ τῶν καθ' ἡμᾶς αὐτοὺς διαπρεψάντων ἐκκλησιαστικῶν ἀνδρῶν, &c. That is, Concerning thoſe Eccleſiaſtick perſons who were famous in Our Own age, &c. Whence it may plainly be gathered, that Euſebius the Compiler of this Hiſtory, was the Authour of The Contents of the Chapters alſo. Beſides, Rufinus, who rendred the Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory into Latine, about Six hundred years after Euſebius's death, found the ſame Contents in His Greek Copy, which now occur in Our Copies. And this is apparent from Rufinus's Manuſcript Copies, one of which, written out above Seven hundred years ſince, I have in my Cuſtody. For in them, the Contents of the Chapters are always ſet before every Book, in the ſame order wherein they are now placed in Our Greek Manuſcript Copies. And Rufinus calls them Capitula. But Caſſiodorus, in His Preface to the Tripartite Hiſtory, terms them righter Titulos; as does likewiſe S^t Cyprian, in His Exhortation to Martyrdom [written] to Fortunatus. Compendium feci, ſays He, ut propoſitis titulis, quos quis noſcere debeat & tenere; Capitula Dominica Subnecterem. Where you ſee that Tituli are diſtinguiſhed from Capitula. Moreover, Suidas, in the word κεφάλαιον, and in the word πίναξ, remarks that Tituli differ from Capitula. For inſtance, S^t Matthew [He ſays] contains Sixty eight Tituli, but Three hundred fifty five Capitula; and ſo concerning the other Goſpels. Capitulum is properly a part of a Book, which contains the entire Narrative of ſome one thing. But Titulus is an Index ſet above the Capitulum; and ſometimes One Titulus or Title contains many Capita or Chapters, as may be ſeen in The Pandects of the Civil Law. The ſame thing was heretofore viſible in S^t Matthew's Goſpel, which had more Chapters than Titles, as Suidas does atteſt. So alſo in the other Goſpels. For, that paſſage which occurs in Suidas, namely, that S^t Mark had fourty eight Tituli, and but thirty ſix Capita, is faulty, and inſtead of thirty ſix, it muſt be mended thus, two hundred thirty three, as may be plainly gathered from The Canons of the Goſpels which Our Euſebius compoſed. But ſometimes each Titulus does anſwer each Capitulum, as 'tis in theſe Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. And in the Mazarine and Medicæan Copies, The Titali or Contents of each Book are prefixed, together with the Numeral Notes, or, Figures. But in The Fuketian Manuſcript, after the Titulus, κεφάλαιον is added, together with the Numeral Note. But this term never occurs in thoſe Excellent Copies which I have mentioned. Yea, inſtead thereof, I found the Word τόμος placed in the Beginning of the Fourth Book, over the very Contents of the Chapters; Λόγος τετάρτης τόμοι. That is, The Contents of the Fourth Book. VALESIUS'S PREFACE,

To HIS EDITION of

EUSEBIUS'S HISTORY.

HAving performed the Office of a Solemn [a] Dedication, 'tis now time, Most Illustrious Prelates! That I should give You a particular Account of my Work. For, whereas this Labour was undertaken by me, on Your account chiefly, and by Your Command; I do both wish, and also hope, that before all others, You will be the Readers and Judges of my Work. There are three things therefore, which I have endeavoured to perform in this Edition. The first is, an Amendment of the Greek Text: The second, a Latine Version of it. The third is, an Explanation of the obscurer places. As touching the Latine Version, after three Translatours of Eusebius's History, I have made a fourth. But no person before us, had attempted an Amendment and Explanation of the Eusebian Work. But, that I may speak more distinctly concerning each particular in its place and order, I will begin first from the Emendation. Whoever attempt a new Edition of old Writers, those persons must of necessity begin their Labour from an Emendation. So Origen, after He had undertaken a New Edition of the Seventy Interpreters, and had found many passages in them that were doubtfull and disagreeable by reason of the diversitie of Copies, in the first place Laboured in an Emendation of them. And having compared the Copies of the Seventy Seniors, partly with the Hebrew Text, partly with three other Editions, namely Aquila's, Theodotion's, and Symmachus's; He took out all those Errours which had crept into the Edition of the Seventy Seniors. For this He himself intimates, in His Eighth Tractate on S^t Matthew, in these words. [b] In Exemplaribus quidem Veteris Testamenti, quæcunque fuerunt inconsonantia, Deo præstante coaptare potuimus; utentes judicio cæterarum Editionum. Ea enim quæ videbantur apud Septuaginta dubia esse propter Consonantiam Exemplariorum, facientes judicium ex Editionibus reliquis, convenientia Servavimus. Indeed, in the Copies of the Old Testament, whatever [passages] were disagreeable, by God's assistance we have been able to make fit; using the judgment of the rest of the Editions. For those [passages] which seemed in the Seventy to be doubtful by reason of the agreement of Copies, making a judgment from the other Editions, we have preserved agreeable.

[a] Valesius Dedicated His first Volume, (which contains Eusebius's Ten Books of History, His Life of Constantine, Constantine's Oration, and His Own,) to the Arch-Bishops, Bishops, and the whole Clergy of the Gallican Church.

Origen's Example was afterwards followed by S^t Jerome, who bestowed a new Edition of the Seventy Translatours mended by Himself, and distinguished by Asterisks and Obelisks, on the men of His own Language, as He Himself attests in several places. And that I may speak also concerning profane Writers, Crates and Aristarchus, Grammarians, who set forth most accurate Editions of Homer's Poem, have done nothing else in a manner, but mended and distinguished that Work. In like manner therefore, when I had resolved to publish a New Edition of the Eusebian History, I used my utmost Industry and diligence in its Emendation. Two Editions onely of Eusebius's History have hitherto come forth in Greek. The one is the Paris-Edition, which Robert Stephens Printed; a person who on this very account has deserved highly of Learning, because He was the first that published the Body of Ecclesiastick History in a most Excellent Letter. The other is the Geneva-Edition. But this has in the Greek Text every where expresst that Edition of Robert Stephens: save onely, that it has various Readings and Emendations set at the margin, [taken] out of the Copies of Learned men; and, that out of those Copies it has supplied some imperfections which occur in the Books concerning the Life of Constantine. Therefore, my pains was to be beſtowed upon that one Edition onely of Robert Stephens. Which, with as much diligence as I could, I have compared with Four Manuſcript Copies of the beſt Note, and have reſtored it in many places. Two of theſe Four Copies, the King's Library furniſht us with. The former bears the Arms of Francis the fifſt; written on Silken paper, about four hundred years ſince; and it does ſometimes exhibit ſingular Readings, and very different from the other Copies. This is that, which in my Notes I have named The King's Copy. The other is out of the Medicæan Library, which being now removed into the King's, is called by one and the ſame name of the King's Library. This, to diſtinguiſh it from that former Copy, is in Our Notes termed the Medicæan Copy. Which, though it be ſomething leſs ancient, is nevertheleſs tranſcribed from an excellent Copy, and by a Learned hand. Robert Stephens had made uſe of Both theſe Copies, in His Edition of the Euſebian Hiſtory. And in His Printing of the Text it ſelf, He has almoſt every where followed the King's Copy, and very ſeldom departs from its footſteps, as I have remark'd in my Notes. But in the diſtinction of the Chapters, He has expreſt the Medicæan Copy, wherein the Contents are ſet before each Chapter, and are written in Red-Letters. There is, beſides thoſe, a third Copy, belonging to the moſt Eminent Cardinal Julius Mazarinus. Before I ſpeak concerning the goodneſs and excellency of which Copy, it is requiſite, and You (Moſt illuſtrious Prelates!) with importunity ſeem to crave this very thing of me, that a few words ſhould be ſaid concerning the Moſt Eminent Cardinal, by whom that Copy was lent me. For, whereas this Moſt Eminent Prince, born to every thing that is Great, does embrace Learning with a ſingular affection and benevolence; We, who from our infancy have applied our minds to the Studies of Learning, ſhould doubtleſs be ungrateful, ſhould we not, both in our own, and in the name of all Learned men in general, ſtudy to render Him all poſſible Thanks, as well in words, as in our Writings. Farther, with what favour and how great a benevolence He does honour and reſpect Learning, His bounteous Liberality and Munificence towards Learned men does atteſt; which, to ſpeak nothing concerning other perſons, [a] He was lately willing ſhould be extended even to me alſo, when I neither hop'd for, nor thought of any ſuch thing. The ſame thing is declar'd by His moſt compleatly-furniſht Library. Which having ſtor'd with innumerable Copies of the Beſt Writers, partly Printed, and partly in Manuſcript; He does not keep it perpetually ſhut like ſome Sepulchre, as thoſe old Senators of the City Rome did, whom [b] Ammianus Marcellinus doth ſharply reprove on that very account: but opens it, as 'twere ſome publick Houſe, to all the Learned; and voluntarily invites each perſon to it; and freely imparts the uſe of His Manuſcript Books to the Studious, as often as they ſhall have need. What ſhall I ſay concerning His other virtues and eximious Accompliſhments of mind? What concerning His wonderful Moderation and Lenity, whereby He hath allayed inteſtine Commotions and Tumults, without the bloud of any Citizen? But, theſe things will be ſpoken by me more fitly at another time, or more rhetorically by others. For at preſent I have reſolved, to purſue thoſe praiſes of His onely, which do apart belong to the Studies of Literature. Nevertheleſs, I can't poſſibly refrain my ſelf, but muſt ſpeak ſomething here concerning that Peace, which the moſt Eminent Cardinal, with all imaginable earneſtneſs and induſtry, does now chiefly urge and promote, and which we hope will in a ſhort time be made publick by His Majeſties [c] Proclamation. For, this thing is of great concern to the advantage of Learning; which every one knows to be the child of Peace, and to repoſe it ſelf under its Umbrage and defence. Whereas therefore the moſt Eminent Cardinal, when firſt placed at the Helm of State, had not Himſelf raiſed a diſmal War with the Spaniards, but had found it already raiſed: by various Councills (as ['tis requiſite] in ſo Great an affair,) long and accurately weighed, at length He hath reſolv'd upon this; that the Spaniards are to be broken by a laſting War, and muſt really be made to know how powerfull the French are in Arms, Riches, Valour, Conſtancy, and the other neceſſary Proviſions and Helps for a War: that the Enemy, made ſenſible of their own weakneſs and the power of the French, might be ſlower in future to provoke Our Nation, either by Arms or injuries. For ['twas His Sentiment,] that a firm and ſecure Peace could no otherwiſe be made with the Enemy, than till ſuch time as by their frequent Overthrows and Loſſes they had perceived, that they were inferiour to the French in waging War. Therefore, when the Spaniards, no otherwiſe than the Phrygians, had at length underſtood that; then the moſt Eminent Cardinal, perceiving a fit opportunity of entring into a Peace preſented it ſelf, refus'd not to make it with the Enemy, and to recede ſomething from Our Right, from the chief point of the whole War, laſtly from that Hope and Victory which we had now almoſt in our hands; that thereby He might [promote] the Good of the people, [anſwer] the wiſhes of all good men, and gratifie the deſire of the whole Chriſtian world. In which affair I can't indeed enough admire His ſingular prudence, and His wiſdom that was ſo ſalutary to the State. For the Peace was for no other reaſon deferred ſo long, than that in future it might be laſtinger and more firm. And let thus much be ſaid by the by, concerning the praiſes of the moſt Eminent Cardinal. Who having, during the War, never deſiſted from cheriſhing Learning and Learned men in a moſt gracious manner; 'tis much more to be hop'd, that in the time of His Own Peace, He will embrace the ſame Arts with a choice Affection and Care: and will bring it to effect, that Our French, who for the Glory of Arms have been always eminent above other Nations, may now excell for the praiſe of Learning,

[a] He allowed Valeſius a yearly penſion of 1500 Livers; which ſum the Cardinal ſent him yearly, as long as he lived; and by his Will continued it till Valeſius's death: See Valeſius's Life, written by his Brother Hadrian.

[c] Or, Cryers,

Learning, and in the ſtudies of the beſt Arts. But, 'tis now time, that we ſhould return thither, whence we have digreſs'd. That third Copy therefore, which the Library of the Moſt Eminent Cardinal hath furniſhed us with, is far the beſt and ancienteſt of all thoſe Copies of Euſebius which I have ſeen. For, whatever Emendations we found in other Copies, are all ſhown us by that Manuſcript: and many other Amendments occur in it, which I found not in other Copies, as the Studious Readers will be able to perceive from my Annotations. It is written in Parchment, [tranſcrib'd] about ſeven hundred years ſince, moſt neatly and alſo moſt correctly. It has likewiſe [a] Short Expoſitions now and then ſet at the ſide, ſometimes in an ancient, ſometimes in a more modern hand; which Expoſitions we have ſet down in Our Notes, at their due places. Many other things alſo are to be taken notice of in that Excellent Manuſcript, partly in the Accents, partly in the [b] Diſtinction or Punctation. For, as to the Accents, in that Manuſcript words are often acuted, which in other Copies have a Circumflex Accent. For inſtance, πῶ and καίσαρ in that Copy are always acuted. But on the contrary, σφῖσι, which in other Manuſcripts is mark'd with an acute Accent, is Circumflected in that Copy. And this in my judgment is righter. But, as to the Diſtinction, which we vulgarly term the Punctation, this Copy is ſo accurately poynted, that from this very one Manuſcript you may underſtand the whole manner and knowledge of poynting, which is a thing of no ſmall moment. Indeed, before I had procured this Copy, I was not thorowly acquainted with the uſefulneſs and neceſſity of the Middle diſtinction; with which, that very one Book diligently inſpected and examined, hath at length made me acquainted. But, we ſhall ſpeak more hereafter, concerning the Diſtinction. This moreover I have obſerved in that moſt ancient Manuſcript, as often as a [c] full diſtinction, or τελεία στιγμὴ is ſet in any Line, the firſt Letter of the following Line appears without the order of the reſt, and touches upon the very outward margin. And this is a ſigne, that a new Chapter, or a new period is begun after that final diſtinction. I have obſerved the ſame in the other Manuſcript Copies alſo. Indeed, in the Old Sheets of the King's Library, which contain Euſebius's Books concerning the Life of Conſtantine, I have found that 'tis always ſo, as often as a new Chapter is begun. We had, beſides, a fourth Copy out of the Library of that moſt illuſtrious perſonage Nicholas Fuket, who bears the Office of Procuratour General in the Senate of Paris, and at the ſame time manages the Præfecture of the Royal Treaſury, with the higheſt commendation. And theſe four Manuſcript Copies we have made uſe of, in order to our amendment of the Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. But, we have compared the Books concerning the Life of the Emperour Conſtantine, with three ancient Copies. The firſt is that Copy of the King's, concerning which I have ſpoken above, in which Manuſcript, before the Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, occur the four Books concerning the Life of the Emperour Conſtantine, written, though not in the ſame, nevertheleſs in an ancient hand. The ſecond place belongs to the Old Sheets of the King's Library. So I call certain papers, which are digeſted into Quaternions; but they are looſe, and are not made up into the form of a Book. In theſe Sheets, beſides Euſebius's Books concerning the Life of Conſtantine, and the Oration of the ſame Emperour to the Saints, occurs the firſt Quaternion of the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory; whereof I have likewiſe made frequent mention in my Notes. All the reſt of it, by what accident I know not, is loſt. The Fuketian Library furniſhed us with the third Copy. Wherein, before the four Books concerning the Life of the Emperour Conſtantine, is prefixt Euſebius's Panegyrick, ſpoken to the ſame Conſtantine, in the thirtieth year of His Empire. This Copy, though of the meaneſt Antiquity, is nevertheleſs of the beſt Note, and in many places more correct and larger than thoſe two former, which Robert Stephens made uſe of in His Edition. Beſides theſe Manuſcript Copies, we were aſſiſted by thoſe various Readings and Emendations, which learned men had with their own hands noted at the margin of Robert Stephens's Edition: Of which ſort many Books are now to be found. But we made uſe more eſpecially of three, which are likewiſe often mentioned in our Notes. The firſt was Hadrian Turnebus's, which with great exactneſs He had compared with The King's, and The Medicæan Copy. But the Books concerning the Life of the Emperour Conſtantine, had been compared with an Engliſh Copy, either by the hand of Hadrian Turnebus Himſelf, or that of Odo Turnebus. The ſecond Copy was Vulcobius's; which, becauſe Renatus Moræus a Phyſician of Paris had lent me, I am wont in my Notes to term Moræus's Copy. This Book contains ſome few other Emendations, beſides thoſe which occur in Turnebus's Copy. The third was S[r] Henry Savil's Book, a perſon of incomparable Learning; it was ſent me out of England by James Uſher Arch-Biſhop of Armagh. For, whereas I had perceived, that in Uſher's Notes on the Martyrdom of the B. Polycarp, a Manuſcript Copy of Euſebius's Hiſtory out of S[r] Henry Savil's Library was quoted; and had found, that, by ſome paſſages produced by Uſher, that Copy was of the beſt Note; I made my requeſt to Him by Letter, that he would tranſmit to me the Various Readings of that Copy; for I did ſuppoſe, that the whole Copy had been compared by him. But he wrote back to me, that the Copy it ſelf, written in ſilken paper, had been given by S[r] Henry Savil to the Oxford-Library. But he preſently ſent me Robert Stephens's Edition, in the margin whereof S[r] Henry Savil had noted the Emendations taken out of that his own Manuſcript Copy. Nevertheleſs, as far as I have been able to conjecture, S[r] Henry Savil hath not ſet all the readings of the Manuſcript Copy at the ſide of that Edition; but thoſe onely, which he thought to be good and undoubted. For ſome readings are produced by Uſher out of that Manuſcript Copy, which I afterwards perceived were omitted by S^r Henry Savil. Farther, the same S^r Henry Savil, at the margin of that Edition, hath written many Amendments, out of a Book of John Christophorson's, which Book Christophorson had compared with some Manuscript Copies. These are the Helps from Books, wherewith we were furnished, when we undertook to mend the Books of Eusebius's History. But least any one should perhaps think, that any thing hath been altered by us rashly and at pleasure, we do before all things desire the Readers should know, that we have done nothing without the consent and authority of the Best Copies. And so scrupulous were we, of making any alteration in these Books, that when it appeared most evidently, that the place was corrupted, we refused even then to favour and follow our own conjecture. For proof hereof, may be [produced] a place in the close of the tenth Book of the Ecclesiastick History, pag. 399 [of Our Edition;] which runs thus: ὁ δ' ἀρετῇ πάσῃ θεοσεβείας ἐκπρεπὴς μέγας Θ. νικητὴς καὶ σεβαστὸς. We could very easily have restored the true Reading here, and instead of ἐκπρεπὴς, mended it in this manner, ἐκπρέπων. For so Gelasius Cyzicenus, in [a] His second Book, cites this place of Eusebius; nor is it otherwise written in Eusebius's second Book concerning the Life of Constantine, Chap. 19; where this passage is repeated almost in the very same words. Lastly, no place is mended in this our Edition, concerning which I have not advertised the Reader in my Notes, and have not given an account of mine amendment.

[a] Chap. 1. Pag. 45. Edit. Paris. 1590.

Distinction, or Punctation, is not the last part of Emendation; concerning which I must say something, least peradventure the Readers should be confounded by a new kind of poynting, which was first brought into this Edition by me. Although, if we would speak properly, this is not a new sort of Distinction, but the oldest, and made use of by all the Ancients, as well Greek as Latine Writers: which being wholly disused and lost by the negligence of more modern Authours, I have, at least in part, endeavoured to restore in this Edition. Those Ancients indeed (the figures of Letters being then newly invented,) wrote in one continued form, without any distinction at all. Which thing containing much of difficulty both in reading and pronouncing, the ancient Grammarians found out three positures or distinctions, whereby, as 'twere by certain Stations and Inns, the continued journey of speech might be distinguished and divided. The first they termed ὑποστιγμὴν, that is a subdistinction: the second μέσην, that is a middle distinction: the third τελείαν στιγμὴν, that is a final or full distinction. Now, they noted them by three Poynts plac'd in a different Site. For a Poynt set at the bottom of a Letter, denotes a subdistinction: a middle distinction, which the Latines have termed [b] Moram, is shown by a poynt placed at the middle of a Letter. But that poynt which is set at the head of a Letter, denotes a final distinction. What the import and design of these distinctions is, the Grammarians do inform us; Donatus, and Marius Victorinus, and Diomedes in his Second Book. Which Authour last named, at this place shall be to us instead of all. Lectioni, says he, posituras accedere vel distinctiones oportet, &c. To reading must be added the positures or distinctions, by Græcians termed θέσεις: which, during our reading, give a liberty of recovering breath, least it should fail by a continuation. These are three, a distinction, a subdistinction, a middle distinction or pause, or, as some will have it, a submiddle: the diversity of which [three,] is shown by three Poynts set in a different place. And after some few words. A distinction is a token of silence, when, the sense being ended, there is a Liberty of resting longer. The mark hereof, is a Poynt set above the verse, at the Head of the Letter. A subdistinction is a signe of a meet and convenient silence, whereby the Course of pronunciation (the sense remaining) is so stop'd, that what follows, ought to succeed immediately. The note hereof, is a poynt plac'd under the verse. A pause is a small separation, interpos'd in the continuation of senses, and possesses the middle place of a meet distinction and subdistinction, in such manner that it may seem neither perfect in the whole, nor omitted, but by a signification of staying, may want the beginning of another sense. And it attends this office onely, that by the shortest respiration it may recover and nourish the Reader's breath. For, in pronouncing every one ought in such wise to be silent, that, because the breath it self is changed by a kind of decay, it may afterwards be recovered. As thus,

Ut belli signum Laurenti Turnus ab arce
Extulit, & rauco strepuerunt cornua Cantu.
Utque acres concussit equos, utque impulit arma.
Extemplo turbati animi.

For, there are many middle clauses of this reading. First, least those be confounded, which are put as double-membred and treble-membred [clauses,] and the like. Then, that the [c] Emphasis of the words may be more eminently apparent and conspicuous, which may be moved by some affection, either by indignation, or commiseration compared, &c. Such marks therefore of distinctions and punctations as these, all the ancients as well Greeks as Latines, made use of in their Books: which also, as 'tis manifest, were still in use, in the age of Isidorus Hispalensis. For this we learn from His Origines, Book 1. Chap. 19. In Manuscript Copies likewise which are somewhat ancienter, the same way of distinguishing is always observed. But more modern Writers, whether whether by unskilfullneſs or a kind of ſloth and negligence, have changed them all. And inſtead of a ſubdiſtinction, they have put [d] little rods; for the mark of a middle diſtinction, two poynts: but they have caſt the Note of a final diſtinction from the head to the feet of a Letter. Which ill way of poynting almoſt all Printers have followed, except Aldus Manucius. For he in his Edition of Greek Books, whereof he Printed almoſt an innumerable company, hath always retained that punctation, which he had found in Manuſcript Copies. As to the Little Rods, I would not condemn them. For 'tis of very ſmall moment, what mark we ſhould make uſe of, to denote a ſubdiſtinction, provided that mark be placed at the feet of a Letter. Indeed, in that Excellent and moſt ancient Manuſcript belonging to the Mazarine Library, whereof I have made mention before, I found a little rod placed ſometimes for a middle, ſometimes for a final diſtinction; that is, ſometimes at the middle of a letter, ſometimes at the top. And not onely by a little rod, but alſo by a Sicilicum or ἁπλῆ turned backwards, a middle diſtinction was ſometimes denoted, as Victorinus informs us in his firſt Book of the Art of Grammar. But, whereas we now-a-days put a point at the feet of a letter for a final diſtinction, in my judgment that can in no wiſe be born with. For it does not onely contradict Antiquity, but Reaſon alſo. For Reaſon requires, that a mark placed in the ſame ſite, ſhould denote the ſame diſtinction. A poynt therefore placed in the bottom ought to ſignifie the ſame that a little rod does, which is ſet at the bottom of a Letter. For, not the mark it ſelf, but the ſite of the mark alters the diſtinction. Whence 'tis made evident, that a final diſtinction is not rightly ſhown by us, by our ſetting a poynt at the feet of a Letter. Wherefore, 'tis not without reaſon that I have endeavoured to reſtore the old way of Punctation in this Edition. I have indeed retained the Little Rod it ſelf, in regard in denoting a ſubdiſtinction it ſerves for the ſame purpoſe with a poynt: but from the authority of the Manuſcript Copies, I have, by way of Recovery as 'twere, put the middle diſtinction into poſſeſſion of its own places. The advantage and neceſſity whereof, the ſtudious, I hope, will ſoon acknowledge. For, that middle diſtinction does not onely ſerve for this purpoſe, that breath may be taken in order to a continuing the beginning of another ſenſe, and that the Emphaſis may be more eminently apparent and conſpicuous, as Diomedes writes; but alſo, to denote the difference of perſons and dignities. So ſomewhere in theſe Books, where the reading is ὑπισκόπων πρεσβυτέρων τε καὶ διακόνων, the Moſt Eminent Cardinal's Manuſcript, after the word ὑπισκόπων, adds a middle diſtinction. Beſides, in many places I have ſet a poynt at the head of the Letter, to denote a final diſtinction: and would have done that every where, had not the force of old cuſtom diverted me from my attempt. But, what I have in part onely performed in this Edition, that (I hope) will at length be perfected by others endued with greater Learning and Authority, who ſhall in future publiſh the Books of the Ancients. And thus much may ſuffice to have been ſpoken briefly concerning Our Emendation and Punctation. Come we now to the Latine Tranſlation.

I doubt not but there will be many who will admire, why, after three Latine Tranſlatour's of Euſebius, and thoſe not meanly vers'd in the Greek Tongue, I ſhould have made a fourth Verſion. To whom in the firſt place I anſwer thus. If after Ruſinus, who firſt turned the Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory into Latine, Muſculus might have leave to make a new Tranſlation; if again, after Muſculus, Chriſtophorſon might have leave to do the ſame, why ſhould not I alſo have the like Liberty with others? Amongſt the Jews, after the Edition of the Seventy Seniours, confirmed by the Religion of ſo many oaths, by the authority of ſo many ages; firſt Aquila, then Theodotion and Symmachus, did each of them publiſh new Verſions of the Old Teſtament. Alſo, ſome perſons are found to be the Authors of a fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh Edition, whoſe names are unknown: and all theſe Tranſlations Origen hath plac'd in His Hexapla, that they might be read by Catholicks. That therefore which the Jews were free to do in the Old Teſtament, why may not I have leave to do in Euſebius? eſpecially, in regard 'tis leſs dangerous to attempt that in Euſebius, than in the ſacred Books of the divine Scriptures. Indeed, many and thoſe cogent reaſons enforc'd me even againſt my will, to undergo the burthen of this new Tranſlation. For, whereas by [e] Your Command and with Your Advice I had undertaken a new Edition of the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory; and perceived, that the Verſions of former Tranſlatours, by reaſon of their frequent miſtakes and ill Renditions, did in no wiſe ſatisfie the deſire of Learned men; as it has been [f] already declared by the Teſtimony of J. Curterius and Peter Halloixius: one of theſe two things was of neceſſity to be performed by me, that I ſhould either correct the old Tranſlation, or elſe make a new one. Farther, to correct the Tranſlation of others, as it is in it ſelf a thing troubleſome and difficult, ſo alſo it ſeemed invidious. For, His own praiſe and His own honour, is from us due to each perſon. They have done as much as in them lay, and by their own pains have endeavoured to lighten and leſſen Our Labour. Therefore, the Work of each Tranſlatour ought to be commended by us, rather than interpolated. Ruſinus, although He follows the ſenſe of Euſebius rather than His words, is nevertheleſs neat and clean, and not unpleaſant to the Readers: and even on this very account highly to be commended, becauſe He was the firſt that beſtowed the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory on men of the Latine Tongue; whoſe Tranſlation the Weſtern Church has made uſe of till Our own age. Muſculus keeps cloſer to the words, and in tranſlating is ſhort and clear, and in many places more happy than Chriſtophorſon.

ſon. Chriſtophorſon, as He is more diligent and learneder than Muſculus, ſo alſo is more verboſe; and has ſomething of the Style of Cicero. Beſides, He uſed Manuſcript Copies in the making His Tranſlation: and was the firſt that publiſhed Euſebius's Panegyrick ſpoken at Conſtantine's Tricennalia, in Latine; which the Geneva-Printers afterwards Printed in Greek. Some body will be ready to ſay here. What need then was there of a new Verſion? whenas thoſe Tranſlatours abound with ſo many and ſuch high commendations. I rehearſe their praiſes, but do not detect their errours: which I had rather ſhould be diſcovered by the teſtimony of others, than mine own. But, if any one will read my Notes, or ſhall have a mind to compare my Tranſlation with their Verſion, He will doubtleſs underſtand, with how many and how groſs miſtakes their Tranſlations are ſtuft; and that 'twas not without reaſon, that You had ordered me to make a new Verſion of Euſebius. But, becauſe I am faln upon this diſcourſe, not willingly but by a neceſſity, I will ſay ſomething briefly concerning the errours of former Tranſlatours. For, ſhould I have a mind to reckon up all their miſtakes one by one, my diſcourſe would be ſtretcht to a vaſt length. To begin therefore with Rufinus; who knows not, that, at his pleaſure, he has added many paſſages to Euſebius, has taken away many paſſages from him, has changed many; and in moſt places is rather a Paraphraſt than a Tranſlatour? For inſtance, in the Seventh Book he has inſerted a tedious Narrative concerning the Miracles of Gregory Thaumaturgus, which occurs not in the Copies of Our Euſebius. The ſame perſon, in the Ninth Book, rehearſes a ſpeech of Lucian the Martyr, ſpoken before the Judge in defence of our faith; which Speech the Copies of Euſebius do not acknowledge. He has omitted almoſt the whole Tenth Book of the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, in his Verſion. I ſay nothing here concerning the Chapters altered by him in the Sixth and Seventh Book, in as much as I have given the Reader notice of this thing, in my Notes. How many places of Euſebius are miſunderſtood and ill rendred by him? This is he, who of Zacharias the Prieſt, of whom mention is made in Saint Luke's Goſpel, has made us a Martyr of Lyons. This is he who hath confounded Biblias with Blandina. This is he who has made the moſt noble Martyr Philoromus a Tribune of Souldiers, from his being a Rationaliſt. To what purpoſe is it to ſpeak concerning Muſculus, whoſe Verſions (for he has tranſlated other Writers alſo into Latine,) are not extraordinarily approved of by the Learned? I could, if I had a mind, expoſe his innumerable miſtakes: amongſt which this is a notorious one. Dionyſius Alexandrinus, in his Epiſtle to Germanus, which Euſebius records in his Sixth [g] Book, ſays that he was taken by the Souldiers ἀφὶ ἡλίῳ δυσμάς, and was brought to Tapoſiris. But Muſculus believed Heliodyſmas to be a Town. For thus he renders it. Ego namque cùm Heliodyſmas unà cum illis qui mecum erant veniſſem, Tapoſirim à militibus ductus ſum. For I, after I was come to Heliodyſmæ, together with them that were with me, was brought by the Souldiers to Tapoſiris. Farther, the ſame Muſculus in his Tranſlation has wholly omitted Euſebius's Book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, which is ſubjoyn'd to the Eighth Book of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory; for what reaſon I know not. For that Book of Euſebius's, is a moſt Elegant one. The Tranſlation of John Chriſtophorſon remains [to be ſpoken of,] which very Verſion wants not its Blemiſhes. For, to omit the Barbariſms which do frequently occur in it, his Tranſlation is too prolix and intricate, whilſt he either adds ſome words to fill up the period, or annexes his own Explanations in order to the clearing of an obſcure place. Sometimes alſo, of two periods he makes but one, and puts two Chapters into one: in ſo much that, the diviſion of the Latine Chapters in his Tranſlation differs much from the Greek. Which thing, how much trouble and vexation it breeds in citing places out of Euſebius, all the Studious know. The ſame Tranſlatour was indeed ſufficiently well vers'd in Divinity: but he was meanly furniſhed with the skill of [h] a Critick, and with the knowledge of Roman antiquity. Wherefore, in the proper names of Roman Magiſtrates, and in thoſe matters which appertain to the Civil Adminiſtration, he is always out: for inſtance, in rendring the words ἡγεμών, στρατηγός, ἐπαρχικῆς τάξεως, and in other ſuch like terms. Laſtly, Chriſtophorſon has embodied Euſebius's Book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, (which in Robert Stephens's Edition, and in the Manuſcript Copies, is ſubjoyned to the Eighth Book of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory,) with his Eighth Book, becauſe he believ'd it to be a part thereof. Which miſtake of Chriſtophorſon's, the Geneva-Printers having afterwards followed, that they might make the Greek agree with the Latine; of two Books of Euſebius's, have made but one. And let thus much be briefly ſpoken concerning the Errours of former Tranſlations, not with any deſign to diſparage, or leſſen the glory of any Tranſlatour; but, that all the Studious may underſtand, that we had good reaſon for our undertaking a new Tranſlation. Which as I dare not warrant to be perfect and every way compleat, (for that would be too much confidence;) ſo I do boldly affirm, that it wants very many faults, wherewith former Tranſlations do abound. Further, whereas three things are required in a Verſion; namely that it be faithfull, Elegant, and clear; I have made it my Buſineſs, that no one of theſe ſhould be wanting in our Tranſlation.

[g] Chap. 40.

[h] Or, Critical Art.

The Tranſlation is followed by the Annotations. Wherein I had an eye chiefly to two things: firſt that I might give an account of my Emendations, and might propoſe to the Studious the various Readings of Manuſcript Copies: Secondly, that I might clear the obſcurer paſſages in Euſebius, and might explain the ancient Uſages and Rites of the Church, by producing and comparing comparing the passages of other Writers. To my Annotations I have subjoyned [a] four dissertations. The first whereof is, Concerning the Beginning and Progress of the Schism of the Donatists. The Second, Concerning the Anastasis and the Jerusalem-Martyrium. This is followed by a disputation about the Version of the Seventy Translatours against James Usher Arch-Bishop of Armagh. The Fourth is, concerning the Roman Martyrologie which Rosweydus published. And these are the things which with care and diligence I have performed in this Edition, in order to the illustration of Eusebius's History. Which if to any one they shall peradventure seem slight and of little worth, let him think, that all things which are published in this kind of Learning, are in a manner of this nature, and are either valued or contemned according to the affection and stomach of the Readers. For, if they find a candid and studious Reader, they are highly esteemed: but if they shall happen to fall into disdainful ears, they are look't upon as nothing. Besides, what but that which is very ordinary and mean can be expected, from me especially, who by reason of my weakness of sight am forc'd both to reade and write by other mens eyes and hands: and who, whilst by reason of the greatness of the Labour I do always hasten forwards, have so hastily dictated this whole work such as it is, that I have scarce had leisure to reade it over again. On which account I am the more to be pardoned, if perhaps in any place of my Notes I have not so fully satisfied the Reader's desire.

VALESIUS'S ACCOUNT

LIFE AND WRITINGS

Euſebius Cæſarienſis.

Concerning the Life of Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea, Acacius His Scholar and Succeſſour in the See of Cæſarea had heretofore written a Book, as [a] Socrates does atteſt. But in regard this Book, together with very many others, is loſt by the careleſneſs of Antiquity, we, by gathering together from this place and t'other the Teſtimonies of Ancient Writers who have ſpoken concerning Euſebius, to the utmoſt of our ability will endeavour to repair that Loſs. Euſebius therefore was born in Paleſtine, about the Cloſe (as 'tis likely) of Gallienus's Reign. That he was a Native of Paleſtine is hence prov'd, becauſe by the Ancients he is commonly call'd a Paleſtinian. So, 'tis certain, Baſilius, Theodoret, and others do term him. And although he might have been thus Sur-nam'd from his being Biſhop of the City Cæſarea, yet it ſeems to me truer, that he drew that Sur-name from his Country. Indeed, he himſelf does atteſt, in his Firſt [b] Book concerning the Life of Conſtantine, that during his being a youth he was educated and converſant in Paleſtine, and that Conſtantine was firſt ſeen by him there, whilſt he made a journey thorow Paleſtine in the Court of Diocletianus Auguſtus. Beſides, in the Second [c] Book of the ſame work (where he records a Law of Conſtantine's, which he wrote to the Paleſtinians in favour of the Chriſtians,) he does plainly ſhew himſelf to have been a Paleſtinian. For, after he has recited the Contents of that Law tranſmitted to the Paleſtinians, he adds theſe words. Τὸ μὲν δὴ πρῶτον ὡς ἡμᾶς κατελάμπρυνεν βασιλέως γράμμα, ταῦτα διετάττετο. Theſe were the Conſtitutions contained in the Emperour's firſt Edict ſent to Us. But whereas I have plac'd his Birth upon the Latter end of Gallienus's Reign; of this thing I have Euſebius himſelf for my Authour. For ſpeaking (in his Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory,) concerning Dionyſius Biſhop of the Alexandrians, he does atteſt that He had lived in his own age, as may be ſeen in Book 3, Chap. 28. Wherefore, in regard 'tis manifeſt that Dionyſius Alexandrinus departed this life on the twelfth year of Gallienus's Empire, Euſebius muſt of neceſſity have been born then; if his age fell on thoſe times wherein Dionyſius lived. The ſame may likewiſe be gathered from the Fifth [d] Book of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, about the end of it, where ſpeaking concerning Artemon's Hereſie, he writes that Paul of Samoſata had revived that Hereſie in [e] his age. Laſtly, relating (in his Seventh Book,) thoſe things which hapned during the Reign of Gallienus, before he begins his Diſcourſe concerning the Errour and Condemnation of Paul of Samoſata, he has theſe words. [f] Ἀλλὰ γὰρ ἤδη μετὰ τοῦτο περὶ τούτων ἱστορίαν, φέρε καὶ τοῦ καθ' ἡμᾶς πῶς μετέπεσεν γνωρίζειν γενεὰν ὁποία τις ἦν, παραδῶμεν. But now, after an hiſtorical relation of theſe things, we will deliver to the knowledge of poſterity an account of our own age. Whom he had for his Parents, is unknown to us, excepting that Nicephorus Calliſtus, following I know not what Authours, does tell us that he was begotten of the Siſter of Pamphilus the Martyr. But in Arius's [g] Letter to Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, he is termed the Brother of Euſebius Nicomedienſis. And although by reaſon of his friendſhip he might be called the Brother, yet it ſeems truer to me, that he was either the near Kinſman or Couſin-germane of Euſebius Nicomedienſis, eſpecially in regard Arius, although many other perſons are there mentioned, yet terms onely Euſebius of Cæſarea Brother to him of Nicomedia. Beſides, Euſebius of Nicomedia was a Native of Syria. For he was at firſt Biſhop of Berytus. Nor was it the uſage then, that ſtrangers and perſons unknown ſhould be preferred to govern Churches. What Maſters he had in ſecular Learning, is in like manner unknown to us. But in ſacred Literature he had Dorotheus the Eunuch, a Presbyter of the Antiochian Church, for his Maſter: of whom alſo he makes an honourable mention in his Seventh [h] Book. Although Euſebius at that place ſays onely, that he had heard Dorotheus, whilſt he expounded the Holy Scriptures in the Church not unfitly. Nevertheleſs, if any one has a mind (with Trithemius) to conclude from thoſe words of Euſebius, that Euſebius was Dorotheus's diſciple, truly I ſhall not very much oppoſe him. Theotecnus being at that time dead, the Biſhoprick of the Church of Cæſarea was adminiſtred niſtred by Agapius, a perſon of eminent piety, and large bounty towards the poor. By him Euſebius was admitted into the Clergy, and entred into the ſtricteſt and moſt intimate friendſhip with Pamphilus, who at that time was eminent amongſt the Preſbyters of the Church of Cæſarea. Pamphilus was by Nation a Phœnician, born at Berytus, Scholar to Pierius a Preſbyter of the Alexandrian Church, as Photius relates. Who (in regard he was inflamed with a ſingular Love of ſacred Learning, and with the greateſt diligence imaginable made a Collection of all the Books of Eccleſiaſtick Writers, and eſpecially of Origen's;) founded a moſt famous School and Library at Cæſarea. Of which School Euſebius ſeems to have been the firſt Maſter. Indeed Euſebius, in his [a] Book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, writes in expreſs words, that Apphianus, who compleated his Martyrdom on the third year of the Perſecution, had been inſtructed in the Sacred Scriptures by him in the City Cæſarea. From that time Euſebius always lived with Pamphilus in the cloſeſt intimacy, and continued his inſeparable companion till his death: ſo dear to him, that from his friendſhip he got the ſurname of Pamphilus. Nor did Euſebius love him whilſt he liv'd, but had a ſingular affection for him when dead alſo: in ſo much that after Pamphilus's death, he always made a moſt honourable, and likewiſe a moſt loving mention of him. This is atteſted by thoſe Three Books which he wrote concerning the Life of Pamphilus the Martyr, which Books S[t] Jerome terms moſt elegant ones. The ſame is likewiſe gathered from many paſſages which occur in his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, and in his Book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine. Laſtly, in his Second Book againſt Sabellius, which was written by Euſebius after the Nicene Council, he frequently commends Pamphilus the Martyr, although he ſuppreſſes his name. For even in the very beginning of his Diſcourſe he ſays thus. Puto adhuc aures obſtrepi meas à memoria beati illius viri, &c. I think my Ears are as yet ſtruck by the memory of that Bleſſed man, who frequently made uſe of that devout word. For even your ears do as yet retain the ſound of that word. For I think I hear him ſaying, The onely-begotten Son of God. For this Religious word was always uttered by his mouth. For it was the remembrance of the Onely-Begotten, to the Glory of the unborn Father. Now, we have heard the Apoſtle commanding, that Presbyters ought to be honoured with a double honour, thoſe eſpecially who labour in the Word and Doctrine. And at pag. 29, he ſpeaks of him again in this manner. Hæc non nos extollunt, &c. Theſe things do not puff us up, [b] remembring that Bleſſed man. Now I wiſh I could ſo ſpeak, as together with you I did always hear from him. But theſe words which are now ſaid, ſeem to have been pleaſing to him. For 'tis the Glory of Good Servants, to ſpeak truth concerning the Lord; and 'tis the honour of thoſe Fathers who have taught well, if their Doctrines be repeated. And again in the ſame Book, pag. 37. Hæc audiebamus ſemper à beato illo viro. &c. Theſe words we always heard from that Bleſſed man. For they were often ſpoken in this manner by him: although ſome ſuſpected, that he uttered theſe words with his mouth, but that in his heart he thought otherwiſe. And indeed I remember with you, that I have heard from him, that he hath ſatisfied us with an holy oath, that there was not one thing in his tongue, and another in his heart. And a little after. Sed nunc quidem paucis, &c. But now, Let thus much be ſaid by us in ſhort, in memory and honour of that Our Father, ſo Good, ſo Laborious, and every where vigilant for the Churches. For we have not made mention of his Stock, nor of his Education, or Learning, or of [c] the reſt of his Life and Reſolution. Which paſſages in Euſebius (that I may not defraud any one of his commendation,) were ſhown me by the Moſt Learned Franciſcus Ogerius. Now, from what I have ſaid it may be evidently enough gathered, that Euſebius was joyned to Pamphilus by no [d] Tye of kindred, but by the Bond of friendſhip onely. 'Tis certain, Euſebius, although he names Pamphilus in ſo many places, and boaſts ſo highly of his friendſhip, yet never terms him his Kinſman or Relation. Yea, from Euſebius's own Teſtimony 'tis plainly made out, that Pamphilus the Martyr was not Euſebius's Kinſman. For in the cloſe of his Seventh [e] Book of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, where he makes mention of Agapius Biſhop of the Church of Cæſarea, his words are theſe. Κατὰ τοῦτον ἐλλογιμώτατον ἀνδρὸς τε βίῳ φιλόσοφον ἀληθῶς, πρεσβείᾳ τῆς αὐτόθι παροικίας ἠξιωμένον, Πάμφιλον ἐγνωμεν. In this man's time we knew Pamphilus (a moſt eloquent man, and a true Philoſopher in the practiſes of his Life) honoured with a Presbyterſhip of that Church. Whereas therefore Euſebius himſelf does atteſt, that Pamphilus was firſt known by him then, it is ſufficiently apparent, that they were not joyned together by any kindred or affinity. In theſe times happned that moſt ſevere Perſecution of the Chriſtians; which being firſt begun by Diocletian, was by the following Emperours continued to the tenth year. In the time of this Perſecution, Euſebius, in regard he was then a Presbyter of the Church of Cæſarea, reſided almoſt conſtantly in that City, and by continual Exhortations inſtructed many perſons in order to Martyrdom. Amongſt whom was Apphianus, a noble Youth, whoſe illuſtrious Combat Our Euſebius does relate in his [f] Book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine. In the ſame Perſecution Pamphilus was taken, and caſt into Priſon, where he ſpent two whole years in Bonds. During which time Euſebius in no wiſe deſerted his Friend and Companion: but viſited him continually, and in the Priſon wrote together with him Five Books in defence of Origen: the Sixth and laſt Book of that Work he at length finiſhed after Pamphilus was dead. That whole work was by Euſebius and Pamphilus dedicated to the Confeſſours living in the Mines of Paleſtine, as Photius relates in his Bibliotheca, Chapter 118. In the time of the ſame Perſecution, on account of ſome urgent Buſineſs of the Church, as 'tis probable; Euſebius went to Tyre. During his reſidence in that City, he atteſts (Book 8. Chap 7.) that he himſelf was eye-witneſs of the Glorious Combats of five Egyptian Martyrs. And in the Ninth Chapter of the ſame Book, he writes that he came into Egypt and Thebaïs, whilſt the fury of the Perſecution as yet rag'd; and that there he beheld with his own eyes, the admirable conſtancy of many Martyrs of both Sexes. There are thoſe who relate, that Euſebius in this Perſecution, to free himſelf from the Troubles of a Priſon, ſacrificed to Idols: and that that was objected againſt him by the Egyptian Biſhops and Confeſſours in the Synod at Tyre, as we will hereafter relate. But, I doubt not but this is falſe, and a calumny forged by the Enemies of Euſebius. For, had ſo great a Crime been really committed by Eusebius, how could he have been afterwards made Bishop of the Church of Cæsarea? How is it likely that he should have been invited by the Antiochians, to undertake the Episcopate of that City? And yet Cardinal Baronius has catcht up that as certain and undoubted, which was objected against Eusebius by the way of contention and wrangling, by his Enemies, nor was ever confirm'd by any one's Testimony. At the same time, a Book was written by Eusebius against Hierocles. The occasion of writing it was given by Hierocles of Nicomedia, who about the beginning of this Persecution, when the Churches of the Christians were every where demolished, insulting as 'twere over the disquieted Religion, in the City Nicomedia published two Books against the faith of Christ, which he entitled φιλαλήθης. In which Books amongst other things he asserted this, that Apollonius Tyaneus performed far more and greater Miracles than Christ; as Lactantius does attest in his [a] Seventh Book. But Eusebius contemning the Man, rested satisfied in confuting him in a very short Book. Agapius Bishop of Cæsarea being dead during this interval, and the Persecution being now abated, and peace restored to the Church; by the general consent of all persons Eusebius is put into his place. Others make Agricola (who was present at, and subscribed to the Synod of Ancyra, on the year of Christ 314,) Successour to Agapius. So Baronius in his Annals, at the year of Christ 314; and Blondellus in his Apology pro sententiâ B. Hieronymi, Chap. 19. Where he writes, that Eusebius undertook the Administration of the Church of Cæsarea after Agricola's death, about the year of Christ 315. But those Subscriptions of the Bishops which are extant in the Latine Collections of the Canons, in my judgment seem to have little of certainty and validity in them. For they occur not either in the Greek Copies, or in the Latine Version of Dionysius Exiguus. Besides, Eusebius reckoning up (in the Seventh [b] Book of his Ecclesiastick History,) the Bishops of the chief Sees, under whom the Persecution began and rag'd, ends in Agapius Bishop of Cæsarea, who (says he) took a great deal of pains in that Persecution for the good of his own Church. He therefore must of necessity have sate Bishop untill the end of the Persecution. But Eusebius was made Bishop immediately after the Persecution was ended. For when Paulinus Bishop of Tyre dedicated a Cathedral, sometime after Peace and repose was restored to the Church; He, together with other Bishops, was invited by Paulinus to its Dedication, and made a most Elegant Oration before him, as we are informed from the Tenth [c] Book of his Ecclesiastick History. Now, this hapned before Licinius rebell'd against Constantine, which fell out on the year of Our Lord 315. About these times Eusebius wrote those famous Books concerning Evangelick Demonstration and Preparation. Which Books, 'tis plain, were written before the Nicene Council, in regard they are by name cited in his Ecclesiastick History, which was written by Eusebius before that Council, as we have shown in Our Annotations. In the interim Licinius, who managed the Government in the Eastern Parts, incited by a sudden rage, began to persecute the Christians: especially those that were Prelates, of whom he had a suspicion that they shewed more of favour to Constantine, and put up prayers for him. But Constantine undertook an Expedition against Licinius, and in a short time compell'd him, after he had been vanquished in two fights by Land and Sea, to a Surrendry. And thus Peace was again by Constantine restored to the Christians, who inhabited the East. But a far more vehement disturbance was at that time rais'd amongst the Christians themselves. For Arius a Presbyter of the City Alexandria, in regard he would publickly in the Church preach up some new and impious Opinions concerning the Son of God, and having been frequently admonished by Alexander the Bishop, would nevertheless persist in those Assertions, was at length condemned together with the Associates of his own Errour, and was expell'd out of the Church. Highly resenting this his Condemnation, he sent Letters, with a draught of his own Faith, to all the Bishops of the neighbouring Cities: wherein he complain'd, that he had been undeservedly deposed by Alexander, in regard he asserted the same Points that the rest of the Eastern Prelates maintained. Many Bishops impos'd upon by these Artifices, and powerfully incited by Eusebius of Nicomedia, who was an open Favourer of Arius's Party, wrote Letters in defence of Arius, to Alexander Bishop of the City Alexandria, entreating him to restore Arius to his former place. Our Eusebius was one of their number, whose Letter written to Alexander, is extant in the Acts of the Seventh Oecumenical Synod, and is by us put amongst the [d] Testimonies of the Ancients. Eusebius Cæsariensis's example being presently followed by Theodotus and Paulinus, the one Bishop of Laodicea, the other of Tyre; they interceded with Alexander for Arius's restitution. Whose Letters, as Patronizing his own Opinions, in regard Arius boasted of in all places, and by the authority of such great men drew many persons into a Society of his own Errour; on this account Alexander himself also was forc'd to write Letters to the other Bishops of the East, whereby it might be made publickly known, that Arius, together with his Associates, had been justly condemn'd and depos'd. Two Letters of Alexanders are at this present extant: the one to Alexander Bishop of Constantinople, in which Alexander complains of three Bishops of Syria, who agreeing in opinion with Arius had inflamed the quarrel, which they ought rather to have extinguished, and had rendred it fiercer than it was before. These three are Eusebius, Theodotus, and Paulinus, as may be collected from Arius's Letter written to Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia. The other Letter of Alexanders written to all the Bishops throughout the world, Socrates records in his First [e] Book. To these Letters of Alexander almost all the Eastern Bishops subscrib'd: amongst whom the Prelates of chiefest note were, Philogonius Bishop of Antioch, Eustathius of Berœa, and Macarius of Jerusalem. Now, those Bishops who seem'd to be of Arius's side, in regard they saw themselves severely touch'd in Alexanders Letters, made it their business to defend Arius with far more of fierceness and Vehemency: but most especially Eusebius Nicomediensis. For our Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea, together with Patrophilus and Paulinus, and other Bishops of Syria, concluded upon this onely, that Arius the Presbyter should have a Liberty of holding Assemblies in his own Church; nevertheless, that he should be subject to Alexander the Bishop, and should earnestly request of him that he might be admitted to Peace and Communion. The Bishops in this manner disagreeing amongst amongst themselves, and some favouring Alexanders, others Arius's side; the Contention was incredibly heightned. To cure which mischief, Constantine assembled a General Synod of Bishops (such a one as no age had ever seen,) from all parts of the Roman World, in Nicæa a City of Bithynia. Of this Greatest and most celebrated Council, Our Eusebius was not the least part. For he had both the first place in the right-hand [a] Side, and also in the name of the whole Synod made a Speech to the Emperour Constantine, who sate on a Golden Chair in the midst between the two Rows of those who sate together [in the Council;] as he himself attests in the Preface to his first [b] Book concerning the Life of Constantine, and in his [c] Third Book of the same work. The same is likewise confirmed by Sozomen, in the First [d] Book of his Ecclesiastick History. Farther, when there was a great contest amongst the Bishops concerning a [e] Draught of the Creed, Our Eusebius proposed a Draught that was exactly true and plain, and which was commended by the consent of all the Bishops, and of the Emperour Himself. But, in regard something seem'd to be wanting in that Draught, in order to confuting the impiety of the new Opinion; the Fathers of the Nicene Synod judged these words as necessary to be further added, Very God of Very God; begotten not made, being of One Substance with the Father. They likewise annex'd Anathematisms, against those who should assert that the Son of God was made of things which are not, and that there was a time when He was not. And at first indeed Our Eusebius refused to admit of the Term Consubstantial. But afterwards, informed by the other Bishops what the import and meaning of that word was, he at length consented and subscrib'd to this Creed, as he himself relates in his [f] Letter to his Diocess of Cæsarea. Some affirm, that Eusebius, forc'd by necessity, and out of a fear of the Emperour, rather than from the Sentiment of his own mind, had subscrib'd to the Nicene Creed. I might indeed be easily induc'd to believe that, concerning others who were present at this Synod. But, I can't think so of Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea. For after the Nicene Synod, Eusebius always condemned those who would assert that the Son of God was made of nothing, as 'tis plain from his Books against Marcellus, and expressly from the ninth and tenth Chapter of his First Book De Ecclesiastica Theologia. Athanasius does likewise attest the same concerning him. Who (though he has often related that Eusebius Cæsariensis had subscribed to the Nicene Synod, yet) does never declare, that he did that dissemblingly and in pretence onely. Had Eusebius subscrib'd to the Nicene Council, not heartily, but by fraud and under a colour; why did he afterwards send that Letter I have mentioned, to his Diocess of Cæsarea, wherein he profess'd ingenuously, that he had embraced that Faith, which had been published in the Nicene Council? After the Nicene Synod, the Arians out of a fear of the Emperour, were for some little time quiet. Resuming their boldness presently, after they had by subtlety crept into the Prince's favour; by all ways and arts they began to Persecute the Catholick Prelates. Their first assault was made against Eustathius Bishop of the City Antioch, who was Eminent both for the Glory of Confession, and was also accounted the Chief amongst the Assertors of the Nicene Faith. Him therefore they accuse before the Emperour, because he maintained Sabellius's impiety, and because he had reproach't Helena Augusta the Emperour's Mother. A numerous Assembly of Bishops is convened in the City Antioch, in which presided Eusebius of Nicomedia, the Chief and Ring-leader of the whole Faction. Eusebius of Cæsarea was likewise present at this Synod. Eustathius therefore having been accused by Cyrus Bishop of the Bereans, because he held the impious Doctrine of Sabellius, and moreover an accusation of [g] incontinency having been framed against him, is thrust out of his own See. On which account a most impetuous Tumult is rais'd at Antioch; the people being divided into two Parties, some requesting Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea might be put into Eustathius's place; others desiring Eustathius their Bishop might be restored to them. And it had come to blows, had not a fear of the Emperour, and the Judges authority repress'd them. The Sedition being at length quieted, and Eustathius banisht, Our Eusebius (although entreated both by the people, and by the Bishops also that were present, to undertake the Administration of the Antiochian Church, yet) refused to do that. And when the Bishops by Letters written to Constantine, had acquainted Him both with their own [vote,] and with the suffrage of all the people; Eusebius wrote his Letters also to Constantine. Whereto the Emperour Constantine gave answer, and highly commended Eusebius's resolution. Eustathius having in this manner been depos'd, which was done on the year of Christ 330, as I have remark'd in my [h] Annotations; the Arians turn the violence of their fury upon Athanasius. And in the first place they complain of his Ordination, in the Prince's presence: then, that [i] he exacted an Impost of a Linen Garment from the Provincials: that he had broken a sacred cup: lastly, that he had murdered one Arsenius a Bishop. Therefore Constantine wearied with their most troublesome complaints, indicted a Council in the City Tyre, and commanded Athanasius the Bishop to repair thither, to make his defence. In that Synod, Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea, amongst others, sate as Judge; whom Constantine had a mind should be present at that Council. Potamo Bishop of Heracleopolis (who had come thither with Athanasius the Bishop, and some Prelates of Egypt; ) seeing him sitting in the Council, is said to have accosted him in these words: [Is it fit,] Eusebius, that You should sit, and that the innocent Athanasius should stand to be judg'd by You? Who can bear such things as these? Tell me, were not you in Custody with me during the time of the Persecution? And I lost an eye in defence of the Truth; but you appeared maim'd in no part of your body, nor did you undergo Martyrdome, but are alive and whole. By what means did you escape out of Prison? Unless you promised our persecutors that you would do the [k] detestable thing, and perhaps you have done it. These things are in this manner related by Epiphanius in the Heresie of the Meletians. From which words by the by it appears, that they are mistaken who relate, that our Eusebius had sometime sacrificed to Idols, and that that was openly objected against him in the Tyrian Synod. For Potamo accused not Eusebius, as if he had sacrificed to Idols; but onely, his dismission out of Prison safe and whole, had given Potamo an occasion of suspecting that concerning him. Nevertheless 'tis possible, that Eusebius might have been dismist out of Prison by some other way, than that which Potamo has related. Farther, from Epiphanius's words it may, I think, be gathered, that that Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea presided at this Synod. For he adds, that Eusebius being sorely vex'd at the hearing of these words, dismissed the Council. Yet from other Writers we have it for certain, that not Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea, but Eusebius of Nicomedia presided at the Tyrian Synod. After the Council held at Tyre, all the Bishops who had sate together there, by the Emperour's Order betook themselves to Jerusalem; to celebrate the Consecration of that Great Church, which Constantine had erected in that place, in honour of Christ. There Our Eusebius grac'd the Solemnity, by several Sermons which he made in the Church. And when the Emperour by most sharp Letters had summon'd the Bishops to his own Court, that in his presence they might give an account of those things, which by fraud and out of hatred they had transacted against Athanasius; Our Eusebius together with five others came to Constantinople, and certified the Prince concerning all Transactions. Then also he recited his Tricennalian Oration in the Emperour's own presence, in the Palace. Whereto the Emperour hearkened with the greatest joy imaginable, not so much in respect of his own, as God's Praises, whom Eusebius has magnified thorowout that whole Oration. This was the Second Oration that Eusebius spoke in the Palace, as he himself attests in his Fourth [a] Book concerning the Life of Constantine. For he had before made an Oration in the Palace concerning the Sepulchre of Our Lord: which the Emperour heard standing, nor could he ever be perswaded, though he was once and again entreated by Eusebius, to sit down in the Seat set for him; saying, 'twas fit, that Discourses concerning God should be heard by persons standing; as Eusebius relates in the thirty third Chapter of the same Book. Farther, how dear and acceptable Our Eusebius was to Constantine, may be known both from these matters I have mentioned, and also from many other circumstances. For he both frequently received Letters from him, which occur inserted in the foresaid Books. Nor was it seldom that he was sent for to the Palace, and entertain'd at Table, and honoured with private discourse. Moreover, Constantine related that Vision of the Cross, which he saw in the Heaven at such time as he was making his Expedition against Maxentius, to Our Eusebius; and shewed him the Labarum, which he had [ordered to be] made, to express the likeness of that Cross, as Eusebius himself does [b] attest. And when he wanted [c] Copies of the Sacred Scriptures for the use of those Churches which he had built at Constantinople, he committed the care and over-sight of transcribing them to Eusebius; in regard he well knew him to be most skilfull in these matters. Lastly, when Our Eusebius had Dedicated a [d] Book concerning the Feast of Easter to him, that Present was so acceptable to Constantine, that he ordered that Book to be forthwith translated into Latine, and by a Letter written to Eusebius entreated him, that he would as soon as possible communicate the works of this nature which he was upon, to the Studious in sacred matters. About the same time Eusebius comprized a Description of the Jerusalem-Church, and of the sacred Gifts which had been consecrated there, in a small Book, and Dedicated it to the Emperour Constantine. Which Book, together with his Tricennalian Oration, he had plac'd at the close of his Books concerning the Life of Constantine. But this Book is not now extant. At the same time also Five Books were written by Eusebius against Marcellus: the last three whereof De Ecclesiasticâ Theologiâ, he Dedicated to Flaccillus Bishop of Antioch. Now Flaccillus entred upon that Bishoprick a little before the Synod of Tyre, which was convened in the Consulate of Constantius and Albinus, on the year of Our Lord's Nativity 335. 'Tis certain, Eusebius (in his First Book against Marcellus De Ecclesiasticâ Theologiâ, Chap. 14,) writes in express words, that Marcellus had been deservedly condemned by the Church. Now Marcellus was first condemned in the Constantinopolitan Synod, by those very Bishops who had consecrated Constantine's Church at Jerusalem, that is on the year of Christ 335, or else 336, as Baronius will have it. Indeed [e] Socrates acknowledges but Three Books of Eusebius's against Marcellus; those namely which are entituled De Ecclesiasticâ Theologiâ: whereas nevertheless, the whole Work against Marcellus, was by Eusebius comprized in Five Books. Farther, of all Eusebius's Books, the last seem to be those Four concerning the Life of Constantine. For they were written after the death of that Emperour, whom Eusebius did not long survive. For he dyed about the beginning of Constantius Augustus's Reign, a little before the death of Constantine Junior, which hapned when Acindynus and Proculus were Consuls, on the year of Christ 340; as may be gathered from Socrates's Second [f] Book. Now, what Scaliger says, in his Animadversions upon Eusebius, pag. 250 of the last Edition, that Eusebius's Books against Porphyrius were written under Constantius Son to Constantine the Great, can't so easily be admitted of by us, in regard 'tis confirmed by the Testimony of no ancient Writer. But what the same Scaliger adds in that very place, that the three last Books of The Evangelick Demonstration, the eighteenth namely, ninteenth, and twentieth, were written by Eusebius against Porphyrius; therein he does manifestly blunder. Saint Jerome [g] writes indeed, that Eusebius answered Porphyrius in three Volumes, that is, in the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth; who in the twelfth and thirteenth of those Books which he published against the Christians, had attempted to confute the Book of the Prophet Daniel. But Saint Jerome does not mean Eusebius's Books concerning Evangelick Demonstration, as Scaliger thought, but the Books he wrote against Porphyrius; which had this Title, ἐλέγχε καὶ ἀπολογίας [Books] of Confutation and Apology, as may be gathered from Photius's Bibliotheca. Farther, I am of Opinion, that these Books were written by Eusebius after his Ecclesiastick History. And this I conjecture from hence, because Our Eusebius in the Sixth [h] Book of his Ecclesiastick History, where he produces a famous passage out of Porphyrius's Third Book against the Christians, makes no mention of those Books wherein he had answered Porphyrius: whenas nevertheless, he is wont to be a diligent Quoter of his own works, and does frequently referre the Studious to the reading of them. But because a fit opportunity presents it self, I have a mind to make some few Remarks here concerning his Books of Ecclesiastick History. For on their account chiefly, all this Labour hath been undertaken by us. Indeed, much hath been written by Our Eusebius for the profit and advantage of the Catholick Church, and in confirmation of the truth of the Christian faith; partly against the Jews, and partly against againſt the Heathens. Nevertheleſs amongſt all his Books, his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory does deſervedly bear away the Bell. For, before Euſebius, many perſons had written Books in defence of the Chriſtian Faith, and by moſt cogent Reaſons had confuted the Jews Contumacy, and the Errour of the Heathens. But there was no perſon before Euſebius, who would deliver to poſterity an Hiſtory of Eccleſiaſtick Affairs. On which account Our Euſebius is the more to be commended, who was both the firſt that found out this Subject; and alſo, after he had attempted it, left it entire and perfect in every reſpect. 'Tis certain, although many have been found after him, who, incited by his example, have undertaken to commit to writing Eccleſiaſtick matters; yet they have all begun their Hiſtory from thoſe times wherein Our Euſebius had cloſed his Work: but the Hiſtory of the foregoing times, which he had ſet forth in Ten Books, they have left to him entire and untoucht. Wherefore, ſhould any one have a mind to term him the Father and Founder of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, truly that perſon would ſeem to give him this ſurname not abſurdly nor without cauſe. Now, what way Euſebius applied himſelf to this Subject, 'tis not hard to conjecture. For, whereas in the laſt part of his Chronical Canons, he had accurately noted the Time of Our Lords Coming, and of his paſſion; the names alſo of the Biſhops who had ſate in the four chief Churches, and of the famous men who had flouriſhed in the Church; and laſtly, in their own time and order had digeſted the Hereſies and Perſecutions wherewith the Church had been diſquieted; He was led by the hand as 'twere, by little and little to the writing an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory; that he might handle thoſe matters more largely and copiouſly in his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, which in his Chronical Canons he had comprized in a Summary as 'twere. Indeed he himſelf, in the [a] Preface to his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, does plainly ſhew that which I have ſaid. Where alſo he requeſts, that Pardon may be granted him by candid Readers, if peradventure he ſhall not ſo largely and copiouſly purſue and finiſh this Subject: for [he ſays,] that he was the firſt perſon who applied himſelf to this ſort of writing, and firſt began to walk in a way which had not before been worn by any one's footſteps. But this may ſeem to ſome perſons, not ſo much an excuſe and deſire of Pardon, as an endeavour to procure praiſe and glory. Farther, notwithſtanding it appears evident from Euſebius's own Teſtimony, that he wrote his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory after his Chronological Canons; yet 'tis ſtrange that Both thoſe Works proceed to one and the ſame Limit, namely to Conſtantine's twentieth year, which was the year of Chriſt 325. That moreover may deſervedly be wondred at, that although the Nicene Synod was celebrated on Conſtantine's [b] Vicennalia, yet no mention is made of it, either in his Chronicon, or Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. For, whereas in his Latine Chronicon, at the Fifteenth year of Conſtantine, theſe words occur; Alexandrinæ Eccleſiæ 19. ordinatur Epiſcopus Alexander; &c: Alexander is ordained the nineteenth Biſhop of the Alexandrian Church; by whom Arius the Presbyter being ejected out of that Church, joyns many to his own impiety. To confute the perfidiouſneſs of which perſons, a Synod of 318 Biſhops being conven'd at Nicæa a City of Bithynia, ruin'd all the ſubtil devices of the Hereticks by the oppoſition of [the term] HOMOOUSIOS: 'tis plain enough, that thoſe words were not written by Euſebius, but were added by Saint Jerome, who interpolated Euſebius's Chronicon, by inſerting many paſſages on his own head. For, to omit that, namely that the mention of the Nicene Synod is here ſet in a forreign and diſagreeable place; who can ever believe, that Euſebius would have ſpoken in this manner concerning Arius, or would have inſerted the Term HOMOOUSIOS into his own Chronicon? Which word always diſpleaſed him, as we ſhall ſee afterwards. How ſhould Euſebius ſay, that there were three hundred and eighteen Biſhops preſent at the Nicene Synod? when in his Third [c] Book concerning the Life of Conſtantine, he writes in moſt expreſs words, that ſomething more than two hundred and fifty ſate in that Synod. Yet I don't doubt, but the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory was finiſhed by Euſebius ſome years after the Nicene Synod. But, whereas Euſebius had reſolved to cloſe his Hiſtory, with that Peace which after Diocletian's Perſecution ſhone from heaven upon the Church, as he himſelf atteſts in the beginning of his work; he deſignedly avoided mentioning the Nicene Synod, leaſt he ſhould be compell'd to ſet forth the ſtrifes and broils of the Biſhops quarrelling one with another. For Writers of Hiſtories ought chiefly to take care of and provide for this, that they may conclude their work with an illuſtrious and glorious cloſe, as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis has long ſince told us in his compariſon of Herodotus and Thucydides. Now, what more illuſtrious Event could be wiſh'd for by Euſebius, than that Repoſe which by Conſtantine had been reſtored to the Chriſtians after a moſt bloudy Perſecution; when, the Perſecutours being every where extinct, and laſt of all Licinius taken off, no fear of paſt miſchiefs was now left remaining? With this Peace therefore Euſebius choſe to cloſe his Hiſtory, rather than with the mention of the Nicene Synod. For in that Synod the Diviſions ſeem'd not ſo much compoſed, as renewed. And that, not by the fault of the Synod it ſelf; but by their pertinacious obſtinacy who refuſed to acquieſce in the moſt wholeſome determinations of the Sacred Council. And Let thus much ſuffice to have been ſaid by us in reference to the Life and Writings of Euſebius.

It remains, that we ſpeak ſomething concerning his Faith and Orthodoxy. And in the firſt place I would have the Readers know, that they are not to expect here from us a defence of Euſebius. For it belongs not to us to [d] pronounce concerning matters of this nature, in regard in theſe things we ought rather to follow the Judgment of the Church, and the Opinion of the Ancient Fathers. Wherefore we will ſet down ſome Heads onely here, whereon relying as on ſome firm foundations, we may be able to determine with more of certainty concerning Euſebius's faith. Whereas therefore the Opinions of the Ancients in reference to our Euſebius are various; and ſome have thought, that he was a Catholick; others, an Heretick; others [e] διλωτον, that is a perſon of a doubtfull and wavering faith; we muſt enquire, to which opinion chiefly we ought to aſſent. 'Tis a conſtant Rule of the Law, in doubtfull matters the more favourable and milder opinion ought to be embrac'd. Beſides, whereas all the Weſterns, Saint Jerome onely excepted, have entertained honourable ſentiments concerning our Euſebius; and whereas the Gallican Church hath enroll'd him amongſt the number of Saints, as may be be gathered from Victorius Aquitanus, [a] Usuardus, and others; without question 'tis better, that we should subscribe to the Judgment of our Fathers, than to that of the Eastern Schismaticks. Lastly, whose authority ought to be greater in this matter, than that of the Bishops of Rome? But Gelasius in his Book De Duabus Naturis, has recounted Our Eusebius amongst the Catholick Writers, and has recited two authorities out of his Books. Moreover, Pope Pelagius [b] terms him the most honourable amongst Historians, and pronounces him free from all Spot of Heresie, notwithstanding he had highly commended heretical Origen. But some body will say, that the Judgment of the Easterns is rather to be followed, in regard the Easterns were better able to know Eusebius, as being a man of their own language. But it may be answered, that there are not wanting some amongst the Easterns, who have thought well of Our Eusebius. Amongst whom is [c] Socrates, and [d] Gelasius Cyzicenus. But, if the judgment of the Seventh Oecumenical Synod be opposed against us, Our answer is in readiness. For, Eusebius's Faith was not the subject of that Synod's debate, but the worship of Images. In order to the overthrowing whereof, when the Adversaries, a little before conven'd in the Imperial City, had produc'd an Evidence out of Eusebius's Letter to Constantia, and laid the greatest stress thereon; the Fathers of the Seventh Synod, that they might lessen the authority of this Evidence, cryed out, that Eusebius was an Arian. But they did this by the by onely, from the occasion and hatred of that Letter; not designedly, or after a cognizance of the Cause. They do indeed produce some passages out of Eusebius, whereby they would prove, that he adher'd to the Arian Opinion. But they make no difference between Eusebius's Books before the Nicene Council, and those he wrote after that Council: which nevertheless ought by all means to be done, to the end a certain and just sentence might be pronounc'd concerning Eusebius's faith For, whatever he wrote before the Nicene Synod, ought not be objected and charg'd as a fault upon Eusebius. Farther, Eusebius's Letter to Alexander, wherein he intercedes with him for Arius, was doubtless written before the Nicene Synod. Therefore, that Testimony of the Fathers of the Seventh Synod against Eusebius, although it has the greatest autority, yet seems to us a rash judgment, before the matter was heard, rather than a Synodal Sentence. But the Greeks may have leave to think thus concerning our Eusebius, and to call him a Borderer upon the Arian Heresie, or even an Arian. But who can with patience bear Saint Jerome, who not content to term him Heretick and Arian, does frequently stile him a Ring-leader of the Arians? Can he be justly termed a Ring-leader of the Arians, who after the Nicene Synod always condemned the Opinion of the Arians? Let his Books De Ecclesiasticâ Theologiâ be perused, which he wrote against Marcellus long after the Nicene Council. We shall find what I have said, that they were condemn'd by him, who would affirm, that the Son of God was made of things which are not, and that there was a time when He was not. Athanasius does likewise attest the same thing concerning Eusebius, in his Letter about the Decrees of the Nicene Synod, in these words. Καὶ πέπονθέ τι δεινόν. ὡς γὲ ἀπολωλώς, &c. And truly he was unhappy in that: For, to the end he might clear himself, he in future accused the Arians, because, when they would maintain that the Son [of God] existed not before He was begotten, by this means they might deny Him to have existed before His incarnation. And this is the Testimony which Athanasius gives Eusebius, who bore Eusebius a private grudge. But S[t] Jerome who had no reasons of hatred against Eusebius, yea who had profited so much from his writings; who had rendred his Chronical Canon, and his Book De Locis Hebraïcis into Latine; yet brands Eusebius with this reproach, which even his most malicious Enemies never fastned on him. The reason of which thing I am not able to find out, unless it be, that Saint Jerome, having conceived an hatred against Origen, beyond measure persecuted all the defenders of his Opinions, and especially Our Eusebius. It must indeed be confest, that Our Eusebius (although he can't deservedly be termed a Ring-leader of the Arians, yet) after the Nicene Synod was perpetually conversant with the Chiefs of the Arians, and together with them opposed the Catholick Bishops, Eustathius namely and Athanasius, the principal Maintainers of HOMOOUSIOS. That also seems worthy of reprehension in Eusebius, that although he always asserted the Eternity of the Son of God against the Arians, yet never heartily approved of the word HOMOOUSIOS. 'Tis certain, he has never made use of that term, either in his Books against Marcellus, or in his Orations concerning the faith against Sabellius. Yea, in his Second Book against Sabellius, he does plainly intimate, that that word, in regard it occurs not in the Scriptures, is displeasing to him. For thus he says. Sicut ergo de his quæ possunt quæri, inertium est non quærere: &c. As therefore concerning those matters which may be search'd into, 'tis sluggishness not to enquire: so, in reference to them which there is no necessity of searching into, 'tis boldness to enquire. What things then ought to be search'd into? Those which we find recorded in the Scriptures. But, what we don't find in the Scriptures, let us not search after. For, were it behoveable that they should be known to us, doubtless the Holy Spirit would have plac'd them in the Scriptures. And a little after he has these words. Let us not in such a manner expose our selves to danger, but let us speak safely. But if any thing be written, let it not be blotted out. And in the end of his Oration he expresses himself in this manner. Speak what is written, and the controversie will be ended. In which words Eusebius no doubt touches upon the term HOMOOUSIOS. But now, if you please, let us hear the Testimonies of the Ancients concerning Eusebius. Wherein this is chiefly to be remark'd, although the Judgments of men concerning our Eusebius have been various, in reference to the purity of the Ecclesiastick Opinions; yet all do unanimously give him the commendation of most profound Learning. One onely person, Joseph Scaliger, has lived in our Fathers memory, who, hurried on with a rash boldness and lust of reproaching, has endeavoured to deprive Eusebius of this Glory of his Learning, which even his Adversaries never envied him. His [d] words, if any one be desirous of knowing them, we have plac'd amongst the Testimonies of the Ancients; not that that we have any great value for his judgment, in this particular eſpecially; but with this deſign rather, that his unreaſonable detraction might be expoſed to publick view. THE

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory OF EUSEBIUS PAMPHILUS.

CHAP. I.

The Subject of this Work.

THE ſucceſſions of the Holy Apoſtles, together with the ſeries of times continued from our Saviour to our age, and how many and great things are ſaid to have been done, agreeable to the ſubject of an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and who have eminently governed and preſided over the Church, eſpecially in the moſt famous Sees[a]; alſo who in every age have ſet forth the Divine Word, either by preaching or writings; And alſo, what men, and how many, and when, through a deſire of innovation, falling into extream errours, have publiſhed themſelves authors of knowledge falſly ſo called, and ſparing none, as ravening wolves, have devoured the flock of Chriſt; and moreover, what evils and calamities befell ſtraightway the whole nation of the Jews, becauſe of their conſpiracy againſt our Saviour; and again, by how great and what manner of means, and in what times the Divine Word hath been impugned of the Gentiles, and what ſingular men in every age have undergone the greateſt perills in defence thereof, by ſhedding their bloud, and ſuffering torments; and beſides all this, the Martyrdoms that have happened in our own times, together with the merciful and benign aſſiſtance of our Saviour graciouſly exhibited towards every one: Theſe things, I ſay, I determining to publiſh in writing, will not take my entrance from any other place, than from the very [b] Incarnation of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus, who is the Chriſt of God. But truly even in the beginning we muſt modeſtly crave pardon; for we confeſs ingeniouſly, it is far beyond our ſtrength to finiſh what we deſign and promiſe perfectly and compleatly, ſo as to omit nothing. For we taking this argument in hand firſt, adventure to tread a ſolitary and untroden way, praying that God may be our guide, and the power of our Lord our preſent help and aid; but we can no where find ſo much as the bare ſteps of any men who have paſſed the ſame path before us: excepting onely ſome ſmall ſhews and tokens divers here and there have left us, particular declarations of the times they lived in, holding forth as it were Torches a far off, and lifting up their voices from one high, and calling as out of a Watch-tower to direct us what way we ought to goe, and how without errour or danger to order our diſcourſe. Whatſoever things therefore we think will be expedient for this preſent argument, theſe we carefully chuſing, as they are here and there by them mentioned, and culling and gathering the commodious and fit ſentences of former Writers, as it were flowers out of Wiſdoms Meadows, we will endeavour by an Hiſtorical narration to compact the ſame into one body, reſting well contented to preſerve from oblivion the ſucceſſions, although not of all, yet of the moſt famous Apoſtles of our Saviour in thoſe Churches which

[a] I cannot approve of Chriſtophorſons tranſlation who renders the word [παροικίας] Provinces. Neither am I pleaſed with the amendment of Curterius, or whoever it was that tranſlated it [Churches.] Indeed παροικία ſignifies a Church amongſt Chriſtian Writers, and particularly in our Euſebius, not in one place. The original of which ſignification came from hence, as I judge; becauſe the Church is as it were, πάροικος, a Stranger or Sojourner in the earth; but its Country and freedom is in heaven. Hence we often meet with this phraſe in our Euſebius, ἐκκλησία παροικοῦσα ἐν σμύρνῃ, Book. 4. & B 4. Chap. 23. And Clemens, in His Epiſt. to the Corinthians, writes thus - ἡ ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡ παροικοῦσα ῥώμην, &c. But in this place of Euſebius we muſt not tranſlate this word [παροικίας] Churches. For then the ſame word muſt be repeated twice in the ſame clauſe, thus - Who have governed and preſided over the Church eſpecially in the moſt famous Churches. I ſhould rather tranſlate it [Cities or Sees] or, with Rufinus, in celeberrimis locis, in the moſt famous places. Sometimes this word is taken for the whole Dioceſs, as it occurs in Euſebius in very many places; and in ſeveral other Authours: ſometimes it is taken in a more ſtrict ſenſe, not for the whole Dioceſs, but for one particular Church: So Apollonius in his book againſt the Cataphrygians, whoſe words Euſebius quotes Chap. 18. B. 5. In both theſe ſenſes the word is uſed amongſt the Latines. See Fac. Sermondus in his notes on the laſt Epiſtle of Sidonius. Valeſ. See J. Gs. Notes on Ridleys view of the Civil Law. p. 152. edit. Oxford, 1634.

[b] Whatſoever our Saviour did on earth in order to the procuring the ſalvation of mankind, that the antient Greek-fathers called οἰκονομίαν. Therefore [ἡ πρώτη τοῦ χριστοῦ οἰκονομία] which is the phraſe here uſed, ſignifies the Incarnation; as the laſt οἰκονομία is His paſſion. For they are miſtaken who think that οἰκονομία ſignifies nothing elſe but the Incarnation. For this word is taken in a larger ſenſe, and comprehends the whole Life of Chriſt among men. Nicephorus therefore (B. 1. Chap. 2.) has rightly uſed, inſtead of this phraſe here in Euſebius, this [τὴν ἐν σαρκὶ πολιτείαν] i. e. His converſation in the Fleſh. In this ſenſe Juſtin Martyr uſes this word, in his diſputation adverſus Tryphon. p. 331. Clemens in the 6. of his Stromat. And Irenæus, Lib. 1. cap. 10. calls the paſſion of Chriſt οἰκονομίαν. So Chryſoſtom in his ſecond Homilie on Matt. and Cyrill, in his 6. B. againſt Julian, pag. 213. and Origen, in the beginning of his 11 Tome of his commentaries on John. Valeſ.

then were eminent, and are ſtill renowned. I ſuppoſe that I have taken in hand a ſubject very neceſſary, becauſe I have not found any Eccleſiaſtical Writer which hath hitherto employed any diligence in a work of this nature; I hope alſo it will appear a moſt profitable work to thoſe who prize the uſefull knowledge of Hiſtory. And indeed I heretofore wrote an Epitome of theſe things, when I compiled my [c] Chronical Canons; but the more ample declaration hereof I now purpoſe to undertake. And the beginning of my narration (as I ſaid) will I take from the [d] Diſpenſation of our Saviour Chriſt, and from his [e] Divinity, the conception whereof far exceeds the reach of humane capacity. For it is requiſite for him that would commit to writing an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, thence to begin, even from the incarnation of Chriſt, diviner than it ſeemeth to many, in as much as from him we are honoured with the name of Chriſtians.

[c] In the Maz. M. S. I found this Scholion written in the Margin [σημείωσαι ὅτι ταῦτα προεγράφησαν οἱ Χρονικοὶ Κανόνες ἀνωθεν] that is, Obſerve that the Chronical Canons were firſt written by Euſebius. Valeſ.

[d] There being in Chriſt a twofold nature, the one Divine, the other Humane, which conjoyned make one perſon: as often as He is treated of, the diſcourſe muſt be divided into two parts. And thoſe things which are ſpoken of His Humanity belong to the οἰκονομία, as we ſaid before; But thoſe which are ſpoken of His Divinity are to be referred to the Θεολογία (which are the two terms here uſed by Euſebius.) Thus Gregor. Nazian. in his 38 Orat. upon Chriſts birth, diſtinguiſhes the Oeconomia from the Theologia in theſe words, Ταῦτά μοι περὶ Θεοῦ περιλοσοφήσαι παχύν· ἅδε δὲ ὑπὲρ ταῦτα κωμῳδῶ· ὅτι μὴ Θεολογία τὸ προκείμενον ἡμῖν, ἀλλ' οἰκονομία. And Chryſoſtome, in his Sermon De ſigillis which is in his ſixth Tome, ſays, that the three former Evangeliſts, being to preach the Goſpel of Chriſt to all Nations, began their diſcourſe from his οἰκονομία· but, that John, after them three, ayplyed himſelf to the explicating of his Θεολογία; and took the beginning of his diſcourſe from the Divinity of Chriſt. Whence it appears why Euſebius here uſed theſe words [Τῆς κατ' τὸν Χριστὸν ἐπιγειμβρὸς οἰκονομίας τε καὶ Θεολογίας.] For when we ſpeak of Chriſt, we muſt neceſſarily underſtand His two Natures. Valeſ.

[e] The Antients called that Theologicen, which we now commonly Stile Theologiam; Jerom in his 155. Epiſt. Ad Paulam Urbicam —— Aut de Logicâ pro quâ noſtri Theologicen ſibi Vindicant; ſo its written in the old M. S. of Henricus Memmius (not as it is now commonly printed, Theoricen, without any ſenſe) which I have heretofore ſeen. After the ſame manner Pliny called that Geometricen, and Magicen, which we now call Geometriam and Magiam. In the Books of Jerome you will never find it termed Theologiam, but in Greek Θεολογίαν. See him on Chap. 40. Ezechiel. Valeſ.

CHAP. II.

A brief Summary concerning the Præexiſtence and Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

[a] The Maz. Med. and Fuk. M.SS. Begin the firſt Chap. at theſe words, with this Title [Τίς ἡ τῆς ἐπαγγελίας ὑπόθεσις.] The ſame is obſerved in the Edit. of Robert Stephens, who has, throughout the whole work, followed the Kings M. S. in the Stile, or Text of the Chapters, but the Medicæan M. S. in the titles of the Chapters. But any one may ſee that this Title is altogether unmeet for this place. Chriſtophorſon therefore rightly ſet it at the beginning of this Book; and here began the ſecond Chapter; whom we have willingly followed. Valeſ.

[a] WHereas therefore there is in Chriſt a twofold Nature, the one reſembling the Head of the Body, by which He is underſtood to be God; the other rightly compared to the feet, by which he hath put on our humane nature, ſubject to like paſſions with us, for the ſake of our Salvation; the ſeries of our ſubſequent narration will be perfect and entire, if we begin the declaration of the diſcourſe of the whole Hiſtory concerning Him, from thoſe Heads which are the chief and principal. Hereby alſo both the Antiquity and divine dignity of Chriſtianity will be manifeſtly declared, againſt them which ſuppoſe this Religion new, and ſtrange, of yeſterday and never before apparent. But to declare the Generation, Dignity, Eſſence, and Nature of Chriſt, no ſpeech can ſufficiently ſerve. Wherefore alſo the Holy Ghoſt in the Prophets ſaith; His Generation who ſhall be able to declare? Iſai. 53. 8. For the Father no man hath known but the Son; neither at any time hath any fully known the Son but the Father alone which begat him. Matt. 11. 27. That Light that ſhone before the World, that Intellectual and Eſſential Wiſdom that was before all Ages, the Living God, the Word, who was in the beginning with the Father, who but the Father alone can clearly and perfectly comprehend? Him, who is before every creature and workmanſhip Iſai. 9. 6. whether viſible or inviſible, the firſt and onely begotten Son of God, chief Captain of the rational and immortal Hoſt in heaven, the Angel of the great Counſel, the [b] finiſher of the ſecret Will of the Father, maker and worker of all things together with the Father, who after the Father, is Cauſe and Authour of all things, the true and onely begotten Son of God, Lord, God, and King of all Creatures, receiving Dominion and Rule from the Father, together with Divinity, Power, and Honour. For, according to the Myſtical and Divine expreſſions of the Scriptures concerning him, In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. All things were made by him, and without him nothing was made that was made. John 1. 1, 2, 3. And the ſame, great Moſes, who is the moſt ancient of all the Prophets, when he deſcribes by inſpiration of the holy Spirit the Creation and diſpoſition of the Univerſe, doth ſhew; to wit, that God the framer of the World and Architect of All, granted to Chriſt himſelf, and to none other, that is, to his Divine and onely begotten Word, the making of inferiour Creatures, and that he conferred with him about the Creation of Man; for God ſaid, ſaith he, Let us make Man after our own Image and likeneſs. Gen. 1. 26. And with this ſaying agreeth another Prophet, thus ſpeaking of God in Hymnes, He ſpake and they were Made, He commanded and they were Created. Pſal. 33. 9. He introduceth the Father and Maker, commanding, as Univerſal Lord, with his Royal beck; but the Word of God next to him, (not different from him who is Preached by us) in all things [c] miniſtring to his Fathers commands. Therefore from the firſt original of Mankind, all who are ſaid to have been eminent for righteouſneſs and the virtues of Religion, both about the time of Moſes that great worſhipper, and before him, eſpecially Abraham and his ſons, and as many as in the times following were accounted juſt; and the Prophets alſo who contemplated with the pure eyes of the mind, have acknowledged him, and have attributed to him, as to the Son of God, due honour. And he being in no wiſe ſlothfull about his Fathers worſhip, [d] was appointed a maſter to teach all men the knowledge of his Father. [e] The Lord God therefore appeared in the likeneſs of man unto Abraham, as he ſat at the Oak of Mamre; but he forthwith falling down upon his face, although with the outward eye he beheld but man, worſhipped him as God, and made ſupplication to him as Lord. And that he was not ignorant who he was, he profeſſeth when he uttereth theſe words, O Lord, which judgeſt the whole earth, wilt not thou judge rightly? Gen. 18. 25. For if it be contrary to reaſon that either the unbegotten and [b] Or, Miniſter: for ſome copies read it [ὑπουργὸν;] others [πρόσωπον] as we have tranſlated it. Valeſ.

[c] In the Med. & Savil. M.SS. There is this Scholion in the Margin at theſe words, [οὐκ ἐπίστατα ὁ τὸ παλαιὸς ὁμούσιος λόγος, ἀλλὰ συνδημιεργῶν τῶν κτίσιν, ὡς φύσει θεὸς καὶ ἰσότιμος] i.e. The Word of the Father, being of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father, is not ſubject to the Father, but together with him framed the Creation, as being by Nature God, and equal to the Father in honour. Valeſ.

[d] Or, is appointed, or, made. Valeſ.

[e] At theſe words the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil. M.SS. begin the ſecond Chapter, to which agrees Robert Stephens's Edit. But we, following Chriſtophorſon, have otherwiſe diſtinguiſhed the Chapters: for which we gave the reaſon before. Valeſ.

and immutable [f] person or nature of God Almighty should transform himself into the likeness of man, and so by an appearance in a bodily shape deceive the eyes of the beholders; or that the Scripture should feign such things falsly; then that God and Lord, who judgeth the whole earth, and executeth judgment, appearing in the shape of man, who else can he be called (for it is not lawfull to say it of the first Authour of all things) but onely his preexistent Word? Of whom also it is said in the Psalms, He sent forth his Word and healed them, and delivered them from their destructions. The same, Moses plainly calleth Lord, next after the Father, saying, The Lord rained brimstone and fire from the Lord out of Heaven upon Sodom and Gomorrah. The same doth the Divine Scripture call God, appearing again unto Jacob in the figure of a Man, and saying unto Jacob, Thy name shall be no more called Jacob, but Israel shall be thy name, because thou hast prevailed with God. At which time Jacob named that place the Vision of God, saying, For I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved. Moreover, neither is it lawful once to surmise that the apparitions of God in the Scripture may be attributed to the inferiour Angels and Ministers of God: for neither doth the Scripture, if at any time any of them appeared unto men, conceal the same; expressly saying, not that God, or the Lord, but that Angels spake; which may easily be confirmed by innumerable testimonies. This same also doth Jesus the successour of Moses term chief Captain of the great power of the Lord, as Prince of Celestial Angels, and Arch-Angels, and all supernatural powers, and as being the power and wisdom of the Father, and to whom the second place in the rule and government of all things is committed, when as he beheld him in no other form or figure then of Man. For thus it is written, And it hapned when Joshua was in Jericho, he lifted up his eyes, and behold a man standing over against him, having a naked sword in his hand. And Joshua coming unto him said, art thou on our side, or on our Adversaries? And he said unto him, As chief Captain of the Host of the Lord I am now come hither. And Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and said unto him, Lord, what commandest thou thy servant? And the Captain of the Lords Host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shooe from off thy foot: for the place where thou standest is an holy place. By these very words thou mayst by an attentive consideration perceive, that this person did not differ from him who delivered his Oracles to Moses: himself the Captain of the Host of the Lord, was the same that appeared to Moses in the Bush. Now he concludes this from hence, because this Captain of the Lords Host used the same words to Joshua, that God did to Moses in the Bush. So, before Eusebius, supposed Justin Martyr, in his Disputat. adversus Tryphon. and others, as Theodoret witnesses, in his questions on the Book of Joshua. But the rest of the Fathers thought this Captain of the Host of the Lord was not the Son of God, but rather Michael the Arch-Angel. In the most antient Maz.M.S. there is at these words, a Scholion put which I thought good here to Translate. But the Church, O holy Eusebius, thinks otherwise concerning this, and not as thou dost. For him that appeared to Moses in the Bush, the Church concludes to be God; but him that appeared to Moses's successour in Jericho, to whom the presidency over the Hebrews was allotted, who had his sword drawn and commanded Joshua to put off his shooe, him, I say, the Church supposes to be Michael the Arch-Angel: and its manifest that it thinks righter than thou. Whence is this gathered? God, that appeared in the Bush in the form of fire, being asked by his servant Moses, who he was, most evidently declared this unto him, That he was God. But he that appeared to Joshua, in no wise stiles himself God, but calls himself Gods chief Captain. But this Dignity being inferiour to the Supream power and Divinity, and being not Regal, but belonging to a General, as one would say ..... The rest, by reason of the great age of the M.S. could not be read, which indeed is great pitty. For it is both a most elegant Scholion, and also written by the hand of that very Antiquary who wrote out the M. S. that is, by a most learned and antient hand. Vales.

[f] Valesius, in his Note on this place, says that [ἰδίαν Οὐσίαν, the Essence of God] is here taken for [hypostasis] i. e. the person of God the Father; for so (continues he) the Ecclesiastical writers before the Nicene Council used to speak; he translates it [Naturam] nature. For confirmation of which he quotes Photius's Bibliotheca, Cap. 119. See Photii Biblioth. Cap. 119. pag. 300. Edit. David. Hoeschel. 1611.

[g] Eusebius would here prove, that he who appeared to Joshua the son of Nun, and called himself the

For of him also the Scripture speaketh the same words, When the Lord saw that he came for to see, God called to him out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses; and he answered, what is it? And he said, come not nigh hither; put thy shooes off thy feet, for the place where thou standest is holy ground. And he said unto him, I am the God of thy fathers; The God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; Now that there is a certain Essence living and subsisting before the foundations of the world were laid, which ministred unto the Father and the God of all at the Creation of all Creatures, termed The Word, and the Wisdom of God; beside the before produced demonstrations, Wisedom her self, in her proper person by Solomon plainly speaking and delivering her Mysteries after this manner, is to be heard: I Wisedome, have fixed a Tabernacle: Councel, Knowledge, and Understanding I have by calling allured unto me. Through me Kings doe reign, and Princes decree justice. Through me Princes bear Rule on earth. To this she addeth; The Lord himself fashioned me the beginning of his ways, for the accomplishing of his Works, I have been ordained before the foundations of the World were laid, and from the beginning: Or ever the earth was made, before the well-springs flowed out, before the foundations of the mountains were firmly set, and before all hills, begat he me. When he spread and prepared the Heavens, I was present with him; and when he bound in due order the depths under Heaven I was by, composing all things, I was she in whom he daily delighted; rejoycing continually before his face, when he rejoyced at the perfect finishing of the World. That therefore the Word of God subsisted before all things, and that to some he appeared, though not to all men, let thus much suffice at this time to have been by us briefly delivered. [h] Now for what cause he was not Preached of old unto all men, and unto all Nations as now he is, thus it shall evidently appear. That antient generation of men was not able to receive the most wise and most excellent doctrine of Christ. For, immediately in the very beginning, after that primitive happy state of life, the first man, being careless of the commandment of God, fell into this mortal and frail life, and changed this cursed earth for those heavenly delights and pleasures of old. And his posterity, when they had replenished this world, appeared far worse, one or two excepted; they gave admission to certain savage and bruitish manners, and led a life not worthy to be called life: And moreover they busied not their minds to erect either City or Common-wealth, nor to profit in Arts or Sciences: They had not amongst them so much as the name either of Laws or Statutes, or moreover of Virtue, or Philosophy: But wandring in deserts, they lived like wild and fierce Savages: They corrupted their natural understanding, and the seeds of Reason and gentleness sown in mans mind with their excessive willfull malice, yielding up themselves wholly to all abominable wickednesses: sometimes they defiled one anothers bodies, ſometimes they ſhed one anothers bloud, and ſometimes they ſpared not to devour one anothers fleſh, yea they audaciouſly undertook to wage war with God, and attempted thoſe Gigantick-combats ſo much talk't of, determining in their minds [i] to pile up the earth in manner of a Bulwark and ſo to ſcale Heaven; and, ſuch was their outragious madneſs, they prepared to give Battel to God himſelf who is over all. Wherefore, they behaving themſelves on this manner, God the Overſeer of all things came upon them with Floods and fiery deſtructions, as if they had been a wild Thicket overſpreading the whole earth: alſo he cut them off with continual Famines and Peſtilences, with Wars, and Thunderbolts from Heaven; Repreſſing with moſt ſharp Puniſhments that grievous and moſt pernicious malady, as it were, of their ſouls. Moreover, when this [k] fullneſs of wickedneſs was now come to its height, and had in a manner ſpread it ſelf over all, ſhadowing and darkning the minds almoſt of all men, as it were a certain grievous and dead fit of drunkenneſs; then that Firſt begotten and [l] Preexiſtent Wiſedom of God, and the ſame Word that was in the beginning with God, out of his ſuperabundant loving kindneſs unto Man, appeared ſometimes by Viſion of Angels unto the inhabiters on earth, ſometimes by himſelf, as the ſaving power of God, unto ſome one or two of the Antients that were beloved of God in no other form or figure than that of Man: for otherwiſe it could not have been. After that by them the ſeeds of Gods Worſhip were now ſown and ſcattered amidſt the multitude of men, and that whole Nation, which originally deſcended from the Hebrews, had now addicted themſelves to the worſhip of God, He, by the Prophet Moſes, delivered unto them, as unto a multitude, yet [m] corrupted and tainted with old Cuſtoms, Figures and Signes of a kind of Myſtical Sabbath, and Circumciſion, and introductions unto other intelligible contemplations, but not the perfect and plain initiation into the ſacred Doctrines. But when the Law, famous among them, was publiſhed abroad, and diffuſed, like a moſt ſweet Odour amongſt all men, and thereby many of the Gentiles then had their [n] mindes and manners civilized by Law-makers and Philoſophers every where, and their rude and bruitiſh ſavageneſs changed into a meek and mild temper and behaviour, ſo that there enſued perfect Peace and friendſhip and mutual commerce amongſt them; then at the laſt to all men, and to the Gentiles throughout all the world, as it were now prepared and fitted to receive the knowledge of the Father, the ſame Perſon again, the School-maſter of Virtue, his Fathers Miniſter in all goodneſs, the Divine and Celeſtial Word of God manifeſted himſelf, about the beginning of the Roman Empire, in Humane ſhape, for bodily ſubſtance nothing differing from our Nature, and therein wrought and ſuffered ſuch things as were conſonant with the Oracles of the Prophets, who foreſhewed there ſhould come into the world ſuch a one as ſhould be both Man and God, a mighty worker of Miracles, an Inſtructer of the Gentiles in the worſhip of his Father; and withall they foretold his Miraculous Birth, his New Doctrine, his wonderfull Works, moreover the manner alſo of his Death, his Reſurrection from the Dead, and laſt of all his Glorious and Divine Return into Heaven. The Prophet Daniel therefore by the Divine Spirit beholding his Kingdom that ſhall be in the latter Age of the World, having been moved by the power of that Divine Spirit, hath thus more after the manner of Man, and to Mans capacity deſcribed the Viſion of God; For I beheld, ſaith he, untill the Thrones were placed, and the Antient of days ſat thereon: his garments were as the white ſnow, the hairs of his Head as pure wooll, his Throne a flame of fire, his wheels burning fire. A fiery ſtream ſlided before his face. Thouſand thouſands miniſtred unto him, and ten thouſand times ten thouſand ſtood before him: the judgment was ſet, and the Books were opened. And afterwards, I beheld, ſaith he, and behold, one coming in the clouds like the Son of Man; and he came unto the Antient of days, and he was brought before him: and to him was given Principality, and Honour, and Rule; and all People, Tribes, and Tongues ſhall ſerve him; His Power is an everlaſting Power which ſhall not paſs, and his Kingdom

[i] Its ſtrange, that in the Tranſlation of this place both Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon erred. Ἐπιτειχίζειν (which is the term here uſed) in Greek ſignifies, to make a Fortification, or Bulwarke againſt a place; See Harpocration, in the word [ἐπιτείχισμα.] But it's ridiculous to believe, that men arrived to that degree of madneſs, as by building Rampires to attempt to Scale Heaven, and to turn out God from thence; which yet Euſebius ſeems by this place to have believed. Theſe are the fictions of the Poets, who by this fanſie would ſet forth the pride of men of that Age, and their contempt of God. Indeed Holy Writ mentions the Giants, but it ſays nothing of this ſort concerning them; and it teſtifies that that Tower was built, not by the Giants, but by the ſons and poſterity of Noah, after the Flood. Valeſ.

[k] The term in the Original is [κόρος] and it ſignifies ſatiety or fullneſs; it is the ſame in Robert Stephens Edit. But Valeſius ſays it ſhould be [κάρος] which he Tranſlates (torpor) i. e. a ſlothful heavineſs, for ſo, ſays he, it is written in the Fuk. and Savill. M. SS.

[l] I doubt not but Euſebius wrote it thus [πρωτόκτιστον τὸ θεοῦ σοφία, i. e. the Preexiſtent Wiſedom of God] as it is in our four M.SS. Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil; and not [πρωτότοκον, i. e. the firſt produced, &c.] for this term agrees better with Euſebius's meaning, ſeeing that he had a little above quoted that place out of the Proverbs (Chap. 8. v. 22.) The Lord himſelf faſhioned me, &c. Indeed, the Antient Divines, and eſpecially thoſe who wrote before the times of the Nicene-Council, by the word [κτίζειν] underſtood, not onely a Creation which is made of nothing, but, all Production in general, as well that which was from all eternity, as that which is produced in time. Hence it is, that Melito wrote a Book [περὶ κτίσεως καὶ γενέσεως χριστοῦ] as we ſhall ſee at the fourth Book of this Hiſtory. But if we ſhould here read [πρωτότοκον] there would be an unmeet repetition, which is called a Tautologie, thus [ὁ πρωτόλογος καὶ πρωτότοκος, &c.] Beſides, [πρωτότοκος] is an unfit term to expreſs the Divine generation. Valeſ.

[m] Nicephorus underſtood this place amiſs, as if it had been ſpoken by Euſebius in praiſe of the Jews: But the words of Euſebius have a clean contrary meaning. For he ſays, that the Jews being corrupted by the contagion of their former life, God thought it ſufficient to preſcribe them legal Ceremonies, and to deliver them as it were certain Signes and Symbols of more ſecret Myſteries, as being yet ignorant, and accuſtomed to the Superſtition of the Heathens. Chryſoſtome, on Matthew, ſays the ſame. Ἐκ διαλάσθαι, from whence the participle here uſed comes, ſignifies in Greek, to be corrupted, and from a priſtine diſcipline to fall into a luxurious and diſſolute courſe of life. From whence [ἐκδιδυμηκὸς βίος] is a remiſs and looſe life; a phraſe taken from intemperate men, who obſerve no rule in meat and drink, nor in their whole courſe of life. This word occurs often in the writings of Dion Caſſius. Valeſ.

[n] Tranſlatours underſtood not this place, as it appears from their verſion of it. The meaning of Euſebius here is this. He attributes not ſo much to the Law-makers and Philoſophers of the Gentiles, as if that old Savageneſs and immanity of men were by little and little brought to be more tractable and gentle by their Precepts and Inſtitutes. But he imputes the reaſon hereof to the Law of Moſes; which, being known to the whole World, at length reclaimed and civilized the manners of all men. For the Law-makers and Philoſophers of the Gentiles, having derived all their beſt precepts from that Law, as from a fountain, infuſed them afterwards into the minds of their Auditours: whereby men being poliſhed, were rendred fit to receive the knowledge of the Evangelical Law. For the Moſaical Law was previous and the forerunner to the Evangelical, and prepared the way to Chriſt's Preaching. This place therefore is to be thus written [Τοῖς πλείοσι δὴ ἐθνῶν διὰ δὴ παιδαγόστε νομοθετῶν τε καὶ φιλοσόφων ἡμέρωτο τὰ φρονήματα] as it is plainly written in the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. and not, as it is in Robert Stephens Edit. thus [ἡμερώτατα φρονήματα.] Undoubtedly, unleſs it be thus written, the ſentence will be incoherent. For to what ſhall the particle [ὡς ὃ] be referred, which is put in the beginning of the period? There is alſo another difficulty in this place of Euſebius, that is, what is meant by theſe words [ἐξ αὐτῶν.] For Euſebius ſays [ἤδη τότε ἐξ αὐτῶν καὶ τοῖς πλείοσι, &c.] as before. Which words, as to me it ſeems, were put in, that Euſebius might ſhew, that whatever was fitly ſaid by the Law-makers and Philoſophers of the Gentiles, they borrowed it all from the Hebrews. And thus Ruſinus underſtood this place, as it plainly appears from his Tranſlation. Euſebius diſcourſes largely concerning this point in his Book, De preparatione, where he ſhews that the Grecian Philoſophers ſtole many things out of the Books of Moſes. Valeſ.

Dan. 7. 9, 10, & 13, 14.

Kingdom shall never be destroyed. These things can manifestly be referred to none other than to our Saviour, the Word that was in the Beginning with God, God the Word, termed the Son of Man by reason of his Incarnation in the latter times. But because we have in proper and peculiar ° Commentaries collected the Oracles of the Prophets touching our Saviour Jesus Christ, and have elsewhere confirmed by evident demonstrations those things which have been delivered concerning him, at this present we will be content with the premisses.

° He means his Books of Evangelical Demonstration, of which ten onely are now extant. Moreover, this Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius ought to be so much the more esteemed by us, because he wrote it after almost all his other works. Vales.

CHAP. III.

That the very Name of Jesus, and also that of Christ was from the Beginning both known and honoured among the Divine Prophets.

[a] NOw that the Name both of Jesus, and also of Christ, was of old honoured among the Prophets beloved of God, it is now an opportune time to declare. First of all Moses, knowing the Name of Christ to be most especially Venerable and Glorious, when he delivered Types and Symbols of heavenly things, and mystical forms, agreeable to the Divine Oracle that said to him, See thou doe all things after the fashion that was shewed thee in the mount, the Man whom he entitled (as much as he lawfully might) the High-Priest of God, the same he stiled Christ; and thus to the dignity of High-Priesthood, which excelled in his judgment all other prerogatives among men, he for honour and glory put-to the Name of Christ. So then he deemed Christ to be a certain Divine thing. The same Moses also, when being inspired by the Holy Ghost, he had well foreseen the Name of Jesus, judged again the same worthy of singular prerogative. For this Name of Jesus, which before Moses his time had never been named among men, Moses gave to him first, and to him alone, whom he knew very well by type again and figurative sign was to receive the Universal principality after his death. His Successour therefore, before that time not called Jesus, but by another Name, to wit, [b] Ause, which his Parents had given him, he called Jesus, giving him this appellation as a singular Title of Honour far passing all Royal Diadems, because that same Jesus, the Son of Nave bore the figure of our Saviour; who alone, after Moses, and the accomplishment of the figurative service delivered by him, was to succeed in the Government of the true and most pure Religion. Thus to two men who surpassed all people of that Age in virtue and glory, one being then High-priest, the other to be chief Ruler after him, Moses gave the Name of our Saviour Jesus Christ, as an Ensign of the greatest Honour. The Prophets also who came after, Propheſied plainly of Christ by Name, foretelling long before-hand the treacherous practice of the Jewish people against him, and the calling of the Gentiles by him. Both Jeremie saying thus, * The Spirit before our face, Christ our Lord, is taken in their nets, of whom we spake, under the shadow of his wings we shall be preserved alive among the Heathen: and David also, being very much perplexed, speaking thus, * Why have the Gentiles raged, and the people imagined vain things? The Kings of the earth stood forth, and the Princes assembled together in the same place against the Lord and against his Christ; whereunto afterwards he addeth in the person of Christ, The Lord said unto me, Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me, and I will give thee the Heathen for thine inheritance, and the ends of the earth for thy possession. The Name of Christ therefore among the Hebrews hath not onely honoured those that were adorned with the High-priesthood, being anointed with figurative and mystical oyl prepared on purpose, but Kings also, whom Prophets by the Divine appointment anointing, made figurative Christs; because they bore in themselves a resemblance of the regal and Princely power of the onely and true Christ, The Word of God, who governeth all things. And moreover we have learned that certain of the Prophets also by being anointed have typically become Christs. So that all these have a relation unto the true Christ, the Divine and Heavenly Word, the onely High-Priest of the whole World, therefore onely King of all the Creation, and the onely chief Prophet of the Father among all the Prophets. The proof hereof is demonstrable: For none of them that of old were typically anointed, whether Priests, or Kings, or Prophets, ever obtained so great a measure of Divine power and virtue, as the Saviour and our Lord Jesus, the onely and true Christ, hath shewed. Indeed none of them, how famous soever they were among their own followers throughout many Ages, by reason of their dignity and honour have caused by their being typically called Christs, that such as were conform to them should be named Christians. Neither hath the Honour of Adoration been exhibited by their subjects unto any of them, neither after the death of any of them have the minds of any been so much affected towards him, as to be ready to die for the maintenance of his Honour: neither hath there been any so great stir and commotion among all the Nations throughout the whole World for any of them. For the power of the figure and shadow was not of such efficacy in them, as the presence of the truth exhibited by our Saviour. Who though he received not from any the Ensigns and Badges of the High-priesthood, nor indeed * lineally descended according unto the flesh from the Priestly Race, nor was advanced by a Guard of Armed men unto his Kingdom, nor was made a Prophet after the manner of the antient Prophets, nor obtained any preeminence, or prerogative among the Jews; yet for all this he was adorned [c] by the Father with all these dignities, though not in Types and Symbols, yet in very truth. And although he obtained all these Titles in another manner then those men did, whereof mention hath been made, yet hath he been more truly stiled Christ than they all. And he, as being the onely and true Christ of God, hath by that truly venerable and Sacred Name of his filled the whole World with Christians: Nor doth he deliver henceforth types and shadows unto his followers, but naked virtues, and an heavenly life accompanied with the undoubted Doctrine of verity.

[a] In the Maz. and Fuk. M.SS. there is no distinction here of a new Chapter: for those Copies begin the third Chapter long before, as we noted above. The Med. M. S. begins the fourth Chapter at these words. But its most certain, as I before intimated, that the third Chapter must begin here; which the Title it self does demonstrate. Vales.

Evangel.* B. 5. Chap. 17. in Hebrew he is Named יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, i. e. Joshua, Numb. 11. v. 28. Vales.

And the oyntment He received was not corporal, compounded of ſpices, but Divine, by the Holy Ghoſt and by participation of the unbegotten Deity of the Father. The which thing again Eſay declareth, when as in the perſon of Chriſt he breaketh out into theſe words, * The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, wherefore he hath anointed me to Preach glad tidings unto the poor, he hath ſent me to cure the contrite in heart, to Preach deliverance unto the captives, and recovering of ſight to the blind. And not onely Eſay, but David alſo, directing his words to his Perſon, ſaith, * Thy Throne, O God, laſteth for ever and ever: the Sceptre of thy Kingdom is a right Sceptre. Thou haſt loved righteouſneſs and hated iniquity: Wherefore God even thy God hath anointed thee with the oyl of gladneſs above thy fellows. In which Text the Word of God in the firſt verſe termeth Chriſt God, the ſecond honoureth him with a Royal Sceptre: thence deſcending by degrees, after the mention of his Divine and Royal Power; in the third place he ſheweth him to have been Chriſt, anointed not with oyl of corporeal ſubſtance, but of Divine, that is of Gladneſs: whereby he ſignifieth his Prerogative and ſurpaſſing Excellency above them which with corporeal and typical oyl had of old been anointed. And in another place the ſame David ſpeaketh of him thus, ſaying, † The Lord ſaid unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand untill I make thine enemies thy footſtool. And, Out of my Womb before the Day-ſtar have I begotten thee; The Lord ſware and will not repent, Thou art a Prieſt for ever after the Order of Melchiſedec: This Melchiſedec in the Sacred † Scriptures is brought in the Prieſt of the moſt High God; but neither was he Conſecrated by any oyl prepared of man for that purpoſe, nor by ſucceſſion of kindred had he attained unto the Prieſt-hood among the Hebrews: wherefore our Saviour, according unto his Order, and not according to them who received ſignes and ſhadows, is publiſhed, and that with addition of an Oath, Chriſt and [d] Prieſt. Wherefore alſo the Sacred Hiſtory neither mentions him to be corporally anointed among the Jews, nor born of the Prieſtly Tribe, but of God himſelf before the Day-ſtar, that is, having His Eſſence before the ſtructure of the World, immortal, poſſeſſing a Prieſt-hood that never periſheth by reaſon of Age, but laſteth world without end. But this is a great and an apparent argument of his Incorporeal and Divine [e] Power, that he alone, of all men that hitherto ever were, is by all men throughout the whole world called Chriſt; is Preached and confeſſed by the common conſent and teſtimony of all, and by this Name every where celebrated among the Grecians and Barbarians: and that hitherto among all his followers throughout the world, He hath been both honoured as King, had in admiration above a Prophet, and alſo glorified as the true and onely High-Prieſt of God; and above all this, that he is worſhipped even as God, in as much as he is the Eternal Word of God, and ſubſiſted before all Worlds, [f] receiving majeſtical Honour from the Father: But this moreover is moſt of all to be marvelled at, that we who are dedicated unto him, honour him not with voices onely and noiſe of words, but with all entire affection of the mind, ſo that we prefer the confeſſion of him before our own lives,

CHAP. IV.

That the Religion, by him declared to all Nations, is neither New, nor Strange.

[a] LEt theſe things therefore be neceſſarily placed by me here in the beginning of this Hiſtory, leaſt any man ſhould ſurmiſe our Saviour and Lord Jeſus Chriſt to be a Perſon newly apparent, by reaſon of the late time of his being converſant in the fleſh. Now alſo, leaſt any ſhould deem his Doctrine to be New and Strange, as delivered by a new comer, and one who nothing differeth from the reſt of men, come on, let us alſo in ſhort debate thereof. It is indeed moſt certain, when as the coming and preſence of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt ſhone now freſh unto all men, that a people new we muſt confeſs, yet neither ſmall, nor ſuch as was ſcituate in ſome corner of the earth, but of all Nations both the moſt populous and moſt religious, and upon this account inexpugnable and invincible, becauſe aided continually by the aſſiſtance of God, at certain ſeaſons predetermined by the ſecret providence of God, to us ſuddenly appeared, being ennobled among all men by the Title and Name of Chriſt. This, one of the Prophets by the eye of the Divine Spirit foreſeeing would come to paſs, was aſtoniſhed, in ſo much that he cried out, thus, * Who hath heard ſuch things? Or who hath ſpoken after this manner? Hath the earth travelling brought forth in one day? And hath a Nation ſprung up ſuddenly and at one time? Alſo the ſame Prophet ſhews the very Name that ſhould be given, ſaying, * And they that ſerve me ſhall be called after a New name which ſhall be bleſſed upon earth. But although, without controverſie we are but of late, and this new name of Chriſtians hath been but lately known unto all Nations; yet, that our life and manner of converſation, together with the rules of Religion, are not newly deviſed by our ſelves, but have been (as I may ſay) even from the original of mankind, inſtituted and obſerved by antient godly men from thoſe notions that nature had implanted in their minds, we will thus make evident. That the Nation of the Hebrews is no new Nation, but honoured among all people for their antiquity, is well known to all. They have books and monuments in writing containing the actions of antient men, who were rare indeed, and few in number, yet excelled in piety and righteouſneſs, and all other kind of virtues. Whereof ſome flouriſht before the floud, others after; as the ſons and off-ſpring of Noah; [b] And moreover Abraham, in whom the children of the Hebrews doe glory, as their chief Founder, and forefather. Now if any one beginning with Abraham and going upwards to the firſt man, does affirm that all thoſe men who have ſo glorious Teſtimonials of their righteouſneſs, were in reality though not by name Chriſtians, he ſhall not erre far from the truth. For whereas the name of Chriſtian ſignifieth a man who through the knowledge and Doctrine of Chriſt excelleth in modeſty and righteouſneſs, in patience of life

[a] At theſe words the Maz. and Fuk. MSS. and the Kings M. S. and the Old ſheets begin the 4th Chapter.

* Iſai. 62. 2.

[b] Some Tranſlatours (as Muſculus, and Dr Hanmer as appears by his Verſion, and marginal Note thereat) ſuppoſed that [ἀπὸ, i. e. atar, which is the word here uſed in the Original, and is a Greek adverb] was a proper name, and a corruption of Terah the name of the father of Abraham, of whom mention is made Gen. 11. But this is a great miſtake. For Terah, the father of Abraham, was not one of thoſe whom God loved; as it may be plainly collected from Sacred Scripture: neither did our Euſebius think ſo, as appears by his own words, when he ſays, a little after this, in this Chapter, concerning Abraham, that he left the ſuperſtition of his fathers. We have therefore tranſlated theſe words [ἀπὸ δὲ] And moreover. Valeſ.

and virtuous fortitude, and in profession of sincere Piety towards the one and the onely God who is above all; they were no less studious about all this than we are. They cared not therefore for corporal Circumcision; no more doe we: nor for the observation of Sabbaths; no more doe we; nor for abstinence from certain meats, and distinction of other things, which Moses first instituted and delivered to be typically observed; no more doe Christians regard such matters now. But they of Old evidently knew the very Christ of God. For that he appeared to Abraham, gave answers to Isaac, talked with Jacob, conversed with Moses, and afterwards with the Prophets, we have shewed before. Hence thou maiest find those darlings of God honoured with the name of Christ, according unto that saying of them, * See that ye touch not my † Christs, neither deal perversly with my Prophets. It is manifest therefore that the service of God, which was instituted by the godly of Old about the time of Abraham, and published of late unto all the Gentiles by the Doctrine of Christ, ought to be accounted the first, the eldest, and the antientest of all. But if they say that Abraham a long time after received the commandment of Circumcision; yet before the receit thereof he is said to have been justified by his faith; the Scripture speaking thus, * Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousnes. And he being such a one already before Circumcision, the Oracle from God, who manifested himself unto him, even Christ himself, the Word of God before-hand hath uttered this unto him in these words, concerning those who in future Ages should be justified after the same manner with himself, saying thus, * And all the Tribes of the earth shall be blessed in thee; And that he should be a great and a populous Nation and all the Nations on the earth should be blessed in him. And we may by consideration easily perceive that this is fulfilled in us. For he, through Faith in Christ the Word of God who appeared unto him was justified, when having left the superstition of his fathers, and the errour of his former life, he confessed one onely God who is over all, and worshipped him with virtuous works, and not with the ceremonious service of the Law delivered afterwards by Moses. Unto him, being such a one it was said that, In him shall all the Tribes of the earth and all Nations be blessed. The very same manner of Religion which Abraham followed, is found at this present among Christians alone throughout the world, practised by them in works which are far more evident than words. What then hindreth but that we may henceforth confess, that one and the same way of living, and the same kind of Religion is common to us, who have our name from Christ, with them who of Old sincerely served God and were so dear unto him. It plainly appears therefore that that perfect and exact rule of Religion, which hath been delivered unto us by the Doctrine of Christ, is neither New nor Strange, but (if we ought to speak the truth) the first, the onely, and the true one. And of these matters let thus much suffice.

CHAP. V.

Of the times of our Saviours Manifestation unto Men.

AUGUSTUS.

BUt, after this preparation wherein by way of Preface we have laid down such things as are fit to usher-in the Ecclesiastical History we design, it now remaineth that we take the first step as it were of our journey from the appearance of our Saviour in the flesh; calling upon God, the Father of the Word, and upon Jesus Christ himself, of whom we Treat, our Saviour and Lord, the heavenly Word of God, that he will be our help and fellow-labourer in the declaration of the Truth. It was now therefore [a] the two and fortieth year of the Reign of Augustus, and the eight and twentieth year after the subduing of Egypt, and the death of Antonius and Cleopatra, in whom the Rule of the Ptolomees in Egypt ceased, when our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ at the time of the first [b] Taxing, which was when [c] Cyrenius was Governour of Syria, was born in Bethlehem of Judea, agreeable to the Prophecies, that went before of him. Which Taxing under Cyrenius, Flavius Josephus, a most famous Historiographer among the Hebrews, maketh mention of; adding thereto another History concerning the Sect of the Consulship. Thus much concerning the year wherein Christ was born. Eusebius does no where expresly mention the day. It was the common opinion of the Western Church that he was born on the 7. Kalend. January: but the Eastern Church thought otherwise, that he was born on the 8. Id. January (i. e. on the 6th day Jan.) Vales. The learned have found so great difficulty in assigning the day of our Saviours Birth, that Scaliger said, Unius Dei est non hominis definire; i. e. God onely, not man, was able expressely to declare it. It had been much better for these men to content themselves with the tradition of the Church, rather than by such an elaborate unfruitful search to entangle the truth. For the celebration of this festival, many testimonies may be produced out of Origen, Cyprian, and Chrysostom, each of these fathers deducing it from the practise of the first antiquity; and St Augustine makes it a Character of a son of the Church to solemnize the Festivals of it, and this (principally and by name) of the Nativity. To which may be added that of the Author of the Constitutions (Constit. B. 5. c. 13.) τὰς ἡμέρας τῆς ἑορτῆς φυλάσσετε, ἡ πρώτην τῶν ᾠῴθλιον, i. e. Keep the days of the feasts, and first the day of Christs Birth. So that the Religion of this day, non est nupera, neque novitia, is not modern, nor newly begun, though Scaliger said so. And for the particular day, the 25th of December, whereon this Festival is by us solemnized, (not to mention other testimonies which might be produced to this purpose) In Joseph the Egyptian's Arabick Codex of the Counsels (a M. S. in the Archives of the publick Library of Oxford, of the gift of Sr Thomas Roe) this day as well as this Feast is affirmed to stand by Apostolical Canon. The words of which, as it is Transcribed by Mr Gregory, are in English these, Also that you constitute an anniversary Feast at the Nativity of the Lord Christ, on the Day on which he was Born, and that was the five and twentieth of the first Canon (i. e. of December) For this is the principal of all the Feasts, &c. See Mr Gregories Works, Chap. 34. Dr Hammond on the Festivals of the Church, and the Learned Seldens Tract of Christmas-Day for further satisfaction.

[a] The first year of Augustus, according to Eusebius's computation, is that wherein Hirtius and Pansa were Consuls. Therefore the fourty second year of Augustus falls on his thirteenth

[b] It is by learned men affirmed, particularly by Fr. Casaubon in Bar. p. 105. (and is most probable) that this decree of Taxing (or inrolling every Person, according to their Families and Estates) was an effect of Augustus his curiosity (and neither of his desire to enrich his Treasure, nor to reform the excesses of those before him) and this over-ruled by Gods special providence, that this Emperour might serve to be instrumental to the conserving the record of the Birth of Christ, whose Name and his mothers, as well as Josephs, were now inrolled. And this is an evidence of the nature of this ἀπογραφὴ, that it was not a Tax, for that would not have belonged to women and infants, but to the possessours onely. See Dr Hammond on Luk. 2. v. 1.

[c] There is a great disagreement amongst the Learned about this enrolment and valuation of mens Persons and Estates, whether it was done once, or twice. Some say there were two, both made by the same Cyrenius, (or Quirinius,) and both mentioned by St Luke: the first he speaks of Chap. 2. 2. of his Gospel; which was made a little before our Saviours Birth, about the latter end of the Reign of Herod the great, Sentius Saturninus being then president of Syria; this, say these men, St Luke calls πρώτη ἀπογραφὴ, the first Taxing, to difference it from that other mentioned by him, Acts 5. 37. And whereas St Luke says, Cyrenius at that time had the rule over Syria; these words are to be taken in a looser, not stricter sense; not that Cyrenius was then the standing Governour there under the Romans, but was sent by the Emperour particularly on this occasion, to take an Inventory of this part of the Empire: for its confest that Sentius Saturninus was then the president of Syria. The other Taxing, mentioned in the Acts, was made ten years after this, after the banishment of Archelaus, and about the insurrection of Judas of Galilee (or Gaulanites.) This is the opinion of Scaliger, Petavius, Casaubon, and Hammond. On the other hand, Valesius (and with him, as he thinks, agrees our Eusebius in this Chapt.) says there was but one Taxing, (which may be supposed to have been begun at the latter end of Herod the great his Reign, about the time of Christs Birth, and was not perhaps perhaps finiſhed till ten years after, when Cyrenius was preſident of Syria, after the baniſhment of Archelaus;) his reaſons are theſe; Joſephus mentions but one: after this Enrolment once made why ſhould it be repeated, and that by the ſame perſon? For if he had done it equally and exactly, what need of a new one? if not, another perſon ought rather to be ſent who might doe it better: What had a Roman Magiſtrate to doe with any thing of Government in Judea whilſt Herod lived, who in all right was King there, and was ſo acknowledged by the Roman Senate? Laſtly, about the time of Chriſts Birth Saturninus and Varus were procurators in Syria, and not Cyrenius. I ſhall not take upon me to determine this difference; the Reader has here the ſum of the Arguments on both ſides, and is left to his liberty to be ſwayed by which party he pleaſes.

AUGUSTUS. Galileans, which ſprang up about the ſame time, whereof amongſt us alſo Luke in the Acts of the Apoſtles maketh mention, ſaying thus, * After this man roſe up one [d] Judas of Galilee in the days of the Taxing, and drew away much people after him: he alſo himſelf periſhed, and all even as many as obeyed him, were diſperſed. The ſame indeed, Joſephus before mentioned in his eighteenth Book of Antiquities, doth agree in and confirm thus, word for word, "Cyrenius one of "the number of the Roman Senatours, a man who "had born all Offices, and by all the degrees of "Honour had climbed at length to the Conſulſhip, "and who was greatly renowned in other re"ſpects, came with a few men into Syria, being "ſent on purpoſe by Cæſar, as Judge of the Na"tion, and to take the Valuation of their Eſtates. "And a little after, he ſaith, Judas Gaulanites, a "man of the City named Gamala, having taken "unto him one Saddochus a Phariſee, earneſtly "ſollicited the people to Rebellion: Both of "them affirming, that the Taxing of this Tribute "inferred nothing but manifeſt Servitude, and ex"horting the whole Nation to maintain their Li"berty. And in his Second Book of the Wars of the Jews, he writeth thus of the ſame Perſon: "At that time a certain Galilean by name Judas, "ſtirred up the people of that Region to defecti"on, upbraiding them for paying Tribute ſo tame"ly to the Romans, and, having God their Sove"reign, for ſuffering mortal men to be their ma"ſters. So far Joſephus.

*Act. 5. 37.

[d] This inſurrection of Judas of Galilee we aſſert to have been after the baniſhment of Archelaus. Indeed, before his depoſition there could be no reaſon why Judas ſhould ſtir up the people of the Jews to a defection. For no Valuation of mens Eſtates could be made by a Roman Magiſtrate there, where a King, that was a friend and an Allie of the Romans, Governed;

CHAP. VI.

That in his time, according to the Predictions of the Prophets, the Princes of the Jewiſh Nation who before by ſucceſſion had held the Principality, ſurceaſed, and that Herod, the Firſt of the Aliens, became their King.

NOw at that time, when Herod, the Firſt of them who by deſcent was a Forreigner, had obtained the Rule over the Jewiſh Nation, the Prophecy written by Moſes was fulfilled, which * Gen. 49. 10. ſaid, * There ſhall not want a Prince in Juda, neither a Leader fail of his Loyns, untill he come for whom it is reſerved. Whom he declares to be the expectation of the Gentiles. Indeed the things of that Propheſie hung unaccompliſhed all the time that it was lawful for the Jews to live under Princes of their own Nation: who taking their beginning as high as Moſes himſelf, continued down their Reign even to the Empire of Auguſtus: under whom Herod the Firſt [a] Forreigner had the

[a] Joſeph Scaliger, in his Animadverſions upon Euſebius's Chronicon, has ſufficiently made it evident, that Herod was no Forreigner. Joſephus, in his 20. B. of Antiquit. Chap. 6. calls Herod τὸ γένος ἰδιώτην, i. e. a Few as to his Lineage. Valeſ.

Government of the Jews granted him by the Romans: who, as Joſephus declares, was by his fathers ſide an Idumæan; by his mothers, an Arabian: But, as Affricanus, one not of the vulgar ſort of Writers, ſays, they who have been more accurate about his pedegree, ſay he was the ſon of Antipater, who was the ſon of one Herod an Aſcalonite, who was one of the ſervants which Miniſtred in the Temple of Apollo. This Antipater, being taken by Idumæan theeves while he was yet a child, remained a long time among them, becauſe his father being one of a mean Eſtate was not able to redeem him. And being brought up after their manner of breeding, became at length very familiarly acquainted with Hyrcanus the High-prieſt of the Jews. This very mans ſon was that Herod who lived in the time of our Saviour. When therefore the principality of the Jews was come into the hands of this Alien, then was the expectation of the Gentiles even at the doors, according unto that Propheſie: For then the Line of their Native Princes and Governours was broken off, which had been drawn down by a continued Succeſſion from Moſes himſelf untill that time. For before they were taken Captives and carried into Babylon, Kings reigned over them, beginning from Saul who was the firſt, and from David. Before their Kings Princes bore Rule over them, whom they called Judges, beginning their Government after Moſes, and his Succeſſour * Jeſus. After their return from Babylon there ceaſed not amongſt them a form of Government, an Ariſtocracie together with an Oligarchie, the beſt ruling, and they but few in number. For the High-Prieſts had held that preeminence untill Pompey the Roman Captain coming upon them by main force, beſieged and ranſacked Jeruſalem, polluted the Holy places, by entring into the Sanctuaries of the Temple, and ſent priſoner to Rome the High-prieſt whoſe name was Ariſtobulus with his ſons, who by ſucceſſion from his Progenitors had continued unto that time both Prince and Prieſt; and committed the Office of High-prieſthood unto his brother Hyrcanus, and from that time forth made the whole Jewiſh Nation become Tributary to the Romans. And indeed not long after, Hyrcanus, the laſt of thoſe to whom the High-prieſthood by ſucceſſion befell, being taken priſoner by the Parthians, Herod the firſt Forreigner, as I ſaid before, had the Government of the Jewiſh nation delivered to him by the Roman Senate and the Emperour Auguſtus. Under whom, whenas the preſence of Chriſt was apparent, the long-lookt-for Salvation of the Gentiles was accompliſhed, and their calling conſequently followed, according to the predictions of the Prophets. Since which time the Princes and Rulers of Juda (thoſe I mean who were of Jewiſh extraction) ceaſing, ſtraightway the ſeries and courſe of the High-prieſthood, which among them by order of ſucceſſion after the deceaſe of the former was always, as it was meet, wont to fall unto the next of bloud, was confounded. Hereof thou haſt Joſephus a witneſs worthy of credit, declaring how that Herod, after that he was intruſted with the rule over the Jews by the Romans, aſſigned them no more High-prieſts of the antient Prieſtly Race, but conferred that honour upon certain obſcure perſons; and how that the ſame courſe which Herod had taken in conſtituting High-prieſts, was followed by his ſon Archelaus, and after by the Romans who ſucceeded him in the Government of Judea. The ſaid Joſephus declareth, how that Herod firſt ſhut up under his own Privy-Seal the Holy Robe of the High-prieſt, not permitting the

And let these things be spoken by us to evidence the truth of another Prophesie, which by the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus was accomplished. For most plainly and expressly of all other, the Holy Scripture in Daniel describing the number of certain weeks unto Christ the Ruler (whereof we have in another [b] place intreated) foretelleth that after the accomplishment of those weeks the Jewish anointing should be abolished. And this is plainly proved to have been fulfilled at the time when our Saviour Jesus Christ came in the flesh. And let these things necessarily be fore-observed by us for the proof of the truth of the times.

CHAP. VII.

Of the disagreement supposed to be among the Gospels about the Genealogy of Christ.

BUt in as much as Matthew and Luke, committing the Gospel to writing, have differently delivered unto us the Genealogie of Christ, and are thought by many to disagree very much among themselves, so that almost every one of the faithful, through ignorance of the truth, hath ambitiously striven to comment upon those places; come on, let us rehearse a certain History which is come to our hands concerning the premises, the which Africanus (whom we mentioned a little before) hath set down in an Epistle written to Aristides about the concordance of the Genealogie of Christ in the Gospels: and having indeed [a] blamed the Opinions of others, as wrested and false, he delivereth the History that he himself had met withall, in these very words. "For seeing that the names of kindred in Israel "were numbred either after the line of nature, or after the rule of the Law; after the order of Nature, "as by succession of natural seed, after that of the "Law, as when any one begetteth a son in the "name of his brother who deceased without issue: "For because a perspicuous hope of the Resurrection was not yet granted them, they shadowed out in some sort the promise to come "with this kind of mortal Resurrection, that the "name of the deceased might continue and never "be quite blotted out. Because therefore, of them "that are reckoned in this Genealogy, some succeeded their fathers as natural sons, but others "received their name whence they received not "their nature; mention is made of both; as well "of them who were truly fathers, as of them who "were titular onely and as fathers. Thus neither "of the Gospels is found false, the one drawing "the Pedegree by the Natural, the other by the "Legall line. For the race both of Solomon, and "that also of Nathan, are so wrapped and twisted together, by reviving of persons deceased "without issue, by [b] second marriages, and by "raising up of seed, that not without cause the "same men are supposed to have had divers fathers, whereof some were onely nominative, "others fathers indeed. Thus the account in both "Gospels is true, and is brought down to Joseph "accurately and exactly, though by a various and "different line. And, that what I say may plainly appear, I will recite "the [c] alteration of Families. If we count the Generations (as * Matthew "doth) from David by Solomon, Matthan will "be found the third from the end, who begat Jacob "the father of Joseph: but if from Nathan the son "of David, according unto * Luke, then the third "in like manner from the end "will be [d] Melchi, whose "son was Heli the father of "Joseph. For Joseph was the "son of Heli, the son of Mel"chi. Joseph therefore be"ing, as it were, the mark we "shoot at, we must shew how "each person is termed his fa"ther, as well Jacob, who deriveth his pedegree "from Solomon, as Heli who descended from "Nathan; and besides, how, in the first place, "these two, Jacob and Heli, were brethren, then, in "the next place, how their fathers Matthan and "Melchi, born of divers kindreds, may be made "appear to be Grand-fathers to Joseph. Now "therefore thus it was: Matthan and Melchi "marrying, one after the other, the same wife, "begat children who were brethren by the mo"ther; the law not forbidding a widow, either "dismissed from her husband, or after the death "of her husband, to be married unto another man. "First therefore Matthan, descending from So"lomon, begat Jacob of Estha: for that is said to "be the womans name. After the death of Mat"than, Melchi, who descended from Nathan, "being of the same Tribe, but of another race "(as we said before) took this widow to his "wife, and begat Heli his son. Thus shall we "find Jacob and Heli, though of a different "race, yet by the same mother to have been bre"thren. One of whom, namely Jacob, after "Heli his brother was deceased without issue, "married his wife, and begat on her the third, "Joseph, by nature indeed and reason his own "son; whereupon also it is writtten, And Jacob "begat Joseph; but by the Law he was the son of "Heli; for Jacob being his brother raised up "seed unto him. Wherefore neither is that Ge"nealogie which concerneth him to lose its au"thority, the which indeed * Matthew the Evan"gelist reciting saith, And Jacob begat Joseph, "but * Luke on the other side, Which was the son, "as it was supposed (for he addeth this withall) "of Joseph, which was the son of Heli, which was "the son of Melchi. Nor could he more signi"ficantly and properly have expressed that way "of Generation according to the Law. There"fore in his recital of procreations of this sort, "he passeth over in silence even to the end, the "word of Begetting, carrying the whole series "of Families step by step up as high as A"dam, who was the son of God. Neither is "this matter destitute of good proof, or rashly "and hastily devised. For the kinsmen of our Sa"viour according to the flesh, either out of desire "to make known the Nobility of their stock, or "simply to tell the story, have very truly delivered "even these things unto us; how that Idumæan "Theeves invading the City Ascalon in Palæstina, "took Captive together with other spoils out of "the [b] The chief cause of confusing of Families was, when the woman, having had children by a former husband, hastned to remarry, and bore children by her latter also. After which, let us suppose the son, begotten by her first husband, to have married a wife, and afterwads to have died without issue. Then, if his brother by the mother side marry his widow, and beget children of her, in these children there will be a confusedness of families; in so much that by nature they may be called this mans and have one name, but by Law the others, and bear another name. Valef.

But, in that the "Prieſt was not able to pay the ranſome for his "ſon, Antipater was brought "up after the faſhion of the "Idumæans, and at length "became very familiar with "Hyrcanus the High-prieſt "of Judea. He, being by "Hyrcanus ſent Embaſſa-"dour unto Pompey, and "having recovered him the "Kingdom free and entire, "which his brother Ariſto-"bulus had in great part uſur-"ped, had the good hap him-"ſelf to gain the Title and Of-"fice of [f] Procuratour of Pa-"leſtine, and lived in great "proſperity. This Antipa-"ter being traiterouſly ſlain "by ſome who envied his "great felicity, Herod his "ſon ſucceeded him, whom "at laſt Antonius and Au-"guſtus, by decree of the Senate, conſtituted King "over the Jews: whoſe ſons were Herod and the "other Tetrarchs. Theſe things are common alſo "among the Greek Hiſtories. Now whenas un-"to that time the Genealogies not onely of the "Hebrews, but of them alſo who Lineally deſcen-"ded from antient Proſelytes, as from Achior the "Ammonite, and Ruth the Moabiteſs, and thoſe "who came out of Egypt with the Iſraelites "and mingled with them, were Recorded a-"mong the antient monuments; Herod conſider-"ing that the Iſraelitical pedegrees would avail "him nothing, and being prick't in mind with the "conſciouſneſs of his baſe-"neſs of birth, [g] burnt their "antient recorded Genealo-"gies, ſuppoſing thereby to "make himſelf to be thought "to come of noble paren-"tage, when none other, "aſſiſted by publick Re-"cords, were able to bring "their pedegrees from the "Patriarchs, or antient Pro-"ſelytes, or ſuch as were cal-"led [h] Georæ, ſtrangers born, "and mingled among the Iſ-"raelites. Yet ſome few ſtu-"dious in this behalf having "either kept in memory the "names of their Anceſtours, "or copied them out of an-"tient Rolls, have got unto "themſelves their proper pe-"degrees, and glory much "that they have preſerved "the remembrance of their "antient Nobility. Amongſt "whom were thoſe men I mentioned before, who by "reaſon of their near kindred with our Saviour, "were called DESPOSYNI. Theſe travelling "from Nazara and [i] Cochaba, towns of the Jews, "into other regions, plainly expounded the fore-"ſaid genealogie, partly out of the book of their "[k] Ephemerides, and partly out of their memorie, "as far as they were able. However then the caſe "ſtand, whether thus or otherwiſe, no man in my "judgment, and in the judgment of any other in-"genious perſon, can find "a plainer expoſition. Let "us make much of this there-"fore, though we have [l] no "proof to confirm it, ſeeing "we cannot produce a better, "and a truer expoſition. The "Goſpel indeed in all reſpects "uttereth moſt true things. And about the end of the ſame Epiſtle he addeth theſe words; "Matthan de-"ſcending from Solomon be-"gat Jacob. Matthan de-"ceaſed, Melchi of the "ſtock of Nathan on the "ſame woman begat Heli. "[m] So Heli and Jacob were brethren by the mo-"thers ſide. Heli dying without iſſue, Jacob "raiſed unto him ſeed by begetting of Joſeph, "his own ſon by Nature, but Heli his ſon by "Law. Thus was Joſeph ſon to both. So far "Africanus. Now the Genealogie of Joſeph being thus recited, the ſtock alſo of Mary, who was of the ſame Tribe together with him, is in effect made apparent. For by the Law of Moſes, mingling of Tribes by marriage was forbidden. For the woman is commanded to be joyned in marriage to one of the ſame Houſe and of the ſame Family, that ſo the inheritance of the kindred might not be removed from tribe to tribe. But of theſe matters let thus much ſuffice.

AUGUSTUS.

[e] This paſſage is altogether fabulous. For the name of Antipater's father was not Herod, but Antipater an Idumæan; neither was he a miniſter in the Temple of Apollo. See Joſephus B. 14. Chap. 2. This Antipater, Alexander King of the Jews made Prefect of all Idumæa; and this firſt Antipater ſeems to be the founder of all that Greatneſs, to which his poſterity afterwards arrived. For he had the Prefecture of Idumæa during the reign of Alexander and Alexandra; and, having made an Alliance with the Aſcalonites, Gazites, and Arabians gat great riches. Valeſ.

[f] Antipater, the father of Herod, was Procuratour of the whole Kingdom of Judæa under Hyrcanus, and managed all affairs, both Militarie, and Civil. Therefore Joſephus, in his 14. B. calls him [ἐπίτροπον, i. e. Procuratour.] Valeſ.

[g] I judge this paſſage alſo to have little of certainty in it. For Joſephus, in the book of his own life, mentioning the original and antiquity of his own ſtock, fetches it from the publick Archives. Therefore thoſe publick tables, which contained the originalls of the Jewiſh families, were extant in Joſephus's time. And ſo its falſe to ſay that Herod burnt them. Valeſ.

[h] Two ſorts of men joyned themſelves with the children of Iſrael when they went up out of Egypt. The one were native Egyptians, whom Moſes (Exod. 12. 19.) calls αὐτόχθονας, i. e. born in the land: the other ſort were a mixt multitude, whom he there calls γηώρας, i. e. ſtrangers. They were extraneous perſons amongſt the Egyptians, who took the land to Till at a certain penſion: the Jews were ſuch, before they went up out of Egypt. Both theſe ſorts of men the ſacred Scripture comprehends under the name of a mixt multitude (Exod. 12, 38.) Valeſ.

[i] Cochaba was a village neer Decapolis. Valeſ.

[k] Many of the Jews, ſtudious of preſerving their pedegree, had private copies thereof, taken out of the publick Archives; as we often ſee Gentlemen doe at this day amongſt us. Valeſ.

[l] How much this explication of the place in the Goſpels is to be valued, appears from theſe words of Africanus; who confeſſes it is not confirmed by the teſtimonie of any antient writer: But he would have us admit of it, becauſe none that is better can be brought. Which if it be ſo, I wiſh our Euſebius had not mentioned this matter in the entrance of his Hiſtory. It had undoubtedly been better and more adviſedly done, to have paſſed over in ſilence this diſagreement of the Evangeliſts, leaſt thoſe Readers, who were not believers (many of which there were at that time) might hence take occaſion to doubt of the truth of the Goſpel. Valeſ.

[m] In this way of reconciling this matter, which Africanus relates, two things occur which ſeem to have ſome thing of difficulty in them, firſt, I doubt whether it were lawful for the brother by the mothers ſide to marry his brothers widow, and to beget children of her, which were to ſucceed in the name and be accounted of the Familie of his brother. The Law (Deut. 25.5.) ſpeaks of the brother that dwells in the ſame houſe, and that is of the ſame Stock: But the brother by the mothers ſide is not of the ſame Houſe, nor of the ſame Stock: Seeing that the Stock, eſpecially amongſt the Jews, was deduced from the fathers Race. Secondly, it may be deſervedly queſtioned, whether in reckoning up the generations, there be any account had of the adoptive fathers. Obed, who is mentioned in the Genealogie of Chriſt, is an eminent example hereof. For when Maalon was dead in the land of Moab, and Ruth left a widow without children, Booz the kinſman of Maalon (he that was a nearer kinſman than he giving up his right) took Ruth to wife, whereby he might raiſe up ſeed to Maalon. Yet Obed that was begotten of her, is by the Evangeliſts, and in the Book of Ruth not called the ſon of Maalon, but the ſon of Booz. Valeſ.

Of Herods cruelty towards the Infants, and after how miſerable a manner he ended his life.

NOw Chriſt being born in Bethlehem of Judæa at the time before manifeſted, according to the predictions of the Prophets, Herod, upon an enquiry made by the *wiſe men that came from the Eaſt, asking where he was that was born King of the Jews? for they ſaid they had ſeen his Star, and had therefore made ſuch a long journey with diligence, becauſe they moſt ardently deſired to worſhip him that was born, as God: Herod, I ſay, being not a little troubled, judging his Government to be in very imminent danger, demanded of the Doctors of the Law, then in the Nation, where they expected Chriſt ſhould be born: when he knew of the Prophecy of Micah, who foretold he was to be born in Bethlehem; by one expreſs Edict he commands all the young children both in Bethlehem and in all the coaſts thereof from two years old and under, according to the time which he

But his Parents having had notice of the whole matter by an Angel that appeared to them, conveyed the young child into Egypt, and so he escaped the Kings bloudy plot. Thus much indeed the sacred writing of the Gospel sets forth. And now moreover it would be worth the while to see what immediately befell Herod upon account of his audacious wickedness acted towards Christ and those of the same age with him; How forthwith, without all delay, the Divine vengeance seized him whilst alive after such a manner, as to foreshew some beginnings of those torments which awaited him after this life. And how he clouded the prosperous Successes of his Reign, as he judged them to be, with domestick calamities following one upon another, with the murthers of his wife and children, and others of his nearest relations and deerest friends, I shall not now be able particularly to recount, in as much as the rehearsal of this matter would far surpass even all the most savage cruelty of every Tragedy; which Josephus in his History has at large declared. But, how after his cruel plot formed against our Saviour and the other infants, he was forthwith smitten from heaven with a disease, as with a scourge, whereof he died, it will not be unfit to understand from the Authour himself, who in his * seventeenth Book of Antiquities relates after how lamentable a manner he ended his life, writing word for word thus; "But the disease of Herod grew "yet more bitterly violent, God exacting this "judgment of his enormities upon him. He had a "gentle feaver not expressing it self so much to "the outward touch and feeling, as more grievously burning him within. Moreover he had a "vehemently strong appetite after meat, but nothing could suffice him; he had an ulcer of the "entrails with sharp conflictations especially of "the Colick-gut: a phlegmatick and shining humour appeared about his feet. Moreover the "disease had gotten about the lower belly, and "more than that, there was a putrefaction of his "Genitalls, and it bred worms; besides he had "a shortness of breath, which was also unsavory; "a troublesome flux of Rheum, which caused a "perpetual difficulty of breathing. And, the "patient having not strength to resist these things, "there followed a convulsion of all the parts. "It was said therefore by the Diviners, and those "who made it their business to give judgement "of such things, that the hand of God was upon "the King to punish him for his so oft repeated "horrible offences. Thus much therefore the foresaid Writer relates in the fore-mentioned Book. And in the Second [a] Book of his History he speaks of him after the same manner, in these words: "After that he was taken with a disease "which seising upon the whole state and habit of "his body, tormented him exceedingly with several "pains: He had a feaver but not of any acute kind, "an insufferable itching over all his body, with "continual tortures of the Colon: by the humours "about his feet you would judge him to have been "Hydropical; besides this, a strange inflammation "of the lower belly, and such a putrefaction of the "Genitalls as bred worms; moreover a shortness "and difficulty of breathing with a convulsion of "all the parts. This moved those of that time "who pretended to know the mind of God, to "term these diseases a punishment inflicted on him "from heaven. But although he strugled with "so many distempers, yet he hoped to live and "recover, and sought for remedy. Passing therefore over Jordan he made use of the hot-waters "that are neer Callirhoe. They fall into the lake "Asphaltites, but are so sweet that they are "potable. There, when his Physitians thought "it good to bathe his whole body in warm oil, "being set into a bathing-vessel filled with oil, "he was so weakened all over his body that he "turned up his eyes as if he had been dead. But "at the noise of his attendants outcries he came "to himself again. After this, despairing of recovery, he gave order for the distribution of "fifty [b] Drachms to every "one of his common Soul-"diers, but to his Comman-"ders and friends he gave "great sums of money. "From thence he returned "to Jericho; and being "now grown very melan-"choly, he did as it were "threaten death it self, and "resolved upon the commis-"sion of a most horrible and "villanous fact. For he "commanded all the emi-"nent personages that were "in every town of Judæa "to be summoned together "and imprisoned in the Hip-"podrome. Then calling for his sister Salome "and her husband Alexander, I know, said he, "the Jews will rejoyce mightily at my death; "but, if you will obey my commands, I can make "my self to be lamented by many, and obtain "an honourable Funeral; as soon as breath is out "of my body, doe you being guarded with Soul-"diers, kill all these men whom I have imprisoned; so all Judæa, yea every family shall though against their wills, mourn at my death. And a little "after he says, and again when he was tortured "partly by want of sustenance, and partly by the "Convulsions of his violent Cough, being overcome "with continual torments he resolved to hasten his "own death. And having taken an apple, he asked "for a knife, for his manner was to cut them him-"self when ever he eat them; then looking round "least there should be any one that might hinder him, he lifted up his right hand, as about "to doe violence to himself. Moreover the same "Writer relates farther, how that a little before "his death he most wickedly "commanded [c] another of his "own sons, having slain [d] two "of them before, to be put "to death, and then soon af-"ter died in most exquisite "torture. And such was the end Herod made, suffering a due punishment for his cruelty towards the infants of Bethlehem, which he contrived on purpose to destroy our Saviour. After his death an Angel appeared to Joseph then in Egypt, and commanded him to take the young Child and his Mother and return into Judea, telling him they were dead who sought the young Childs Life. To which the * Evangelist farther adds, saying, when he heard that Archelaus reigned in Judea in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither, not withstanding being warned of God in a dream he turned aside into the parts of Galilee.

AUGUSTUS.

* Joseph. Antiq. B. 17. c. 8.

[a] These words of Josephus we meet with now in the 1. B. 21. c. of his History. But in the M.S. copies of Josephus in the Books were otherwise divided than now they are. That division Eusebius followed, and therefore no alteration is here to be made. Vales.

[b] The word δραχμὴ is derived from δραγμὴ, that is, an handfull, as containing so many pieces of brass-money as would make an handfull, to wit, six. This word from the Greeks came not onely to the Romans, but, after the time of the Selucidæ, to the Jews also; so Ezr. 2. 69. דרכמונים, the greek word with a very little alteration, rendred by the 72 δραχμαὶ, by us Drachms. Now four Attick Drachms make one ordinary Shekel (so I call it to distinguish it from that of the Sanctuary which was twice as much) an ordinary shekel is two shillings and six pence in our Coin. So that according to this account Herods largess came to six pounds and five shillings a man. Suid.

[c] Antipater who was beheaded by his fathers command five days before his death. See Montagues Acts and Mon.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Times of Pilate.

TIBERIUS.

THe said Historian agrees also concerning the Reign of Archelaus after the death of Herod, declaring the manner of it, how both by his fathers Testament, and also by the decree of Augustus Cæsar, he obtained the Kingdom of Judea: And how, when after ten years he was deposed from his Government, his brethren, Philip, and Herod juniour, and [a] Lysanias governed their Tetrarchies. The same Authour, in the eighteenth Book of his Antiquities, makes it plainly appear, that Pontius Pilate was made Procuratour of Judea in the twelfth year of the Reign of Tiberius (who then was Emperour, succeeding Augustus, who had Reigned fifty seven years) and continued so full ten years, almost as long as Tiberius lived. From whence their fiction is manifestly confuted, who of late have published [b] Acts against our Saviour. In which chiefly the title or note of time, inscribed upon the said Acts, does evidently show the Authours thereof to be liars. For those things which these men have impudently feigned concerning the salutary passion of our Lord, are said to have been done when Tiberius was Consul the fourth time, which fell out to be the seventh year of his Reign. At which time it is certain Pilate was not come as Governour into Judea, if we may believe Josephus; who in his foresaid Book does expressly shew, that Pilate was made Procuratour of Judea by Tiberius, in the twelfth year of his Reign.

[a] St Luke mentions this Lysanias, chap. 3. 1. But Josephus mentions him not in his account of this matter. 'Tis certain he was not Herods son, nor yet his successour. Vales.

[b] Acts were Books wherein the scribes that belonged to the several places of judicature, recorded the sentences pronounced by the Judges. See Calvins Lex. Jurid. the word Acta. These Acts of Pilate were counterfeited by the Enemies of Christianity, in the Persecution under Maximinus, as Eusebius affirms, Lib. 9. c. 5.

CHAP. X.

Of the High-Priests among the Jews, in whose time Christ Preached the Gospel.

AT this time therefore, namely in the fifteenth year of the Reign of Tiberius, according to the * Evangelist, and the fourth of Pilate's Procurator-ship of Judea, Herod, [a] Lysanias and Phillip being Tetrarchs over the rest of Judea, our Lord and Saviour Jesus, the Christ of God, being about thirty years of Age, was Baptized by John, and then first began to Preach the Gospel. And the Sacred Scripture says, that he finisht the whole time of his Preaching under Annas and Caiphas being [b] High-priests, meaning thereby that all his Preaching was terminated within that space of time wherein they executed the High-priests Office. Although therefore he began when Annas was High-priest, and continued till Caiphas came on, yet there are scarce full four years contained within this space of time. For, since from the time now mentioned, the Laws and sanctions about Holy matters were almost abolished, the High-preisthood also ceased to be for life and hereditary, neither was the worship of God rightly performed. But the Roman Governours made sometimes one, sometimes another High-priest, none bearing that Office above a year. [c] Josephus indeed in his Book of Antiquities does relate, that from Annas to Caiphas there were in one continued Order four High-priests: his words are these, "Valerius Gratus "having put out Annas from being High-priest, "made Ismael the son of [d] Baphi High-priest; "not long after he removed him, and made Elea- "zar, son of the High-priest Annas, High- "priest; within a year after he deprived him, "and gave Simon the son of Camithus the High- "priesthood. He, after he had held that honour "not more than a year, had [e] Josephus, whose "name also was Caiphas, for his successour. It is manifest therefore that the whole time of our Saviours Preaching was not compleat four years, within which space of time there were as many High-priests made, reckoning from Annas his bearing that Office, to Caiphas his promotion to it, [f] every one of which bore the Office one year. The Holy [g] Gospel therefore is right in noting Caiphas to be the High-priest that same year in which our Lords salutary passion hapned. From which authority of the Gospel also it is evident, that the time of Christs Preaching does not disagree with the account we have laid down. Now our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, not long after his beginning to Preach, called twelve men, whom he named Apostles, giving to them in particular a Title more honourable, and preferring them before the rest of his disciples. Besides, he chose other seventy men, whom he sent two by two before his face, into every of those places and Cities whither he himself would come.

TIBERIUS.

[b] In all our copies this word is in the singular number [High-priest] but in St Luke it is in the plural [High-priests] But these words of St Luke doe no way mean what Eusebius perswades himself they doe; to wit, that Christ began to Preach in that year wherein Annas was High-priest, and continued till Caiphas came on. For first, Luke speaks there concerning Johns preaching, which was before Christs, and not concerning our Saviours: Then he says, that that preaching of John was begun under Annas and Caiphas being High-priests; not that there were two High-priests at the same time, which is absurd and was never heard of, but that Luke means by these words, that in this fifteenth year of Tiberius, Caiphas was High-priest, and Annas was one that had born that Office very lately. (See Dr Hammonds note on Luke chap. 3. v. 2. where he treats of this matter learnedly and largely.) Whosoever had born the High-priests Office, those were called High-priests during their lives, and took Tythes; So Josephus declares B. 20. of Antiq. Vales.

* Luk. 3. 1, 2.

[a] I know not why Eusebius put Lysanias in the middle between Herod and Phillip, the sons of Herod the great. For Luke, whose words Eusebius does here profess that he follows, in that famous place concerning the Baptism of Christ, names Lysanias in the third place. Wherefore Eusebius should have observed the same order, especially because Lysanias was neither son, nor successour to Herod. Eusebius also seems to be reproveable here, in that after he had said Pilate was then Procuratour of Judea, he adds, that the rest of Judea was governed by the Tetrarchs, Herod, Phillip, and Lysanias. But Lysanias never had any part of Judea. For Abila was not a City of Judea, but of Syria. Yet Eusebius may be excused, if we say, that by Judea he understood the whole dominion of Herod the great. For its manifest that he had the Tetrarchie of Lysanias given him by Augustus. For the Roman Emperours used to bestow these Tetrarchies on those Kings that were their confederates and friends, that they might thereby the more oblige them. Its strange that there is no mention of this Lysanias, of whom St Luke speaks, either in Josephus, Dion, or the rest.

[c] Joseph. Antiq. B. 18. chap. 4. Eusebius is here very much mistaken; for Josephus does not speak of the same times that St Luke does; Josephus speaks of the first ten years of Tiberius's Reign, in which time Valerius Gratus was Procuratour of Judea; but Luke speaks of Tiberius's second ten years, when Pilate was Governour of Judea. Vales.

[d] Or Phabi, as some Copies read it. Vales.

[e] Or Josippus, or, Joseppus, as it is in the old Editions of Rufinus. Vales.

[f] Eusebius understands Josephus so, as if Josephus had said that those four High-Priests, Annas, (or Ananus,) Ismael, Eleazar, and Simon executed the High-priest hood, each the space of one year. Indeed Josephus says this expresly of the two last; but not so of the two first. For he declares that Ismael indeed was put out a little after he was made High-priest by Valerius: But Josephus is so far from making Ananus to have been High-priest but one year, that from his words it is plainly gathered he held the High-priesthood three years at least. See Josephus's Antiq. B. 20. chap. 8. Vales.

[g] He means John 11. 18. but the Evangelist does not say there that he was made High-priest that same year.

CHAP. XI.

What hath been testified concerning John the Baptist, and concerning Christ.

[a] I began the 11 chap. at these words; following the autority of the Kings, the Maz. and the Fuk. M.SS. Vales.

[a] THe sacred History of the Gospel also mentions the beheading of John the Baptist, by Herod Junior, to have been not long after this. To which also agrees Josephus, who both makes mention particularly of Herodias by name, and also expresly declares, how that Herod, having put away his former wife lawfully married to him, took this woman his brothers wife by force from him being yet alive, and married her: she was the daughter of Arethas King of the Arabians: and that upon her account, Herod having slain John, went to war with Arethas, incensed at the disgrace of his daughter. In which war, he relates that Herod and his whole Army were vanquished in a Battel, and that these things befell him upon account of his cruelty towards John. The same Josephus does agree with the Evangelical History in the account it gives of this John, especially as to his confessing him to have been a most righteous man and a Baptist. He says further, that Herod was deprived of his Kingdom for the sake of this Herodias, and was together with her banisht to [b] Vienna a City of Gallia. All this he relates in his eighteenth Book of Antiquities, where also he writes these very words concerning John: "But some of the "Jews judged Herods Army to have been over-"thrown by God, he avenging justly on him the "murther of John called the Baptist. For him "Herod had slain, who was a good man, and one "that exhorted the Jews to the exercise of virtue, "commanding them to deal justly with one ano-"ther, and to behave themselves piously towards "God, and so to come to be baptized. For "Baptism, said he, was then onely well-pleasing "to God, when it was used, not for the excusing "of some certain offences, but in order to the "cleansing of the body, the soul being before "purified by righteousness. Now when many "flockt to him from every quarter (for they "were strangely taken with hearing of such dis-"courses) Herod fearing least through the power-"full perswasion of the man, his subjects should "revolt, (for they seemed ready to doe any "thing that he advised) judged it better to cut "him off before any innovation hapned by him, "than, after it was come to pass, and had greatly "endangered his affairs, to repent he did not when "it was too late. Upon this very mistrust of He-"rods, he being put into bonds, was sent to the "foresaid Castle of Macharous and there slain. Thus far he concerning John. The same Authour in the same Book makes mention also of our Saviour in these words; "About that time there was "one Jesus, a wise man, if he may be called a "man; for he wrought wonderfull miracles, and "taught all that with delight would embrace the "truth. He had many followers, both Jews and "Gentiles. This was he that was * called "Christ. Whom though he was accused by the "chief men of our Nation, and Pilate condemned "him to be crucified, yet those who at first loved "him forbore not to worship him. For he ap-"peared unto them alive on the third day, as the "holy Prophets had predicted, who foretold "these and many more wonderfull things concer-"ning him. And till this day that Sect continues, "which of Him are called Christians. Seeing there-fore that this Writer, being a Jew born and bred, has in his works recorded thus much of our Saviour and John the Baptist, what evasion can remain to the Forgers of those Acts against them, that they should not evidently be proved to be the most impudent of men? But thus far of these matters.

[b] Josephus, in his 18 B. of Antiquit. 9 chap. says he was banisht by Caius Cæsar to Lions in France. Vales.

* Ἀεγόμενον, i. e. called, is to be understood, as Valesius supposes.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning our Saviours Disciples.

MOreover, the names of our Saviours Apostles are to all apparently manifest in the Gospel, but as to the seventy disciples, a particular * catalogue of them is no where extant. But Barnabas is said to have been one of them, of whom we have frequent mention both in the Acts of the Apostles, and also most especially in Pauls Epistle to the Galatians. Sosthenes also, they say, was another of them, he that together with Paul wrote to the Corinthians: for so says Clemens in the fifth Book of his Institutions; where also he affirms Cephas (that Cephas of whom Paul speaks, * But when Cephas came to Antioch I withstood him to the face) a name-sake of Peters, to have been one of the seventy disciples. Matthias also, who was numbred with the Apostles in the room of the Traitor Judas, and the other who had the honour to be proposed in the same lot with him, are reported to be of the number of the Seventy. Thaddæus likewise; of whom I will by and by adjoyn an History as it came to our hands, is reported to have been one of them. But he that shall attentively observe, will find, even from Pauls testimony alone, that our Saviours disciples were more in number than Seventy. For he * says, Christ after his Resurrection was seen first of Cephas, then of the twelve, after that he was seen of above five hundred Brethren at once: of whom some were fal'n asleep, but the greatest part, he declares, were alive when he wrote these things. Then, says he, he appeared to James. [a] He is said to have been one of the Seventy disciples of our Saviour, and also one of the Lords Brethren. Lastly, there being many more besides the twelve, who were called Apostles by way of imitation, of which sort Paul himself was one, he farther adds saying, Then he was seen of all the Apostles. But so much of this. The fore-mentioned History concerning Thaddæus was thus:

* There is a Catalogue of the 70 Disciples, written by Dorotheus, but it was not extant in Eusebius his time.

* Gal. 2. 11. where, instead of Cephas we now read Peter.

* 1 Cor. 15. 5, 6, 7.

[a] Many of the antient writers affirm, that James the brother of our Lord, he that was Ordained the first Bishop of Jerusalem, was not of the number of the 12 Apostles, but of the disciples of the Lord. Indeed Paul, in his 1 Epist. to the Cor. chap. 15. v. 7. seems to favour this opinion, where, reckoning up those to whom Christ appeared after his death, after he hath named the 12 Apostles, and five hundred others, he adds After that he was seen of James, &c. Vales.

CHAP. XIII.

The History of the Prince of the Edessens.

THe Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ being every where famous by reason of his wonderfull power by which he wrought miracles, drew together an innumerable company even of forreigners, and inhabitants of Countreys far remote from Judea, who were sick and troubled with all sorts of pains, hoping to be recovered. Therefore King [a] Agbarus, the then worthy Governour of the [b] Nations lying beyond Euphrates, being much weakened with a ſore diſeaſe, incurable by humane skill; as ſoon as he heard of the great Name of Jeſus, and of his wonderfull works atteſted by all, ſent a Letter to him by a Letter-carrier, humbly beſeeching him to vouchſafe to cure his diſtemper. Now though he did not then hearken to his requeſt, yet he vouchſafed to give him anſwer by his own Letter, wherein he promiſed to ſend one of his diſciples, who ſhould both cure him, and alſo bring ſalvation to him, and his relations and friends. Soon after therefore this promiſe was exactly fulfilled. For after his Reſurrection from the dead, and Aſcenſion into heaven, Thomas, one of the twelve Apoſtles, moved thereto by Divine impulſe, ſent Thaddæus, choſen one of the ſeventy diſciples of Chriſt, to Edeſſa, to be a Preacher and Evangeliſt of the Doctrine of Chriſt. By whom all that which our Saviour had promiſed, was fulfilled. The written evidence of this matter we have taken out of the Office of Records within the princely City of Edeſſa, in which Agbarus then was Governour. For among the publick Records there, wherein the antiquities of the City and the Acts of Agbarus are contained, are found theſe things, there preſerved to our days. Nothing hinders but that we may hear the very words of the Letter, which we have taken out of the antient Rolls, and faithfully tranſlated out of the Syriack Tongue in theſe words, thus:

[b] Agbarus was Ruler over one nation onely; for he was Prince of the Arabians, but not of them all: For the Arabians were divided into many tribes; and each tribe had its diſtinct Preſect. This name was common to the Princes of Edeſſa. It is an Arabick term, and ſignifies moſt powerfull. Valeſ.

A Copy of a Letter written by King Abgarus to Jeſus, and ſent to him to Jeruſalem by Ananias the Courier.

"Abgarus Prince of Edeſſa, to Jeſus the "good Saviour, who hath manifeſted himſelf "within the confines of Jeruſalem, ſendeth greeting. I have heard of thee, and of the Cures, "wrought by thee without Herbs or Medicines, "for, as it is reported, thou doſt reſtore ſight to "the Blind, thou makeſt the Lame to walk, thou "cleanſeſt the Leprous, and thou doſt caſt out "devills and unclean ſpirits, and thou healeſt thoſe "that are tormented with diſeaſes of a long continuance, and thou doſt raiſe the dead. When I "heard all this of thee, I was fully perſwaded to "believe one of theſe two things, either that thou "art very God, and art come down from heaven "to doe ſuch things, or elſe the Son of God, and "ſo performeſt them. Wherefore, I have now "written to thee, beſeeching thee to come to me, "and cure my diſeaſe. For, I have heard that the "Jews murmur againſt thee, and contrive to doe "thee miſchief. I have a City, a little one indeed, but it is beautifull, and capable of receiving us both. Thus wrote Agbarus, as then but a little enlightned from above. It is alſo worth while to hear the Anſwer of Jeſus returned to him by the ſame Courier; ſhort indeed it is, but it has much of power and efficacy in it; It was thus:

"Bleſſed art thou, Agbarus, who haſt believed in me whom thou haſt not ſeen. For it "is [c] written of me, that they which have ſeen me "ſhould not believe in me, that ſo they which have "not ſeen me may believe and be ſaved. But as "concerning what thou writeſt about my coming "to thee, Know, that all things for which I am "ſent muſt be here by me fulfilled; which being "finiſhed, I ſhall be taken up and return to him "that ſent me. But after I am aſcended, I will "ſend thee one of my diſciples, who ſhall cure thy "diſtemper, and give life to thee, and to them "that are with thee. To this Letter there is this farther added in the Syriack Language; "After Jeſus was aſcended, Judas, called alſo "[d] Thomas, ſent Thaddæus "the [e] Apoſtle who was one "of the ſeventy diſciples, to "Agbarus. When he was "come thither, he abode with "Tobias the ſon of Tobias. "As ſoon as it was heard "that he was come, having "manifeſted himſelf by the "miracles he wrought; Agbarus was told, that the "Apoſtle of Jeſus was come "thither according to his promiſe in his Letter. Now "Thaddæus began to cure "every diſeaſe and diſtemper "by the power of God, to the "wonder of all. When Agbarus heard of the great and wonderfull works "wrought by him, and how in the Name and by the "power of Jeſus Chriſt he cured diſeaſes, he had "ſome ſuſpicion, that this was the perſon about "whom Jeſus wrote to him, ſaying, when I am "taken up, I will ſend thee one of my diſciples, "who ſhall heal thy diſtemper. Having therefore "called for Tobias, with whom Thaddæus abode, "I have heard, ſaid he, that there is a certain "powerfull man come from Jeruſalem, who "lodges at thy houſe, that performs many Cures "in the name of Jeſus. There is a ſtranger, Sir, "replied he, come to my houſe who does many "miracles: Bring him, ſaid Abgarus, to me. "Tobias went home to Thaddæus and told him, "Agbarus the Governour of this City having "ſent for me, commands me to bring thee to him, "that thou mayeſt cure his diſtemper. I will go, "replied Thaddæus, for it is chiefly upon his account that I am with power ſent hither. Tobias "therefore getting up early next morning, took "Thaddæus along with him, and went to Agbarus. When he was come, to Agbarus (his "Nobles being preſent and ſtanding round him) "there appeared a wonderfull ſight in the face "of the Apoſtle Thaddæus, as he came in to him, "and therefore he worſhipped him. All that were "preſent wondred at that, for they ſaw nothing "of that ſight which appeared onely to Agbarus. "Then he asked Thaddæus, art thou, in truth a "diſciple of Jeſus the Son of God, who wrote "thus to me, I will ſend thee one of my diſciples, "who ſhall cure thy diſtemper and give life to "thee, and to all with thee? Thaddæus anſwered, for as much as thou haſt firmly believed in the "Lord Jeſus who ſent me, therefore am I ſent to "thee, and if thy Faith in him does ſtill increaſe, "according to thy Belief thou ſhalt have the deſires "of thine heart fulfilled. Agbarus made him anſwer, I did ſo firmly believe in him, that I would "have raiſed Forces to have deſtroyed the Jews "who crucified him, had I not been inhibited from "that purpoſe by the Roman Empire. Jeſus Chriſt, "replied Thaddæus, our Lord God fulfilled the "will of his Father, and having finiſhed that, was "taken up to his Father. Agbarus ſaid unto him, "I be[d] Thomas indeed, that was one of the twelve Apoſtles, was called Didymus; but that the ſame perſon was ſurnamed Judas, is not, that I know, any where elſe to be found. Upon this account therefore this ſtory is deſervedly to be ſuſpected. Valeſ.

[e] Apoſtle here is to be taken in a large ſenſe; (See Euſebius at the latter end of the foregoing Chapter.) after the ſame manner every Nation and City termed them Apoſtles, from whom they firſt received the truth of the Goſpel. This name was not onely given to the 12; but all their diſciples, companions, and aſſiſtants, were generally called Apoſtles. Valeſ.

[c] In what part of the Old Teſtament theſe words occur I am yet to ſeek. Indeed, in the Goſpel of St John it is written that our Lord ſaid to Thomas after his Reſurrection, Joh. 20. 29. Bleſſed are they that have not ſeen, and yet have believed. But this Epiſtle of Chriſt to King Abgarus, if it be genuine, preceded that reprehenſion of the Apoſtle Thomas ſome years. Valeſ.

"fore, said Thaddæus, I lay my hand on thee, in "the name of the same Lord Jesus Christ: and "having done so, he was presently cured of the "disease and distemper that he had. Agbarus
"wondred greatly when he saw that really accom-

"by his disciple and Apostle Thaddæus, who "without the help of Herbs or Medicines, re"stored him to his former soundness. And not
"onely him, but one Abdus also the son of Ab-
"dus who had the Gout; he coming and falling "down at Thaddæus's feet, received a blessing
"by prayer and the laying on of his hands, and "was healed. Many others also of the same City "with them were cured by the Apostle, who "wrought wonderfull Miracles, and Preached the "Word of God. After all this, Agbarus spake
"thus, We believe, Thaddæus, whatever thou
"dost, thou performest by the power of God,
"and therefore we greatly admire thee. But,
"We pray thee moreover, give us some farther
"account of the Advent of Jesus, How and after "what manner it was; of his power also, and by "what virtue he wrought those mighty Works

"Thaddæus, because I am sent to publish the "Word of God: But assemble all the men of thy "City together to me to morrow, and I will "Preach the Word of God to them, and will "disperse the Word of life among them, and ex"pound the Advent of Jesus, after what manner
"it was, his Commission, and for what reason his "Father sent him; the power of his Works, the "Mysteries he declared to the world, by what "power he wrought so great Miracles, his new "Preaching, the slender and mean reputation he "made himself of, the despicableness of his out"ward man, how he humbled himself even unto TIBERIUS.
"death, how he lessened his Divinity, how many "and great things he suffered of the Jews, how
"he was Crucified, how he descended into Hell,
"and rent asunder that Inclosure never before se"vered; how he rose again, and together with him"self, raised those from the dead who had layn
"buried many ages; how he descended from hea"ven alone, but ascended to his Father accom"panied with a great multitude, how with glory
"he is set down at the right hand of God his Fa"ther in Heaven, and how he will come again
"with power and glory to judge both quick and "dead. Agbarus therefore commanded the men
"of his City to come together very early and hear "Thaddæus Preach. After this he commanded,
"that Gold and Silver should be given to Thad-
"dæus: But he refused it, saying, how shall we,
"who have left all that was our own, take any "thing that is anothers? These things were done "in the [f]Three hundredth and fortieth year. All this, being translated word for word out of the Syriack Tongue, and not unprofitable to be read, we have thought good to set down opportunely in this place.

[f] This Three hundredth and fortieth year according to the account of the Edessens, falleth with the first year of the two hundredth and second Olympiad. For the Edessens numbred their years from the hundredth and seventeenth Olympiad, fixing their Æra upon the first year of Seleucus his Reign in Asia (as Eusebius writes in his Chronicon) from which time to the beginning of the two hundredth and second Olympiad, there are just three hundred and forty years. Now the beginning of the two hundredth and second Olympiad falleth with the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar; in which year, as many of the Antients believed, our Blessed Saviour suffered and ascended. So that this account falls right, placing Thaddæus his coming to Edessa, and his curing King Agbarus on the same year, in which our Blessed Saviour suffered. Note that the Edessens began their year, from the Autumnal Æquinox, according to the custom of the Syrians, and almost all the Eastern Nations. Vales.

Of the Ecclesiastical History

The PREFACE.

WHatsoever was necessary to be premised by way of Preface to Our Ecclesiastical History, both concerning the Divinity of the comfortable Word, the Antiquity of the points of our doctrine and Evangelical Politie; and also moreover concerning the Manifestation our Saviour lately made of himself, his Passion and the Election of the Apostles, we have Treated of in the foregoing Book, and briefly summed up the proofs thereof. Now therefore in this, we will diligently look into what followed upon his Ascension; partly from what we find noted in Holy Writt, and partly from other Records, which we will mention in due place.

CHAP. I.

Of those things which were instituted by the Apostles, after the Ascension of Christ.

[a] FIRST of all therefore, Matthias, who, as before hath been manifested, was one of the Lords disciples, by lot was elected into the Apostleship of the Traitour Judas. Then, seven approved men were by prayer and imposition of the Apostles hands Ordained Deacons for the publick Administration of the Churches affairs; of which number Stephen was one: who [b]immediately after his Ordination, as if he had been made Deacon onely for this, was the first that, after the Lord, was slain by those very Jews that had been [a] At these words we began the first Chapter, following the Autority partly of Rufinus, partly of the King's, Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. for, what goes before is a Preface. Vales.

[b] The year wherein Stephen suffered Martyrdom is not agreed on by all: some say it was the third year after Christs passion, which was the last of Claudius, so Syncellus. Others say he was martyred on the 7th of the Calend. of Jan. that same year in which Christ suffered. So Scaliger says in his Excerpt. Chronolog. which he puts out with Euseb. Chronicon. p. 68. and this seems to have been the opinion of Eusebius, as appears from this place. Vales.

the Lords murtherers, who ſtoned him to death: And thus he, being the firſt of the worthily victorious Martyrs of Chriſt, gained a Crown [c] anſwerable to his Name. Then James alſo, who was termed the [d] brother of the Lord, becauſe he alſo was called the Son of Joſeph: for Joſeph was the father of Chriſt, to whom Mary being eſpouſed, before they came together ſhe was found with child of the Holy Ghoſt, as the Sacred Hiſtory of the Goſpel doth declare: This ſame James, I ſay, who for his eminent virtue the Antients ſurnamed the Juſt, was as they relate the firſt that had the Epiſcopal ſeat of the Church at Jeruſalem delivered to him. So Clemens affirms in the ſixth Book of his Inſtitutions. For he ſays, That, after our Saviours Aſcenſion, Peter, James, and John, although our Lord had preferred them before the reſt, did not contend for the Dignity, but choſe James the Juſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem. The ſame Author, in the ſeventh Book of the ſame work, ſays this farther of him, The Lord after his Reſurrection conferred the gift of Knowledge upon James the Juſt, John and Peter, which they delivered to the reſt of the Apoſtles, and thoſe to the Seventy Diſciples, one of whom was Barnabas. But there were two James's; the one ſurnamed the Juſt, who was caſt head-long from the Battlement of the Temple, and beaten to death with a Fullers Club: the other was beheaded. Paul makes mention of this James the Juſt, writing thus: * Other of the Apoſtles ſaw I none ſave James the Lords brother. At this time alſo all that our Saviour had promiſed to the King of the Oſdroënians was fulfilled. For Thomas, moved thereto by Divine impulſe, ſent Thaddæus to Edeſſa to be a Preacher and Evangeliſt of the Doctrine of Chriſt, as from a Record there found we have a little before manifeſted. He, when he was come thither, did in the Name of Chriſt both cure Agbarus, and alſo aſtoniſhed all the Inhabitants of the country with the wonderfulneſs of his Miracles. And when he had ſufficiently prepared them with ſuch Works, and brought them to an adoration of Chriſts power, he made them diſciples of his wholeſome Doctrine. From that very time untill now the whole City of the Edeſſens has continued to be Conſecrated to Chriſts Name, enjoying no trivial evidences of our Saviour's graciouſneſs towards them. And theſe things are ſaid as from the Hiſtory of the old Records. We will now return again to Holy Writ: After the Martyrdom of Stephen, when the firſt and ſoreſt perſecution of the Church at Jeruſalem by the Jews aroſe, all the diſciples of Chriſt, except the Twelve onely, being ſcattered throughout Judea and Samaria, ſome of them travelling as far as Phœnice and Cyprus and Antioch, as Holy Scripture teſtifieth, were not able to be ſo bold as to communicate the Word of Faith to the Gentiles, but Preach't to the Jews onely. At that time * Paul alſo untill then made havock of the Church, entring into every houſe of the faithfull, haling men and women, and committing them to priſon. Moreover * Philip, one of thoſe who was ordained Deacon with Stephen, being one of them that were diſperſed, went down to Samaria, and being full of the Divine power, was the firſt that Preach't the Word to thoſe inhabitants. And the Grace of God did ſo effectually cooperate with him, that by his Preaching he drew after him Simon Magus with many other men. This Simon, at that time very famous, did ſo far prevail with thoſe whom he had deceived by his impoſture, that they thought him to be the great power of God. Then therefore this very perſon, being greatly amazed at the Miracles Philip wrought by the power of God, craftily inſinuated himſelf, and ſo far counterfeited a faith in Chriſt, that he was baptized. The ſame thing with admiration we ſee now done by the followers of his moſt filthy Sect, who creeping into the Church, as their fore-father did, like ſome peſtilent and leprous diſeaſe, doe deeply corrupt all thoſe into whom they are any way able to inſtil that pernicious and incurable poyſon which lies concealed within them. But many of them were caſt out of the Church, as ſoon as their vitiouſneſs was diſcovered; in like manner Simon himſelf being at length detected by Peter, was deſervedly puniſhed. Furthermore when the wholeſome Preaching of the Goſpel daily increaſed, Divine providence brought out of the land of Æthiopia a man of great autority under the Queen of that Countrey, for thoſe Nations are according to their countrey faſhion governed by a woman, who being the firſt of the Gentiles, that by Philip, warned of God by a Viſion, was made partaker of the Myſteries of the Divine Word; was alſo the firſt fruits of the faithfull throughout the world: Returning into his own country he is reported to have been the firſt publiſher of the Knowledge of the great God, and of the comfortable Advent of our Saviour in the Fleſh: And ſo by him was really fulfilled that prediction of the Prophet, * Æthiopia ſhall ſtretch out her hand unto God. At this time, † Paul, that choſen veſſel, was made an Apoſtle, not of men, neither by men, but by the revelation of Jeſus Chriſt, and God the Father, who raiſed him from the dead; being vouchſafed this calling by a Viſion, and a voice from heaven which came to him at the Revelation thereof.

TIBERIUS.

[c] Stephen, in Greek ſignifies a Crown.

[d] That this James was not the Son of the B. Virgin, nor yet of Joſeph by one Eſcha a former wife; but of Mary the wife of Cleophas ſiſter to the B. Virgin, may thus be made appear: we read Jo. 19. 25. that there ſtood by the Croſs of Chriſt his Mother, and his Mothers ſiſter Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalen: in the reſt of the Evangeliſts we find at the ſame place (Matth. 27. 56.) Mary Magdalen, and Mary the mother of James and Joſes; and again at the Sepulchre (Matth. 28. 1.) Mary Magdalen and the other Mary. Wherefore that other Mary by the conjunction of theſe Teſtimonies, appeareth to be the ſiſter of the B. Virgin, to be the wife of Cleophas, and the mother of James and Joſes; and conſequently James and Joſes the brethren of the Lord, were not the ſons of Mary his mother, nor of Joſeph by a former wife, but of the other Mary, and therefore called his brethren, according to the language of the Jews [See Gen. 13. 8. & 12. 5. & 29. 12.] becauſe that other Mary was the ſiſter of his mother. CHAP. II.

WHen the wonderfull Reſurrection of our Saviour and his Aſcenſion into Heaven was now divulged among all men; becauſe it was of old cuſtomary that the Governours of Provinces ſhould communicate to the Emperour every ſtrange and unuſual accident that happened within their charge, that ſo nothing that was done might eſcape his knowledge; Pilate acquainted the Emperour Tiberius with the Reſurrection of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt now much talk't of over all Paleſtine; giving him an account that he had alſo heard of many other Miracles of his, and how that riſing again after he had been dead, he was now by many believed to be God. And they ſay that Tiberius referred this matter to the Senate, but the relation was rejected by them; upon pretence, that they had not firſt approved of the matter, TIBERIUS. matter; there being an old Law amongst the Romanes, that no one should be deified but by the suffrage and decree of the Senate; but in reality, that the wholesome Preaching of the divine Doctrine might not stand in need of any humane approbation or assistance. When therefore the Senate had rejected the Relation concerning our Saviour, Tiberius persisted in his former judgment, attempting nothing prejudicial to the Doctrine of Christ. Thus much [a] Tertullian, a man incomparably well skilled in the Roman Laws and every way famous, and most renowned among the Latine Writers, in the Apologie for the Christians written by him in Latine, but afterwards translated into Greek, does declare in these very words: "[b] And that we "may discourse concerning "the Original of these Laws, "there was an old Decree, "that the Emperour should "consecrate no God, before "he was approved by the Senate. Marcus Æ- "milius knows this concerning his God Albur- "nus. And this makes for our advantage, because "among you Divinity is weighed by humane ap- "probation. If God please not man, he shall not be "God. Man now must be propitious to God. Ti- "berius therefore, in whose time the Christian "Name made its entry into the world, communi- "cated to the Senate the account he had received "out of Syria Palestine, whereby the Truth of "the Divinity of Christ was made apparent; "which he confirmed with his own suffrage. But "because the Senate had not approved of it, it "was rejected: the Emperour persisted in his "judgment, threatning the accusers of the Chri- "stians with death. Which opinion divine providence, according to his dispensation instilled into the mind of Tiberius Cæsar, that the Preaching of the Gospel then in its infancy, might without impediment spread over the whole world.

[a] Tertullian was by birth a Carthaginian; his father was a Centurion, a Deputy-pro-Consul. He wrote many volumes in Latine, of which his Apologie onely was done into Greek, but by whom, it is uncertain: he flourisht under Severus and Antoninus Caracalla. Vales.

[b] In our translation of this quotation out of Tertullian, we have followed the Original expression of the Authour, according to Rigaltius his Edition of him: this Greek translation being not fully expressive of the Authours mind, as Valesius thinks.

CHAP. III.

How the Doctrine of Christ spread in a short time over the whole World.

AND thus by the cooperation of Divine power, the comfortable Word of God, like the beams of the Sun, on a sudden enlightned the whole world, and presently, agreeable to the Divine * Psal. 19. 4. Scriptures, the sound of the heavenly Evangelists and Apostles went out into all lands, and their words into the ends of the earth. And indeed in a short time there were throughout all Cities and Villages Churches gathered, which like a Threshing-floor filled with Corn, were thronged with infinite multitudes. And they, who, deriving their ignorance from their Ancestours and their errours of old, were ensnared as to their souls with the superstitious worship of Idols, as in an inveterate disease, being freed as it were from their cruel masters, and loosned from their heavy bonds by the power of Christ, and the Preaching and Miracles of his disciples, did with scorn reject the multitude of gods brought in by devils, and acknowledged there was one onely God the maker of all things: And him they worshipped with the Holy Rites of true Religion, by that divine and sober way of worship which our Saviour had spread among mankind. When therefore the Grace of God diffused it self into the rest of the Nations; and Cornelius of the City [a] Cæsarea in Palestine, in the first place together with his whole household, by a Vision from heaven and the Ministery of Peter, embraced the Faith of Christ; and many others of the Gentiles at Antioch did the same, to whom the disciples, dispersed upon the persecution that arose about Stephen, Preached the word of God, the Church at Antioch now increasing and prospering, in which many were gathered together, both Prophets from Jerusalem, with whom were Paul and Barnabas, and besides, also other brethren in number not a few: the appellation of [b] Christians then and there first sprang up, as from a pleasant and fertile soyle: and Agabus also, one of the Prophets there present fore-told the dearth that afterwards happened; and [c] Paul and Barnabas were sent to relieve the Brethren by their Ministration.

TIBERIUS.

[a] It was called Cæsarea in Palestine to distinguish it from Cæsarea Philippi, which was in Phœnice. Vales.

[b] That our Saviours followers were first named Christians in Tiberius his Reign, Tertullian affirms in his Apologie, the place is quoted by Eusebius in the preceding Chapter. Vales.

[c] This journey of Pauls to Jerusalem can no way fall upon the times of Tiberius. For Luke writes expresly in the Acts, chap. 11. v. 29, 30. that it happened about that time when Herod Agrippa was smitten by the Angel of the Lord: which it is most certain, happened in Claudius his time. Vales.

CHAP. IV.

How, after the death of Tiberius, Caius made Agrippa King over the Jews, and punished Herod with perpetual Banishment.

BUT Tiberius, having Reigned about two and twenty years, died. Caius succeeding him in the Empire, presently gave [a] Agrippa the Kingdom of Judea, and made him King over the Tetrarchies both of Phillip and Lysanias. Besides, not long after he gave him Herods Tetrarchy also, having condemned Herod to perpetual banishment, being together with Herodias his Wife deservedly punished for divers enormities: (This was the Herod that was present at our Saviours Passion:) Josephus is a witness of these things also. Moreover in this Emperours time Philo flourished, a man highly esteemed of for his Learning by many, not onely among us but also among forreigners. He was indeed by Original extract an Hebrew, inferiour to none of those that were illustrious in dignitie at Alexandria. Moreover what and how great pains he bestowed about divine matters, and in the learning of his own Nation, it is to all evidently manifest. Besides, how excellent he was at Philosophy and Humane Learning it is needless to relate; for he is said to have excelled all of his own time in the Platonick and Pythagorean Philosophy which he much affected.

C. CALIGULA.

[a] Caius Cæsar about the beginning of his reign made Agrippa King, first of Trachonitis, which was Phillips Tretrarchy. After that, when Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, by the perswasion of his wife Herodias, went to Rome to get the Regal dignity of Caius the Emperour, Caius took from Herod his Tetrarchy of Galilee, and gave it to Agrippa. At length, after the death of Caius, Claudius confirmed the Kingdom to Agrippa which Caius had given him, and gave him also Judea and Samaria, which his Grandfather Herod had. And so the whole Kingdom of Herod the great was possessed by Agrippa. See Philo in Flaccum & in Legat. ad Caium sub finem; and Joseph. Hist. B. 18. so that Eusebius is mistaken, in that he says, Caius made Agrippa King of Judea. Vales.

CHAP. V.

How Philo went on an Embaſſage to Caius upon the Jews Account.

[a] There are now extant onely two Books of Philo's concerning this Subject, the one entitled in Flaccum, the other de Legatione ad Caium; ſo that either Euſebius forgot their number, or elſe they were heretofore divided into five Volumes: Neither can any one ſuſpect the other three to be loſt: for in thoſe two, we now have, are contained all that happened to the Jews under Caius his Empire. Valeſ.

MOreover this man comprized in [a] five Books the calamities that befell the Jews in Caius his Reign; wherein he ſets forth both the madneſs of Caius Proclaiming himſelf to be god, and alſo his inſolent carriage in his Government in innumerable inſtances; likewiſe the diſtreſſes the Jews underwent in his Reign; and declares how himſelf went Embaſſadour to Rome upon the account of his Countrey-men that dwelt at Alexandria; and how that reaſoning before Caius for the Laws and cuſtomes of his own nation, he obtained nothing beſides laughter and reproaches, and narrowly eſcaped the danger of being put to death. Joſephus mentions all this in his eighteenth Book of Antiquities, writing thus much word for word: "Moreover, there happened a ſedition at Alexandria among the Jews "that dwelt there and the "Greeks, [b] three of each "faction were ſent Embaſſadours to Caius. Now Apion was one of the Alexandrian's Embaſſadours, "who railed bitterly againſt "the Jews, laying many "things to their charge, and "amongſt the reſt that they "neglected to worſhip Cæſar. For when all the ſubjects of the Roman Empire built Temples and "Altars to Caius, and at all points worſhipped "him as they did their gods, the Jews onely, "ſaid he, accounted it a vile thing to erect Statues to him, and to ſwear by his name. When "Apion had urged theſe and many other vehement "accuſations againſt them, whereby he hoped, as "it was likely, to incenſe Caius, Philo chief of "the Jewiſh Embaſſy, a man every way famous, "brother to Alexander [c] Alabarchus, and not unskilfull in Philoſophie, was able and ready with an Apologie to anſwer his Accuſations. But Caius forbad him, commanding him to depart immediately from his preſence. And the Emperour was ſo highly incenſed, that none doubted but he would moſt ſeverely puniſh the Jews. But "Philo being much reviled went out, and, as they "ſay, ſpake to the Jews that were about him to "be of good courage, for "although [d] Caius was angry with them, yet he had "now really rendred God his "Adverſarie. Thus much Joſephus relates. And Philo himſelf, in the account which he wrote of this his Embaſſy, does exactly relate every particular thing that was then done. Whereof omitting moſt part, I will hereunto annex onely ſo much as ſhall make it evidently plain to the Readers, that theſe miſeries ſtraightway without any delay befell the Jews upon account of their enormous impieties committed againſt Chriſt. Firſt of all therefore he relates, that in the Reign of Tiberius one Sejanus of the City of Rome, a perſon who then could doe much with the Emperour, did uſe his utmoſt indeavour to deſtroy that whole Nation: and that in Judea, Pilate, in whoſe time that horrible wickedneſs was moſt audaciouſly committed againſt our Saviour, attempting ſomething about the Temple at Jeruſalem which yet ſtood, contrary to the cuſtomes and ordinances of the Jews, raiſed vehement commotions among them.

[b] Philo ſays there were five Embaſſadours of the Jews ſide ſent to Rome; See his de Legat. ad Caium ſub finem. Theſe Embaſſadours were ſent upon two accounts, firſt, the Jews complained that the Alexandrians defiled their Proſeucha's by bringing the Emperours Statues into them; and then, that the Alexandrians went about to deprive the Jews of their freedom of the City Alexandria. Valeſ.

[c] So the chief Magiſtrate among the Jews at Alexandria was called: He held his place as long as he lived; and at his death the Jews choſe another into his room. See Philo in Flaccum. Valeſ.

[d] Philo's meaning here is, that Caius indeed was angry with the Jews as to appearance, and in words; but that in reality he did arm God, and ſet him in array againſt himſelf. For, in that Caius would have himſelf called god, he provoked God to take vengeance of him. Ἀνθιπαρεξάγειν (whence the word here uſed is derived) is a military term, and ſignifies, to ſet an army in array againſt an enemy. Valeſ.

CHAP. VI.

How great miſeries befell the Jews after their audacious wickedneſs committed againſt Chriſt.

HE relates further how, after the death of Tiberius, Caius aſſuming the Government, was every way ſorely injurious towards many, but above all he moſt heavily annoyed the whole Jewiſh Nation, which in ſhort we may underſtand from Philo's own [a] words, writing thus word for word. "So great therefore was the extravagancy and pride of Caius's carriage towards all, "but more eſpecially towards the Jewiſh Nation, "which he bitterly hated, and appropriated to "himſelf all their [b] Proſeucha's in the reſt of the "Cities, beginning with thoſe "at Alexandria, filling them "with his own Images and "Statues. For in that he ſuffered others to conſecrate "Statues to him, he ſeemed "in a manner to dedicate "them to himſelf. And he "changed and transformed "the Temple at Jeruſalem, "which hitherto had remained undefiled and dignified with all the priviledges of a Sanctuary, "and made it into a Temple dedicated to himſelf, "cauſing it thence forward "to be called the Temple "of CAIUS [c] JUNIOR "JUPITER [d] CONSPICUOUS. Moreover the ſame Authour, in his ſecond Book which he intitled of [e] Virtues, relates innumerable other calamities, ſuch as are grievous beyond all expreſſion, that befell the Jews dwelling at Alexandria, during the Government of the foreſaid Caius. To whom Joſephus agrees, who notes that thoſe troubles, with which the whole Jewiſh Nation was moleſted, began even from the times of Pilate, and from thoſe enormous facts committed againſt our Saviour. Let us therefore hear what he alſo declares in his ſecond Book of the Jewiſh wars, in theſe [f] words, ſaying, "Pilate being by Tiberius ſent Procurator into "Judea, brought into Jeruſalem by night the "veiled Images of Cæſar, which are called his "Statues,

[a] Philo in Legat. ad Caium about the end.

[b] The Jews had two ſorts of places, beſides their Temple, (which was for ſacrifice) for religious duties; viz. their Proſeuchæ, and Synagogues; the difference between them was this; the Proſeucha was a Plot of ground encompaſſed with a wall or ſome other incloſure, and open above; the uſe of it was properly for prayer; a Synagogue was a covered edifice, where the Law and Prophets were read and expounded, and the people inſtructed in divine matters; beſides, the Synagogues were within, the Proſeuchæ without the Cities. They were in uſe before the Captivity, as may be gathered from Joſ. 24. 26. Pſal. 74. 7. See Acts 16. 13. Mr Mede.

[c] So Caligula was called, to diſtinguiſh him from Julius Cæſar, who was alſo called Caius, and was deified. Valeſ.

[d] Ἐπιφανὴς, Conſpicuous. Valeſius tranſlates it præſens; præſentes dii ſunt vel qui ſtatim præſtant, vel qui coluntur & videntur. Donat. in Terent. Phorm. That is, the Propitious or Conſpicuous gods were ſuch, as were at hand, or ſuch as were viſible to the worſhippers. Hence Antiochus King of Syria was called Epiphanes by his flatterers.

[e] Valeſius thinks that by this Second Book of Virtues muſt be underſtood Philo's Book in Flaccum; and his reaſon is, becauſe Philo does no where elſe but in that Book, relate the calamities that befell the Jews of Alexandria.

[f] Joſ. Bell. Jud. L. 2. c. 8.

C. CALIGULA. "Statues. As soon as it was day this raised a "great commotion among the Jews. For those "who were near were astonished at the sight, in "that their Laws were violated and trampled "on. For they account it a detestable thing to "place any graven image in the City. These things if thou compareſt with the Evangelical writing, thou shalt understand that that voice they uttered before Pilate, crying out they had no other King but Cæsar*, was soon [g] after revenged upon them. The same Writer relates another following calamity inflicted on them by Divine vengeance in these words: "After this Pi-"late raised another commotion amongst them; "exhausting the stock of the sacred Treasury (it "is call'd the [h] Corban) in making a Conduit; "wherein the water that was to be brought was "at three hundred furlongs distance. For which "there was great indignation amongst the po-"pulace: And when Pilate was at Jerusalem, "they flockt about the judgment Seat, and be-"gan to exclaim. But he (for he foresaw there "would be a tumult amongst them) mingled "armed Souldiers, clad like the common people, "amongst the multitude, and, forbidding them "to use their swords, but commanding them to "strike those that cried out with clubs, gave them "a sign from his Tribunal. So the Jews were bea-"ten, and many of them killed, some by the blows "they received perished, others being troden to "death in the croud by those of their own party "that fled. And so the multitude, being astonished "at the calamity of those that were slain, were "silent. Moreover, the same Writer relates in-numerable other commotions raised in Jerusalem; and shews, that even from that time forward both the City and all Judea was distracted with Seditions, Wars, and continual contrivances of mischief following one upon another, untill at last the Siege in the Reign of Vespasian by way of revenge befell them. After this manner therefore hath divine vengeance pursued the Jews for their execrable wickedness committed against Christ.

* Joh. 19. 15.

[g] In this place Eusebius is mistaken, in that he thought that those things, which Josephus relates concerning the images of Tiberius brought into the City of Jerusalem by Pilate, happened after the death of Christ. But Josephus attests (in the 2d B. of the Jewish wars, and in his 18 B. Antiq.) that this happened at the beginning of Pilates Government. Now Pilate was sent by Tiberius into Judea in the twelfth year of his Reign. Its absurd therefore to say, that those mischiefs, which befell the Jews long before Christs death, happened to them for no other cause than for their wickedness committed against Christ. Besides, Eusebius thought, that one and the same Act of Pilate's was mentioned both by Philo and Josephus. But Josephus speaks of the Images of the Emperour; and Philo, of the guilded Bucklers, which had no image, but onely the name of the Emperour to whom they were dedicated, and Pilate's name that made that dedication. Moreover, what Josephus relates, happened in the first year of Pilates Government; but, what Philo reports, came to pass when Pilate had been many years Governour. Vales.

[h] Corban comes from קרב, which signifies promiscuously to draw nigh, and to offer: the Evangelist renders Corban, a gift (Matth. 15. v. 5.) i. e. that which is presented and consecrated to God in the Temple: it signifies also the place where the Offerings so called were laid up. Dr Hammond.

CHAP. VII.

That Pilate made himself away.

IT is also worth knowing, how that this same Pilate, who condemned our Saviour, in the Reign of Caius, whose times we now Treat of, fell, as it is famed, into so great troubles, that he was [a] forced to be his own Murderer and Revenger, saying violent hands on himself: Divine justice, as it was meet, not long deferring his punishment. This those Grecians do Record, who have written [b] Olympiads, giving an account what was done, and in what time performed. C. CALIGULA.

[a] That is, by reason of despair. This is confirmed by Eusebius in his Chronicon; In the third year of Caius Caligula, says he, P. Pilate falling into great troubles killed himself. King Agrippa (apud Philon. in Legat. ad Caium) gives this description of this Pilate, ἦν γὰρ τὴν φύσιν ἀκαμπὴς, καὶ μετὰ πάσης ἀυθαδείας ἀμείλικτος; That is, he was of an inflexible nature, and withall arrogant and cruel: which testimony is so much the more considerable, because it came out of Agrippa's mouth, who was an eye-witness of Pilates detestable acts. A character well befitting him that condemned our Saviour. Vales.

[b] There were amongst the Grecians, games instituted for the exercise of their youth, to the honour of Jupiter Olympus, neer unto whose Temple they were performed in the Olympian field. The time was (as onely Pindar has revealed) at the full moon which followed the Summer Solstice. They were celebrated every fifth year: and the interval was called an OLYMPIAD, consisting of four Julian years, and the odd Bissextile day. The restitution of these Games by Iphitus, is so much more taken notice of than the first celebration by Hercules. That this, which was many years after, is yet accounted for the first Olympiad, upon which the Grecian Chronology fixeth it self, as upon the certain term, to which their reckoning does refer, See Mr Jo. Gregory of Oxford, de Æris & Epoch.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Dearth that happened in Claudius his time.

BUt Caius having held the Empire not full out four years, Claudius the Emperour succeeded him. In whose times a Dearth oppressed the whole world, of which those Historians make mention, who are wholly averse from our Religion. And so the prediction of the Prophet Agabus, of whom there is mention in the Acts of the Apostles, concerning this Dearth that should come upon all the world, was compleated. Luke having in the Acts mentioned this Dearth that happened in the time of Claudius, adds this farther, saying, That the brethren which were in Antioch, every one according to his ability, sent to them who were in Judea by the hands of Barnabas and Paul. CLAUDIUS. Acts 11. 28, 29, 30.

CHAP. IX.

The Martyrdom of James the Apostle.

NOw about that time, to wit, in the Reign of Claudius, Herod the King stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the Church: and he killed James the brother of John with the sword. Concerning this James, Clemens, in the seventh Book of his Institutions, relates a memorable History, speaking as he had heard from his predecessours. "For he says, that he "that [a] accused him before "the Judgment-seat, seeing "him openly and willingly te-"stifie and declare the faith of "Christ, was moved thereat, "and professed that he also "was a Christian. And so "says he, they were both to-"gether led away to suffer. "And, as they were going, "he beseeched James to par-"don him; who, after a short "deliberation, said, peace be "to thee, and kissed him; "and so they were both be-"headed together. Then al-so, as Holy *writ declares, [b] Herod, perceiving that the killing of James very much pleased the Acts 12. 1, 2.

[a] It was usual for those that were accused, to be brought before the judgment-seat by a Souldier or Apparator: the Greek word (ὁ εἰσαγαγὼν) will bear that sense, as well as Accuser, but we have translated it Accuser, upon the account of Clemens his following words, saying, that this person asked James forgiveness, which, if he had accused him, he had reason to doe; but had he been onely an Officer or Souldier, and had done no more but brought in James before the judge, he may seem to have done no more then the duty of his place, what he was commanded; and so needed not have asked James forgiveness. Vales.

[b] This Herod, called also Agrippa, was eldest son to Aristobulus by Bernice his Wife, daughter of Salome Sister to Herod the great: which Aristobulus was eldest son to Herod the great by his Wife Mariamne the Assamonean. See Montagues Acts, and Mon. chap. 4. Sect. 34. So that this Herod was Grandchild to Herod the great. Joseph. Antiq. B. 18. c. 7.

CLAUDIUS. Jews, ſet upon Peter alſo, and having put him in bonds, would forthwith have put him to death, had he not been miraculouſly delivered out of priſon by a divine apparition, to wit, by an Angel coming to him by night; being diſmiſt for the miniſtration of Preaching. All which happened to Peter by the diſpoſition of divine providence.

CHAP. X.

How Agrippa, called alſo Herod, perſecuting the Apoſtles, preſently felt Divine vengeance.

BUt the Kings attempt to do violence to the Apoſtles remained not long unrevenged; for a chaſtizing Miniſter of divine juſtice purſued him: He therefore, ſoon after his bloudy plot againſt the Apoſtles, going down to Cæſarea, as it is related in the Acts of the Apoſtles, and being there upon the great feſtival day dreſſed in a white and Royal garment, made an Oration to the people from his lofty throne; and when all the multitude gave a ſhout with loud acclamations at his Oration, as at the voice of God and not of Man, Sacred writ declares that he was immediately ſmitten by an Angel, and was eaten up of worms and gave up the ghoſt. But the conſent between Holy writ and the Hiſtory of Joſephus, in the account given of this ſtrange thing is worthy of admiration. In which he, giving evident teſtimony to the truth in his nineteenth * Book of Antiquities does plainly declare this wonderfull thing in theſe words thus, "The third year of his reign over all Judea was "now compleated; when he went to the City "Cæſarea, heretofore called the Tower of Straton. "There he exhibited ſhewes in honour of Cæſar, "knowing that [a] Feſtival to "have been inſtituted for the "proſperity of him. Hereun-"to flockt a great multitude "of thoſe who were honoura-"ble and excelled in digni-"ty, throughout that whole "[b] Province. On the ſecond "day therefore of the ſhews, "being clothed with Robes "made all of ſilver admira-"bly wrought, he entred the "Theatre early in the mor-"ning. When the ſilver of "his Robes, ſhining by rea-"ſon of the beams the riſing "Sun caſt on them made a wonderfull gliſtering, "ſtriking thoſe who ſteadfaſtly looked on him "with wonder and amazement, preſently his flat-"terers, ſome from one place ſome from another, "cryed out with voices moſt pernitious to him "terming him God; and beſeeching him to be "propitious to them. Hitherto, ſaid they, we have "reverenced thee as a Man, but now we acknow-"ledge thee to be above mortal nature. But the "King neither rebuked them, nor rejected their "impious flattery, preſently after looking up he "eſpied an [c] angel ſitting over his head; whom "he forthwith underſtood to be the cauſe of miſ-"chief towards him, having [d] heretofore been the "foreteller of his proſperity. A pain that pierced "his very heart immediately ſeized him. He had "beſides a griping all over his belly, which began "with a vehement ſharpneſs, and was continual and "without intermiſſion. Looking therefore upon his "friends, I your God, ſays he, am now compelled to "end my life; fatal neceſſity forthwith demonſtra-"ting the falſhood of your boaſting acclamations "even now uttered concerning me: I, who by you "was ſtiled immortal, am now ſnatch't away by "death. But what deſtinie is to be born with which "God hath decreed. We have in no wiſe lived ill, "and deſpicably, but in ſuch ſplendor as was look't "upon to be moſt fortunate. When he had ſpoken "theſe words, he was ſpent with the vehemency of "his pain. Being therefore preſently carried into "the Palace, a rumour was immediately ſpread "abroad that the King was in imminent danger "of his life; ſtraightway the whole multitude "with their wives and chil-"dren [e] ſitting upon ſpread "ſackcloth, after their coun-"try faſhion, made ſupplica-"tions to God for the King. "Every place was filled with "wailings and lamentations. "But the King lying in an "High-bed-chamber, looked "down upon them as they "lay proſtrate and could not "refrain weeping. At length "having been for five days "ſpace continually tormen-"ted with pains of his Belly, "he died, in the fifty fourth "year of [f] his Age, and "the ſeventh of his Reign. "For firſt he reigned four "years under Caius Cæſar, "having governed the Te-"trarchie of Phillip three "years; in the fourth he "had Herods Tetrarchie an-"next: the three laſt years "of his Reign he paſſed un-"der Claudius Cæſar. Thus far Joſephus: wherein, as alſo in other paſſages, I much admire him, in that he agrees ſo exactly with Holy Scripture. But if any one ſhould think that there is ſome diſagreement about the name of the King; both the time and the action doe evidently ſhew that he was the ſame perſon; ſo that either his name was changed by ſome miſtake of the Tranſcriber, or elſe this King had, as many others have, two names.

* Joſeph. Antiq. B. 19. c. 7.

[a] This Feſtival was inſtituted firſt by Herod the great in honour of Auguſtus, in the 192 Olympiad, ſays Joſephus, (Antiq. L. 16. c. 9.) at the City Cæſarea. Agrippa went to Cæſarea to celebrate it, in the 4 year of Claudius, at the beginning of the 206 Olympiad. Valeſ.

[b] He means Syria, or (which was part of it) Phœnicia; which was called the Province, to diſtinguiſh it from Judea where Agrippa then reigned. Indeed Luke ſays expreſly (Acts 12. 20.) that the principal men of Tyre were then preſent, which Tyre was the chief City of Phœnicia. Valeſ.

[c] Joſephus calls it τὸν βεβῶνα, an owl: See his words in the B. and chap. laſt cited.

[d] To wit, in the reign of Tiberius: when Agrippa, being in bonds, and leaning againſt a tree, as he ſtood before the palace of Tiberius, ſaw an owl ſitting over his head. A German being by, one of his fellow priſoners, foretold this to portend great felicity to Agrippa. See the ſtory at large in Joſeph. Antiq. B. 18. c. 8.

[e] This was the uſual poſture of the Hebrew mourners. See Job 2. 3. Eſai. 47. 5. Lament. 2. 10. Jonah 3. 6, &c. conſonant hereunto, the Reverſes of the medalls both of Veſpaſian and Titus, made for the memory and celebration of the conqueſt of Judea, were imprinted with a ſilent woman ſitting on the ground, and leaning her back to a palm-tree, with this inſcription, Judæa Capta, i. e. Judea ſubdued. Note here that the Reverſes made to commit victories to memory were always written upon with ſome repreſentation of proper reſpect to the place conquered. I know the poſture of ſitting is a ceremony of Roman lamentation too. But it was firſt uſed among the Jews, from whom the Romans learned it. Mr Gregory of Oxford. Chap. 4. pag. 25, &c.

[f] This man had two ſons, and three daughters; his ſons were, Agrippa the younger mentioned Acts 25. and Druſus who died young. His daughters were, Bernice, Mariamne, and Druſilla, which laſt married Felix the Procurator of Judea, as we have it in the Acts: Bernice is alſo mentioned in the Acts coming in great pomp with her brother Agrippa to hear Paul. Joſeph. Antiq.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Impoſtour Theudas and his Aſſociates.

BUt becauſe Luke does moreover in the * Acts bring in one Gamaliel ſpeaking in the conſultation the Jews had about the Apoſtles, of one [a] Theudas that aroſe up in theſe days boaſting himſelf to be ſome body, who was ſlain; and all, as many as obeyed him, were ſcattered: we alſo will adjoyn the relation of Joſephus concerning this very perſon. Who, in the Book before cited expreſly declares thus much word for word: "When Fadus was Procurator of Judea, a cer-"tain Impoſtour, by name Theudas, perſwaded "a multitude of people to take their goods with "them and follow him to the River of Jordan. "For he ſaid that he was a Prophet, and that he "would, by his command, part the waters of the "river, mentioned in the Acts; for that Theudas was before Judas Galilæus (Acts 5. 39.) and he was in the time of Cyrenius's being Governour of Syria. That Theudas in the Acts therefore must needs be some other person, whom the Jews had recorded in their writings, and from thence Gamaliel there recites the story, though we have no other record of it. This is the opinion of Scaliger, in L. 6. de Emendat. Tempor. and of Casaubon in Exercitat. 2. c. 18. and of Dr Hammond in his notes on Acts 5. 36. Valesius, in his annotations, dissents from all these learned men, and says that by those words of St Luke [after this man rose up Judas of Galilee] is meant, that Judas his insurrection was before that of Theudas; which exposition he confirms by saying, that whenever we begin to reckon from the last, as nearest to us, (so he supposes St Luke there does) we must necessarily place the last person first in such a reckoning, and the first last: so that notwithstanding St Luke says (after this man rose up Judas of Galilee) yet Judas his insurrection was long before Theudas's. This he illustrates by two examples of such an expression, one taken out of Tertullian in Apologet. the other out of Clemens Alexandr. Lib. 7. Stromat. But then being not able to reconcile the time of Theudas his insurrection with the time Josephus places it in, to wit, in the time of Fadus his Procuratorship, he says Josephus was mistaken, placing it later than he should have done. For he will by no means allow two Theudas's. Another way he has to make up this difference, that is, he thinks St Luke in his expression used a prolepsis, anticipating the insurrection of Theudas ten years, and makes Gamaliel speak that which was agreeable to his present purpose: and thus Eusebius, he thinks, understood St Lukes words. The Reader has here the opinion of both sides, and is left to his liberty to believe which he pleases.

river, and afford them an easie passage over. By such speeches he deceived many. But Fadus suffered them not to take the benefit of their madness, but sent out a body of horse against them, which, falling on them at unawares, partly killed them, and partly took them prisoners. And having taken Theudas alive they beheaded him, and carried his head to Jerusalem. After this the same writer makes mention of the Dearth which happened in the reign of Claudius, after this manner.

CHAP. XII.

Of Helena Queen of the Osdroënians.

[a] "AT that time, there happened to be a "great * Dearth throughout all Judea. When Queen Helena, buying Bread-corn "in Egypt at a very deer price, distributed it to "them that were in want. All which we find agreeable to what is related in the Acts of † the Apostles; Where we have this moreover, that the disciples which dwelt at Antioch, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea; which also they did, and sent it to the Elders by the hands of Barnabas and Paul. But of this Helena, which Josephus has mentioned, there is an illustrious [b] Sepulchral-monument yet to be seen, standing in the Suburbs of Jerusalem, which is now called Ælia: And she is said to have been Queen of the Adiabeni.

This Helena had a Palace in Jerusalem, says Josephus, in the 6 B. of the Jews wars. Vales.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Simon Magus.

BUt the faith of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ being now every where diffused among all men; that enemy of mans salvation, plotting to possess himself of the Royal City, brings thither the forementioned Simon. And, joyning his inchantments to that mans craftiness, he made many that dwelt at Rome his own by inducing them into errour. This Justin evidences; a man very famous amongst the professours of our Religion soon after the Apostles time; whose worth we will give account of in due place. Let us read what he has writ in his [a] second Apologie to Antoninus for our doctrine, where he says thus: "And after the "Ascension of our Lord into "heaven, the Devils sent "forth certain men who stiled themselves Gods: whom "you were so far from persecuting that you worshipped them. Amongst "them there was one Simon a Samaritane, of the "village named Gitton, who in the reign of "Claudius Cæsar, having performed many magical wonders by the assistance and art of Devils within your City Rome the Metropolis "of the Empire, was accounted a God by you, "to whom you dedicated an Image, as to a God, "in an Island of the river Tiber, between the two "Bridges, with this Latine "inscription, [b] SIMONI "DEO SANCTO, that "is, to Simon the Holy God. "Him almost all the Samaritans, and some of other Nations, confess to be the great "God, and worship him, as "also one [c] Helena at that "time a constant companion "of his, who heretofore was "a prostitute in the stews of "Tyre a City of Phœnicia; "and her they term the prime "notion (or first conception) from him. Thus far he: with whom agrees Irenæus in his first Book against Heresies, wherein he sets forth the Life of this man, his impious and most impure doctrine, which it would be superfluous here to relate; since any one that has a desire may fully understand from the foresaid Books of Irenæus, wherein these things are accurately delivered, the original, the life, the grounds and reasons of the false opinions, and the endeavours and purposes not onely of this Simon, but also of all other Arch-hereticks. We have heard that this Simon was indeed the chief Captain, and first Authour of all Heresie. From which time even to our age those who are followers of his Heresie, although they pretend to have imbraced throughout their whole Lives, the Christian Religion renowned amongst all men for its modesty and sanctity; yet nevertheless they relapse to the superstitious worship of Devils, which they seem'd to have abandoned, prostrating themselves before the Images and Pictures of Simon and his forementioned Helena, whom they worship with sweet perfumes, sacrifices, and oblations. And those things which are transacted in secret amongst them, which, say they, do forthwith strike terrour into the minds of those that at first hear them, and which (to use the terms of their own written oracle) doe make them tremble and shake by reason of astonishment; are in truth full of terrour, amazement of mind, and outragious madness: So that it is impossible not onely to commit them to writing, but even for men of modesty to utter them through their lips, by reason of their excessive obscenity

CLAUDIUS.

[a] This place of Justin is now to be found not in his second but in his first Apologie. Eusebius in citing Justins Apologies follows not the order of our common Editions. For he always calls that the first which our Editions term the second; and that the second which they call the first: of which more hereafter. Vales.

[b] The Learned have long since observed, that Justin, by reason of his unskilfulness in the Latine tongue, was here mistaken; thinking that the Image dedicated to Semon Sancus was consecrated to Simon Magus. Tis certain, that image, which Justin had seen in the Island of Tiber, was lately dug up, with this inscription upon it, Semoni Sango Deo Fidio. Sancus was a God among the Sabins that had the charge of bargains and contracts, whence he had the names of Sangus and Fidius. By him the Romans were wont to swear. Some Samaritans, no doubt, deceived Justin, making him believe this Image was dedicated to their Simon Magus. Vales.

CHAP. XIV.

Of Peter the Apoſtle's Preaching at Rome.

THe devil that hater of all goodneſs and moſt trecherous enemy of mans ſalvation, at this time produced this Simon the authour and contriver of ſo much miſchief, that he might be the great Antagoniſt of the divine Apoſtles of our Saviour. But the Divine and Celeſtial grace, which is always aſſiſtant to its Miniſters, by their appearance and preſence ſoon quenched the flame, enkindled by the devil, humbling and depreſſing by them all haughtineſs and ſwelling pride that exalted it ſelf againſt the knowledge of God. Wherefore, neither the devices of Simon, nor of any other which then were hatch't, became any ways prevalent during the age of the Apoſtles. For the ſplendour of the Truth vanquiſhed and prevailed againſt all machinations; and the power of the divine Word, which had newly enlightned mens minds from heaven, did both flouriſh upon earth, and alſo was converſant and did effectually cooperate with the Apoſtles. Straightway therefore the foreſaid Impoſtour, having the eyes of his mind blinded by a divine and wonderful ſplendour and light, as ſoon as he was detected by the Apoſtle Peter in Judea in what he had wickedly committed, took a great journey over ſea, and fled from the Eaſtern to the Weſtern parts: concluding that he could no other way live freely, and according to his own mind. Arriving at Rome, by the help and aſſiſtance of a devill [a] there lying in wait, he in a ſhort time ſo far perfected his attempt, that the inhabitants of that City ſet up an Image to him and worſhip't him as God. But all ſucceeded not long according to his mind. For ſoon after, in the reign of Claudius, the benign and moſt endearing providence of God brought Peter, that valiant and great Apoſtle, for courage chief of all the reſt, to Rome againſt this mighty deſtroyer of mankind, who, as a ſtout Leader of God, armed with celeſtial weapons, brought that precious merchandiſe of intelligible light from the Eaſt to thoſe that dwelt towards the Weſt: declaring to them that Light and Doctrine comfortable to the ſoul, to wit, the publication of the Kingdom of heaven.

[a] Euſebius ſpeaks of a devil, which had made his reſidence and fixt his habitation in Rome, being then the metropolis of the whole world. Valeſ.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Goſpel according to Mark.

WHen therefore he had publiſhed to them the divine Word, immediately the power of Simon was extinct, and, together with the man [a] himſelf, deſtroyed. But ſo great a luſtre of Pietie enlightned the minds of them that were the hearers of Peter, that they thought it not ſufficient barely to hear him once, nor were contented to have received the publication of the doctrine of the celeſtial Word by word of mouth and unwritten. Therefore they earneſtly entreated Mark, Peters follower, whoſe Goſpel is at this day extant, that he would leave with them ſome written Record of that doctrine they had heard. Neither did they deſiſt till they had prevailed with the man; and thus they gave the occaſion of writing that Goſpel, which is called the Goſpel according to Mark. When the Apoſtle Peter underſtood by the Revelation of the holy Spirit what was done, he was much delighted with the ardent deſire of the men, and confirmed that writing by his Autority, that ſo thenceforward it ſhould be read in the Churches. [b] Clemens in his ſixth Book of Inſtitutions relates this paſſage. To whom the Biſhop of Hierapolis, by name Papias, may be added as a witneſs. Furthermore, Peter mentions Mark, in his former Epiſtle, which, as they ſay, was written at Rome; Peter himſelf does intimate thus much (calling Rome by [c] a figure Babylon) in theſe words, * The Church that is at Babylon elected together with you, ſalluteth you, and ſo doth Marcus my ſon.

[a] From theſe words of Euſebius it is concluded that the death of Simon Magus happened at Rome in the time of Claudius: for Euſebius writeth that Peter came to Rome in Claudius his reign, and that preſently after, Simon's magical arts were by his coming deſtroyed together with the Authour. Though there be others that ſay Simon was deſtroyed in Nero's time. Valeſ.

[b] This place of Clemens is quoted again by Euſebius in his 6 B. Eccleſ. Hiſt. at which place more ſhall be ſaid of it. Valeſ.

[c] Rome was parallel to Babylon in many things. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVI.

That Mark firſt Preached the knowledge of Chriſt to the Egyptians.

BUt this Mark [a] going into Egypt is reported to have been the firſt publiſher there of the Goſpel he had written, and to have ſetled Churches in the very City of Alexandria. And furthermore, that ſo great a multitude both of men and women, who there embraced the faith of Chriſt, profeſſed from the very beginning ſo ſevere and ſo philoſophical a courſe of life, that Philo vouchſafed in his writings to relate their converſe, their Aſſemblies, their eating and drinking together, and their whole manner of living.

[a] Euſebius in his Chronic. places Mark's going into Egypt on the ſecond year of Claudius: the Authour of the Alexandrian Chronic. and Georg. Syncellus ſay he went in the third year of C. Caligula: its the opinion of Eutychius Patriarch of Alexandria that Mark went thither in the ninth year of Claudius. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVII.

What Philo relates of the Aſcetæ in Egypt.

IT is reported that this Philo in the times of Claudius came to be familiarly acquainted with Peter at Rome, who then Preached the Word of God there: neither is this unlikely. For that work of his, of which we ſpeak, being by him elaborated a long time after, does manifeſtly contain all the Eccleſiaſtical Rules which are to this preſent obſerved among us. And ſeeing he deſcribes evidently the lives of the [a] Aſcetæ amongſt us, he does make it ſufficiently perſpicuous that he did not onely ſee, but alſo very much approve of and admire the Apoſtolical men of his time, who being, as it is probable, originally Jews, upon that account did then obſerve in a great meaſure the Judaical Rites and cuſtomes. Firſt of all therefore, in that Book which he intituled, Of Contemplative life, or, of Suppliants, having profeſſed that he would inſert

CLAUDIUS. nothing disagreeable to truth, or of his own head, into that account which he was about to give, he says that the men were called [b] Therapeutæ, and the women that were conversant among them Therapeutriæ: And he adjoyns the reason of that appellation, either because like Physitians they healed the mindes of those that resorted to them, curing them of their vitious affections, or because they worshipped the Deity with a pure and sincere service and adoration. Further, whether Philo himself gave them this name, devising an appellation agreeable to the manners and dispositions of the men; or whether they were really so called from the beginning, the name of Christians having not yet been every where spread and diffused, it is not necessary positively to affirm or contend about it. But he attests that in the first place they part with their goods; "saying that as soon as they betake "themselves to this course of Philosophizing they "put over their wealth and possessions to their re- "lations. Then, casting away all care of worldly "matters, they leave the Cities, and make their "aboad in gardens and solitary places; well know- "ing the conversing with men of a different and "disagreeing perswasion to be unprofitable and "hurtfull. Which thing the Christians of that time seem to me to have instituted out of a generous and most fervent ardour of faith, endeavouring to emulate the Prophetical severe course of life. Therefore in the * Acts of the Apostles (which contain nothing but the perfect truth) it is shewed, that all the disciples of the Apostles selling their possessions and goods, divided the price among the brethren according as every one had need, that so there might not be any indigent person among them. For as the Word says, as many as were possessours of Lands or houses sold them, and brought the prizes of the things that were sold and laid them down at the Apostles feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need. After Philo has attested the very same things with these, of the Therapeutæ, he adds thus much farther concerning them, word for word saying, "This [c] sort of men indeed "is diffused far and wide "over the whole world. For "it was requisite, that both "Greeks & Barbarians should "be partakers of so excellent "a benefit. Egypt especially "is full of them, throughout "all its divisions, but most of all about Alexan- "dria. But from all places the principal of them "retire themselves into a most commodious place "above the Lake Maria, situate upon a little "rising hill, excellently well seated both for whol- "someness of air and safe conveniency of abiding, "as into the Country of the Therapeutæ. Then, after he has described their houses, after what manner they were built, he speaks thus of the Churches they have in divers places. "In every house there "is a Chappel called a Semnæum, and Monaste- "rium, in which alone by themselves they perform "the mysteries of an holy life. They bring in "thither neither meat nor drink, nor any corporal "provisions or necessaries; but onely the Law, "and the divine Oracles of the Prophets, and "Hymns and such like, whereby knowledge and "piety are increased and perfected. And a little after, he says: "All the interval of time from "Sun rising to the Evening they spend in medita- "tions of Philosophie: For reading the holy "Scriptures, they Philosophize after their Country "way, and expound allegorically. For they sup- "pose that the words are onely notes and marks "of some things of a mystical nature, which are "to be explained [d] figura- "tively. They have [e] wri- "tings of some ancient per- "sons, who have been here- "tofore famous leaders of "their Sect, and have left "them many Monuments of "that learning which con- "sists in dark and secret ex- "pressions, which they, using "as original platforms, doe "imitate thereby that course "of study. These certain- ly seem to be words of such a man as had heard some of our Religion expounding the holy Scriptures. And it is very likely that the writings of those ancient persons, which he says they had, were the Gospels and writings of the Apostles, and certain expositions of the ancient Prophets, of which sort many are contained both in other Epistles of Paul, and also in that written to the Hebrews. Afterwards Philo thus writeth concerning the new Psalms composed by them: "They do not onely "spend their time in contem- "plation, but they [f] compose "Songs and Hymns to the "praise of God of all sorts of "meeter and musical verse, "which they write in grave "and seemly rhymes. He relates many other things of them in that Book I mentioned: But I judged these fittest to be selected and pickt out, in which certain marks of Church discipline are proposed. But if any one shall think what Philo here says to be in no wise proper to the Evangelical politie, but may be adapted to others besides those I have mentioned; he will certainly be convinced by Philo's following words; in which, if he shall duely weigh the matter, he will receive a most undoubted testimony of this thing. Now he writes thus: "Having first laid tem- "perance as a certain foundation, they build there- "upon the other Virtues. For none of them "takes either meat or drink before Sun set: for "they hold it requisite to spend the day in the "study of Philosophy, and the night in making "necessary provision for the body. Therefore "they allot the whole day to study, but allow "a very small portion of the night for bodily "provision. Some of them forget to eat for "three days together, so great is the desire of "knowledge that possesses them. But some others "of

CLAUDIUS.

[b] That these Therapeutæ were not Christians we will shew hereafter. Some think they were Essens; but that is unlikely: for Philo never terms them so in that Book wherein he describes them, but at the very beginning calls them Therapeutæ: Besides, the Essens (as Philo himself witnesses in his Apology for the Jews, cited by Eusebius Lib. 8. De præparat.) were onely in Judea and Palæstine; but these Therapeutæ, he says were scattered all over the (then known) world. Lastly Philo attributes many things to these Therapeutæ, which the Sect of the Essens by no means allowed: as for example, that they had women conversant among them called Therapeutriæ: now Philo says expresly that the Essens hated womankind. See Philo de vita Contemplat. and Joseph. Hist. of the Jewish wars. B. 2. Chap. 12. Vales.

[c] Philo's description of these Therapeutæ in these following words can no way agree with the Christian professours in those times. For they were then few in number, neither did they look upon any Country as their own, besides the heavenly Jerusalem. Vales.

[d] Ἐν ὑπονοίας that's the term in the original. So the Ancient Greeks called that which the latter call ἀλληγορίας; that is, an allegory, as they term it; when one thing is said, another is to be understood. Vales.

[e] From these words of Philo we may easily perceive that these Therapeutæ were not Christians. For the professours of Christianity were then of a very fresh date. Besides, what writings could these be? The Books of the Prophets they were not, for Philo separates them from these, speaking of them a little before: They could not be the Gospels, nor the Epistles of the Apostles, for they were scarce written in Philo's age, however they could not then be called the writings of antient persons, at least by Philo. Vales.

[f] The composition of Psalms and Hymns was not in use so early in the Church, as these words of Philo must suppose, if we understand them to be spoken of the Christians: that came in after the times of Antoninus, when learned men began to embrace the Christian Faith. So that neither can these words of Philo be any ways understood of Christians. The junior Pliny indeed (in his Epistle to Trajan L. b. 10. Epist. 97.) says it was a custome of the Christians in their Cœtus, carmen Christo tanquam Deo dicere secum invicem, i. e. to say one with another by turns a verse, or Hymn, to Christ as unto God: But there is a difference between saying and composing a song or Hymn; and besides, this was long after Philo's time. See Dr Hammonds preface to his Exposit. on the Psalms; and Mr Gregory's Posthumous works; Discourse 2d.

CLAUDIUS. "of them are ſo well pleaſed with, and feed ſo "richly and deliciouſly upon the banquets of "Wiſdom, which ſets before them wholſome pre- "cepts as a moſt ſumptuous feaſt, that they are "wont ſcarce to taſt any neceſſary food in twice "that ſpace, to wit, in ſix days time. We ſuppoſe theſe words of Philo to be evidently and without all doubt ſpoken concerning thoſe of our Religion. But if after all this any one ſhall ſtill perſiſt in a peremptory denyal of theſe things; he will at length recede from his obſtinate difficulty of belief, being perſwaded to ſubmit to ſuch manifeſt demonſtrations as are no where to be found but in the Chriſtian Religion, compoſed according to the rule of the Goſpel. "Philo ſays further there- "fore, that among theſe men, of whom we ſpeak, "there are certain women converſant, many of "which continue Virgins being old; not out of "neceſſity, like ſome of thoſe amongſt the Gre- "cian Prieſts, but voluntarily preſerving their "chaſtity out of an ardent affection to and deſire "of wiſdom; in the embraces and familiarity "whereof they earneſtly affect to ſpend their "lives; having deſpiſed all bodily pleaſures, and "deſiring earneſtly not a mortal iſſue, but an im- "mortal; which that mind onely that loves and "is beloved of God can of it ſelf bring forth. After many other expreſſions, he ſpeaks yet more plainly thus, "Their Expoſitions of holy Writ "are figurative by way of Allegories. For theſe "men ſuppoſe the whole Law to be like a living "creature; the bare words whereof are, as it "were the Body, and the inviſible ſenſe, that lies "hid under the words, reſembles the ſoul. Which "ſence this Sect have and doe make it their Reli- "gion earneſtly to ſearch into and contemplate, "beholding in the words, as in a glaſs, the admi- "rable beauty of the meaning. There is no ne- ceſſity of adding farther here an account of their Aſſemblies, of the diſtinct apartments of their men and women, and of their ſeveral ſtudies and holy exerciſes, now in uſe amongſt us, more eſpe- cially about the feaſt of our Lords Paſſion, when we are wont to practiſe them in faſtings, watch- ings, and attentive reading of holy Scriptures. All which the man we have ſo often mentioned, does relate in his writings accurately, after the ſame manner in which we onely at this time obſerve them: Eſpecially he mentions the [g] Vigils of the great Solemnity, the holy exerciſes therein, and the Hymns we are wont to recite. And how, when one has begun to ſing a Pſalm harmoniouſly and gravely, the reſt, ſilently hearkening, doe after ſing out in Chorus the latter parts onely of the verſes. "And how throughout thoſe days lying "in ſtraw upon the ground, they wholly abſtain "from wine (as he has ſaid in theſe expreſs "words) and eat nothing that has bloud in it: "water is their onely drink, and their food is "bread with ſalt and hyſſop. Farther he deſcribes the order and degrees of their Governours, to wit, [h] thoſe who perform the Eccleſiaſtical Offices, then the Miniſtrations of the Deacons, and laſtly the Epiſcopal preſidency over all. He that deſires to know theſe things more accurately, may be therein informed from the fore-mentioned Hiſtory of Philo. It is therefore apparently evident to every one, that Philo writing thus, did mean thereby thoſe firſt Preachers of the Evangelical doctrine, and the diſcipline, at the beginning delivered by the Apoſtles. CLAUDIUS.

[g] Euſebius means that whole week which precedes the feaſt of Eaſter, which the Greek Fathers call μεγάλην ἑβδομάδα, the great week, and we the Paſſion week. But in Philo's Book there is no mention of this feaſt of Eaſter. He ſpeaks indeed μεγάλης ἑορτῆς, of a great ſolemnity; but by his following words 'tis evident he means the Jewiſh-feaſt of weeks, or, our Pentecoſt. Valeſ.

[h] He means the Preſbyters; concerning whom, See Philo, in his ſaid Book, De vitâ contemplat. p. 899. Edit. Par. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVIII.

What writings of Philo's have come to our hands.

MOreover this Philo being a man of a fluent utterance, and abundant in ſentences, alſo lofty and high in contemplations upon the holy Scriptures, compiled a divers and variable expoſition of the ſacred Volumes of holy Writ: partly explaining in a fit and agreeable ſeries and order, the ſubject matter of the things contained in Geneſis, which he entitled The Allegories of the Holy Laws: and partly making particular and diſtinct explications of thoſe Chapters in Scripture which contain any thing in them that is dubious, with objections thereupon and ſolutions thereof; which alſo he fitly entitled Queſtions & Solutions upon Geneſis and Exodus. There are beſides elaborate tracts of his peculiarly written concerning certain Problems; ſuch as are, two Books Of Husbandry, and as many of Drunkenneſs, and ſome others having different and fit Titles: Such is that, [a] Of the things which a ſober mind prayeth for, and which it deteſteth; and that, Of the confuſion of Languages; and that, Of [b] flight and invention; and that, Of Aſſemblies upon account of obtaining Learning: and concerning this ſubject, Who is the Heir of Divine things, or, of diviſion into parts equal and their contraries: and alſo that, Of the three Virtues which with others Moſes wrote of. Beſides, that, Of them whoſe names are changed, and for what reaſon they are changed; in which Book he ſays, he wrote Of Teſtaments the firſt and the ſecond. There is alſo another Book of his, Of Removals in journey, or ſhifting of places, and of the life of a wiſe man perfected according to righteouſneſs, or, Of unwritten Laws, and alſo, Of Giants, and, that God is immutable; alſo, [c] That Dreams are ſent from God, according to the opinion of Moſes five Books. And thus many are the Books he wrote on Geneſis which have come to our hands. We have alſo known five Books of his, of Queſtions and Solutions upon Exodus; and alſo that, of the Tabernacle, and that, of the Decalogue, and thoſe four Books, of thoſe Laws which in ſpecie have reference to the chief heads of the Decalogue; and that, of thoſe beaſts fit for ſacrifice, and, what be the kinds of ſacrifices; and that, of the rewards and puniſhments propounded in the Law as well to the Good as to the Evil; and, of curſes. Beſides all theſe there are extant of his particular Books,

[b] In Suidas this Book is called, περὶ φύσεως καὶ εὑρήματος· which inſcription Suidas took from Sophronius the interpreter of Ferom. But our excellent M.SS. Maz. Med. Fuk. and S[r] Henry Savills have it thus, καὶ ὁ περὶ φύσεως καὶ αἱρέσεως. Wherefore I agree with Nicephorus, who rightly diſtinguiſht the two Books of Philo: the one of which was entitled περὶ φυγῆς καὶ αἱρέσεως, Of flight and choice; the other, περὶ φύσεως καὶ εὑρέσεως, that is, Of nature and invention. Whence it appears that that Book of Euſebius's, which Nicephorus made uſe of, was in this place more correct than our copies. Valeſ.

[c] 'Tis manifeſt that Philo wrote three Books on this Subject, That Dreams are ſent from God. The firſt of which is loſt; the ſecond is extant in the Paris Edition of Philo, pag. 465. in the beginning whereof he makes mention of a former Book which he had written on that ſubject. The third is alſo extant in the ſame Edition, pag. 1108. but miſplaced. Whether he wrote any more than theſe three, is uncertain. Suidas mentions five Books of Philo's De Somniis. Valeſ.

CLAUDIUS.

Books, as that, Of [d] Providence, and a discourse compiled by him; [e] Of the Jews, and, of the man leading a Civil life; also, Alexander, or, That Brutes are endowed with Reason. Besides, of this, That every wicked man is a slave, to which follows in order this Book, That every man studious of Virtue is free. After these he compiled that Book, Of contemplative life, or, of Suppliants, out of which we have cited those things concerning the lives of the Apostolical men. Also, The interpretations of the [f] Hebrew names in the Law and in the Prophets, are said to have been done by his diligence. This Philo, coming to Rome in the time of Caius, wrote a Book of Caius's hatred of God, which, by way of Scoff and Ironie, he entituled, Of Virtues; which Book, its said, he rehearsed before the whole Roman Senate in the time of Claudius; and the piece was so taking, that his admirable works were thought worthy to be dedicated to the publick Libraries. At the same time, when Paul travelled from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum, [g] Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome. [h] At which time Aquila and Priscilla, with other Jews, departing from Rome, arived in Asia, where they conversed with Paul the Apostle, then confirming the foundations of those Churches there newly laid by him. Even the Holy book of the Acts teacheth us these things.

[d] In the Maz. and Fuk. M.SS. its written, τὸ περὶ προνοίας, truer; for there was onely one Book that bore this Title. In a M. S. copy of Philo's works in the Library of Auspurg, this Book of Philo's, De Providentiâ, is confounded with another of his Adversus Flaccum. Indeed this Book, De Providentiâ, is lost. But there is an eminent fragment of it in Eusebius De præparat Libr. 8. cap. Ultim. and in Libr. 7. cap. 21. Valesius.

[e] I doubt not but it should be written ὑπὲρ Ἰουδαίων, For the Jews, for so this Book is quoted by Eusebius in his 8 B. De Præparat. Evangel. chap. 10. where there is a most elegant place produced ἐκ τῆς φίλωνος ὑπὲρ Ἰουδαίων ἀπολογίας, i. e. out of the Apologie of Philo for the Jews. Rufinus confirms this our emendation; who turns this place thus, de Judæis Apologeticus Liber. Valesius.

[f] Jerome makes mention of this Book of Philo's, in his interpretation of the Hebrew names. Moreover, Philo having onely interpreted those names that occur in the Law and the Prophets, Origen added afterwards an interpretation of the words and names of the New Testament; supplying that which seemed to be wanting in Philo's Book, as Jerome writes in that Book of his now mentioned. Valesius.

[g] Eusebius took this out of the Acts of the Apost. chap. 18. v. 2. And Orosius writes, as he had it out of Josephus, that this was done in the ninth year of Claudius. But that place of Josephus which Orosius quotes is not now extant. Therefore Orosius seems to me to have forgotten himself. And truely, it is not very likely, that Claudius the Emperour, who had so great a kindness for the Jews, as appears by his many Edicts extant in Josephus, should drive the Jews in particular out of the City. I should rather think, whenas there was a great famine at Rome (which in Eusebius's Chronicon is said to have happened in the tenth year of Claudius) that Claudius expelled all forreiners out of the City, amongst whom were the Jews also. For so Augustus did before; and 'twas frequently practised by the following Emperours, as oft as the City of Rome was in any scarcity of Provision: and so I judge that place of Luke in the Acts is to be understood. But if any one, relying on the Authority of Suetonius (whose words are these, Judæos impulsore CHRESTO assiduè tumultuantes Româ expulit; in the Life of Claudius. See Dr Hammonds Annot. on Acts 26. v. 31.) does reject this our Opinion, I will not much withstand him. All the Chronologers downwards follow Orosius; as does also Barronius in his Annals. Whom I much wonder at, in that when he had placed this Edict of Claudius on the ninth year of his Reign, he should also cast the Jerusalem Council upon the same year. Which is manifestly repugnant to the History of the Acts of the Apostles. For, after the Jerusalem Council, which is related Acts 15, Paul going back to Antioch, delivered the Epistle of the Apostles to the brethren, and is said to have tarried there some time. After this, being parted from Barnabas, he went into Syria and Cilicia, Preaching the Word of God. Then he travelled into Phrygia, Galatia, and Mysia, where he was warned by the Holy Spirit in a dream to sail into Macedonia, and first Preach't the Faith of Christ at Philippi; after that, at Thessalonica and Berea. Sailing thence to Athens, he staied there a good while expecting Timothy and Silas; and Preached the Word of God to the Athenians. Then going to Corinth he found Aquila and Priscilla there, who were lately come from Italy thither, upon account of the Edict of Claudius commanding all Jews to depart from Rome, as it is in the 18 chap. Acts. From all this its apparent, that there was a good distance of time between the Council held at Jerusalem, and the Edict of Claudius; in which space all this we have related was dispatcht by Paul the Apostle. In Chronico Alexandrino, the Council at Jerusalem is placed on the sixth year of Claudius; he had better have said, the seventh. For so all things agree exactly. For Paul staid at Antioch the remaining months of that year wherein the Council was; then the following year he travelled through Syria, Cilicia, Phrygia, and Galatia. At length in the ninth year of Claudius, he came into Greece. Valesius.

CHAP. XIX.

What a Calamity befell the Jews at Jerusalem on the very day of the Passover.

BUt Claudius yet ruling the Empire, there happened to be so great a tumult and disturbance at Jerusalem on the feast of the Passover, that there were [a] thirty thousand Jews slain, being those onely who by force were prest together about the gates of the Temple and troden under foot by one another. So that that Festival was turned into mourning over the whole Nation, and Lamentation throughout every family. Thus much also Josephus relates almost word for word. But Claudius made Agrippa, the son of Agrippa, [b] King of the Jews; having sent [c] Felix Procuratour of the whole country of Samaria and Galilee, and also of the Region beyond Jordan. And when he had raigned thirteen years and eight months, he dyed, leaving Nero his successour in the Empire.

[a] The same number he sets down in his Chronicon. But Josephus, in his 2 B. of the Jewish wars says there was somewhat more than ten thousand killed. But in his 20th B. of Antiquities, which work he compiled after his History, he accounts the number of the slain to be twenty thousand. Which number I would rather agree too, because these Books, as I said, were written last by him. Valesius.

[b] This Agrippa the younger, to speak properly, was never King of the Jews. For after the death of Agrippa his father, who dyed the fourth year of Claudius, Claudius took him being very young and kept him with him, neither did he permit him to succeed in his fathers Kingdom. Afterwards, Herod the King of Chalcis being dead, Claudius gave Agrippa his Uncle's Kingdom; which when he had held four years, Claudius in the twelfth year of his Reign gave him Thraconitis, which was the Tetrarchie of Philip, and also the Kingdom of Lysanius; having first taken Chalcis from him: He transferred to him also the authority over the Temple, and the power of electing the High-priests, which his Uncle Herod had. A little after, Nero added to his Kingdom part of Galilee, as Josephus writes in his twentieth B. of Antiq. Which being thus, its apparent Eusebius was mistaken, who wrote both here and in his Chronicon, that Agrippa the younger succeeded in his fathers Kingdom presently after the death of his father, and was made King of the Jews by Claudius. Although Eusebius says not here expressly that he was by Claudius made King presently after his fathers death. Indeed, out of Josephus it may be evidently shown that the younger Agrippa was not made King immediately after his fathers death. For in his second Book of the Jewish wars, chap. 13, he makes the twelfth year of Nero, wherein the Jewish war began, to be the same with the seventeenth of King Agrippa. Therefore the younger Agrippa began to reign in the eighth year of Claudius. Moreover, I will not deny that he was King of the Jews, seeing he was King of Galilee, and is by Justus reckoned among the Kings of the Jews. But I deny that ever he was King of Judea. For after the death of the Seniour Agrippa, which happened in the fourth year of Claudius, Judea was brought into the form of a Province, and every year the Procuratours of Cæsar were sent thither, as Josephus relates. Valesius.

[c] In the Chronicon of Eusebius, Felix is said to have been sent Procuratour into Judea by Claudius, in the eleventh year of his Reign. But in Scaligers Edition of that work, it is more rightly placed on the tenth year of Claudius. Yet it seems to be truer, that Felix was sent into Judea in the ninth of Claudius. For Tacitus, in his twelfth Book, says, That Felix was lately set over the Jews, (Sulla and Otho being Consuls, which was the tenth year of Claudius:) and in Acts 24. Paul, pleading his cause before this same Felix, which was done on the thirteenth year of Claudius, speaks thus to him: For as much as I know that thou hast been for many years a judge unto this Nation. Moreover Rufinus is mistaken, in that he thinks these are Josephus's words, when as it appears that they indeed are Eusebius's. Valesius.

CHAP. XX.

What was done at Jerusalem in the Reign of Nero.

NERO.

NOw in Nero's time, Felix being Procuratour of Judea, Josephus relateth in the twentieth Book of his Antiquities, that there

NERO. was again a Sedition of the Prieſts one againſt the other, in theſe words: "There aroſe alſo a Sedi-"tion of the chief Prieſts, againſt the Prieſts and the "chief of the people of Jeruſalem. And each of "them forming for themſelves a company of moſt "audacious fellows and ſuch as indeavoured to "make innovations, behaved themſelves as Ca-"ptains; and encountring they railed againſt each "other, and threw ſtones at one another. There "was no body to rebuke them; but, as in a City de-"ſtitute of a Governour, theſe things were licen-"tiouſly done. And ſo great impudence and pre-"ſumptuous boldneſs poſſeſſed the chief Prieſts, "that they dared to ſend their ſervants to the thre-"ſhing floors, and take the Tythes due to the "Prieſts. Whence it came to paſs that the pooreſt "of the Prieſts were ſeen to periſh for want of "ſuſtenance. In ſuch ſort did the violence of the "Seditious prevail over all juſtice and equity. And again the ſame writer relates that at the ſame time there aroſe a ſort of theeves in Jeruſalem, who in the day time, as he ſays, and in the very midſt of the City, killed thoſe they met with; but eſpecially on the Feſtivals, being mixt among the croud, and hiding little daggers under their garments, they ſtab'd the moſt eminent [a] Perſonages; and when they fell, theſe murtherers would diſſemble themſelves to be of the number of thoſe that grieved. Whereby they were undiſcovered, becauſe of the good opinion all men had of them. And firſt, he ſays, Jonathan the High Prieſt was killed by them, and after him many were ſlain daily, and he ſays, the fear was more grievous than the calamity, in that every one, as in war, hourly expected death.

[a] Τὰς διαφθορὰς; ſo it is in Joſephus. Gelenius renders it, enemies: which I like not. For Joſephus by that term means τοὺ διαφέροντας; the moſt eminent Perſonages. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXI.

Of that Egyptian who is mentioned in the Acts of the Apoſtles.

After theſe things Joſephus adds, having interpoſed ſome other words; "But the Egyptian "falſe prophet annoyed the Jews with a greater "miſchief than theſe. For he, coming into the "Country, being a Magician, and having gotten "himſelf the repute of a Propher, gathered toge-"ther about thirty thouſand men ſuch as he had "ſeduced; and leading them out of the wilder-"neſs to the mount called the mount of Olives, "prepared by force from thence to enter Jeruſa-"lem; and, having vanquiſhed the Roman guards, "to ſeize the principality over the people, reſol-"ving to make them his guard who together with "him by violence entred the City. But Felix pre-"vented his attempt, having met him with the Ro-"man Souldiers; and all the people joyned their "aſſiſtance in repelling his injurious violence. So "that, the Aſſault being made, the Egyptian fled "with a few, and moſt of his party were ſlain and "taken priſoners. Theſe matters Joſephus relates in the ſecond Book of his Hiſtory; and its worthy our [a] obſerving, together with what is here related of this Egyptian, thoſe things which are declared of him in the Acts of the Apoſtles: There, in the time of Felix it is ſaid by the chief Captain at Jeruſalem unto Paul, when the multitude of the Jews raiſed a tumult againſt him; * Art not thou that Egyptian which before theſe days madeſt an uproar, and leddeſt into the wilderneſs [b] four thouſand men that were murtherers? But thus much concerning the times of Felix.

[a] Ἐπισῆσαι, ſignifies properly, to attend too, or obſerve. In this ſenſe Euſebius uſes the word chap. 18. of this Book, and in B. 3. chap. 24. This word occurs in Athenæus, Polybius, and others. Valeſ.

* Acts 21. 38. See Joſephus Antiq. B. 20. c. 6, & 7. See alſo Dr Hammond on Acts 21. 38.

NERO. [b] Joſephus ſays there were thirty thouſand men: which is ſo to be underſtood, as that the number of the whole multitude was 30000, of which 4000 onely were murtherers. And ſo Joſephus will be reconciled to Luke. But I agree not with Euſebius, who writes that this was done in Nero's time. For, in Acts 21, this Egyptian is ſaid to have been overthrown a little before Pauls coming to Jeruſalem. Now Paul came thither in the laſt year of Claudius: which may be gathered from the 24 chap. Acts, where Luke writes that Portius Feſtus was ſent as ſucceſſour to Felix. Seeing therefore Feſtus was ſent into Judea in the ſecond year of Nero, the overthrow of this Egyptian muſt neceſſarily fall on the laſt year of Claudius. The narration of Joſephus, who ſeems to refer all this to the times of Nero, deceived Euſebius. But Euſebius ought to have conſidered, that Joſephus does in that place relate all the Acts of Felix together, as well what he did under Claudius, as what under Nero. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXII.

How Paul, being ſent bound from Judea to Rome, having made his defence, was wholly acquitted.

But Feſtus is by Nero ſent as ſucceſſour to this Felix: in whoſe time Paul having pleaded for himſelf is carried bound to Rome; Ariſtarchus was with him, whom ſomewhere in his Epiſtles he deſervedly ſtiles his fellow priſoner: And Luke, who committed to writing the Acts of the Apoſtles, concluded his Hiſtory here, having ſhewed that Paul lived two full years at Rome, enjoying in a great meaſure his liberty; and, that he Preached the Word of God, no man forbidding him: Then, having made his defence, it is moreover reported that the Apoſtle travelled again upon account of the miniſtration of Preaching; and that, coming the ſecond time to the ſame City, he ended his life by martyrdome in this Emperours Reign. At which time, being in bonds, he wrote the ſecond Epiſtle to Timothy, ſignifying therein both his former defence, and alſo his approaching death. Take his own Teſtimonie hereof. At my firſt anſwer, ſays he, no man ſtood with me, but all men forſook me, I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge: notwithſtanding the Lord ſtood with me, and ſtrengthened me, that by me the Preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear; and I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion. By which words he makes it plainly evident, that at the firſt time, that his Preaching might be fulfilled, he was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion; ſpeaking, as it was likely, of Nero, becauſe of his cruelty. [a] But afterwards he has not added any thing like unto theſe words [He ſhall deliver me out of the mouth of the Lion:] for by the Spirit he ſaw that his end was now near at hand: wherefore, having ſaid [and I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion] he adds this [The Lord ſhall deliver me from every evil Work and will preſerve me unto his heavenly Kingdom] evidently ſignifying that his martyrdom was at hand; which he more plainly foretels in the ſame Epiſtle, ſaying, For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. Moreover in this ſecond Epiſtle to Timothy, he manifeſtly declares, that onely Luke was then with him when he wrote it; but, at his firſt anſwer, that not ſo much as he was with him then. Whence 'tis agreeable to reaſon to think, that Luke concluded the Acts of the Apoſtles at that time, having continued the Hiſtory ſo long as he accompanied Paul. Theſe things we have ſpoken, that

[a] Indeed this place is very obſcure; and therefore Muſculus (as alſo Dr Hammer) omitted it. But, having conſidered upon it long and much, at length I apprehended the true ſenſe of this place. Euſebius therefore ſays, that from the ſecond Epiſtle of NERO. that we may make it manifest that the martyrdom of Paul was not consummated at that first coming of his to Rome, which Luke mentions. For its likely, that Pauls Apology for his opinion was more easily admitted by Nero, he behaving himself more mildly at the beginning of his Empire; but proceeding afterwards to the commission of most horrid and villanous Acts, those things against the Apostles together with many other persons, were by him taken in hand.

Paul to Timothy this may be gathered, to wit, that Paul in his first defence was acquitted by the Judges sentence; but afterward at his second defence he was condemned. The former part hereof he apparently manifests in these words [At my first defence no man stood with me;] and whenas he says [I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lyon.] which is as much as if he had said, I was snatcht from Nero's jaws. But Paul speaks far otherwise of his second accusation. For he does not say [The Lord delivered me out of the mouth of the Lyon] as he had said before. For he foresaw, God revealing it to him, that he should by no means any longer avoid the sword of the persecutour, but should end his life by a glorious martyrdom. Therefore when he had said of his first accusation [I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lyon] concerning his second, with which he was then charged, he adds these words [The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly Kingdom] apparently manifesting his death by these words. This is the meaning of this place, which neither the translatours, nor I my self at first understood. Wherefore in the words of Eusebius, it must be read [ἔκ ἅν] in two distinct words, or else the accent must be changed, thus ἕκων. Indeed, in the Maz. M. S. it is thus written [ἔκ ἅν] in two distinct words. Moreover Jerome, in his Book De Scriptorib. Ecclesiast. has quoted this place of Eusebius, where he speaks of Paul; but he apprehended not Eusebius's meaning, as it will be apparent to the Reader. Wherefore Sophronius also, when he translated this place of Jerome, into Greek, omitted some words, which seemed to hinder the meaning. Vales.

CHAP. XXIII.

How James, called the brother of the Lord, was Martyred.

MOreover Paul having appealed to Cæsar, and being by Festus sent to Rome; the Jews, who had plotted a design against him, being now disappointed of their expectation, set upon James the brother of the Lord, to whom the Episcopal seat at Jerusalem was given by the Apostles: and of this sort were their villanous practises against him: Leading him forth publickly, they required him to renounce the faith of Christ before all the people. But when he, contrary to the expectation of all, had spoken freely and with a greater boldness than they looked for, before the whole multitude, and had confessed that our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ was the Son of God; being no longer able to endure the Testimony of the man, they slew him who was believed by all to be a most just person, by reason of that singular eminence he arrived to, in his leading a Philosophical and pious course of life; taking the vacancy of the Government as a fit oportunity for this their Licentiousness. For Festus being at that time dead in Judea, that Province was without a President and Procuratour. Now the manner of this James's death, the words of Clemens before quoted by us have manifested; he having declared, that he was cast headlong from the battlement of the Temple, and beaten to death with a club. But moreover, [a] Hegesippus, being one of those who were of the first succession after the Apostles, does in the fifth Book of his Commentaries most accurately relate these things concerning this James, speaking after this manner: "James, the brother of our Lord, undertook, together with the Apostles, the Government of the Church; That James who was surnamed the Just by all even from the times of our Lord untill ours. For many were called by the name of James; but this man was holy from his mothers womb. He drank neither wine, nor strong drink; nor eat any creature wherein there was life. There never came Rasour upon his head; he anointed not himself with oyl, neither did he use a Bath. To [b] Him onely it was lawfull to enter into the Holiest of Holie's: He wore no woollen, but linnen garments; and went into the Temple alone, where he was found upon his knees, making supplication for the forgiveness of the people: in so much that his knees were become hard and brawny, like those of a Camel, by reason of his continual kneeling to worship God, and to make supplication for the remission of the people. Wherefore, upon account of his most eminent righteousness he was called Justus and [c] Oblias, which signifies in English, the defence and righteousness of the people, as the Prophets declare concerning him. Therefore certain men of the [d] seven Heresies among that people of the Jews, which we have before written of in our Commentaries, asked him, which is the [e] gate of Jesus? And he said, that That Jesus was the Saviour. Some of them believed that Jesus was the Christ: but the forementioned Sects believed neither the [f] Resurrection, nor that he was to come to reward every man according to his works. But as many as believed, believed by the means of James. Therefore, many of the chief men believing, there was a commotion among the Jews, and Scribes and Pharisees, who said that all the people were in danger to think Jesus to be the Christ. Coming altogether therefore unto James they said unto him, we beseech thee restrain the people, for they are in an errour concerning Jesus, supposing him to be the Christ; we entreat thee, perswade all those that come together at the day of the pasover, that they may think aright concerning Jesus: For we all put our confidence in thee; and we and all the people bear thee witness that thou art just, and respectest not the person of any man: perswade the multitude therefore that they be not deceived about Jesus: for we and all the people put our confidence in thee: stand therefore upon the battlement of the temple, that from on high

[a] The first succession of the Apostles is extended to the times of M. Aurelius Antoninus. For in his Reign Polycarp the disciple of John the Apostle was crowned with Martyrdom. Hegesippus therefore is rightly said to have lived in the first succession of the Apostles, in that he flourished in the Reign of the sons of Antoninus Pius. And coming to Rome when Anicetus was Bishop, he stayed there to Eleutherus's time. In the Alexandrian Chronicle (which I would more willingly call the Antiochian) Hegesippus is said to have died in the Reign of Commodus. He was therefore cotemporary with Ireneus: who also was next to the first succession of the Apostles, as Eusebius testifies, Book 5. chap. 20. Vales.

[b] Scaliger, in his Animadvers. Eusebian. p. 178. has examined this whole passage of Hegesippus's, and finds fault with many things in it; which are well worth reading. See also Dionysius Petavius in Not. ad Heresim 78. Epiphanii, & P. Halloixius, in his Notes on the Life of Hegesippus, chap. 3. Vales.

[c] The learned Nich. Fuller, Book 3. chap. 1. of his Miscellan, has thus corrected this place. ἐκαλεῖτο τὸ σαδδὶκ καὶ Ὠζλεὰμ, ὅ ἐστιν, δίκαιος, καὶ φρούρημα τοῦ λαοῦ; i. e. He was called Saddick, and Ozleam, which signifies in English, a just man, and the defence of the people. For צַדִּיק in Hebrew signifies, a just man. And Ozleam is made up of these two Hebrew words עֹז לְעָם; which signifie, the strength, or, defence of the people; the Letter ל being the sign of the Genitive or Dative case with the Hebrews. The original of this appellation is taken from Psalm 28. 9. where we meet with these words in the original, יְהוָה עֹז לְעַמּוֹ יִתֵּן The Lord shall give strength to his people. Fullers Miscell. B. 3. chap. 1.

[d] This place of Hegesippus, wherein, he says, he wrote concerning the seven Heresies, we shall meet with in the 4B. of Eusebius Eccles. Hist. where we will speak more concerning them. Vales.

[e] By Gate here, is meant nothing else, but the way of Entrance to Christ; which is, by Faith in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Agreeable hereto its said Psal. 118. 20. This is the gate of the Lord, the righteous shall enter into it. Vales.

[f] The Pharisees, who were one branch of these Sects, believed the Resurrection from the dead. Vales.

NERO. "high thou mayeſt be conſpicuous, and thy words "readily heard by all the people; for upon ac- "count of the paſsover, all the tribes, together "with the [g] Nations are come "together. Therefore the "foreſaid Scribes and Phari- "ſees placed James upon the "battlement of the Temple, "and cried out to him, and "ſaid, O Juſtus! whom "we all ought to put our "confidence in; because the "people are miſlead after "Jeſus who was crucified, "declare to us, which is the "gate of Chriſt who was "crucified: and he anſwe- "red with a loud voice, "Why do ye queſtion me "about Jeſus the Son of "man? He even ſits in "heaven at the right hand "of great power, and will "come in the clouds of hea- "ven. Now when many were "fully ſatisfied and confirm- "ed and glorified God for "this Teſtimony of James, "and cryed, ſaying, [h] Hoſan- "na to the [i] Son of David, "then the ſame Scribes and "Phariſees ſaid again to one "another, we have done ill "in exhibiting ſuch a Teſti- "mony to Jeſus; but let us "go up and caſt him down, "that ſo the people being "terrified may not give cre- "dit to him. And they cried "out, ſaying, O, O, even "Juſtus himſelf is alſo ſe- "duced. And they fulfilled "that which was written in "Eſaiah. [k] We will deſtroy the righteous, for he is trouble- ſome to us; wherefore they ſhall eat the fruit of their doings. "They went "up therefore and caſt down "Juſtus, and ſaid amongſt "themſelves, Let us ſtone "James the Juſt; and they "began to ſtone him, for he "was not fully dead after his fall, but turning he "kneeled, ſaying, I intreat thee, O Lord God the "Father, forgive them, for they know not what "they doe. As they were thus ſtoning of him, "one of the Prieſts of the ſons of Rechab the ſon "of [l] Rechabim, teſtifyed of "by Jeremy the Prophet, "cried out, ſaying, [m] ceaſe, "what doe ye? Juſtus prays "for us. And one of them, "being one of the Fullers, "took a leaver, with which "he uſed to ſqueeze gar- "ments, and ſmote Juſtus "on the head; and ſo he "was martyred. [n] And they "buried him in that place, and [o] his Grave-ſtone "as yet remains neer the Temple. This man was "a true and ſubſtantial witneſs both to Jews and "Gentiles, that Jeſus was the "Chriſt: and ſoon after Ve- "ſpaſian beſet Judea round "about, and took the Jews "captive. Theſe things Hege- ſippus having related fully and largely, does therein a- gree with Clemens. But James was a perſon ſo admi- rable, and ſo much cried up amongſt all men for his righ- teouſneſs, that the moſt ſober men of the Jews were of o- pinion that this was the cauſe of the ſiege of Jeruſalem, which immediately followed upon his Martyrdome: and that this ſiege befell them up- on no other account than that audacious villany committed againſt this James; Joſephus therefore was not afraid to teſtifie this in writing, decla- ring himſelf in theſe words: "Theſe things befell the Jews "in the way of revenge for "James the Juſt, who was the "brother of Jeſus called Chriſt; becauſe the Jews "had murthered him, being a moſt righteous per- "ſon. And the ſame Authour in the twentieth Book of his Antiquities, relates his death in theſe words: "Cæſar, being certified of Feſtus his "death, ſent Albinus-Procuratour into Judea: "But Ananus the younger, who as we ſaid before "had gotten the High-prieſthood, was a man as "to his diſpoſition raſh and exceſſively bold: he "embraced the Sect of the Sadduces, who in mat- "ters of judgment are cruell above all the Jews, as "we before manifeſted. Ananus therefore, being "ſuch an one as we have deſcribed him to be, "ſuppoſing he had a fit opportunity, in that Fe- "ſtus was dead, and Albinus yet upon his jour- "ney, called an Aſſembly of the Judges; into "which he cauſed the brother of Jeſus called "Chriſt (whoſe name was James) with certain "others to be brought, whom he accuſed as vio- "latours of the Law, and ſo delivered them up "to be [p] ſtoned. But as many as ſeemed to be "the mildeſt and moſt modeſt in the City, and [g] Petavius does here deſervedly reprove Scaliger, who had denied, that it was lawfull for any Gentile to be preſent at the Feſtivals of the Jews. For beſides that place which Petavius quotes; John 12. 20. we are ſupplied with many teſtimonies out of Joſephus, to evidence this matter. Vitellius the Preſident of Syria went up to Jeruſalem at the feaſt of the Paſsover, and was honourably entertained by the Jews: as we may read chap. 6. B. 18. of Joſephus's Antiq. He writes the ſame concerning Quadratus the Preſident of Syria, B. 20. of his Antiq. Valeſ.

[h] This word Hoſanna, is a corruption of the Hebrew word, הוֹשִׁיעֵנִי (which ſignifies, preſerve me, or, make me ſafe.) being the Imperative mood Hiph. with the Affixe נִי; derived from the Theme יָשַׁע. See the original Text of Jer. 17. 14. And alſo, ſee Biſhop Pearſon on the Creed, in his marginal notes, pag. 70. Edit. Lond. 1659.

[i] Theſe words, which Hegeſippus ſays the Jews then uttered, ought to be underſtood of Chriſt, rather than of James. For when James was ſet upon the battlement of the Temple, and had declared Jeſus to be the Chriſt and Redeemer of mankind, thoſe that embraced the Faith of Chriſt began to cry out, Hoſanna, to the Son of David, that is, to Jeſus Chriſt. Valeſ.

[k] So the 72 Tranſlate Eſai. 3. v. 10. Their words are theſe, δίκαιον τὸν δίκαιον, ὅτι δύσχρηστος ἡμῖν ὅδε· τοίνυν τὰ ἐπιτηδεύματα αὐτῶν φάγονται. But the Hebrew copy differs much from this Tranſlation, אִמְרוּ צַדִּיק כִּי טוֹב כִּי פְרִי מַעַלְלֵיהֶם יֹאכֵלוּ. Which our Tranſlation following, renders thus in Engliſh, Say ye to the righteous, that it ſhall be well with him; for they ſhall eat the fruit of their doings. Compare the Sept. Tranſlat. of Iſai. 3. 10. with the Hebrew Text of that place.

[l] As if he had ſaid, one of the Prieſts, the ſon of Rechab, of the family of the Rechabites; which laſt words [υἱὸς ῥαχαβείμ] are therefore added, that Rechab, the father of this Prieſt, might be diſtinguiſhed from other Rechabs. For many were called by the ſame name of Rechab: but this man, of whom Hegeſippus ſpeaks, was of the ſtock of the Rechabites, ſpoken of by the Prophet Jeremy, chap. 35. Valeſ.

[m] Epiphanius, in Hæreſi 78, writes, that theſe words were not ſpoken by the Rechabite Prieſt, but by Simeon the ſon of Cleopas. Valeſ.

[n] Ἔθαψαν αὐτὸν ἐν τῷ τόπῳ; ſo the Kings M. S. reads it; which Stephens followed in his Edit. But our other three M. SS. Maz. Med. and Fuk. have it thus καὶ ἔθαψαν αὐτὸν ἐπὶ τῷ τόπῳ πλησίον τοῦ ναοῦ; that is, and they buried him in that place, near the Temple; which reading Nicephorus and Rufinus doe confirm. Valeſ.

[o] How can it be that the Grave-ſtone, or Monument of this James ſhould remain after the deſtruction of the City by the Romans? Neither is that very likely, which Hegeſippus ſays, to wit, that James was buried neer the Temple. For the Jews uſed to bury their dead without the City; as appears from the Goſpel, and from the Sepulchre of Helena, which before we ſpoke of, at chap. 12 of this Book. Rufinus therefore leaves out this whole clauſe, in his Verſion. In the moſt antient Maz. M. S. I found (at the Grave-ſtone) this note written in the margin: Ἰστέον ὅτι ἡ σήλη αὕτη λίθου ἦν ἀμορφου, ὀπηχαρὸν ἔχων τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ τεθαμμένου Ἰακώβου; ἐξ οὗ καὶ ἕως νῦν οἱ χριστιανοὶ ἐν τοῖς μνήμασιν αὐτῶν λίθους ἱστᾶσιν, ἢ ἃ γράμματα ἐν αὐτοῖς χράφουσιν, ἢ τὸ σημεῖον τοῦ σταυροῦ ἐγχαράσσουσι; That is, you muſt know that this Monument was nothing elſe but a ſtone not formed into any ſhape, upon which the name of James there buried was cut: from whence even to this time the Chriſtians ſet up ſtones on their Sepulchres, and either write Letters thereon, or engrave the ſign of the Croſs. Valeſ.

[p] What can be more different, yea contrary, than this relation of Joſephus, and that of Hegeſippus, about James's Martyrdome? For Joſephus ſays, he was condemned in a publick council of the Jews; and Hegeſippus, that he was murthered in a ſedition and tumult of the people: Hegeſippus relates, that he was killed with a Fullers club, in the midſt of the City: but Joſephus declares that he was ſtoned; which was always done without the gates of the City. Farther, Joſephus ſhews us the year, wherein James died, by theſe two remarques, to wit, that it was when Ananus was High-prieſt, and when Albinus came firſt into Judea. Euſebius, in his Chronicon, writes that Albinus ſucceeded Feſtus in the ſixth year of Nero's Empire; and yet the ſame Authour places the Martyrdome of James on the year following, which manifeſtly contradicts what Joſephus has related: for he expreſly ſays that James was murthered before Albinus came into that Province. Euſebius therefore ought to have included the beginning of Albinus his Procuratourſhip, and James his Martyrdom in the ſame year. But Baronius denies all this, and proves, that the Martyrdom of James happened on the ſeventh year of Nero; which aſſertion he confirms both from the conſent of all the Antients, and alſo from Joſephus his Hiſtory of the Jewiſh wars B. 2. chap. 12. But I judge that the conſent of Jerome, Nicephorus, and others, who wrote from, and followed Euſebius's Chronicon (Euſebius's opinion not being diſcus'd) is not much to be eſteemed of: Now the place in Joſephus proves nothing elſe, than that Albinus was Procuratour of Judea in the fourth year before the Jewiſh war began, and in the ſeventh before the City was taken. But from that place in Joſephus it cannot be concluded that Albinus began his Procuratourſhip in the ſeventh year before the taking of Jeruſalem. Yea, it ſeems truer in my judgment, that Albinus came came into Judea in the fourth year of Nero. For Porcius Festus Governed Judea two years, as appears by his Acts, of which Josephus relates but few. To him succeeded Albinus in the fourth year of Nero, and continued there to the tenth of that Emperour, as Eusebius has out of Josephus rightly observed. Therefore James was Martyred in the fourth year of Nero. Epiphanius confirms this our conjecture (in Heres. 78.) where he says James presided over the Church at Jerusalem about twenty four years, from the Lords Ascension. Vales.

NERO.

"who were the strictest observers of the Law, "were very much offended hereat; and sending "privately to the King, they intreated him to "write to [q] Ananus, to warn him that he should "not any more attempt any such thing. For that "he had not done this first fact regularly and le-"gally. And some of them also went to meet Al-"binus journeying from Alexandria, and in-"formed him, that it was not lawfull for Ananus "without his consent to assemble the Sanhedrim. "Albinus being induced to believe what they said, "wrote in great anger to Ananus, threatning "that he would punish him. And King Agrippa "for this very thing took the High-priesthood "from him, which he had held three months, and "constituted Jesus the son of [r] Dammæus High-"priest. Thus much concerning James, whose the first of those called the general Epistles is reported to be. But you must know it is [s] suspected to be spurious. Therefore not many of the Antients have made mention of it, like as neither of that called Jude, being also one of the seven, termed the general Epistles: Yet notwithstanding we know, that these with the rest have been publickly read in most Churches.

[q] Nicephorus (in his second B. chap. 4.) thinks this Ananus to be the same with that Ananias, who commanded Paul to be smitten; of whom Luke speaks Acts 23. 2. But herein he is much out. For Ananias the son of Nebedæus (of whom Luke there speaks) was High-priest in Claudius's Empire, from his seventh year to the beginning of Nero's reign; a man that was the most potent of all the Jews in his age, as Josephus testifies in his twentieth book of Antiq. But moreover, that catalogue of High-priests, which is there put down by Nicephorus, is to be made up out of Josephus's Books: And after Joseph the son of Cama, Ananias the son of Nebedæus is to be placed, of whom Josephus speaks in the 3 chap. of his twentieth book. After him was Ishmael the son Phabæus, made High-priest by Agrippa juniour. After whom succeeded Joseph, surnamed Cabus, the son of Simon; and then Ananus, the son of Ananus, who is here spoken of. Vales.

[r] In Josephus and Nicephorus it is Damnæus. Vales.

[s] Rufinus and Christophorson translated this place so, as if this were the opinion of some; which sense we have followed in our version. But, having now considered the matter better, we think otherwise, to wit, that Eusebius did absolutely pronounce this Epistle to be Spurious. Ferom (de Jacobo) says thus, Unam scripsit Epistolam, quæ & ipsa ab alio quodam sub nomine ejus edita asseritur, licèt paulatim tempore procedente, obtinuerit autoritatem: that is, He wrote one Epistle, which is affirmed to have been set forth by another, under his name; though by degrees in processi of time it hath obtained autority. Vales.

CHAP. XXIV.

How, after Mark, Annianus was constituted the first Bishop of the Church of the Alexandrians.

But Nero being in the eighth year of his reign, Annianus, the first after Mark the [a] Apostle and Evangelist, succeeded in the publick charge of the Church at Alexandria; [b] being a man beloved of God, and in all respects admirable.

[a] In the Kings M. S. it is written, μαρκον τὸν ἀπόστολον καὶ εὐαγγελιστὴν, that is, Mark the Apostle and Evangelist; but in the rest of the M.SS. Maz. Med. Fuk and Savil. these words [ἀπόστολον καὶ i.e. Apostle and] are wanting: which neither are in Rufinus's translation. I know indeed, that Mark may deservedly be called an Apostle; in that he was the first that Preacht the faith of Christ to the Alexandrians. Athanasius (in Synopsi) indeed calls Mark and Luke Apostles. Idatius also (in Fastis) stiles Luke and Timothy Apostles. See what we noted above at the last chap. of the first Book. But we doe not here enquire what title Mark deserved, but onely what Eusebius wrote. Vales.

[b] This whole clause is wanting in our three M.SS. copies, Maz. Med. and Fuk. and in the translation of Rufinus. But because it was in the Kings M. S. we have put it in. We have also written the name of Annianus with a double n; from the authority of the Maz. and Med. M. SS. To which agree Rufinus, Ferom, and others. For Annianus is a Roman name, and is derived from Annius. Vales.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the persecution in the time of Nero, in which Paul and Peter were for Religion graced with Martyrdome at Rome.

THe Empire being now confirmed to Nero, he, giving his mind to the commission of nefarious facts, armed himself against the very worship of the supream God. Indeed, how wicked a person he was, our present leisure will not permit us to describe: But, in as much as many have related in most accurate Treatises those things that were done by him, he that is desirous, may from thence see the cruelty and insolent rage of the man. Whereby having without all consideration destroyed an infinite number of men, he arrived to such an height of murdering cruelty, that he forbore not his most familiar and most beloved friends; but slew his mother and his wife, with innumerable others that were related to him, as if they had been enemies and adversaries, by sundry kinds of death. This indeed also ought together with the rest to have been ascribed to him as one of his titles, That he was the first of the Emperours that demonstrated himself to be an Adversary to the worship due to God. Thus much again Tertullian the Roman does record, saying, after this manner: "[a] Consult your Re-"cords. There you will find "that Nero was the first, "who with the Imperial "sword raged against this "Sect then greatly flouris-"ing at Rome. But we even "boast of such a beginner "of our persecution. For he "that knows him, may un-"derstand that nothing but "some great Good was con-"demned by Nero. Thus therefore this man, being proclaimed the first and chiefest enemie of God, set upon slaughtering the Apostles. Wherefore they relate that in his time Paul was beheaded at Rome, and also Peter crucified. And the name of Peter and Paul unto this present time remaining upon the Burial-places there doth confirm the story. In like manner, even an [b] Ecclesiastical man, by name Caius, who flourisht in the time of Zephyrinus Bishop of Rome, and wrote against Proclus a great defender of the opinion of the Cataphrygians, says these very words concerning the places where the sacred bodies of the aforesaid Apostles were depositted: "I am "able to shew the Tro-"phies of the Apostles: For "if you would go to the "[c] Vatican, or to the way "Ostia, you will find the "Trophies of those who "founded this Church. And

[a] He that translated Tertullian's Apologie into Greek, (were it Eusebius, which I think not to be true, or whoever it was;) he understood not Tertullian's words. Neither is this true of this place onely, but of many others also of Tertullian, which are produced in Greek by Eusebius in this work. Vales. Tertullian's words are these: Consulite commentarios vestros; illic reperietis primum Neronem in hanc Sectam, tùm maximè Romæ orientem Cæsariano gladio ferociisse. Sed tali dedicatore damnationis nostræ etiam gloriamur. Qui enim scit illum, intelligere potest, non nisi grande aliquod bonum à Nerone damnatum. Tertul. Apolog. p. 6. Edit. Rigal.

[b] The term [Ecclesiastical] is used in three senses. Sometimes its taken for a Christian, and opposed to an Heathen, or Gentile: So Ferome in his preface to his Book, De Scriptor. Ecclesias. Sometimes it denotes a Catholick, and is oppoſed to an Heretick; So Ferome also in his preface to St Matthew, and on Chap. 13. Ezechiel. So Origen also, Tome 16. Explanat. on St John's Gospel. Lastly, sometimes it signifies a Clergy-man, and is opposed to a Laick, or Secular person. So Ferome again, in his Epistle to Pammachius, and in his 46 Epist. to Rusticus. I would rather take this word in the second sense here; both because that signification of this word is more frequent, and also in regard Eusebius, speaking here of Caius's Book against Proclus, gives each of them his proper Epithet; he stiles Caius [an Ecclesiastical man] and Proclus he calls [the defender of the opinion of the Cataphrygians,] i. e. an Heretick. The Sect of the Cataphrygians was divided into two parts; the Ringleader of the one party was Proclus; of the other Æschynes. So Tertullian, in his Book De præscript. Hæret. Vales.

[c] Peter was buried in the Vatican; Paul in the Via Ostia. Vales.

NERO. that they both suffered Martyrdome at the same time, Dionysius Bishop of Corinth, writing to the Romans, doth thus affirm: "So also you, [d] by "this your so great an admonition, have joyned "together the plantation both of the Romans, and "also of the Corinthians, made by Peter and "Paul. For both of them coming also to our "City of Corinth, and having planted us, did in "like manner instruct us. Likewise they went "both together into Italy, and, having taught "there, suffered Martyrdome at [e] the same time. And thus much I have related, that the History hereof might be yet farther confirmed.

[a] Dionysius here answers the Epistle of Soter and of the Roman Clergie; who, writing to the Corinthians, had in a friendly way admonished them, as Eusebius hereafter declares, B. 4. Chap. 23. The same thing Clemens Romanus in his Epistle had before done. Dionysius therefore says to Soter; You by this your admonition have again united the Plantation of the Roman and Corinthian Churches heretofore made by Peter and Paul. This I have the more largely explained, because the translatours, and especially Christophorson, have been much mistaken in the Version of this place. Vales.

[c] Dionysius does not expressly say that Peter and Paul suffered on the same day, but onely at the same time; which may be so understood, as that there might be an interval of many days between their sufferings. Prudentius [περὶ στεφάνων] says they were both Martyred on the same day, but not in the same year: and that there was a years space between their deaths. With Prudentius agrees Augustine, in his 28 Sermon, De Sanctis; And Arator. Lib. 2. Hist. Apost. But Simeon Metaphrastes takes these words of Dionysius so, as if he said that Peter and Paul were Martyred on the same day together. His words are to be found in Comment. de peregrinat. Pauli ac Petri, apud Surium, Tome 3. Vales.

CHAP. XXVI.

How the Jews were vexed with innumerable mischiefs, and how at last they entred upon a war against the Romans.

[a] At these words I began the chapter,

[a] MOreover Josephus, discoursing at large about the calamities that happened to the whole Jewish nation, makes it manifest in expres words, amongst many other things, that a great number of the most eminent personages amongst the Jews, having been cruelly beaten with scourges, were crucified even in Jerusalem by the command of Florus. For it happened that he was Procuratour of Judea, when the war at first broke out, in the twelfth year of Nero's Reign. Afterwards, he says, that "after "the revolt of the Jews there followed great and "grievous disturbances throughout all Syria, those "of the Jewish nation being by the inhabitants of "every City every where destroyed as enemies, "without all commiseration: In so much that a man "might see the [b] Cities filled with dead bodies that "lay unburied; and the aged together with the in-"fants cast forth dead, and women not having so "much as any covering upon those parts which na-"ture commands to be concealed: and the whole "[c] Province was full of unspeakable calamities: "But the dread of what was threatned was greater "and more grievous than the mischiefs every where "perpetrated. Thus much Josephus relates word for word. And such was the posture of the Jews affairs at that time. NERO.

following the authoritie of the Kings M. S. But in the Maz. M. S. we found another reading, and a different distinction. For that begins the chapter from these words (which are the conclusion of the foregoing chapter) [And thus much I have related, &c.] and it points the whole place thus, [And thus much I have related that the History hereof might be yet farther confirmed. Moreover, Josephus, discoursing, &c.] and puts the full point after these words [makes it manifest in expres words.] The same reading is observed by the Med. and Fuk. M. SS. But the reading and punctation in the Kings M. S. seems to me to be much better; which both Nicephorus and Rufinus followed. I had almost forgot to put you in mind, that these words [τὸ ὑστάτιον] in the title of this chapter, ought to be taken adverbially; for so Rufinus translates it; Ut innumeris Judæi malis afflicti sint, ac novissimè contra Romanos arma moverint. Vales.

[b] These are the words of Josephus in his second Book of the Jews wars, pag: 814. Edit. Genev.

[c] In the original 'tis here τῶν ἐπαρχιῶν; in Josephus and Nicephorus 'tis written τῶν ἐπαρχιῶν. By the Province we must in this place understand Judea, which after the death of Agrippa the Elder was reduced into the form of a Province, and governed by Procuratours sent from the Emperour. Vales.

CHAP. I.

In what parts of the world the Apostles Preached Christ.

NOW the affairs of the Jews being in this posture: the holy Apostles and disciples of our Saviour, being dispersed over the whole world Preached the Gospel. And Thomas, as Tradition hath it, had Parthia allotted to him; Andreas had Scythia; John Asia, where after he had spent much time, he died at Ephesus: Peter, 'tis probable, Preached to the * Jews [a] scattered throughout Pontus and Galatia, and Bithynia, * 1 Pet. 1. 1.

[a] The Jews were dispersed at several times, and for several causes. First, when they were carried Captive into Babylon and into Egypt and Syria; and also when they were subdued by Pompey. Then, in the times of the Macchabees, they did of their own accord remove out of Judea into Egypt. For the Law forbad not the Jews to remove into other Countreys, as it is manifest from the Book of Ruth. Thirdly, they dispersed themselves upon account of gaining Profelytes, which they admitted of all Nations, whence it came to pass that they were scattered over the whole world. Vales. Those Jews that were dispersed in Europe had their chief Assembly at Alexandria; and there the Septuagints translation of the Bible was in use; and thence they were called (John 7. 35.) διασπορὰ Ἑλλήνων, the dispersion of the Hellenists: And of these there were many also in Jerusalem, which used the same translation of the Seventy Seventy two, being thus skilled in the Greek tongue; and these living not in Greece are yet called (Acts 6. 1.) Ἑλληνισταί, because they used the Greek language and the 72 translation, whereas the other are called there (See Acts 6. 1.) Ἑβραῖοι, Hebrews, who used the Jerusalem Paraphrase. The Asian dispersion is mentioned 1 Pet. 1. 1. they had Babylon for their Metropolis, and used the Targum, or Caldee Paraphrase of Onkelos in their Synagogues.

NERO. Cappadocia and Asia. Who, at last coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downwards; for so he desired to suffer. It is needless to say any thing of Paul; who having fully Preached the Gospel of Christ from Jerusalem unto Illyricum, at last suffered Martyrdome at Rome in the time of Nero. Thus much [b] Origen declares word for word in the Third Tome of his Expositions on Genesis.

[b] It is very doubtfull where these words of Origens, whom Eusebius here quotes, doe begin; whether it be at those words, And Thomas, &c. or rather at those, Peter 'tis probable, &c. For Eusebius has not shown us where they begin. Vales.

CHAP. II.

Who First Presided over the Roman Church.

After the Martyrdome of Paul and Peter, Linus was the First that was elected to the Bishoprick of the Roman Church. Paul, writing from Rome to Timothy, makes mention of him in the salutation at the end of the Epistle; saying, * Eubulus greeteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia.

* 2 Tim. 4. 21.

CHAP. III.

Concerning the Epistles of the Apostles.

Indeed, one Epistle of Peter's, called his First, hath by general consent been received as genuine; For that the worthy Antients in former ages quoted in their writings, as being unquestionable and undoubted. But as for that called his [a] Second Epistle, we have been informed by the tradition of our Predecessours that it was not acknowledged as part of the New Testament. Yet, because to many it seemed usefull, 'twas diligently read together with the other Scriptures. But the Book called his Acts, and the Gospel that goes under his Name, and that Book termed his Preaching, and that stiled his Revelation, we know these have in no wise been accounted genuine writings: because no Ecclesiastical Writer either antient or modern hath quoted any authorities or proofs taken out of them. But in the procedure of our History we will make it our chief business to shew, together with the successions, what Ecclesiastical writers in every Age have used the authority of such writings as are questioned as spurious: likewise what they say of those Scriptures that are Canonical and by general consent acknowledged as genuine, and also what concerning those that are not such. And thus many are the writings ascribed to Peter, of which I have known onely one Epistle accounted to be genuine, and universally acknowledged as such by the Antients. But of Pauls there are fourteen Epistles manifestly known, and undoubted. Yet it is not fit we should be ignorant, that some have rejected that to the Hebrews, saying, it is by the Roman Church denied to be Pauls. Now what the Antients have said concerning this Epistle, I will in due place propose. But as for those Acts that are called his, we have been informed from our Predecessours, that they are not accounted as unquestionable and undoubted. And whereas the same Apostle, in his Salutations at the end of his Epistle to the Romans, makes mention among others, of one Hermas, who, they say, is Authour of that Book entitled Pastor; you must know that that Treatise also has been questioned by some; upon whose account it must not be placed amongst those which by general consent are acknowledged as genuine: But by others it has been judged a most usefull Book, especially for such as are to be instructed in the first rudiments of Religion. Whereupon we know it is at this time publickly read in Churches; and I do find that some of the most Antient writers doe quote it. Let thus much be spoken in order to a representation of the Holy Scriptures, to discriminate those Books, whose authority is in no wise contradicted, from those that by general consent are not acknowledged as genuine.

NERO.

[a] That this 2d Epistle of S. Peter was not at first received in the Church of Christ with so universal agreement and consent as the former, may be concluded from this passage in Eusebius. But notwithstanding, there are great and sure evidences of this Epistles being written by the acknowledged Authour of it, as (1.) the Title of Simon Peter with the Addition of An Apostle of Jesus Christ (Chap. 1. v. 1.) (2.) There is a whole passage in this Epistle (Chap. 1. v. 16, 17.) which doth signally belong to Peter, that of having been on the holy mount with Christ, and hearing those words, This is my beloved Son, &c. which certainly belongs to the transfiguration, Matth. 17. where onely Peter and James and John were present with Christ. (3.) This is said to be a 2d Epistle (Chap. 3. v. 1.) written much to the same purpose with the former. (4.) St Jude speaking (v. 18.) Of the scoffers that should come, &c. cites that Prediction from the Apostles of our Lord Jesus (v. 17.) where it is reasonable to believe that this Epistle (Chap 3. v. 3.) is referred too; for in it those very words are met with (and are not so in any other Apostolick writing) Knowing this first, &c. Compare Jude the 17. & 18. v. with 2 Epist. Pet. 3. chap. v. 3. All this in all Copies stands unmoved to secure the authority of this Epistle, and to convince us of the author of it. See Dr Hammonds preface to the 2d Epist. Pet.

CHAP. IV.

Of the first Succession of the Apostles.

That Paul therefore, Preaching to the Gentiles, laid the foundations of those Churches from Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum, is manifest both from his own * words, and also from what Luke has related in the † Acts. Likewise in what Provinces Peter, Preaching the Gospel of Christ to those of the Circumcision, delivered the doctrine of the New Covenant, is sufficiently apparent from his own ‡ words out of that Epistle of his, which, we have said, is universally acknowledged as genuine; which he wrote to the Jews that were dispersed throughout Pontus and Galatia, Cappadocia, and Asia, and Bithynia. Now how many and what sincere followers of them have been approved as sufficient to take the charge of those Churches by them founded, it is not easie to say; except such and so many as may be collected from the words of Paul. For he had very many fellow labourers, and, as he termed them fellow souldiers; many of which were by him vouchsafed an indeleble remembrance, he having in his own Epistles ascribed to them an everlasting commendation. But Luke, enumerating, in the Acts, the disciples of Paul, makes mention of them by name. Moreover, Timothy is reported to have been the first that was chosen to the Bishoprick of the Ephesian Church: as also Titus, of the Churches in Creet. Luke, by original extract an Antiochian, by profession a Physitian, for the most part accompanied Paul; and being diligently conversant with the rest of the Apostles, has left us, in two Books written by divine inspiration, Lessons that are medicinable for our souls, which he procured of them.

The one is the Gospel, which he * professes he wrote even as they delivered it unto him, who from the beginning were eye witnesses and Ministers of the Word, in all which things, he says, he had perfect understanding from the very first. The other is the Acts of the Apostles, which Treatise he composed now not of such passages as he had received by report, but of what he had seen with his own eyes. They say also that Paul was wont to mean the Gospel according to Luke, when, speaking, as it were of his own Gospel, he says, † According to my Gospel. Of the rest of the followers of Paul, Crescens is by the Apostle himself declared to be one; who was sent by him into [a] Gallia. Linus also; whom in his second Epistle to Timothy he mentions to be at Rome with him, who was before manifested to have been the first that was chosen to the Bishoprick of Rome, after Peter. Clemens also, who was likewise constituted the third Bishop of Rome, is attested by Paul himself to have been his fellow labourer, and companion in sufferings. Furthermore, that Areopagite (by name Dionysius, whom Luke in the Acts records to have been the first that believed after the Sermon made by Paul to the Athenians in [b] Areopagus) another Dionysius, one of the Antients, a Pastour of the Corinthian Church relates to have been the first Bishop of the Athenian Church. But as we goe on with this work of ours, we will in due place declare the successions of the Apostles in their several times. Now we will proceed to that part of our History which follows in order.

[a] These words of St Paul occur 2 Tim. 4. 10. where we now read, Crescens to Galatia. But the Antients, among whom Eusebius seem to have read Gallia: so Epiphanius in Hæres. Alogor. and Hieronymus in Catalog. and Sophronius and others. But the other reading is the truest, which Clemens confirms in his Constitut. Apost. Theodoret reads Galatia, but says that thereby is meant Gallia. Vales.

[b] Areopagus was the Senate or standing Court of Judicature in Athens, by whose Laws and orders any new gods were received among them; and therefore as soon as they perceived that Paul was a promulger of strange Deities, they bring him to the Areopagus to have him examined what Gods they were that he thus Preached. Two Judicatures they had at Athens; one every year changed, made up of 500. chosen men, of whom the Republick consisted; the other perpetual, which judged of Murthers and the like capital Offences; and this was in Areopago; of which and the customs thereof, See Budæus on the Pandects. Why it was called Areopagus, see St Aug. de civit Dei L. 18. c. 18. The Judges which sat in this Court were called Areopagitæ, who were looked upon with such reverence, that an Areopagite signified proverbially an excellent Person. Gell. L. 12. c. 7. Dionysius was one of these Areopagites.

CHAP. V.

Of the last Siege of the Jews after Christs death.

VESPASIAN. AFter Nero, who held the Government thirteen years, Galba and Otho having reigned a year and six months; Vespasian grown famous in the wars against the Jews, was made Emperour in Judea, being proclaimed by the Army there. He therefore going immediately to Rome, committed the management of the war against the Jews to his son Titus. Moreover, after the Ascension of our Saviour, when the Jews, besides the audacious wickedness committed against him, had now contrived and executed very many cruel designs against his Apostles; (first Stephen being stoned to death by them; then after him James the son of Zebedee and brother of John beheaded, and last of all that James who was first chosen into the Episcopal seat there, after our Saviours Ascension, Murthered according to the fore mentioned manner;) when the rest of the Apostles, were by innumerable wiles laid wait for to be put to death; and being driven out of Judea, were gone to Preach the doctrine of the Gospel to all nations, assisted by the power of Christ who had said unto them; * Goe and teach all Nations in my Name: And furthermore, when the whole congregation of the Church in Jerusalem, according to an Oracle given by revelation to the approved persons amongst them before the war, were commanded to depart out of the City, and inhabit a certain City (they call it [a] Pella) beyond Jordan; into which when those that believed in Christ had removed from Jerusalem; and when the holy men had as it were totally relinquished the Princely Metropolis of the Jews, and the whole Country of Judea: then at length divine vengeance seized them who had dealt so unjustly with Christ and his Apostles, and utterly destroyed that wicked and abominable generation from among men. But, how great calamities then befell the whole nation in every place, and how they especially who were inhabitants of Judea were driven to the extremity of misery; and how many * Myriads of men, together with women and children, were destroyed by Sword and Famine, and by infinite other kinds of death; and how many and what Sieges there were of the Jewish Cities; and how great miseries and more than miseries they beheld who fled into Jerusalem it self, as into the best fortified Metropolis; and also the manner and order of the whole war, and every particular action therein; and how at length the abomination of desolation predicted by the Prophets was set up in the very Temple of God, heretofore famous, but now about to suffer all manner of pollution, and to undergoe its last destruction by fire: He that is desirous to know it, may accurately read all this in the History written by Josephus. But, how the same Writer relates, that a multitude of about thirty hundred thousand persons assembled together from all parts of Judea at the time of the passeover feast, were shut up in Jerusalem (as it were, says he, in a prison) I think it requisite to shew in those his own words. [b] For it was fit, that at that very time (wherein they had killed the Saviour and Benefactour of all, Christ the Son of God,) that in the same days, I say, they should be shut up as it were in a Prison, to receive that destruction from divine vengeance which awaited them. But I will omit the particular relation of those miseries which befell them, and their great sufferings by the Sword and otherwaies, and doe think it necessary to propose onely the Calamities of the Famine; that so they who shall read this our work may from that part of their sufferings understand, that the divine punishment for their enormous impieties committed against the Christ of God did not long after light upon them.

* Matth. 28. 19.

[a] So says Epiphanius (in Hæres. Nazaræorum cap. 7.) to wit, that the Christians who dwelt in Jerusalem being forewarned by Christ of the approaching Siege removed to Pella. But in his Book (de ponderibus & mensuris) he writes that the disciples of Christ being warned by an angel removed to Pella: And afterwards when Adrian rebuilt Jerusalem and called it after his own name Ælia Colonia, they returned thither. Vales.

* A Myriad is ten thousand.

[b] Immediately before these words Bp Christophorson (in his Latine translation of Eusebius) inserts a passage at length out of Josephus his Hist. of the Jewish wars, B. the 6th, both against the authority of all the M. SS. Copies, and also without any necessity. Neither Rufinus nor Nicephorus hath inserted this passage of Josephus's; and Eusebius did sufficient to intimate it, and to produce some words from it, as are those, ὥσπερ ἐν εἱρκ]ῇ, i. e. as it were in a prison; which words Eusebius does sufficiently shew to be Josephus's, in that he says, ὥσπερ ἐν εἱρκ]ῇ ῥῆμασιν ἀν]οῖς, &c. In the common Editions of Eusebius these words ῥῆμασιν ἀν]οῖς were wanting, which we have put in, warranted thereto by the old M. SS. copies, Maz. Med. and Fuk. we found those words also in the Kings M. S. which Robert Stephens made use of in his Edition of Eusebius; who too much favoured his own conjecture, by expunging those words here, and putting them in a little after, thus, ἀναγκαῖον δὲ ῥῆμασιν ἀν]οῖς ὑποσημήνασθαι, against the authority of all Copies. Vales.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

Of the famine that oppressed the Jews.

COme on therefore, Let us again take the fifth Book of Josephus his History into our hands, and rehearse the Tragedy of those things then and there done. * "Moreover (says he) for those that "were rich to stay it was equally destructive. "For they were slain for their wealth, under a pre- "tence of their revolting to the enemy. Together "also with the famine, the insolent rage of the se- "ditious increased, and both those mischiefs "daily grew more extreamly sharp and violent. "Besides, there was no food any where openly to "be seen: but they rushed violently into houses, "and made a strict Search: and when they had "found any, they beat the masters of the houses "after a most cruel manner, because they denied "they had any: but if they found none, they "tortured them, as if they had most carefully "hid it. Moreover, the bodies of the wretches "were a certain sign whether they had any food "or no: for those who were yet strong and lusty "they supposed had plenty of provision; but such "as were already lean and macerated, they medled "not with. For it seemed irrational to kill those "that were ready to die for want of sustenance. "Many also privately exchanged their estates, the "richer sort for one measure of wheat, the poorer "for one of barley: Then locking themselves up "in the inmost recesses of their houses, some of "them by reason of their excessive want of food, "eat the unground corn; others made bread of it "after such a manner as necessity and fear advised "them. Indeed there was no where any table "furnished; but they snatched the meat while it "was raw from the fire, and [a] tore it from one an- "other. The food was miserable, and the spe- "ctacle truly worthy of Lamentation; in that the "stronger sort got all, whilest the weaker bewai- "led their own condition. Famine doubtless is "superiour to all the affections of the mind; but "nothing is so utterly destroyed by it, as is a duti- "full and observant behaviour. For that which "otherwise is worthy of a reverent regard, in "this case (to wit, in the necessity of famine) "is contemned. Therefore the wives tore the "meat from their husbands, the children from "their parents; and, which was most exceedingly "lamentable, the mothers snatcht it out of the very "mouthes of their infants; yea, they spared not "to deprive them of those very drops of milk "which were their onely sustenance to keep them "alive, whilest their most beloved babes langui- "shed in their arms. And whilest they eat such "food as this, they notwithstanding could not "secure themselves from being discovered; be- "cause the Seditious were every where at hand, "preying upon them; for when they at any time "saw a house shut, that was a sign that those with- "in were eating victuals; and immediately brea- "king open the doors they rushed in, and squee- "zing the bits of meat even out of their very jaws, "they took them away. The old men, who would "not part with their food were beaten; and the "women which hid what they had in their hands "were drawn about by the hair of the head. No "compassion was shown to the hoary-head, or to "infants; but lifting up the little children on "high, hanging at their morsels of meat, they "dashed them against the pavement. Now to "those, who prevented their incursion and before- "hand devoured what they would by force have "taken away, they were more inhumane, as if such "had done them an injury. Moreover they in- "vented cruel ways of torments for the searching "out of provision; for they stopped up the pas- "sage of the privities of those miserable men with "the pulse called Orobos, and thrust sharp rods up "their fundaments; and to force any person to "confess he had but one loaf of bread, or to extort "from him a discovery of his having but one hand- "full of meal hidden, he underwent such torments "as are most horrible to be heard. Now the "tormentours themselves were not oppressed "with hunger; for it would have seemed less "cruel for them to have done all this out of ne- "cessity: but they did it to exercise their out- "ragious insolence, and to procure themselves "provision for the following days. Those also, "who by night crept out as far as the Roman "watch to gather wild herbs and grass, they met; "and when they supposed they had now escaped "the enemy, these men by force took from them "what they had gotten. And when they often "intreated, and by the most Sacred Name of God "beseeched them to communicate some part of "that to them which they had brought off with "the hazard of their lives, they imparted nothing "thereof to them; yea, they were to look upon "it to be a kindness, that they were not also killed, "as well as robbed of what they had gotten. To this, after some other words, he adds, saying, "The Jews, after they were hindred from going "out of the City, were deprived of all hope of "relief. And the famine encreasing extreamly, "consumed the people throughout every house "and family. The houses were filled with wo- "men and infants destroyed by the famine: and "the narrow streets with dead old men: The "children and young men as pale as ghosts wan- "dred up and down the market places, and fell "down whereever the distemper seized any of "them; neither were the sick able to bury their "relations: and those who were strong were "loath to undertake it, both upon account of the "vast numbers of the dead, and also because of the "uncertainty of their own condition. For very "many dropt down dead upon those whom "they were interring. Many also betook them- "selves to their Coffins or Sepulchres before "death seized them. Neither was there mour- "ning or lamentation in these calamities; but "the famine had suppressed every ones affection. "And they who struggled with the very pangs of "death, with dry eyes beheld those who went to "rest before them. A profound silence and dark- "ness loaden with death encompassed the City. "But the theeves were more pernicious than all "this: For they digged through into houses, "now turned into burial places, and robbed the "dead: and taking away the coverings from off "the Corps, went out laughing. They also tried "the [b] edges of their swords upon the dead bodies: "and some of those that lay along, and yet alive, "they ran through, to make trial of the sharpness "of their weapons: But those that beseeched them "to make use of their hand and sword upon them, "by way of scorn they let alone to be destroyed "by the famine. And every one of them that "died, leaving the Seditious yet surviving, [c] fixed

* Joseph. Hist. of the Jewish wars B. 6. chap. 26.

[a] Josephus means that those wretched people tore the meat from one another; not, that they greedily devoured it, as Christopherson took his meaning to be, he translating it avidè ore abripiebant. That is the meaning of those words ἐτέλουν δὲ διήπαζον. Vales.

[b] In Josephus it is ἀκμὰς ξιφῶν; but in the M. SS. copies of Eusebius it is ἀκμὰς, &c. which is the better reading; for the Greeks call that ἀκμὴν, which the Latines call aciem, and we in English the edge, &c. Vales.

[c] Observe here the religion of the Jews, who in what parts of the world soever they were, always prayed to God with their eyes turned towards the holy City and the Temple. We have an example of this custom in Dan. 6. 10. and 1 Kings 8. 48. and 1 Esdr. 4. 58. Hence perhaps was derived the custom of the Christians, to pray towards the East. Vales.

"their eyes ſtedfaſtly upon the Temple. At firſt "they gave command that the dead ſhould be buried at the charge of the publick Treaſury, not "being able to endure the ſtench of the dead bodies: "but afterwards being inſufficient to continue ſo "doing, they caſt them from the walls into deep "pits; which Titus having viewed round, when "he beheld them filled full with the dead, and a "thick gore iſſuing from the putrified bodies, he "ſighed, and ſtretching forth his hands, called God "to witneſs, that it was not his fact. To all this, after the interpoſition of ſome words, he adds, ſaying: "I will not be afraid to declare what "grief commands me to ſpeak; I think, had the "Romans been ſlack to deſtroy thoſe flagitious "wretches, that either they would have been ſwallowed by the earth opening under them; or that "the City would have been drowned by an inundation; or that, like Sodom, it would have been "deſtroyed by lightning. For it had brought forth "a generation of men by far more abominably "impious than thoſe, who had ſuffered ſuch things. "By reaſon therefore of the deſperate outragiouſneſs of thoſe men, the whole body of the people "was together with them deſtroyed. And in his ſixth Book he writes thus: "Of thoſe who periſhed being deſtroyed by the famine throughout the City, the multitude was innumerable; "the afflictions that befell them cannot be uttered. "For in every houſe, where there appeared but "the leaſt ſhadow of proviſion, there was fighting; and ſuch as were deareſt friends ſtrove one "with the other, ſnatching from one another "the miſerable proviſions of their life. Neither were thoſe that dyed believed to expire "for want of ſuſtenance. But the theeves ſearched thoſe that gave up the ghoſt, leaſt any one "having meat in his boſome ſhould feign himſelf "to die. The theeves themſelves, empty and "hollow for want of ſuſtenance, wandred and "hunted up and down like mad dogs, ſtriking "againſt the doors like drunken men; and by reaſon of their ſtupified condition, breaking into "the very ſame houſes twice or thrice in one hour. "Neceſſity made all things to be eaten: and what "was unfitting to be given to the moſt ſordid irrational creatures, they gathered up, and endured to "eat. Therefore at the laſt they did not forbear to "eat girdles and ſhooes: and pluck't the leather from off their Bucklers and eat it. The "ſtumps of old hay were made food by ſome; "and others gathered the very ſtalks or ſmall "fibers of plants, and ſold the leaſt weight of them "for four [d] Attick drachms. But what need I "ſpeak of the ſharpneſs, and extremity of the "famine, as to the eating things without life? "For I will declare ſuch a fact, the like whereof is "no where recorded either amongſt the Grecians "or Barbarians; which may ſeem both horrid to "be related, and alſo incredible to be heard. And "indeed leaſt I might ſeem to poſterity to feign "monſtrous ſtories, I could very willingly leave "this ſad accident unmentioned; but that I have "innumerable witneſſes thereof, to wit, men that "are cotemporary with me: And beſides, I ſhould "doe my Country a very frigid and inconſiderable "kindneſs, ſhould I goe about to conceal the rehearſal of what it really ſuffered. A woman, of "the Region beyond Jordan, by name Mary, the "daughter of Eleazar, of the village Bathezar, "(which word ſignifies, The houſe of Hyſſop) for "deſcent and wealth eminent, flying with the reſt "of the multitude into Jeruſalem, was there together with them beſieged. All her goods, which "ſhe had taken with her out of the region beyond "Jordan and brought into the City, the tyrants "robbed her of. The remains of what ſhe had, "which was of greateſt value and price, and what "ever proviſion of food ſhe could any way procure, the ſpearmen breaking in daily took from "her. A moſt vehement indignation moved "the woman; and oftentimes ſhe reviled and "curſed thoſe ravenous pillagers, and provoked "them againſt her ſelf. But when none of them "could be either inſtigated by anger, or moved "by compaſſion to kill her; and ſhe being grown "weary of finding victuals for [e] others; and "proviſion being now no where to be found; the "famine alſo having entred her very bowels and "marrow, and her anger being more exceedingly "hot than the famine was ſharp; ſhe took fury and "neceſſity as her adviſers, and in a hoſtile manner "invaded Nature it ſelf. And having ſnatched "up her ſon, for ſhe had a ſucking child, Miſerable Babe, ſaid ſhe, amidſt theſe Wars, Famine "and Sedition, for whom ſhall I preſerve thee? Amongſt the Romans, if they let us live, we ſhall "be ſlaves; and the famine muſt precede that ſervitude; but the Seditious are more miſchievous than both thoſe evils. Be thou therefore my food, a [f] fiend "to take revenge upon the "Seditious, and a ſtory for "men to talk of, which is "onely yet wanting to compleat the calamities of the "Jews. Having ſaid this, "ſhe kills her ſon; then "roaſting him ſhe eat half "of him; the remainder ſhe "kept covered. The Seditious came immediately, "and having ſmelt the horrible ſavour, threatned to "kill her forthwith, if ſhe "would not bring out to "them what ſhe had provided: But ſhe, anſwering that ſhe had reſerved "a good part for them, uncovered the remains of "her ſon. Horrour and aſtoniſhment of mind "ſuddenly ſeized them; and they ſtood benummed, as it were, with amazement at the ſpectacle. This, ſaid the woman, is the ſon of mine "own womb, and this mine own fact: Eat, for I "have eaten of him already; be not you more "effeminate than a woman, or more compaſſionate than a mother. But if you are religious and abhor this my ſacrifice, I have "eaten the one half already, and let the reſt alſo "remain with me. After this they went out trembling, abaſhed at this very one thing, and with "much adoe yielding to leave this food with the "mother. Immediately the whole City was "filled with the noyſe of this deteſtable fact; and "every one ſetting before his eyes this unnatural "deed was horribly afraid and trembled, as if it "had been audaciouſly perpetrated in [g] his own "houſe. And now all who were ſorely preſſed "with the famine, earneſtly haſtned to die, and "happy were they accounted, who were taken "away by death before they heard and ſaw ſo "great calamities. Such was the puniſhment the Jews underwent for their iniquity and impiety againſt the Chriſt of God.

[f] The Jews, as well as the Grecians, believed, that the Ghoſts of ſuch as had been murdered follow thoſe that killed them, to take revenge of them. In this ſenſe thoſe words may be taken, that occur Gen. 4. 10. The voice of thy brothers bloud cryeth unto me from the ground: i. e. thy brother, whom thou haſt wickedly ſlain, requires that I ſhould revenge him, and puniſh thee for his murder: Then it follows v. 12. a fugitive and a vagabond ſhalt thou be in the earth; i. e. thy brothers ghoſt, whom thou haſt ſlain, ſhall follow thee every where and be always troubleſome to thee. Valeſ.

CHAP. VII.

Of Christs predictions.

BUt it is worth while to adjoyn hereunto the most true prediction of our Saviour, wherein he manifestly foretells these very things after this manner: * And wo unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days. But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the sabbath-day: for then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no nor ever shall be. But the same writer adding together the whole number of those that were destroyed, says, that by the famine and by the sword an hundred and ten Myriads perished: And that the Seditious and the Theeves that were left, discovering one another, after the City was taken, were put to death: that the tallest and comelliest of the young men were reserved to adorn the Triumph: that of the rest of the multitude, such as were above seventeen years of age, were sent bound to the Mines in Egypt; and that very many were distributed through the Provinces to be destroyed in the publick Shews by the sword and by wild beasts: that those who were under seventeen years of age were carried captive and sold; and that the number of these onely amounted to [a] ninety thousand. These things were done after this manner in the second year of the Reign of Vespasian, agreeable to the presages and predictions of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who by his divine power foreseeing these things, as if they had been present, wept and lamented, according to the History of the Holy Evangelists, who have related his very words; one while speaking as it were to Jerusalem it self: If thou hadst known (said he,) even thou at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee: Then speaking concerning the people: For there shall be (said he) great distress in the Land, and wrath upon this people. And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations, and Jerusalem shall be troden down of the Gentiles, untill the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled: And again, When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with Armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Now whosoever does compare the words of our Saviour with the rest of our Writers relations of the whole war, he cannot but with admiration confess the prescience and prediction of our Saviour to have been truly divine, and exceeding wonderfull. Therefore concerning those things which befell the whole Jewish nation after the salutary passion of Christ, and after those words, whereby the multitude of the Jews desired a thief and a murderer should be released from his punishment of death, and that the Prince of life should be destroyed, it is needeless to [b] add any thing to the relation given by Josephus. So much onely is requisite furthermore to be annexed, as may represent the endearing goodness of the most excellent providence of God, deferring the destruction of these men full forty years after their most audacious villany committed against Christ. During which space, many of the Apostles and disciples, (and James himself the first Bishop there, he that was called the brother of the Lord) being yet alive and making their abode in the City of Jerusalem, continued to be a most impregnable fortification to that place: divine visitation hitherto patiently forbearing them; that, if peradventure they would yet repent of what they had done, they might obtain Remission and Salvation; and to so great patience and forbearance, adding wonderfull signes from heaven foreshewing what was about to befall them unless they repented. Which signes, having been accounted worthy to be recorded by the foresaid * Writer, nothing hinders but we may here propose to those that shall look upon this our work.

* That is Josephus.

Matt. 24. v. 19, 20, 21.

Luke 19. 42, 43, 44.

Luke 21. 23, 24.

Luke 21. 20.

[a] Eusebius is here mistaken; for Josephus does not say so; but onely affirms that the number of those that were taken captive, during the whole war, by the Romans, amounted to ninety thousand men. The words of Josephus are to be seen at the latter end of his sixth Book of the Hist. of the Jewish wars. Vales.

[b] Ταῖς ἱστορίαις ἐπιλέγειν; these are the words of Eusebius; by which he means, not his own History, as Bishop Christopherson thought, but the History of Josephus: in our translation therefore we have expressed his name; but it is not, we confess, in the original of Eusebius. Vales.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the Prodigies that appeared before the War.

LEt us then take the sixth Book of his History, and rehearse what is therein related by him in these words; "Therefore those Impostours, "and such as feigned themselves to be sent of God, "by their false perswasions deceived the wretched "people at that time: So that they neither gave heed "to, nor believed those evident Prodigies which "foreshewed their desolation to be at hand. But "being like persons thunderstruck, and having nei-"ther eyes nor understanding, they contemned "and disregarded the forewarnings of God. First, "a star in the likeness of a sword stood over the "City; and then a [a] Comet "continued a whole year. "Further also, when, before "the revolt and the first be-"ginnings of the war, the "people were gathered to-"gether to the feast of un-"leavened bread, on the "eighth day of the month A-"pril, at the [b] ninth hour "of the night, so great a light "shined round about the Al-"tar and the Temple, that it "seemed to be bright day; "and so continued for the "space of half an hour: "And this was judged by "those that were unskilfull "a good sign; but by the "[c] Scribes that were skilled in the Law, it was im-"mediately concluded to portend those calamities "which afterwards happened: And at the same

[a] We read ὅστις, as it is in Josephus B. 7. pag. 960. But Nicephorus thought that this Star which appeared in the likeness of a Sword, and the Comet which continued a whole year was all one; which, as we judge, is not right. Vales.

[b] The Jews divided the whole νυχθήμερον, i.e. night and day, or four and twenty hours, into eight parts, each of them containing 3 hours; the 3d the 6th, the 9th, and the 12th hour of the day; and the like again for the several watches of the night: the ninth hour of the night (or third watch) according to their account, was commonly betwixt our hours of twelve and three a clock in the morning. See Buxtorf. Synag. Judaic. Chap. 13.

[c] The Scribes amongst the Jews were the same with the Doctors of the Law, as Petavius has well observed, in Animadvers. ad Hæres. 15 Epiphanii. Their office it was, to keep the holy Books of the Law, and to read them in the presence of the people, in the Temple and in the Synagogues. But their principal office was to be assessours with the chief Priests and Elders in the great Councel called the Sanhedrim. See the 6, and 23 Chapters of the Acts. The name of Scribe therefore was the name of a Magistrate among the Jews as well as among the Grecians. And as the [γραμματεῖς] Scribes in Greece were to be present at assemblies and judicatures, and to have the custody of the Laws and Statutes made by the people, and Decrees made by the Senate; so also were the Scribes amongst the Jews the keepers of the Law. That this was no small honour, appears from many places in the Gospel; where our B. Saviour reproves their pride and insolence. After the same manner, amongst the Grecians, cians, the Scribes [γραμματεῖς] were in great authority, as appears from that which S. Luke relates Acts 19. 35. [our tranſlation calls him Town-Clerk, how truly, Mr Jo. Gregory of Oxford will tell you in his notes on the Text; chap. 9. p. 43. of his works.] Amongſt the Jews the Scribes were ſo much the more reſpected by how much that nation above all others eſteemed their own Laws: of which the Scribes were not onely the keepers, but the interpreters alſo. Moreover they were conſulted as being taken to be men of great knowledge and skill, and who were beſt able to interpret Signs and Prodigies; and alſo who beſt knew the myſteries of the Law. So we read Matth. 2. 4. Herod there conſults the Scribes; and in this place of Joſephus here, the Scribes foretell the meaning of the Prodigies. Moreover the Magiſtrate of the City of Jeruſalem who was called Στρατηγὸς, had his Scribe, as Joſephus tells us B. 20. But whither this Scribe was among the number of thoſe that were interpreters of the Law, it is hard to ſay. Farther, the [Ἱερογραμματεῖς] amongſt the Egyptians were certain Prieſts who look't after the Ordinances about things Sacred, and had the keeping of the myſtical Learning, and foretold things to come; concerning whom ſee Joſeph. L. 2. c. 5. where he calls them Ἱερέας. Theſe, after the Cantor and the Horoſcopus went in the third place into the Temple, wearing wings on their heads, and carrying before them in their hands, Ink, and a Pen, with a Book. They had alſo the Hieroglyphical Books of Mercury, and thoſe of Coſmography, and of the ſituation of Countries, and of Egypt, and of the Nile, and of the places conſecrated in honour of their Gods, committed to their cuſtody, as Clem. Alexandrinus writes in his 6 B. Lucianus ſaith that theſe ſort of men had been of long continuance in Egypt. Valeſ.

VESPASIAN. "Feaſt, a Cow, led to be ſacrificed by the High-
"prieſt, brought forth a Lamb in the midſt of the

"now about to ſay would
"ſeem an idle ſtory, were it
"not related by thoſe that ſaw it, and had not the "ſubſequent calamities been anſwerable to ſuch "Prodigies. For before Sun-ſet there was ſeen in "the Air over the whole Country, Chariots, and "whole companies of Armed men, running up and "down in the clouds, and inveſting Cities. Alſo
"at the Feaſt, called Pentecoſt, the Prieſts, as it was "their manner, going by night into the Temple
"to perform their offices, reported that they per"ceived at firſt indeed a motion and heard a
"noiſe; but that afterwards they heard a voice
"as of a great multitude, ſaying, Let us depart
"hence: But, what was more dreadfull than all
"this; one Jeſus, the ſon of Ananias, a country "man of the ordinary rank, four years before the "war, (the City being then in perfect peace and "in a flouriſhing condition) coming to the Feaſt,
"in which it's cuſtomary for all to make taber"nacles to the honour of God near the Temple;
"on a ſudden began to cry out with a loud voice:
"A voice from the Eaſt, a voice from the Weſt,
"a voice from the four winds, a voice againſt Je- "ruſalem and the Temple, a voice againſt the "bridegrooms and the brides, a voice againſt all the "people. This he went up and down crying, day "and night throughout all the narrow ſtreets and "croſs waies of the City. But ſome of the chief "of the people were very much diſturbed at this "ominous cry, and, being highly incenſed, took
"the man and beat him with many and alſo
"grievous ſtripes. But he neither ſpoke any "thing for himſelf, nor ſaid any thing in pri"vate to thoſe that [e] beat him, but perſiſted cry"ing thoſe very words he did before. Then VESPASIAN.

"were bare, he neither intreated for himſelf, nor "ſhed a tear. But to the utmoſt of his power "changing his voice into a dolefull tone, he anſweranother thing alſo more wonderfull than this, which the ſame Writer relates, ſaying, that a Prophecy was found in the holy Scriptures comprehending thus much, to wit, that about that time one was to come out of their Country who ſhould rule over the whole world; which this Writer underſtood to have been fulfilled in [h] Veſpaſian. But he did not rule over the whole world, onely obtained the Roman Empire. This therefore may more juſtly be referred to [d] After theſe words Euſebius omits ſome paſſages that are extant in Joſephus, as, of this Prodigies's being told to the Στρατηγὸς, or Magiſtrate; for an account of whom, and his office ſee the Learned Hammond in his notes on Luke 22. 52.

CHAP. IX.

Of Joſephus, and the Writings he left.

AFter all this, it is fit that we ſhould not be ignorant of this ſame Joſephus, who has given us ſo great aſſiſtance in the Hiſtory we now have in hand, from whence, and of what ſtock he came. And he himſelf does manifeſt even this alſo, ſaying after this manner: "Joſephus the "ſon of [a] Mattathias, a "Prieſt of Jeruſalem, who
"my ſelf alſo at firſt fought "againſt the Romans, and
"was by neceſſity forced to
"be preſent at what was "done afterwards. This man was eſteemed the moſt eminent perſon of all the Jews of thoſe times, not onely by his own country men, but alſo by the Romans: inſomuch that he was honoured with a Statue dedicated to him in the City of Rome, and the Books compiled by him were accounted worthy to be placed in the publick Library. He wrote all the Jewiſh Antiquities in twenty entire Books; and the Hiſtory of the Jewiſh war, in his own time, in ſeven Books; which Hiſtory he himſelf teſtifies, he put forth not onely in Greek, but alſo in his own Country language; and He is worthy to be credited both in this, and in other things. There are alſo two other Books of his extant very worthy to be read, which are about the Ancientneſs of the Jews: in which he anſwers Apion Grammaticus who at that time wrote a [b] Volume againſt the Jews, and ſome

[a] In the Kings M. S. it is Μαθθὶ· and ſo alſo in Joſephus, in his Book of his own Life, and in the proëme to his Hiſtory of the Jewiſh wars. In Sophronius's Book, De ſcriptoribus Eccleſ. it is, Ἰώσηπος μαθθίου ὑός. So alſo Sozomen calls him in the beginning of his firſt Book. And Rufinus calls the father of Joſephus Mathias; Joſeppus, ſays he, Mathiæ filius, ex Hieroſolymis ſacerdos. So it is written in the moſt excellent M. S. of the Pariſian Church. Valeſ. Suetonius, in the life of Veſpaſian, has this paſſage of Joſephus; Unus ex nobilibus captivis Joſephus, cùm conjiceretur in vincula; conſtantiſſime aſſeveravit ſore, ut ab eo brevi ſolveretur, verum jam Imperatore.

[b] The words of Euſebius are σωλαξαντα λόγον; but Nicephorus writes λόγους, which Joſephus ſeems to confirm, who teſtifies that Apion wrote more Books than one againſt the Jewiſh nation. But Ferom, in Catalogo, where he ſpeaks of Joſephus's writings, defends the ordinary reading. Valeſ.

others who had attempted to calumniate the [c] Antiquity and Laws of the Jewish Nation. In the former of these he sets forth the number of the Canonical Books of that called the Old Testament, which of them are among the Hebrews unquestionable and undoubted, as being received from antient tradition; discoursing of them in these words.

[c] Josephus in his Books against Apion, answers not onely those who had calumniated the Laws and Institutions of the Jews; but also he more especially writes against those who had forged certain falsities concerning the original and antiquity of the Jews, as appears by his first Book. But about the end of his second Book he answers Apollonius, Molon, and Lysimachus, who had written some lies about the Laws and Institutions of the Jews. The word πάτεια therefore in this place must mean both these, to wit, the Antiquity, and the Laws of the Jewish Nation. Vales.

CHAP. X.

How Josephus makes mention of the Holy Bible.

"THere are not therefore amongst us an innu"merable company of Books disagree-
"ing and contradicting one another; but onely
"[a] two and twenty, con"taining an Historical ac"count of all times; which "are worthily believed to "be divine. And five of "these are the works of "Moses, which compre"hend both the Laws, and
"also a continued Series of
"the generations of men, and "what was done by them
"from their first creation un-
"till his own death. This "space of time wants little "of three thousand years.
"And from the death of "Moses untill the Reign of "Artaxerxes King of the "Persians successour to Xer-
"xes, the Prophets, who "succeeded Moses, wrote
"what was done in their "Ages, in thirteen Books:
"The remaining four con"tain Hymnes to God, and
"precepts and admonitions
"for the well ordering of "mens lives. Also from Artaxerxes untill our "own times every thing is indeed recorded, but "these Books have not been accounted worthy "of the like authority with the former, in that
"the succession of the Prophets was not so ac"curately known. But it is manifestly apparent
"how highly we revere our own Writings: For
"in so many ages now passed over, no one has "dared either to adde or to diminish from them,
"or to change any thing therein; but it is im"planted upon all us Jews immediately from our "very birth, to think that these are the Precepts
"of God, and to persevere in them, and, if need so "require, willingly to die for them. And let these words of this Writer be profitably here inserted. He compiled also another elaborate work not unworthy of himself, about the Empire of Reason, which some have entitled Maccabees, because it contains the conflicts of those Hebrews, in the writings called the Maccabees so termed from them, who valiantly fought for the worship of God. And, at the end of his twentieth Book of Antiquities he intimates, as if he purposed to write in four Books (according to the opinion of the Jews which they had received from their Ancestours) of God, and of his essence, also of Laws, why according to them some things are lawfull to be done, and others forbidden. Himself also in his own Books mentions other works compiled by his diligence. Moreover it is also consonant to reason to adjoyn those words of his which he has inserted at the [b] conclusion of his Antiquities, for the confirmation of the quotations and Authorities, we have taken out of him. He therefore, blaming [c] Justus Tiberiensis, (who had taken in hand, as well as he, to write an History of those very times,) as having not related the truth, and accusing the man of many other faults, at last adds thus much in these words: "But I was not,
"in that manner as you were, timorous concer"ning my Writings; but gave my Books to the "Emperours themselves, when the deeds done
"were fresh and almost yet to be seen: for I was "conscious to my self, that I had all along faith"fully observed the delivery of the truth; upon "account whereof, hoping for their evidence,
"I was not disappointed of my expectation: and
"moreover I communicated my History to many "others, some of whom were actually present in "the war; as was King Agrippa, and [d] several "of his Relations: Also Titus the Emperour
"was so willing that the knowledge of what was "done should be delivered to men solely out of "them, that he [e] subscribed my Books with his "own hand, and gave command they should be

VESPASIAN.

[a] There were so many Books of the Scripture amongst the Jews, as they had letters in their Alphabet; So Origen tells us in his exposition of the first Psalm, and Jerome in præmio galeato; where also he saies that there were among them three ranks of these holy Volumes; the first contained the Law; the second the Prophets; the third the Hagiography. All which agrees very well with Josephus. But in this they differ; Josephus makes thirteen Books to be of the second order; to wit, following the series of the times. But of the third, he reckons onely four, disagreeing from S. Jerom: who in the foresaid preface, and in that of his before the Prophecie of Daniel, reckons up eight Books of the Prophets, and nine of the Hagiography. But Josephus seems to have placed the Book of Joshua, and Judges, also those of the Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra amongst the Prophetical writings; not that they contain Prophecies, as the Books of the Prophets doe; but because they were written by men that were Prophets. Vales.

[b] To wit, in the book of his own life, pag. 1026 Edit. Genev. which book is the conclusion of his twentieth and last book of his Antiquities; from which it is separated unadvisedly in the Greek and Latine Editions. Now that it is the conclusion of the 20th. of Antiquities, Josephus himself tells us at the close of that Book, and at the end of this book, of his own life. Scaliger therefore is mistaken, in his Animadvers. on Euseb. p. 188, where he saies, Eusebius forgot himself here; and so is Christopherson, who, supposing this place in Eusebius to be corrupted, altered it. But had they seen the Greek M. SS. Copies of Josephus, or had they consulted the Basil. Edition of him, they might easily have found, that which I have said to be true, to wit, that this book of Josephus's, of his own life, was nothing else but an appendix or conclusion of his 20 book of Antiquities. Vales.

[c] Our M. SS. Copies, Maz. Med. and Fuk. have it thus written, Τιβερέα; corruptly as I judge. For both Stephanus Byzantius doth acknowledge it to be Τιβεριάς; and also Jerom, in his book De Scriptorib. Ecclesiast. calls him Justus Tiberiensis; whom we have followed. But Scaliger stiles him Tiberiadensis. This Justus wrote an History of the Jewish wars, as Josephus tells us in his book, De vitâ suâ; and Stephanus, in the word Τιβεριάς. Besides this History he wrote a Chronicle of the Kings of the Jews, as Photius testifies, in Bibliothecâ: which work he dedicated to King Agrippa, as Scaliger affirms, in Animadvers. Euseb. pag. 176. And he adds these words: Nemo de obitu Regis Agrippæ certius pronunciare potuit quàm is qui illi opus suum dedicavit i. e. No body could speak more certainly of the death of King Agrippa, than he who dedicated his work to him. Which I indeed wish, had not dropt from so acute a man. For how can an Historian testifie of the death of him to whom he dedicates his History? unless we say that Justus dedicated his Chronicle to Agrippa, when he was dead, which is absurd. But as Scaliger without all ground asserted, that Justus Tiberiadensis dedicated his Chronicle to K. Agrippa; so what he inferrs therefrom is also absurd. But from Photius his testimonie it is manifest, that that work was put forth by Justus after the death of King Agrippa. Josephus relates that the History of the Jewish wars was published by Justus also after the death of Agrippa, although it was written twenty years before. A book of this same Justus his, whose title was Στέμμα]α, is quoted by Laertius, in the life of Socrates; which Photius says was the same with his Chronicle. Vales.

[d] He means Julius Archelaus and Herod, as Josephus himself declares in his first book against Apion. Julius Archelaus was brother in law to King Agrippa; for he had married his Sister Mariamne; so says Josephus at the end of his 19 and 20 books of Antiqu. Vales.

[e] Nicephorus, in his 3 book, chap. 11. interpreting these words of Josephus, says that Titus with his own hand copied out the books of Josephus his History of the Jewish wars. See what Johannes Langus has noted at that place of Nicephorus. But all interpreters who have translated this place of Josephus into Latine, understand thereby that Titus onely subscribed the books of Josephus with his own hand, and did not copy them out himself. But I would rather follow the opinion of Nicephorus. Neither do these words of Josephus [ὥστε χαρᾶξαι τῇ αὐτῇ χειρὶ τὰ βιβλία, δημοσιεύεσθαι προστάξαι] seem to sound any thing less to me. Thus this place is pointed in all Copies as well M. S. as Printed. But if this place of Josephus we e to be understood onely of Titus his Subscribing Josephus his books with his hand, then the distinction or comma ought to be put after the word χειρὶ: but here you see it put after the word βιβλία. Vales.

VESPASIAN.

"[f] publickly read. And King Agrippa wrote "Sixty two Epistles, testifying therein, that the "truth was delivered by me. Two whereof Josephus there adjoyns. But let thus much be thus far manifested concerning him. We will now proceed to what follows.

[f] In the most excellent M. SS. Maz. Med. Fuk. and in Sr Hen. Savills M. S. it is written [ἀημοσιεύεσθαι;] which reading all interpreters seem to have followed: but I like Rufinus his Version best, who translates it: To be publickly read; in which sense the same word is used by Eusebius in chap. 22. of his second book, where he speaks of the General Epistles of James and Jude; and in chap. 3. of his 3 book. But from these words of Josephus we may gather that the History of the Jewish wars was put out by him in the Reign of Vespasian; but his Antiquities were published by him in the thirteenth year of Domitian, as he himself testifies at the end of his 20 book, and at the close of his book, of his own life. But, that which Scaliger affirms, in Animad. Euseb. p. 187. to wit, that the book of Josephus his own life was by him put out seven years after his Antiquities, seems not probable to me; for that book is as we made it out before, onely the conclusion of his twentieth Book of Antiquities; and at the end of it Josephus reckoning up the Roman Emperours, concludes with Domitian. Vales.

CHAP. XI.

How, after James, Simeon Governed the Church at Jerusalem.

AFter the Martyrdom of James and the taking of Jerusalem, which immediately followed thereupon, report goes that the Apostles and disciples of our Lord, who were yet alive met together from all parts in the same place, together also with the kinsmen of our Lord according to the flesh, (for many of them hitherto survived,) and that all these held a consultation in common who should be adjudged worthy to succeed James: and moreover that all with one consent approved of [a] Simeon the son of Cleophas, of whom the History of the Gospel makes mention, to be worthy of the Episcopal seat there; which Simeon, as they say, was Cousin German by the Mothers side to our Saviour: for Hegesippus relates that Cleophas was the [b] brother of Joseph.

[a] This account of Eusebius his here agrees not with what he has written in that work of his called his Chronicon: for there he writes, that presently after the death of James, Simeon was elected; to wit, in the seventh year of Nero. But here he makes it evident, that after the murder of James, the Episcopal See was vacant for the space of about eight or nine years. Which intervall of time, that the Authour Chronici Alexandrini might fill up, he places the death of James on the first year of Vespasian. Vales.

[b] That is, because (as we conjecture) he married Mary which was Sister to the B. Virgin; upon which account Simeon the son of this Cleophas is here called Cousin-German by the mothers side to our Saviour; for so we translate the word [ἀνεψιὸν] not patruelem, i. e. Cousin-German by the fathers side, as it is in the version of Valesius; but consobrinum, i. e. Sisters son. For Mary the wife of Cleophas, and the B. Virgin were Sisters; see Jo. 19. 25. and so Simeon the son of the former Mary, and our Saviour the son of the latter, were Sisters children. See the Learned Bp Pearson on the Creed, p. 175, & 176. Edit. Lond. 1669. And Petavius, in haref. 78. Epiphan. cap. 7, & 14. and also St Jerom, in Catalog.

CHAP. XII.

How Vespasian commanded that the descendants of David should be sought out.

AND moreover, it is reported, that Vespasian after the taking of Jerusalem, commanded all those that were of the kindred of David to be diligently sought out, least any one of them who were of the Royal Race should be left remaining amongst the Jews: and that a most sore persecution was thereby again brought upon the Jews.

VESPASIAN.

CHAP. XIII.

That Anencletus was the Second Bishop of the Roman Church.

BUt when Vespasian had reigned ten years, his son Titus succeeded him in the Empire: In the second year of whose Reign, Linus Bishop of the Roman Church, having held that publick charge twelve years, delivered it to [a] Anencletus. And Titus, after he had reigned two years and as many months, was succeeded by his brother Domitian.

[a] I know not why R. Stephens read Anacletus, seeing that all our books have it written Anencletus. And so Nicephorus Constantinopolitanus, and his Translatour Anastasius Bibliothecarius in Chronolog. Tripartit. reads it. So also Nicephorus Callistus in Libr. 3. cap. 2. and Georgius Syncellus, and the M. SS. copies of Rufinus. So likewise Irenæus (in Lib. 3, where he reckons up the Roman Bishops in order) names him Anencletus; and omits the name of Cletus, which to me seems to be made of a piece of the word Anencletus. Neither does Optatus, nor S. Augustine, in his 165 Epistle (where he counts up the Romish Bishops) acknowledge Cletus. But on the contrary, in two very antient Catalogues of the Roman Bishops, one whereof is in the Monastery of S. German, and the other in the Jesuits Colledge at Clermont——there is no mention of Anencletus; but onely of Cletus, who succeeded Linus, and sat eleven years, one month, and two daies. From whence its evident that Cletus and Anencletus was the same man. See more of this in P. Halloixius, in notat. ad cap. 7. vitæ Irenæi. Vales.

CHAP. XIV.

That Avilius was the Second Bishop of Alexandria.

FUrthermore, in the fourth year of Domitian, [a] Annianus the First Bishop of the Alexandrian Church, having there spent two and twenty years compleat, died. After whom succeeded [b] Avilius, being the second Bishop there.

DOMITIAN.

[a] That is, the First after Mark. So Eusebius said before, concerning Linus Bishop of Rome, at the 2 chap. of this book. For Mark was the Apostle of the Alexandrians as we before have said. But the Apostles were not reckoned amongst the number of the Bishops. There was therefore no need of putting in here μετὰ Μάρκον, as Nicephorus did. See Seldens notes ad Eutychium patriarcham Alexandr. Vales.

[b] Rufinus and the other Translatours call this man Abilius; and also Jerom himself, in Chronico, not so rightly as I judge. For he ought to be called Avilius, which is a Roman name; as well as Annianus, who was Bishop before Avilius. Besides, the order of the chapters is here disturbed in the common Editions; this chap. of the succession of Avilius being put before that of the succession of Anencletus: but we by the direction of the M. SS. copies Maz. and Fuk. have placed them in their true order. This was a very antient mistake; for in the Index of the chapters prefixed before the 3 B. of Rufinus his translation, and in all the Greek copies except in that of Fuk. the same errour is committed. But in the body of the Maz. M. S. (which book has the titles of the chapters exactly placed in their order) this errour is corrected. Vales.

CHAP. XV.

That Clemens was the Third Bishop of the Roman Church.

ALso in the twelfth year of this Emperours Reign, Anencletus having been Bishop of the Roman Church twelve years, had to his successour Clemens: whom the Apostle, writing an Epistle to the Philippians, declares to be his fellow-labourer, saying: * with Clement also, and with other my fellow-labourers, whose names are in the book of life.

* Philip. 4. 3.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVI.

Concerning the Epistle of Clemens.

MOreover there is extant one Epistle of this Clemens his, which by general consent is acknowledged as genuine, and is singularly excellent and admirable; which he wrote in the name of the Roman Church to that of the Corinthians, there being at that time a Faction raised in the Corinthian Church: which Epistle also we have known to have been publickly read in many Churches before the whole congregation, both in times past, and also in our own memory. Now, that in the time of the aforementioned Clemens there was a Faction raised in the Corinthian Church, Hegesippus is a witness worthy to be credited.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Persecution in Domitians time.

[a] BEsides, Domitian having shown much cruelty towards many, and by unjust sentences put to death no small company of men of Rome that were nobly descended and illustrious, and having punished innumerable other most eminent persons undeservedly with banishment and loss of goods, at length rendred himself the successour of Nero as to his hatred of God, and his fighting against him. For he raised the second persecution against us: Although his father Vespasian had designed nothing injurious towards us.

[a] Rufinus thought these words that follow here were the words of Hegesippus, whom Eusebius quoted at the end of the foregoing chapt. whence it appears that Rufinus read as it is in our M. SS. copies, Maz. Med. and Fuk. μαθὼν ὁ ἡγούμενος λέγων. πολλήν μὲν, &c. Moreover in Rufinus the chap. 17. begins at those words, Now that in the time of the forementioned, &c. as I observed it to be also in the Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. But I rather approve of the ordinary writing and distinction. Vales.

[b] Εὐπατρίδης has the same import with εὐγενὴς, that is, it signifies one that is descended from an illustrious and noble stock. So Gregor. Nazianz. in oration. 40. μὴ ἀπαξιώσητε συμβατρίδην εἶναι πένητι, πλέοντι δὲ· ὁ εὐπατρίδης τῷ δυσγενεῖ. S. Ferom, in Chronico Anno 8. Domitian. saies, Domitianus plurimos nobilium in exilium mittit, atque occidit. Vales.

CHAP XVIII.

Concerning John the Apostle, and his Revelation.

IN this persecution its reported, that John the Apostle and also Evangelist, who yet lived, was banished into the Isle Patmos upon account of the Testimony he exhibited to the word of God. Indeed, * Irenæus, writing concerning the number of the name of Antichrist mentioned in † the † Revelation of John, does in these very words in his fifth book against Heresies thus speak concerning John: "But if at this present time * his "name ought publickly to be preached, it would "have been spoken of by him who saw the Revela- "tion. For it was seen not a long time since, but "almost in our Age, about the latter end of Do- "mitian's Reign. But so mightily did the doctrine of our faith flourish in those forementioned times, that even those Writers who are wholly estranged from our Religion have not thought it troublesome to set forth in their Histories both this Persecution, and also the Martyrdoms suffered therein. And they have also accurately shown the very time: relating, that in the fifteenth year of Domitian, Flavia Domitilla, daughter of the sister of Flavius Clemens at that time one of the Consuls at Rome, was, together with many others also, banished into the Island Pontia, for the Testimony of Christ.

CHAP. XIX.

How Domitian commanded that the descendants of David should be slain.

WHen the same Domitian gave command that the descendants of David should be slain, there goeth an antient report that some Hereticks accused the posterity of Jude, (who was the brother of our Saviour according to the flesh) as being of the off-spring of David, and bearing affinity to Christ himself. And this Hegesippus manifests word for word saying, thus.

CHAP. XX.

Concerning those that were Related to our Saviour.

"THere were yet surviving (who were related "to our Lord) the Nephews of that Jude "who was called the [a] bro- "ther of Christ after the "flesh, whom they accused as "being descended from Da- "vid. And these [b] Evo- "catus brought to Cæsar "Domitian. For Domitian "was afraid of the coming "of Christ, as well as He- "rod. And he asked them, "if they were of the stock "of David; and they ac- "knowledged it. Then he "questioned them how great "possessions they had, or "what quantity of money "they were masters of: and "they said, that they both "had but nine thousand "[c] pence, a moiety where- "of belonged to each of "them: and these they said "they had not in ready mo- "ney, but in land of that va- "lue, being onely thirty nine "Acres: of which also they "paid [d] tribute, and them- "selves were maintained by "their own labour. And "then they shewed their "hands; producing, as an "evidence of their working, "the hardness of their skin, "and a brawniness imprinted "on their hands by reason of "their assiduous labour. Be- "ing also asked concerning "Christ and his Kingdom, "of what sort it was, and "when and where it would "appear; they returned an- "swer, that it was neither "worldly nor Terrestrial, "but Celestial and Angeli- "cal, that it should be at "the end of the world, when "he would come in Glory to "judge the quick and dead, "and

[a] So he is called Matth. 13. 55. But it was the usual language of the Jews to call the first Cousins brethren. See Bishop Pearson on the Creed, pag. 175, 176. Edit. Lond. 1669. See also Bishop Montagues Acts and Mon. chap. 4. S. 6. concerning the Despotyni.

[b] Rob. Stephens, in his Edition of Eusebius calls him Ἰούδαν, and so does the Med. M. S. but in the Kings M. S. I found it written [ὁ Ἰακώβατος] which R. Stephens observed also in his notes added at the latter end of his Edition. Georg. Syncellus, in Chronico, reads it ὁ Ἰούδας. We from our three M. SS. Copies, to wit, Maz. Fuk. and Sr Henry Savills, have made good the true writing of this place, τούτους δ' ὁ Ἰούδας ἤγαγε, and these Evocatus brought, &c. This reading Nicephorus and Rufinus doe confirm; the words of Rufinus are, Hos Revocatus quidam nomine, qui ad hoc missus fuerat, perduxit ad Domitianum. Nicephorus, Lib. 3. cap. 10. has it written ὁ Ἰούδας. These Evocati were Souldiers of an higher degree who having performed their service and being dismist, were upon occasion summoned by the Emperour himself. There is mention of these in the antient inscriptions, Evoc. Aug. i. e. Evocatus Augusti. No man need wonder, that Hegesippus a Greek writer should make use of a Latine word here; for that is usual with him; and in this very relation of his he has [δηλατορευθὲν] and [δηνάεια] both Latine words. Vales.

[c] So we translate the word [δηνάεια] warranted thereto by the same translation of that word, occurring Matth. 22. 19. The value of that peny there shewed Christ, was, saies Dr Hammond on the place, a whole Attick drachm; but what value these here were of, it is hard to say, in regard there were several sorts of these Denarii, which were also of a different value. See Voss. Etymol.

[d] Φόροι were Tributes, or Taxes, raised upon Lands, and they were commonly paid in Wheat, Barley, Wine, and the like; as it appears from Cod. Theodosian. Τέλη was the Toll gathered by the Publicans, who farmed it commonly; it was paid in ready money. The word here is φόρους; which we therefore render Tribute. Vales.

DOMITIAN. "and reward every man according to his deeds. "Upon which anſwer Domitian condemned them "not, but ſcorning them as deſpicable perſons, he "diſmiſt them unbound, and by Edict appeaſed "the Perſecution raiſed againſt the Church. But "they, thus releaſed, (as tis ſaid) afterwards pre-"ſided over Churches, as being both Martyrs, and "alſo allied to our Lord; and, peace enſuing, "they lived till the Reign of Trajan. So far Hege-ſippus. But moreover, [c] Tertullian alſo makes mention of Domitian: Domitian alſo attempted a Perſecution, who was a Limb of Nero as to cruelty. "But being alſo but a man he ſoon deſiſted from "his enterprize, reſtoring even thoſe whom he "had baniſhed. But after Domitian had reigned fifteen years, Nerva, having ſucceeded him in the Empire, the Roman Senate decreed that Domitians Titles of Honour ſhould be abrogated, and that ſuch as were by him unjuſtly baniſhed ſhould return to their houſes and have their goods reſtored. This they relate who committed to writing the Hiſtory of thoſe times. Moreover the account of the Antients amongſt us declares that then alſo the Apoſtle John, was releaſed from his baniſhment in the Iſland, and took up his habitation again at Epheſus.

[c] Tertullians words are theſe, Pentaverat & Domitianus, portio Neronis de crudelitate. Sed quia & homo, facilè cœptum repreſſit, reſtitutis etiam quos relegaverat: they are in his Apolog. But whoſoever it was that tranſlated his Apologie into Greek, he has not rendred his words well. For Tertullians words are to this effect, that after Nero, who firſt raged againſt the Chriſtians, Domitian alſo, like another Nero, attempted the ſame; but as men are fickle and mutable, he ſoon deſiſted from his enterprize. But Euſebius, or whoſoever he was that tranſlated Tertullians Apology, takes the meaning of thoſe words [Quia & homo] to be, as if Tertullian had ſaid, that Domitian was ſomething of a man, but Nero was rather a ſavage beaſt than a man. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXI.

That Cerdo was the third that preſided over the Alexandrian Church.

TRAJANUS. BUt Nerva having reigned ſomething more than a year, Trajan ſucceeded him. It was his firſt year, wherein Cerdo ſucceeded Avilius who had governed the Alexandrian Church thirteen years. This Cerdo was the third, from Annianus, who firſt preſided there. At this time alſo Clemens yet governed the Roman Church, he being alſo the third that after [a] Paul and Peter had the Epiſcopal dignity there: Linus being the firſt, and after him Anencletus.

[a] Here, and before, we may obſerve Paul put before Peter by Euſebius. In the Seals of the Roman Church Paul is put on the right hand, and Peter on the left, as Baronius obſerves, in Expoſitione Concil. Nicen. and Euſebius ſeems to make them both Biſhops of Rome together, Valeſ.

CHAP. XXII.

That Ignatius was the Second that preſided over the Alexandrian Church.

MOreover, Euodius having been conſtituted the firſt Biſhop at Antioch, the ſecond was Ignatius, a man famous in thoſe times: Simeon likewiſe was the ſecond, who, after our Saviours brother, at the ſame time [a] entred upon the publick charge over the Church at Jeruſalem.

[a] The Kings M.S. reads according to our tranſlation, τὴν λειτουργίαν ἐγκεχειρισμένος ἦν. But the other four M. SS. i. e. Maz. Med. Fuk. and Sr Henry Savills have it written τὴν λειτουργίαν εἶχεν, had the publick charge, &c. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIII.

A Relation concerning John the Apoſtle.

AT the ſame time, the Apoſtle and alſo Evangeliſt John, (the ſame whom Jeſus loved) remaining yet alive in Aſia, governed the Churches there, being returned from his Exile in the Iſland after the death of Domitian: For that he was hitherto alive, it is ſufficiently confirmed by two, who evidence the matter: and they are very worthy of credit, having been conſtant aſſertours of Catholick ſound Doctrine: I mean theſe perſons Irenæus and Clemens Alexandrinus. The former of whom, in his ſecond book againſt Hereſie, writes thus word for word: * "And all the "Elders, that were converſant in Aſia with John "the diſciple of our Lord, do teſtifie that John de-"livered it to them: for he continued among "them untill Trajans time. And in the third book of that work he manifeſts the ſame thing in theſe words: "Moreover the Church at Epheſus "was founded indeed by Paul, but John; conti-"nuing among them untill Trajans time, is a moſt "faithfull witneſs of the Apoſtolick Tradition. And Clemens likewiſe, having evidently ſhown the time, adds withall a Relation very neceſſary for thoſe who delight to hear good and profitable things (in that work of his which he entitled who that rich man is that ſhall be ſaved.) Let us therefore take his book and read the ſtory, which is thus. "Hear a Relation, which is not a feigned ſtory, "but a real truth, delivered concerning John the "Apoſtle, and kept in remembrance. For after "the death of the Tyrant he returned from the "Iſland Patmos to Epheſus, and being thereto "requeſted, he went to the neighbouring Pro-"vinces, in ſome places conſtituting Biſhops, in "others ſetting in order whole Churches, [a] and o-"ther where electing into the Clergy ſome one or "other of thoſe who were made known to him by "the Spirit. Coming there-"fore to one of the Cities "not far diſtant, the [b] name "whereof ſome mention, "and moreover having [c] re-"freſhed the brethren; at "length caſting his eyes up-"on a youth of a goodly "ſtature of body, comely "countenance, and lively diſ-"poſition, he lookt upon him "whom he had Ordained "Biſhop, and ſaid, This "youth I doe with all ima-"ginable care commit to thy "charge, in the preſence of "the Church, and of Chriſt "as a witneſs. And when he "had undertaken this charge, "and promiſed his utmoſt "care thereof, John declared "and deſired the ſame again; "And afterwards returned to "Epheſus. But the [d] Preſ-"byter, taking home the "youth committed to his "cuſtody, educated him, "kept him within compaſs, "and cheriſhed him; and at "length baptized him: but "after that, he abated ſome-"thing of his great care "and caution over him; be-"cauſe he had fortified him "with that moſt abſolute de-"fence, to wit, the [e] Seal of [a] The words of Euſebius in the Edit. of Valeſius (which in our tranſlation we follow) are theſe, ὅπου δὲ κλήρου ἕνα τινὰ κληρώσων, &c. In Rob. Stephens Edit. of Euſeb. it is thus, ὅπου δὲ γε κλῆρον ἕνα τινὰ κληρώσων, &c. Valeſius ſays, he altered the reading here upon account of the Authority of the three M. SS. Maz. Med. and Fuk. rejecting the reading of the Kings M. S. (which Rob. Stephens followed) in that he was not able to make ſenſe of it: And moreover, ſays Valeſius, Ruffinus his Verſion confirms this our emendation; for he tranſlates this place thus: Rogabatur etiam vicinas luſtrare provincias, quò vel Eccleſias fundaret, in quibus non erant locis; vel in quibus erant, ſacerdotibus ac miniſtris inſtrueret, ſecundùm quod ei de unoquoque Spiritus Sanctus indicaſſet. Valeſ.

[d] See Dr Hammond, concerning the uſe of this word Presbyter by the Apoſtles and writers of the New Teſtament, and by the Fathers in the firſt Apoſtolical times, in his notes on Acts 11. 30.

CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning the Order of the Gospels.

THese words of Clemens's we have here inserted, upon account both of the story its self, and also of the profit it may yield to the Readers. But, we will now declare and recount the unquestionable writings of this Apostle. And indeed, the Gospel according to him, well known to all the Churches throughout the world, must in the first place be without controversie acknowledg'd and received as undoubted and genuine. Now that it was truely, and upon a good account put in the fourth place after the other three Gospels by the antients, may after this manner be made apparent. Those heavenly and truely divine persons (I speak of the Apostles of Christ) having been as to their lives and conversations perfectly purified, and as to their souls adorned with all manner of virtue, were indeed rude of speech and uneloquent, but they put their confidence in that divine and wonderfull power of working miracles bestowed on them by our Saviour, and neither attempted, nor knew how to be [a] Ambassadours of their Masters precepts in wittiness of words and artificiousness of language. But they solely made use of the demonstration of the divine spirit cooperating together with them, and the power of Christ with which they were fully endowed, and which by them performed miracles; and so they published the knowledge of the kingdome of heaven to the whole world; making it the least of their care to be diligent about writing books: And this they did, because they were emploied about a more excellent and more than humane work. Indeed Paul, who was the most powerfull of them all in the furniture of words, and the most able in weighty expressions, hath left in writing nothing more than some very [b] short Epistles; although he could have disclosed innumerable

[a] The word in the Original is πρεσβεύειν, which we translate, to be Ambassadours of, warranted thereto from the same word occurring 2 Cor. 5. 20. and there so translated. This word signifies the Apostolical office, and that from God to men, offering pardon on his part, and requiring on their part reformation for the future. See Dr Hammond on 2 Cor. 5. 20.

[b] It is doubtfull whether Eusebius would call Paul's Epistles short or few: both may be said of them; to wit, that they are few, being in number not above fourteen; and they are short to them that Piously and Religiously read them over. Origen in Libro 5. Expositionum in Evangeli. Johan. calls them, ὀλιγοστίχους, that is, conteining few verses: he that desires to read Origens words, will find them hereafter quoted in the sixth B. of Eusebius. chap. 25. Valesius.

merable ſecrets, becauſe he attained unto a contemplation of thoſe things that are in the third heaven, and being caught up into the divine paradiſe, was voutſafed to hear there unſpeakable words. Moreover the reſt of our Saviours Preachers, both the Twelve Apoſtles, and alſo the Seventy diſciples, together with innumerable others beſides them, were not unexperienced in theſe things. And yet of all the diſciples of the Lord, onely Matthew and John have left us written records; who alſo, as report ſays, were neceſſitated to write. For Matthew, having Preached firſt to the Hebrews, and being about going to other Nations, did in his own Countrey language pen the Goſpel according to him; ſupplying by writing the want of his preſence and converſe among thoſe, [c] whom he was now to leave. Now, when ſoon after Mark and Luke had ſet forth the Goſpels according to them, John, they ſay, ſpent all that time onely in preaching, and at length came to write for this reaſon. The three firſt written Goſpels having been now delivered into the hands of all, and of John himſelf, they ſay, that he approved of them, and confirmed the truth thereof by his own teſtimonie; onely there was wanting in writing an account of thoſe things done by Chriſt at the firſt beginning of his Preaching. And the thing is true. For its evidently perſpicuous, that the other three Evangeliſts have committed to writing onely thoſe things which were done by our Saviour in one years ſpace, after John the Baptiſts being ſhut up in Priſon; and that they have expreſly evidenced the ſame at the beginning of their Hiſtory. For, after the forty days faſt and the Temptation that followed thereupon; Matthew does plainly ſet forth the time of his own writing, ſaying, * When he had heard that John was caſt into priſon, he departed out of Judea into Galilee. And in like manner Mark; † Now after that John, ſays he, was put in priſon, Jeſus came into Galilee. And Luke alſo, before he begins the relation of the Acts of Jeſus, does in like manner make this remark, ſaying, that Herod, adding yet this to all the evills he had done, ſhut up John in priſon. Therefore they ſay, that the Apoſtle John, being for theſe cauſes thereto requeſted, has declared in a Goſpel according to him the time paſſed over in ſilence by the former Evangeliſts, and what was done by our Saviour therein, (and they were the things that he did before the impriſonment of the Baptiſt;) and that he manifeſts the ſame thing, partly when he ſays thus: This beginning of miracles did Jeſus; and partly when he makes mention of the Baptiſt, whileſt He is ſpeaking of the Acts of Jeſus, as being at that time Baptizing in Anon, near to [d] Salem: and this he evidently declares by ſaying thus; For John, ſays he, was not yet caſt into priſon. Therefore John indeed in the penning of the Goſpel according to him declares thoſe things that were done by Chriſt, the Baptiſt being as yet not caſt into priſon; but the other three Evangeliſts give an account of thoſe things Chriſt did after the Baptiſts confinement to priſon. And to him that ſhall attentively conſider theſe things it will not appear that the Goſpels diſagree one with the other; ſeeing the Goſpel according to John contains the firſt part of the Acts of Chriſt; but the remaining three give a relation of what was done by him at the latter end of the time. With good reaſon therefore has John paſſed over in ſilence the Genealogie of our Saviour after the fleſh, as having been before written of by Matthew and Luke; and has begun with his Divinity, reſerved as it were by the divine Spirit for him, as being the more excellent perſon. Let thus much therefore be ſpoken by us concerning the writing of the Goſpel according to John: Now what was the occaſion of writing the Goſpel according to Mark hath been manifeſted by us in what we ſaid * before. And Luke alſo himſelf, in the beginning of his Goſpel, hath ſhewed the cauſe for which he compiled that Hiſtory; for he makes it manifeſt that, becauſe many had raſhly taken in hand to make a declaration of thoſe things which he himſelf moſt certainly knew, he judged it neceſſary to diſengage us from the uncertain conjectures made by others, and therefore hath in his own Goſpel delivered a moſt firm and true account of thoſe things, the evidence whereof himſelf had ſufficiently obtained, having been aſſiſted therein both by the company and converſe of Paul, and alſo by his familiarity with the reſt of the Apoſtles. And thus much now concerning theſe things. But at a more opportune ſeaſon we will endeavour to manifeſt, by a quotation of the Antient writers, what has been ſaid by others concerning this very matter. Among the writings of John, beſides his Goſpel, alſo the former of his Epiſtles hath without controverſie been admitted as genuine both by thoſe men that are modern and alſo by the Antients: The two other writings of his are queſtioned. The opinion concerning his Revelation is even at this time on both ſides much controverted among many: But this controverſie alſo ſhall at a ſeaſonable opportunity be diſcuſſed by the authority of the Antients.

But Chriſtophorſon interprets it otherwiſe; thus, and what ſeemed to be wanting to thoſe from whom he departed whilſt he was preſent with them, that he fully made up by his ſedulity and labour in writing. In which tranſlation this is to be blamed, to wit, in that he ſays Matthew wrote his Goſpel after his departure from the Hebrews, when as Euſebius ſays the contrary; For in the Greek it is ἀφ' ὧν ἐξέλλετο, i. e. from whom he was going. Athanaſius in his Tract *de Libr. CHAP. XXV.

Concerning thoſe Divine writings, which are without controverſie acknowledged; and of thoſe which are not ſuch.

But it will in this place be ſeaſonable ſummarily to reckon up thoſe books of the New Teſtament which have been before mentioned. In the firſt place therefore is to be ranked the four ſacred Goſpels: next to which follows the book of the Acts of the Apoſtles: after that are to be reckoned the Epiſtles of Paul; after which follows that which is called the firſt Epiſtle of John, and in like manner the Epiſtle of Peter is to be admitted as authentick. Then is to be placed, if you think good, the Revelation of John: the opinions concerning which I will in due place declare. And theſe are the books that with general conſent are acknowledged. Among thoſe which are queſtioned as doubtfull, which yet are approved and mentioned by many, is that which is called the Epiſtle of James, and that of Jude, alſo the ſecond Epiſtle of Peter, and thoſe called the ſecond and third Epiſtles of John, whether they were written by the Evangeliſt, or another of the ſame name with him. mongst the [a] Spurious works let there be ranked, both the work intituled the Acts of Paul, and the book called Pastor, and the Revelation of Peter; and moreover that which is called the Epistle of Barnabas, and that named the [b] Doctrines of the Apostles; and moreover, as I said, the Revelation of John (if you think good) which some, as I have said, doe reject, but others allow of and admit among those books that are received as unquestionable and undoubted. And among these some doe now number the [c] Gospel according to the Hebrews, with which those of the Hebrews that have embraced the faith of Christ are chiefly delighted. All these books may be questioned as doubtfull. And I thought it requisite to make a Catalogue of these also, that we may discriminate those Scriptures that according to Ecclesiastical tradition are true, and unforged, and with general consent received as undoubted, from those other books which are not such, nor incorporated into the New Testament, but are questioned as doubtfull; which yet have been acknowledged and allowed of by many Ecclesiastical persons: and further that we may know these very books, and those other that have been put forth by Hereticks under the name of the Apostles, containing as well the supposed Gospels of Peter, Thomas, and Matthias, and of some others besides them; as also the supposed Acts of Andrew and John, and other of the Apostles. Of which books no [d] Ecclesiastical writer even from the Apostles times hitherto hath in any of his works voutsafed to make the least mention. But moreover also, the manner of the phrase and the stile wherein they are written are much different from the Apostolick natural propriety and innate simplicity: and the meaning and drift of those things delivered in these books, being mightily dissonant from Orthodoxal truth, doth manifestly evince that they are the forgeries of Heretical men. Upon which account they are not to be ranked amongst the Spurious writings, but altogether to be rejected, as wholly absurd, and impious. But we will now proceed to what follows of our History.

[a] Eusebius does here use this word [νόθοις] very improperly, to wit, to signifie those books whose authority is doubtfull; whereas those books are to be called νόθοι, which are adulterated and forged by Hereticks, of which sort he makes mention at the end of this chapter, which that it may more manifestly appear, you must understand, there are three sorts of Sacred Books. Some are without controversie true; others without controversie false; a third sort are those, of which the antients doubted. This latter sort can't be called νόθοι, because many accounted them to be genuine: it remains therefore that the second sort onely be called νόθοι, i. e. Spurious books. Of which sort is Pauls Epistle to the Laodiceans, which S^t Ferom says was with one consent exploded by all. But Eusebius corrects himself in chap. 31. of this Third book, where he manifestly differences the Spurious Books from those which are doubtfull. See his words there. Gregory Naz. in Iambico carmine ad Seleucum, manifestly confirms our opinion. For of the books of Sacred Scripture, some, says he, are genuine and true, which he there reckons up; others are suppositious, which he calls νόθους, Spurious; a third sort he makes those to be, which come neareſt to those books that are genuine, which division Gregory had from Origen, out of his 13 Tome of Explanat. in Joban. But to speak properly, there are but two sorts of Sacred books, those namely that are true, and those whose authority is asserted by some, and questioned by others. For the Spurious books deserve not to be reckoned amongst the Sacred Books. Vales.

[b] Concerning this book see the Learned Arch-Bishop Usher in his dissertation on Ignatius Epistles, Chap. 7. Edit. Oxon. 1644.

[c] Concerning this Gospel, S^t Ferome, in Catalogo, where he, speaking of James the brother of our Lord, says thus, Evangelium quoque quod appellatur secundum Hebraeos, & à me nuper in Græcum-Latinumque Sermonem translatum est, quo & Origenes sæpe utitur, &c. Julianus Pelagianus, Lib. 4. speaks of this Gospel, where he accuses Ferome, because in his dialogue against the Pelagians he made use of an authority of a fifth Gospel, which he himself had translated into Latine. But that which Eusebius adds, that the Jews which embraced Christianity are chiefly delighted with this Gospel, makes him seem to mean the Nazareans and Ebionites; for they use to reade that Gospel written in Hebrew, as S^t Ferom shews, in Esaia c. 11. and in Ezech. c. 18. Vales.

[d] Eusebius speaks not here of the successours of the Apostles, which title belongs onely to Bishops; but he speaks of the Ecclesiastical writers who in a perpetual succession have flourished in the Church. Therefore ἅπαν καὶ διαδοχὰς ἐκκλησιαστικῶν, is the same as ἅπαν καθ' ἑκάστας χρείας ἐκκλησιαστικῶν, i. e. of the Ecclesiastical writers in every Age. For, as heretofore among the Jews there was a succession of Prophets, though sometimes interrupted (as Josephus says in his first book against Apion;) so in the Church there always was a succession of Learned men and Writers which were called Ecclesiasticks. Moreover in the M. SS. Maz. Med. & Fuk. it is written καὶ τὰς διαδοχὰς, with the Article. Vales.

CHAP. XXVI.

Menander, succeeding Simon Magus, shewed himself to be, as to his disposition and manners, a second [a] Dart of Diabolical force no whit inferiour to the former. He also was a [b] Samaritan; and, arriving to no less height of imposture than his master, abounded much more in greater and more monstrous illusions: For he said that he himself was a Saviour, sent from above for the salvation of men from invisible ages; and he taught that no man could otherwise overcome the Angels the makers of this world, unless he were first instituted in the Magical knowledge delivered by him, and initiated in the baptism by him imparted. Of which baptism those that were adjudged worthy, they, he affirmed, would be partakers of a perpetual immortality in this very life; they should be no longer subject to death; but continuing in this present life should be always young and immortal. And indeed its easie to know all this from the books of Ireneus. And Justinus in like manner having made mention of Simon, adds also a narration of this man, saying; "And we knew "one Menander, a Samaritan also of the village "Caparattæ, a disciple of Simon, who being "moved by the fury of devils, and coming to "Antioch, seduced many by Magical art; who "also perswaded his followers that they should "not die; and at this time there are some of his "Sect that profess the same. Wherefore it was the device of the Diabolical power by such Impostours, going under the name of Christians, to endeavour to calumniate by Magick the great Mystery of Godliness, and by them to expose to reproach the Ecclesiastical opinions concerning the immortality of the Soul, and the Resurrection of the dead. But those who joyned themselves to such Saviours as followers of them, were frustrated of the true hope.

[a] I wonder that all Interpreters have erred in the translation of this word. Rufinus renders it Scutum, a buckler; Langus and Musculus, armaturam, armour: Christophorson, propugnaculum, a bulwark. But ὅπλον here signifies telum, a dart. Therefore ὅπλον τῆς διαβολικῆς ἐνεργείας is the same with ὄργανον, an instrument of diabolical force. Vales.

[b] In four of our M. SS. copies, to wit, Maz. Med. Fuk. & S^t Hen. Savills I found a far different punctation of this place from that which Christophorson followed, as appears by his version. For in the said M. SS. it is thus pointed, ὅπλον δὲ ὑπῆρχεν τὸ πρότερον, τῆς διαβολικῆς ἐνεργείας κατεδείκνυτο τὸ τρόπον· ἦν γὰρ οὗτος σαμαρεύς. And truly this punctation is far better than the vulgar. For what can the meaning of these words be [τὸ τρόπον ἦν γὰρ αὐτὸς σαμαρεύς?] I know the Jews hated the Samaritans, as the worst of men; in so much that the name of Samaritan was accounted by the Jews the greatest reproach. But here Menanders countrey is spoken of; his manners Eusebius speaks of hereafter. Moreover he is said to be a Samaritan in the same sense that Justin in Apologet. and Clemens in Libr. Recognit. calls Simon a Samaritan; i. e. he was of the Province or Countrey of Samaria, he came not out of the very City Samaria. For Simon was of the Village Gitton; but Menander of the Village Caparattæ. Vales.

[b] Theſe words [ἁπλῶς καὶ ἀβασανίστως, i. e. ſimply and raſhly] ought to be referred to the word, [καθαπτόμενος, i. e. aſſenting to] and not to the word [εἰρημένῳ, i. e. this ſaying:] which being not minded by Chriſtophorſon, he widely miſtook Clemens his meaning. For Clemens does not ſay that that fact, or that ſaying was done or ſaid by Nicholas raſhly and inconſiderately. Yea he declares in the 2d of his Stromatῶν about the latter end, that this ſaying [δεῖ φθείρεσθαι τῇ σαρκί] was one of Nicholas his Apophthegms, or Pithy ſpeeches. Which ſaying of his, his followers interpreted ſo, as if Nicholas had commanded every one to abuſe his fleſh with all manner of voluptuouſneſs and laſciviouſneſs: but Nicholas meant the clean contrary by this his ſpeech, to wit, that the fleſh ought not to be indulged too, but to be kept under, and wearied out with continual exerciſes of virtue. Valeſ.

TRAJAN. "ters remained virgins when they were old; and "his son continued undefiled by women. Which "things being thus, his bringing of his wife, (over "whom he was said to be jealous) forth before "the Apostles, was a sign of his rejecting and "bridling his passion; and by those words of his "[that we ought to abuse the flesh] [c] he taught "continence and an abstaining from those plea- "sures which are with so much earnestness de- "sired by men. For, I suppose, he would not "(according to our Saviours commandment) serve "two masters, pleasure and the Lord. Moreover, "they say, that Matthias taught the same doctrine; "that we should war against the flesh, and abuse "it, allowing it nothing of pleasure; but that we "should inrich the soul by Faith and Knowledge. Let thus much therefore be spoken concerning those who endeavoured about that time to deprave the truth, but on a sudden were wholly extinct.

[c] These words are spoken by Clemens Alexandrinus by way of Enallage; for thus they are to be taken, as if he had said τὸ ἐγκρατεύεσθαι τῆς σαρκὸς, τὴν ἐγκράτειαν ἠσκευῶν ἐδίδαξε, i. e. by those words of his [that we ought to abuse the flesh] He taught continencie and an abstaining from pleasures, &c. Vales.

CHAP. XXX.

Concerning those Apostles that are found to have been married.

BUt Clemens, whose words we even now recited, after that passage of his before quoted, does reckon up those Apostles that are found to have been married, upon account of such as despise marriage; "saying, what will they reprehend even "the Apostles also? For Peter and Philip begat "children; and Philip matcht his daughters to "husbands. Paul also, in one of his Epistles "fears not to name his wife, whom he carried not "about with him, that he might with more expe- "dition perform his Ministration. But because we have mentioned these things, it will not be troublesome to produce also another story of his worthily memorable, which he hath set forth in the seventh of his Stromatῶn after this manner; "Now they say that S[t] Peter, seeing his wife led "to be put to death, rejoyced because she was called "by God, and because she was returning home: "and that calling her by her name he exhorted and "comforted her, saying, O woman Remember the "Lord. Such was the wedlock of the Saints, and "such the entire affection of most dear friends. And thus much, being pertinent to the subject now in hand, we have here seasonably placed.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Death of John and Philip.

INdeed, both the time and manner of the death of Paul and Peter, and moreover the place where after their departure out of this life their bodies were deposited, we have before manifested: concerning the time of John's death we have already also in some sort spoken: but the place of Sepulchre is demonstrated by the Epistle of Polycrates (who was Bishop of the Ephesian Church) which he wrote to Victor Bishop of Rome; wherein he mentions both him and also Philip the Apostle and his daughters after this manner. "For "also in Asia the great [a] Lights are dead; which "shall be raised again at the last day, the day of "the Lord's coming, wherein he shall come with "glory from heaven, and shall find out all his "Saints. I mean [b] Philip one of the twelve A- "postles who died at Hierapolis; and two of his "daughters who continued virgins to the end of "their lives. Also his other [c] daughter who having "lived by the guidance of the Holy Ghost, died at "Ephesus. And moreover John, who leaned on the "breast of the Lord, and was a Priest and wore "a [d] plate of gold, and was a Martyr and a Do- "ctor; this John, I say, died at Ephesus. And thus much concerning their deaths. And also in the Dialogue of Caius, of which we a little before made mention, Proculus, against whom he instituted the dispute, agreeing with what we have inforced concerning the death of Philip and his daughters, says thus, "After that also, the four Pro- "pheteses the daughters of Philip were at Hiera- "polis a City of Asia, their Sepulchre is there, "and also their fathers. Thus he, Luke likewise in the Acts of the Apostles makes mention of the daughters of Philip that lived then at Cæsarea of Judæa with their father, who were endowed with the gift of Prophecy, saying word for word thus: "We came unto Cæsarea and we "entred into the house of Philip the Evangelist "(which was one of the seven) and abode with "him. And the same man had four daughters, "virgins, which did Prophecie. Having thus far therefore treated of those things which came to our knowledge both concerning the [e] Apostles and the Apostolick times, and the Sacred Writings they left us, both those that are questioned as doubtfull which yet are publickly read by many in most Churches, and those also that are altogether Spurious and Repugnant to Apostolical sound Doctrine, we now proceed to the subsequent part of our History.

TRAJAN.

[a] Μεγάλα στοιχεῖα. Jerome and Musculus translate it Elementa, elements, or foundations. Christophorson turns it Seminaria, Seedplotts: but Rufinus, best of all, calls it Lumina, Lights. For the Grecians were wont to call the signes of the Zodiack στοιχεῖα. So Diogen. Laert. in the Life of Menedemus. Now the Heathens called those signes so, because they thought the principles of the lives and fortunes of men were placed in them. See Epiphan. in Hæres. Pharisæorum. Vales.

[b] Christophorson in this place did in no wise perform the office of a good translatour, who for Philip one of the Twelve Apostles put in Philip one of the seven Deacons. It was an antient mistake, to confound Philip the Deacon and Evangelist with Philip the Apostle. And because they read, Acts 21. v. 8, 9. that Philip had four daughters, virgins, that Propheciced, they asserted Philip the Apostle was married and begot daughters. So, besides Polycrates, Clemens Alexandrinus said in the foregoing chap. and so said Papeas, as we shall see hereafter. But from the Acts of the Apostles it may be manifestly gathered, that Philip the Deacon (he that Baptized the Eunuch and that had the four daughters that were Propheteses) was not the same with Philip the Apostle, but another man. See Isidore Pelusiota, in his first book Epist. 447. and so on, where he evidently demonstrates this. Vales.

[c] This third daughter of Philip, Polycrates separates from the other two which died virgins; whence it may be collected that she was married. Neither is this repugnant to the Acts c. 21. For it may be answered that then when these things were done that Luke mentions, Philip's daughters were virgins: but afterwards one of them was given in marriage by her father. And Clemens Alexandrinus seems to intimate thus much in those words of his, which Eusebius quotes in the foregoing chap. Moreover Christophorson confounds this third daughter of Philips with the two former. Whose translation did much trouble Baronius as appears from his Annals. ad Annum Christi 58. chap. 113. Eusebius repeats this passage of Polycrates in his fifth book chap. 24. where Christophorson does rightly distinguish the three daughters of Philip, and amends his former errour. But it may here be deservedly questioned, why Polycrates mentions onely three daughters of Philips, whereas in the Acts they are counted four. I answer Polycrates mentioned onely those that died and were buried in Asia, as may be seen from his whole Epistle which is recited in the fifth book of Eusеb. Hist. seeing therefore one of the four daughters died at Cæsarea, or some where else, upon that account Polycrates mentions her not. Moreover of these daughters of Philip, one was called Hermione, the other Eutychis. For so it is in Menæo Græcorum die 4 Sept. See the place. Vales.

[d] Τὸ πέταλον, that's the word in Polycrates here quoted by Eusebius. The 72 use this word Exod. 28. 36. for so they translate ציץ the Hebrew word there, which properly signifies a flour, but by our translatours is in English rendred a plate there, and afterwards, Exod. 39. 30. it is called a plate of the Holy crown. It was a long plate of gold, two fingers broad, and reacht from one ear of the Priest to the other, says Maimon. in his Treatise of the Implements of the Sanctuary, Chap. 9. Sect. 1. See Ainsworth on the Pentat.

[e] In our four M. SS. copies, Maz. Med. Fuk. and S[t] Hen. Savills I found it written περὶ τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων αὐτῶν, i. e. concerning the Apostles themselves, the word αὐτῶν being in them added. Vales.

CHAP. XXXII.

How Simeon the Bishop of Jerusalem suffered Martyrdom.

AFter the persecution of Nero and Domitian, Report goes, that under this Emperour whose times we now recount there was a persecution raised against us by piece-meal throughout every City, which proceeded from a popular insurrection. In which we have by tradition received that [a] Simeon the son of Cleophas, who we declared was constituted the second Bishop of the Church at Jerusalem, finished his life by Martyrdom. And this the same Writer attesteth, several words of whose we have before quoted, that is Hegesippus. Who, giving a relation of certain Hereticks, adds; that this Simeon, being at that time by them accused and tormented divers ways, and for the space of many days because he was a Christian, struck with a great amazement both the Judge and those about him, and at length died by the same kind of suffering that the Lord did. Nothing hinders but that we may hear the Writer relating these things word for word, thus; "Some of those Hereticks accused Simeon "the son of Cleophas, as being a descendant from "David, and a Christian; and so he suffered "Martyrdom when he was an hundred and twen-"ty years old, under Trajan the Emperour, and "[b] Atticus of the Consular "order then President of Sy-"ria. And the same Authour says that those his accusers, (such as were of the Royal family of the Jews being at that time sought for) happened to be convicted, as belonging to that family. Now, should any one say that this Simeon was one of those who both saw and heard the Lord, he would speak what is in no wise absurd, having as an undoubted evidence thereof the great length of his Life, and the mention made in the Gospels of Mary the wife of Cleophas; whose son that he was, *our former words have manifested. Also the same writer says that others, related to one of those called the brethren of our Saviour (whose name was Judas) lived untill this †Emperour's Reign, after their profession of the Faith of Christ under Domitian, *before which we mentioned. For thus he writeth, "They come therefore and preside over the whole "Church, as being Martyrs, and of the Kindred of "our Lord. And a profound Peace ensuing over "the whole Church, they continued alive till the "times of Trajan the Emperour, untill the foresaid "Simeon, the son of Cleo-"phas (who was [c] Uncle to "our Lord) being accused "by the [d] Hereticks, was in "like manner also impeacht "for the [e] same thing before "Atticus the president. And "being cruelly tortured for "many days he with constancie professed the Faith of Christ; in so "much that the President and all those about him "wondred greatly, how a man of an hundred and "twenty years old as he was, could have endured "such torments. And in fine, it was ordered he "should be crucified. Moreover the same man, relating what was done in those times, adds, that untill then the [f] Church continued a pure and undefiled Virgin; those who endeavoured to corrupt the sound Rule of wholesom Doctrine, if any such persons there were, absconding themselves hitherto in obscure darkness. But after the sacred company of the Apostles was by various kinds of death become extinct, and that generation of those men, who were accounted worthy to hear with their own ears the divine wisdom, was gone, then the conspiracy of impious errour took its rise from the deceit of false Teachers; who, in as much as not one of the Apostles was then surviving, did now at length with a bare face attempt to Preach up ——— the knowledge falsely so called, in opposition to the doctrine of the Truth. [g] And thus much this Authour, treating of these things, has after this manner said. But we will proceed to what in order follows of our History.

TRAJAN.

[a] In the Kings M. S. it is Σίμωνα, Simon, as Rob. Stephens observed. Ferom, in Chronico, testifies that the name of this Bishop of Jerusalem was written two ways, to wit, Simeon and Simon. The same Georg. Syncellus observes, and also the Authour Chronici Alexandrini. Vales.

[b] That is, when Atticus was Deputy of Syria. The Syrians used to shew their years, by the name of these their presidents. Moreover, of the Emperours Deputies some were of the Consular order; others of the Pretorian. Wherefore Atticus is here called ὑπατικὸς, to shew that he was of the Consular order, or had been Consul. In the M. S. copies of Rufinus his translation (that is in the Kings Librarie) it is, Martyr effectus est cum esset annorum centum XXV. i. e. he was Martyred when he was 125. years old. Vales.

[d] The Authour Chronici Alexandrini supposes that the Cerinthian Hereticks and the Nicholaites are here meant: to whom I doe not assent. Hegesippus means those Sects which at that time were potent at Jerusalem, to wit, the Pharisees, Sadducees, and others, of whom hereafter, at book 4. chap. 22. Vales.

[e] That is, because he Preacht the Faith of Christ, as he said before, and says again, B. 4. chap. 22. Vales.

[f] This Hegesippus spoke of the Church of Jerusalem in particular, to wit, that it continued a Virgin untill the death of Symeon, unto Trajans time. The words of Hegesippus you will meet with hereafter, at chap. 22. B. 4. Eusebius seems to have attributed that to the whole Church which Hegesippus spake of the Church at Jerusalem in particular. Vales.

[g] All these words, to the end of the chapter, are wanting in the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. neither doth Rufinus acknowledge them in his translation, as appears therefrom. And this whole clause seems to me to be Spurious and suppositious. For whosoever added it, thought the words that went before were Hegesippus his; whereas they are not his, but Eusebius's, as we may see from chap. 22. B. 4. Vales.

CHAP. XXXIII.

How Trajan forbad that the Christians should be sought after.

MOreover, so great a persecution raged against us at that time in many places, that Plinius Secundus the most eminent amongst the Governours of Provinces, being moved at the multitude of Martyrs, gave the Emperour an account of the great numbers of those that were destroyed, because of their faith; and together therewith certified him, that he found they did nothing of impiety, nor acted any thing contrary to the Laws; onely that they rose at break of day, and sung Hymns to Christ, as unto God; but that they abhor'd the commission of Adultery and Murder, and such like horrid crimes; and that they did all things consonant to the Laws. Upon account of which Trajan made this Edict, That the Christians should not be sought out; but if by accident they were lighted on, they should be punished. Which being done, the most vehement heat of the persecution that lay heavy upon us was in some measure quenched: But to those who had a mind to doe us mischief there remained pretexts no whit less fair and specious; in some places the people, in others the Rulers of the Provinces, forming treacheries against us; in so much that even when there was no open and general persecution, yet there were particular ones throughout the Provinces, and very many of the Faithfull underwent various sorts of Martyrdomes. We have taken this account out of Tertullians Apology, written in Latine (of which we before made mention) the translation whereof is thus; "But we "have found that the inquisition after us has been "prohibited. For Plinius Secundus, when he "was Governour of the Province, having con-"demned some Christians, and deprived other "some,

TRAJAN. "some, being at length troubled at their great "number, asked advice of Trajan then the Em- "perour, what he should doe with the Residue, say- "ing, that, besides their obstinacy in not sacri- "ficing, he found nothing of impiety in their re- "ligious mysteries, onely that they held early as- "semblies in singing Hymns to Christ as unto

[a] He that translated the words of Tertullian into Greek has rendred them unhappily. For neither does ἐπιχώμιον signifie discipline, nor διαφιλόσοφον, to agree together. I would therefore rather translate these words of Tertullian thus, ᾗ ἵνα ὥσπερ τὸ σύμβολον ἔχωσι τῆς αὐτῶν πολιτείας, i. e. and that they had a certain summary of their polity. Valef.

"God, and that they had a [a] certain summary of "their polity; that they forbad Murder, Adultery, "Fraud, Perfidiousness, and such like crimes. Then "Trajan returned answer, that those sort of men "should not indeed be diligently sought out, but "if by chance [b] they were lighted on and brought "before the Governours, they should be punished. And this was then the posture of affairs.

[b] Here also the Greek translatour of Tertullian hath done ill; for Tertullian, or rather Trajan, calls those Oblatos, who were brought in before the Judges; for so the Latines use to speak. The sense therefore of the Emperour Trajans Rescript against the Christians is this, that the Governours of Provinces should not too diligently hunt after the Christians by sending out Spies and Officers to take them, but if any Christians were by chance found out by their Officers, or if they were made appear to be such by their accusers, that then they ought to be punished. Valef.

CHAP. XXXIV.

That Evaresus was the Fourth that Governed the Roman Church.

CLemens, one of the Roman Bishops, having left his Episcopal Office to Evaresus, finished his life in the third year of the foresaid Emperours Reign; when he had had the charge of the doctrine of the Divine word for full nine years space.

CHAP. XXXV.

That Justus was the Third that Governed the Church at Jerusalem.

BUt moreover, Simeon having finished his life after the foresaid manner, a certain Jew, by name Justus, succeeded in the Episcopal Seat at Jerusalem; there being then an innumerable company of the Circumcision (of which he was one) that believed in Christ.

CHAP. XXXVI.

MOreover, at this time Polycarpe a disciple of the Apostles flourished in Asia, to whom was committed the Bishoprick of the Church at Smyrna, by those that saw and ministred to the Lord. At the same time [a] Papias was famous, who also was Bishop of the Church at Hierapolis, a man most eminently learned and eloquent, and knowing in the Scriptures. Ignatius also, renowned amongst many even to this day, who was chosen Bishop of Antioch, being the second in succession there, after Peter. Report goes that this man was sent from Syria to Rome to be made food for wild beasts, upon account of the profession of his faith in Christ. And being led through Asia under the custody of a most watchfull guard, he confirmed the Churches in every City through which he passed, by discourses and exhortations; warning them most especially to take heed of the Heresies, which then first sprung up and increased. And he exhorted them firmly to keep the traditions of the Apostles, which he thought necessary for the more certain knowledge of posterity to be put in writing, having confirmed them by his own testimony. Coming therefore at length to Smyrna, where Polycarpe then was, he wrote one Epistle to the Church at Ephesus, mentioning Onesimus the Pastour there: and another to the Church at Magnesia standing on the River Meander, wherein again he makes mention of Damas the Bishop. And another to the Church at Trallis, the Governour whereof at that time he declares was Polybius. Besides these Epistles he wrote also to the Church at Rome, wherein he earnestly beseeches them that they would not intreat him to avoid Martyrdom, least they should defraud him of his desired Hope. Out of which Epistle 'tis worth our quoting some short passages, for the confirmation of what we have said. Thus therefore he writes word for word; "From Syria "to Rome I fight with beasts, by sea and land, day "and night, bound to ten Leopards, that is, to a file "of Souldiers, who being kindly treated by me, be- "come [b] worse. But by their "injuries I am the more in- "structed; but for all that "I am not justified. Oh! "that I might enjoy the wild "beasts that are provided for "me! which I even heartily "wish may be found to be "fierce! which I will allure "to devour me immediately, "that they spare me not, as "out of fear they have left "some untoucht. But if they "be unwilling to doe it, I "will compell them by force. "Pardon me; I know what "is good for me: Now I "begin to be a disciple: "[c] Let nothing visible or in- "visible divert me from, or "envy my happiness of, at- "taining Christ Jesus. Let "Fire, and the Cross, the as- "saults of the wild beasts, the "pulling asunder of bones, "the cutting off of members, "the stamping in pieces of the whole body, the pu- "nishment of the Devil come upon me; so I may "obtain Christ Jesus. And thus much he wrote from the foresaid City to the Churches before named. Being now gone beyond Smyrna, he from Troas again sent Letters to those at Philadelphia, also to the Church at Smyrna, and privately to Polycarpe the Prelate thereof: to whom, because he well knew him to be an Apostolical man, he entrusted his flock at Antioch, being a very true and good Pastour; requesting him, that he would have a diligent care thereof. The same person writing to those of Smyrna, borrows some words, which whence he had I [d] know not;

[b] In the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. 'tis read χείρονες γίνονται. A little after I read, with Isaac Vossius, ἃ ἐγὼ εὔχομαι σύντομά μοι εὑρεθῆναι, that is, which I heartily wish may be found to be fierce, which amendment Rufinus his translation confirms. For thus he turns it, Quas & ego opto acriores parari. Therefore Rufinus read, σύντομα, not σύντομα, which signifies [soon, or straight-ways.] the same errour is amended by us hereafter, in the sixth book; for there συντόμως was Printed for συντόνως. Valef. But Bishop Usher reads χείρους; and also, σύντομα. See his Annot. on this Epistle, number 48.

[c] It is as much as if Ignatius had said, Let nothing envy me the Glory of being a disciple of Christ; Let no man pluck me from his Embraces. The holy Martyr alludes, as he uses to doe, to those words of St Paul, who shall separate us from the Love of Christ? Rom. 8. 35. Valef. See Bishop Usher's notes on Ignatius Epist. to the Romans, number 52.

[a] This whole elogue of Papias is wanting in our M. SS. copies, Maz. Med. and Fuk. Neither did Rufinus read these words in his copies, as may be gathered from his translation. Wherefore I doubt not but they were inserted by some unskilfull Scholiast, against the mind and opinion of Eusebius. For how can it be, that Eusebius should here stile Papias a man most excellently learned, and very skilfull in the Scriptures, whenas himself does at the end of this book expresly affirm, that Papias was a man of an ordinary wit, and altogether ignorant and simple. Valef.

[d] This passage of Ignatius his concerning Christ is taken out of the Gospel according to the Hebrews; which was either omitted by Eusebius, or unknown to him. Jerome, in his book de Ecclesiast. Scriptr. informs us hereof; as also in his 18 B. of Commentaries on Esaiah. See Ushers Annotat. on Ignatius his Epistles. pag. 48. number 23.

Concerning thoſe Preachers of the Goſpel who at that time were eminent.

AMong thoſe who were illuſtrious in thoſe times Quadratus was one, who, as Fame ſays, flouriſhed at the ſame time with the daughters of Philip, in the gift of prophecy. Many others alſo beſides theſe were famous at that time, having obtained the firſt place among the ſucceſſours of the Apoſtles. Who, becauſe they were the [a] eminent diſciples of ſuch men, built up thoſe Churches, the foundations whereof were every where laid by the Apoſtles; promoting greatly the doctrine of the Goſpel, and ſcattering the ſalutary ſeed of the Kingdom of heaven at large over the whole world. For many of the then diſciples, whoſe ſouls were inflamed by the divine Word with a more ardent deſire of Philoſophy, firſt fulfilled our Saviours commandment, by diſtributing their ſubſtance to thoſe that were neceſſitous; then after that travelling abroad, they performed the work of Evangeliſts to thoſe who as yet had not at all heard the word of Faith; being very ambitious to Preach Chriſt, and to deliver the Books of the divine Goſpels. And theſe perſons, having onely laid the foundation of faith in remote and barbarous places, and conſtituted other Paſtours, committed to them the culture of thoſe they had perfectly introduced to the faith, departed again to other Regions and nations, accompained with the Grace and cooperation of God. For the divine Spirit as yet wrought many wonderfull works by them; inſomuch that at the firſt hearing, innumerable multitudes of men did with moſt ready minds altogether admit of and engage themſelves in the worſhip of that God who is the Maker of all things. But it being impoſſible for us to recount by name all thoſe who in the firſt ſucceſſion of the Apoſtles were Paſtours or Evangeliſts in the Churches throughout the world, we will here commit to writing the mention of their names onely, whoſe writings, containing the Apoſtolical doctrine they delivered, are to this day extant amongſt us. CHAP. XXXVIII.

Concerning the Epiſtle of Clemens, and thoſe other Writings, which are falſly attributed to him.

AS for example, the Epiſtles of Ignatius, which we have reckoned up, and that of Clemens acknowledged by all as undoubted, which he wrote in the name of the Roman to the Corinthian Church. Wherein, ſeeing he has inſerted many ſentences taken out of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, and ſometimes had made uſe of the expreſs words of it, it evidently manifeſts that that work is not new; whence it has ſeemed agreeable to reaſon to reckon this Epiſtle amongſt the reſt of the Writings of that Apoſtle. For Paul having written to the Hebrews in his own country Language, ſome ſay that Luke the Evangeliſt, but others that this Clemens, of whom we ſpeak, tranſlated that work. Which latter ſeems the trueſt opinion, becauſe the ſtile both of Clemens his Epiſtle, and alſo of that to the Hebrews appeares to be very like; and the ſenſe and expreſſions in both the works are not much different. You muſt alſo know that there is a ſecond Epiſtle, which is ſaid to be Clemens his: But we know for certain that this is not ſo generally acknowledged, nor approved of as the former, becauſe we are ſure the Antients have not quoted any authorities out of it. Further alſo, ſome have of late produced other voluminous and large works, as if they were his, containing the [a] Dialogues of Peter and [b] Apion; [c] of which there is not the leaſt mention extant amongſt the Antients; neither does there appear in them the [d] pure form of Apoſtolical ſound doctrine. Now therefore 'tis apparent which are the genuine and undoubted writings of Clemens: we have alſo ſpoken ſufficiently concerning the works of Ignatius and Polycarpe.

[a] In the tenth book Recognit. of Clemens Romanus there is mention of Appion, who is ſaid to have come to Antioch with Anubion about the ſame time that the Apoſtle Peter came thither. But there is nothing ſaid there of Peters diſpute with Appion. What ſhall we ſay then? that the book of Clemens which contains Peters diſpute with Appion is different from his books Recognit? To me indeed they ſeem not to be two books. For if there had been two books of Clemens's, the one Recognit. the other containing the diſpute of Peter with Appion, why ſhould Euſebius mention one onely, and omit the other? There was therefore but one book of Clemens's entitled περόδοις, or περιόδοι Πέτρου. But 'twas divided into two parts; the former mentioned Matidia and Fauſtinianus to be acknowledged of their children; in the ſecond part was contained the dialogues of Peter and Appion. Indeed Rufinus, who tranſlated that book of Clemens's into Latine, does teſtifie, in his Epiſtle to Gaudentius the Biſhop, that there were two parts of this book in the Greek; in the one of which ſome things occurred which the other had not: he writes alſo that on ſet purpoſe he omitted ſome things, becauſe they diſagreed from ſound doctrine. Valeſ.

[b] This name is written with a double p, in all our M. SS. but that of Mr Fukett, where tis writ with a ſingle p, as it is in Joſephus and others. Photius, in Biblioth. chap. 112, agrees with our copies; and and Clemens also in B. 10. Recognit. where he says that Appion Pliſtonicensis came to Antioch with Anubion. Lastly Agellius, in his 6 B. says Appion Græcus homo qui pliſtonices eſt appellatus. Undoubtedly Appion is a Roman name, wrested into a Greek form, as is μαξίων, κοδρατίων, and the like. Appion was a common name amongst the Egyptians, derived from Apis, whom they worshipped; as, Serapion, Anubion, and the like. Ptolemæus King of the Cyrenæ was called Apion. Wherefore seeing this Grammarian the son of Pliſtonices was an Egyptian, it seems that he should be called Apion, rather than Appion. For Appion that was Consul in Juſtinians time, the Latine Annalls calls Appion; but the Chronicon Alexandrinum calls him Apion. Valeſ.

c But Origen, in his 3d B. Explanat. on Geneſis, makes mention of these books of Clemens's; and quotes a passage out of them, which is still extant in the books of Clemens's Recognit. This quotation of Origens is in the 22 chap. Philocal. (pag. 81. Edit. Cambr. 1658.) and in the common editions of that piece the place is said to be taken out of his B. 2. against Celſus; but in the books of Origen against Celſus now extant, it is not to be found. This quotation out of Clemens is indeed in his 3d B. Explanat. on Geneſis. — But I have observed that Origen does often quote books, whose authority is unknown; wherein he does, like the Bee, gather honey from venomous flowers. Valeſ.

d Photius testifies the same, chap. 112. Biblioth. and before him, Ruſinus in his Epistle to Gaudentius the Bishop, to wit, that in those books Recognit. of Clemens's there are some things said concerning the Son of God, which disagree from the true rule of Faith, and make for the opinion of the Arrians. Epiphanius, in Hereſ. Ebionæorum chap. 15. does expresly affirm, that those books of Clemens Romanus, entitled πέτρου κήρυγμα, were corrupted and falsified by the Ebionites. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Concerning the Books of Papias.

THe Books of Papias now extant, are five in number, which he entitled, an explication of the Oracles of the Lord. Irenæus mentions no more than these five to have been written by him, saying thus; "And these things Papias, the Au "ditour of John, the companion of Polycarpe, one "of the antients, attests in writing, in the fourth of "his books; for he compiled five. Thus far Irenæus. But Papias, in the preface to his books, does not evidence himself to have been a beholder, or an Auditour of the Holy Apostles, but onely, that he received the matters of faith from those who were well known to them; which he declares in these words; "But it shall not be tedious to "me, to [a] set down in or- "der together with my in- "terpretations, those things "which I have well learnt "from the Elders, and faith- "fully remembred, the truth "whereof will be confirmed "by me. For I delighted not "in those who speak much, "as most doe, but in those "that teach the truth: nor "in those who recite strange and unusual precepts; "but in such as faithfully rehearse the command- "ments given by the Lord, and which proceed "from the truth. Now if at any time I met with a- "ny one that had converst with the Elders, I made a "diligent enquiry after their sayings, what Andrew, "or what Peter said; or what Philip, or Thomas, "or James, or John, or Matthew, or any other of "the Lords disciples, were wont to say: And "what Ariſtion, and John the Elder (the disciples "of our Lord) uttered. For I thought that "those things contained in books could not pro- "fit me so much, as what I heard from the mouths "of men yet surviving. In which words its very observable that he recounts the name of John twice; the former of whom he reckons among Peter, James, Matthew, and the rest of the Apostles; manifestly shewing thereby that he speaks of John the Evangelist: but, making a distinction in his words, he places the other John with those who are not of the number of the Apostles; putting Ariſtion before him; and expresly calls him The Elder. So that hereby is shown the truth of their relation, who have said that there were two in Asia who had that same name; and that there are two Sepulchres at Epheſus, and each of them now called the Sepulchre of John. Now I judged it very requisite to make this observation. For its likely that the second, (unless any one would rather have it to be the first) saw that Revelation which goes under the name of John. Further, this Papias, whom we speak of, professes he received the sayings of the Apostles from those who had been conversant with them; and was, as he says, the hearer of Ariſtion and John the Elder. Indeed he mentions them often by name, and has set down in his works those traditions he received from them. And thus much has been said by us, not unprofitably, as we judge. It is also worth our adding to the fore-quoted words of Papias, other relations of the same Authours, wherein he gives an account of some miracles, and other passages, which he received by tradition. Indeed, that Philip the Apostle together with his daughters lived at Hierapolis, has been manifested by what we said * before. Now we are to shew, that Papias, who lived at the same time, mentions his receiving a wonderfull narration from the daughters of Philip. For he relates, that in his time a dead man was raised to life again: and further, that there came to pass another miracle about Juſtus who was surnamed [b] Barſabas; how that he drank deadly poyson, and by the grace of the Lord susteined no harm. That this Juſtus, after our Saviours Ascension, was together with Matthias set forth by the Holy Apostles, and that they prayed that one of them might instead of the Traitour Judas be allotted to fill up their number; the Book of the Acts of the Apoſtles doth after this manner relate — And they appointed two, Joſeph called Barſabas, who was ſurnamed Juſtus, and Matthias. And they prayed and ſaid. Moreover the same writer has set down some other things which came to him barely by word of mouth, to wit, certain strange parables of our Saviours, and Sermons of his, and some other more fabulous relations: Among which he says there shall be a Thousand years after the Resurrection from the dead, wherein the Kingdom of Christ shall be corporally set up here on earth: and, I judge, he had this opinion from his misapprehending the Apostolical discourses, in that he did not see through those things they spake mystically by way of similitude. For he seems to have been a man of a very narrow understanding, as it may be conjectured from his Books. Yet he gave occasion to very many Ecclesiastical persons after him to be of the same erronious opinion with him; who had a regard for the antiquity of the man: as for example, to Irenæus, and to every one also who has declared himself to be of the same opinion. He relates also in his Books other interpretations of the foresaid Ariſtion's, of the sayings of the Lord; and the traditions of John the Elder. To which we doe refer the studious Readers, and judge it requisite now onely to adjoyn to his fore mentioned words a passage he relates concerning Mark the Evangelist, in these words; "This also the Elder said; "Mark, being the [c] Interpreter of Peter, accu-

[a] In the Kings M. S. it is, συναδάξαι ταῖς ἑρμηνείαις, agreeable to our translation. Ruſinus reads this place so, as appears by his translation. For he renders it thus, Non pigebit autem nos tibi omnia quæ quondam à Presbyteris didicimus, & benè retinemus, recordantes exponere cum interpretationibus noſtris. But in the other M. SS. Maz. Med. Fuk. and Nicephorus it is, συνλάξαι. Valeſ.

Acts 1. 23, 24.

[c] Jerom, in Catalogo, calls Mark the interpreter of Peter, from this place of Papias, as I judge. Hence 'tis, that many of the Greeks write, that the Gospel of Mark was dictated by Peter. So Athanaſius in his treatise, de Libris Sacræ Scripturæ. Which, how its to be understood, Papias declares in this place. For it is not to be supposed that Mark wrote his Gospel from the mouth of Peter dictating to him; but, when he heard Peter Preaching the Word of God to the Jews in Hebrew, Mark carefully digested those things in the Greek Language, which concerned Christ. Valeſ.

TRAJAN. "rately wrote what ever he remembred; but yet not "in that order, wherein Chriſt either ſpake, or did "them: For he was neither an hearer of the Lords, "nor yet his Follower; but, as I ſaid, he was after- "wards converſant with Peter, who Preacht the "doctrine of the Goſpel profitably to thoſe that "heard him, but not ſo as if he would compoſe "an Hiſtory of the Lords ſayings. Wherefore "Mark committed nothing of errour, in that he "wrote ſome things ſo as he had remembred them. "For he made this one thing his chiefeſt aime, "to wit, to omit none of thoſe things he had heard, "nor yet to deliver any thing that was falſe therein.

Thus much Papias relates concerning Mark. Concerning Matthew, he ſays this; Moreover Matthew wrote his divine Oracles in the Hebrew tongue, and every one interpreted them, as they were able. This Papias alſo has quoted authorities taken out of the Firſt Epiſtle of John, and likewiſe out of the former Epiſtle of Peter. He has ſet down alſo another relation about a woman who was accuſed of many crimes before the Lord; which relation is contained in the Goſpel according to the Hebrews. And thus much we have uſefully and diligently obſerved, and added to thoſe things which before we had ſet down. TRAJAN.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory OF EUSEBIUS PAMPHILUS.

CHAP. I.

Who were the Biſhops of the Roman, and Alexandrian Churches in the Reign of Trajane.

ABout the [a] twelfth year of Trajan's Empire, Cerdo the Biſhop of the Alexandrian Church,* whom we a little before mentioned, departed this life: and Primus, the fourth from the Apoſtles, was elected to the publick charge of that Church. At the ſame time alſo, Evareſtus having finiſhed his eighth year, Alexander undertook the Biſhoprick of Rome, who was the fifth in ſucceſſion from Peter and Paul.

[a] In the Chronicon of Euſebius, the beginning of Primus's being Biſhop of Alexandria falls upon the tenth year of Trajan. Alſo the beginning of Alexanders being made Biſhop of Rome is placed on the tenth year of Trajan. But in the digeſting of the years of the Biſhops both of Rome, and alſo of other Cities, I have obſerved that Euſebius's Chronicon does often diſſent from his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. Whether it be the fault of the Tranſcribers, or of Jerome the Tranſlatour, or of Euſebius himſelf, I cannot poſitively affirm: for in ſo great a diverſity its difficult to aſſign the cauſe of the miſtake. But, ſeeing that the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory was written by Euſebius after his Chronicon, whereſoever ſuch a diſagreement occurs, that ſeems rather to be followed, which is aſſerted in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. CHAP. II.

What the Jews ſuffered in this Emperours time.

MOreover, the Doctrine and Church of our Saviour flouriſhing daily, increaſed more and more: but the calamities of the Jews were augmented by continual miſchiefs following one upon another. For, the Emperour entring now upon the eighteenth year of his Reign, there aroſe again a commotion of the Jews, which deſtroyed a very great number of them. For both at Alexandria and over all the reſt of Egypt; and moreover throughout Cyrene, they being ſtirred up as it were by ſome violent and contentious ſpirit, raiſed Sedition againſt the [a] Greeks and Gentiles with whom they dwelt. And they increaſing the Faction very much, on the enſuing year enkindled a great War; Lupus was at that time Governour of all Egypt: Moreover it happened that in the firſt encounter they were too hard for the Greeks; who flying to Alexandria, took the Jews that were in the City alive, and ſlew them. But thoſe Jews who inhabited Cyrene, being fruſtrated of aſſiſtance in the war from them, perſiſted to inveſt and deſtroy the countrey of Egypt and all its [b] Prefectures, by pillages and robberies, one Lucuas being their Leader. Againſt whom the Emperour ſent Marcius Turbo with horſe and foot, and alſo with Navall forces: he in many ingagements, having made the war againſt them long and tedious, deſtroyed many Myriads of Jews, not onely of thoſe of Cyrene, but alſo of thoſe of Egypt, who flockt together to give aſſiſtance to their King Lucuas. But the Emperour ſuſpecting that thoſe Jews in Meſopotamia would alſo ſet upon the inhabitants there, commanded [c] Luſius Quietus to clear that Province of them. Who ingaging with them, deſtroyed a very great number of them that dwelt there: for which ſucceſsfull piece of ſervice he was appointed Deputy of Judea by the Emperour. And thus much thoſe heathens, who committed to writing the tranſactions of thoſe times, doe almoſt in the very ſame words relate.

[a] The Jews, who dwelt in the Cities and Towns with the Grecians and Gentiles, and had equal freedom thereof with them, did frequently diſagree with them; tumults being uſually raiſed by reaſon of their different religions. For the Grecians ſcorned that the Jews ſhould be fellow citizens with them and enjoy the ſame priviledges they did; on the other hand, the Jews would not live in a meaner condition, than the reſt of the Citizens did. Hence aroſe frequent contentions, both in Egypt, and alſo in Syria, as Philo, and Joſephus doe atteſt. Therefore in our tranſlation we have inſerted both [Grecians and Gentiles] becauſe one word ſeemed not to ſuffice. For the Jews did not onely aſſault the Grecians, but the Natives alſo of Egypt and Lybia: nor again, the Gentiles onely, but the Chriſtians likewiſe, of whom there was then no ſmall number in Egypt and Cyrene. Valeſ.

[b] This deſtroying of all Egypt and Lybia by the Jews, beſides Dion, Oroſius mentions, in his 7 B. Valeſ.

[c] This

c This man was a Moor, not of the Province of Mauritania, but of the barbarous Moors, who were Allies of the Roman Empire. At first he commanded a Troop of Moors; not long after he was condemned for his lewdness, and in disgrace cashired. But afterwards in the Dacick war, when the Army stood in need of the assistance of the Moors, he did a brave piece of service. Upon which account being rewarded and honoured, he did more and braver exploits in the second Dacick war. At length, in the Parthian war, which Trajan waged against the Parthians, he was so valiant and fortunate, that he was chosen into the Pretorian order, bore a Consulship, and Governed the Province of Palestine, which promotion first made him to be envied, then hated, and at last ruined him. Thus much Dion Cassius relates, in Excerpt. Vales.

CHAP. III.

Who, in the time of Adrian, wrote Apologies in defence of the Faith.

ADRIAN. WHen Trajan had held the Empire twenty years compleat, excepting six months, Ælius Adrianus succeeded in the Government. To whom Quadratus dedicated and presented a book, wherein he had comprized an Apology for our Religion; because certain malicious men endeavoured to molest the Christians. This work is still extant amongst many of the brethren, and we also have it. From which book may be seen perspicuous evidences of the man's understanding, and of his truely [a] Apostolical faith and sound doctrine. The same Writer makes his own antiquity sufficiently evident, by what he relates in these very words; "The works of our Saviour were "always conspicuous; for they were true. Those "that were healed, such as were raised from "the dead, did not onely appear after they were "healed, and raised; but also were afterwards "seen of all: and that not onely whilest our Sa"viour was conversant upon earth, but also after "he was gone they continued alive a great while; "in so much that some of them survived even to "our times. Such a person indeed was Quadratus. Aristides also, a faithfull man of that Religion profest by us, left in like manner, as Quadratus did, an Apologie for the faith, dedicated to Adrian. And this mans book is, to this day, preserved by many persons.

[a] The phrase in the original is [ἀποστολικῆς ὀρθοτομίας, i. e. of his Apostolical right division. This word occurs (2 Tim. 2. 15.) In the Old Testament the Greek translatours use of the word belongs to a way or path to goe in, which was wont to be cut out that it might be fitter for use; thence the Latine phrase, viam secare, i. e. to cut a way, that is, to goe before and direct any in their journey. And with the word [ὀρθὸς, right] joyned with it, it is to goe before one, and direct him in the straight way to such a place. Hence the Syriack version of the New Testament renders this phrase in Timothy [ὀρθοτομεῖν τὸν λόγον,] recte prædicare sermonem, i. e. rightly to Preach the word. Fullers Miscellan. B. 3. chap. 16.

Who were ennobled with the Title of Bishops over the Roman, and Alexandrian Churches in this Emperours time.

IN the third year of Adrians Empire, Alexander the Bishop of Rome died, having compleated the tenth year of his administration. Xystus was successour to him: and about that time, Primus dying in the twelfth year of his Presidency over the Alexandrian Church, Justus succeeded him.

CHAP. V.

Who were Bishops of Jerusalem from our Saviour, even to these times.

MOreover, the space of time which the Bishops of Jerusalem spent in their Presidency over that See I could in no wise find preserved in writing. For, as report says, they were very short lived: But thus much I have been informed of from old records, that unto the Siege of the Jews in Adrian's time, there were in number fifteen successions of Bishops there: all whom, they say, were by birth Hebrews, who had sincerely embraced the knowledge of Christ; in so much that by those, who were then able to give judgment as to such matters, they were approved to be worthy of the Episcopal Office. For that whole Church at Jerusalem was made up of believing Jews, who had continued steadfast in the faith from the Apostles times even to the then Siege: wherein the Jews, revolting again from the Romans, were vanquished and destroyed by no small wars. The Bishops therefore that were of the circumcision then ceasing, it will be now requisite to give a catalogue of them in their order from first to last. The first therefore was James called the brother of the Lord; after him the second was Simeon; the third Justus; the fourth Zaccheus; the fifth Tobias; the sixth Benjamin; the seventh John; the eighth Matthias; the ninth Philip; the tenth Seneca; the eleventh Justus; the twelfth Levi; the thirteenth Ephres; the fourteenth [a] Joseph; the fifteenth and last Judas: And thus many were the Bishops of the City of Jerusalem, from the Apostles to this time we are now treating of; all which were of the Circumcision. But now, Adrian being in the twelfth year of his Empire, Telesphorus the seventh from the Apostles, succeeded Xystus, who had compleated the tenth year of his Episcopal Office over the Romans; and within a years space and [b] some months Eumenes, the sixth in order, succeeded in the Presidency over the Alexandrian Church; his immediate predecessour there having sate eleven years.

[a] Eusebius, in his Chronicon, calls him Joses. So Joseph the brother of the Lord, of whom Matthew and Mark speak in their Gospels, is by Jerom and others called Joses. Ephres also is, by Nicephorus, called Ephrem. Vales.

The last Siege of the Jews in the time of Adrian.

BUt when the rebellion of the Jews again increased exceedingly, * Rufus the president of Judea, having had auxiliary forces sent him from the Emperour, marched out against them; and, making use of their madness and desperation as an occasion of his sparing none, he slew Myriads together both of men women and children; and by the Law of war reduced their country to servitude and subjection to the Romans. The Leader of said the Jews at that time was by name Barchochebas, a name indeed that signifies a Star, but otherwise he was a man that was a murderer and a robber: who by reason of his name did monstrously pretend to his followers, being [a] slaves, that he was a star come down from heaven to enlighten them who were now oppressed with servitude. But, the war growing sharp in the eighteenth year of Adrian's Empire at the City [b] Bethera, which was the best fortified place, and not far distant from Jerusalem; and the Siege continuing a long time; the innovatours also having been utterly destroyed by famine and thirst; and the authour of this their madness undergone condigne condigne puniſhment; from that time that whole Nation was [c] altogether interdicted to enter into the country about Jeruſalem: the Law, Edict, and Sanctions of Adrian having commanded them, that they ſhould not ſo much as from a far off behold their paternal ſoyle. Ariſton of [d] Pella relates this. Thus the City being made deſtitute of the Jewiſh Nation, and wholly cleared of its old inhabitants, was poſſeſſed by forreigners that dwelt there, and [e] afterwards made a Roman City; and, changing its name, was, in honour of the Emperour Ælius Adrianus, called Ælia. And, when there was a Church there gathered of the Nations that dwelt in it, Mark was the firſt who, after the Biſhops of the circumciſion, undertook the publick adminiſtration of matters there.

[c] The ſame is atteſted by Tertullian, Apologet. c. 16; by Celſus, in the latter end of B. 8 of Origen againſt him; and by Gregor. Naz. in his 12 Orat. Onely, on one day (that whereon Jeruſalem was taken and deſtroyed by the Romans) the Jews out of all nations were wont to meet in Paleſtine, and, having paid a ſum of money to the Souldiers, they entred into that part of the City where Solomon's Temple heretofore ſtood; and there they bewailed the deſtruction of the City and Temple. See Scaliger, in Animadverſ. Euſeb. p. 198. Valeſ.

[d] That was a City of Syria, which, after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Titus, was the ſeat of the Biſhops of Jeruſalem; as Euſebius teſtifies. This Ariſton of Pella wrote a book entitled a Diſpute of Jaſon and Papiſcus; this book Origen makes mention of in his 4 B. againſt Celſus: but the Preface of it is onely now extant amongſt the works of Cyprian. Valeſ.

[e] Euſebius is here doubly miſtaken; both in that he ſays Jeruſalem was wholly deſtroyed in Adrian's time; and alſo becauſe he thought that Ælia Capitolina was built by the ſame Adrian after the Siege of Betthera. As to the firſt; its evident from Joſephus, that Jeruſalem was totally deſtroyed by Titus, in ſo much that it was ploughed. As to the ſecond, Ælia was ſo far from being built by Adrian after this Victory obtained over the Jews, that this war was begun by the Jews upon that very account. For when the Jews ſaw the Soyle of their City occupied by ſtrangers; and perceived that in that very place where the Temple had been, Jupiter Capitolinus was worſhiped and ſacrificed to; being not able to endure that, they took Arms, and began this war which Euſebius here relates. Which was begun in the 16 year of Adrian, and ended the 18 of his Empire. But Ælia Capitolina was built long before, to wit, in the ſecond year of Adrian. From whoſe times to thoſe of Conſtantine the Great it was always called Ælia. But from the time of Conſtantine the Great it recovered again the name of Jeruſalem, both upon the account of the honour of that name, and alſo becauſe of its prerogative, being the firſt Epiſcopal Seat. Valeſ.

CHAP. VII.

Who at that time were the Authours of falſe doctrine.

NOw, the Churches throughout the whole world ſhining like moſt bright ſtars, and the faith in our Saviour and Lord Jeſus Chriſt flouriſhing among all mankind, the Devil that hater of good, as being always the enemy of truth, and moſt malicious impugner of mans ſalvation, uſing all his arts and ſtratagems againſt the Church, at firſt armed himſelf againſt it with outward perſecutions: But then afterwards being excluded from them, he made his aſſaults by other methods, making uſe of evil men and Impoſtours as being the pernitious inſtruments for deſtroying of ſouls, and miniſters of perdition: deviſing all ways, whereby theſe impoſtours and deceivers, cloaking themſelves with the title of our Religion, might both lead into the Pit of deſtruction, thoſe of the Faithfull whom they had enticed to themſelves, and alſo divert ſuch as were unskilfull in the Faith from the way that leads to the comfortable Word, by ſuch means as they attempted to put in practiſe. From that Menander therefore, whom we a little * before manifeſted to have been the ſucceſſour of Simon, there was hatcht a Serpentine breed, double mouthed as it were, and double headed, which conſtituted the Founders of two different and diſagreeing Hereſies; Saturninus, by birth an Antiochian, and Baſilides, an Alexandrian; whereof the former in Syria, the other in Egypt, ſet up Schools of moſt deteſtable Hereſies. Moreover, Irenæus makes it manifeſt that Saturninus feigned moſtly the ſame things that Menander did; but that Baſilides under a pretext of more myſtical matters, moſt mightily enlarged his inventions, forming monſtrous and fabulous fictions for the making up of his impious Hereſie. There being many Eccleſiaſtical men therefore, who at that time were defenders of the Truth, and eloquent maintainers of the Apoſtolical and Eccleſiaſtical doctrine, ſome of them forthwith comprized in writing explanatory accounts of the fore-manifeſted Hereſies, which they left as cautions and preventions to poſterity: of which there is come to our hands a moſt ſtrenuous confutation of Baſilides, of Agrippa Caſtor's, a moſt eminent Writer in thoſe times; wherein he diſcovers the horrible impoſture of the man: diſcloſing therefore his ſecrets, he ſays that he made four and twenty books upon the [a] Goſpel, and that he counterfeited for himſelf Prophets named by him [b] Barcabbas and Barcoph, and ſome [c] others who never were in being; and that he gave them barbarous names to aſtoniſh thoſe who were admirers of ſuch things; and that he taught that it was a thing indifferent to taſte of meats offered to Idols, and that in times of perſecutions thoſe did not imprudently who abjured the Faith: and that, after the manner of the Pythagoreans, he injoyned a five years ſilence to his followers: the foreſaid Authour having recounted theſe things and others like them concerning this Baſilides, hath moſt diligently detected and brought to light the errour of the forementioned Hereſie. But Irenæus writeth alſo, that Carpocrates, the father of another Hereſie termed the Gnoſtick Hereſie, was cotemporary with theſe. Theſe Gnoſticks thought that thoſe magical deluſions of Simon's were not to be expoſed covertly as he did, but publickly and openly; boaſting of amorous potions accurately and curiouſly made by them, and of certain ſpirits that were cauſes of Dreams, and [d] Familiars, and of certain other ſuch like deluſions, as if theſe were the greateſt and onely excellent things. And agreeable hereunto they taught, that thoſe who would arrive to perfection in their myſteries, or rather deteſtable wickedneſſes, muſt act all things that were moſt filthy and unclean; being no other ways able to avoid the Rulers of the world (as they call them) unleſs they diſtributed to all of them their dues by moſt filthy and deteſtable acts of obſcenity. The devill therefore who delights in miſchief, making uſe of theſe inſtruments, it came to paſs that he both miſerably enſlaved ſuch as were ſeduced by them, and ſo led them into deſtruction; and alſo gave thoſe Nations that were unbelievers a great occaſion of abundantly ſlandring the divine doctrine; a report ariſing from them being diffuſed to the reproachfull detraction of the whole Chriſtian Religion. Upon this account therefore chiefly it happened that an impious and moſt abſurd ſuſpition concerning us was ſpread abroad amongſt thoſe who then

ADRIAN.

[a] Euſebius ſays not upon what Goſpel Baſilides wrote theſe books, perhaps Baſilides made theſe books upon his own Goſpel; for he wrote one, and ſet his own name to it, and called it [the Goſpel according to Baſilides] as Origen atteſts in his 1 Homil. on Luke; and Jerom in his Preface to S. Matthew. Theſe books were called Baſilides's Exegeticks. Clemens (lib. 4. Stromat.) quotes ſome places out of the 23[d] of theſe books. Valeſ.

[b] Or, Barcabas: upon theſe Prophets, Barcabbas and Barcoph, Iſodore the ſon of Baſilides wrote ſome books of Expoſitions, as Clemens Alexandr. ſhews, B. 6. Stromat. Valeſ.

[c] Euſebius ſpeaks here of thoſe Prophets whom Baſilides feigned for himſelf. Our Authour is right in his ſaying that Baſilides's Hereſie ſprang up in Adrian's Reign. For then the Hereticks began to creep out of their holes: they thought (the Apoſtles being all dead) that they had then an opportune time to divulge their errours. Valeſ.

[d] So they were called, becauſe they were ſuppoſed to be aſſiſtant to men; and kept them from diſeaſes, and unfortunate accidents. Magicians had ſuch ſpirits as theſe at their command, by whoſe help they did miraculous things. Valeſ.

ADRIAN. then were unbelievers; as if we used detestable carnal copulation with mothers and sisters, and fed upon nefarious meats. But these crafts of the devil's did not long succeed with him; the truth asserted and confirmed its self, and in process of time shone forth most clearly and apparently. For these devices of the adversaries, being repelled by their own force, forthwith became extinct; Heresies of a different sort newly designed and cut out, and succeeding one after the other, the former forthwith melted and fell away, and being dissolved into kinds that were of divers sorts and fashions, were, some one way, some another, destroyed. But the brightness of the Catholick and onely true Church, being always the same and so continuing stedfast and like it self, was greatly increased and augmented; the gravity, the sincerity, the ingenious freedom, the modesty, and purity of an holy conversation and Philosophical course of life shooting forth a splendour over all Nations both Grecians and Barbarians. That reproachfull detraction therefore wherewith our Religion had been overspread, was instantly suppressed. Wherefore our doctrine continued to be the onely, and the [c] prevailing opinion among all men, and was confessed to be most eminently flourishing upon account of its gravity, its prudent modesty, and its divine and wise precepts: in so much that no one hitherto hath been so audacious, as to charge our faith with any foul slander, or any such reproachfull detraction, as those our old adversaries were formerly ready and willing to make use of. But moreover, in these times the truth again produced many that were its defenders, who engaged these impious Heresies, not onely with unwritten arguments, but also with penned demonstrations.

[c] Κρατοῦσα is the term in the original, hence the Christian Religion was by the heathens called κρατοῦσα δόξα, i. e. the prevailing opinion; and the Christians were termed κρατῆνες by Porphyrius, in his book *de Oraculor. CHAP. VIII.

What Ecclesiastical Writers there were in those times.

[a] In my opinion Hegesippus is not rightly placed in the times of Adrian; neither doe his words, here quoted by Eusebius, evince so much. It's certain, Hegesippus wrote his books when Eleutherus was Bishop of Rome, as he himself attests in the 22 chap. of this book. He was contemporary therefore with Irenæus, who then composed his elaborate books against the Heresies. Indeed our Eusebius, retracting as it were his former opinion, does, in the 21, and 22 chapt. of this book, place Hegesippus in the times of Marcus Antoninus. Vales.

[b] Which was celebrated every fifth year, at Mantinea in Arcadia, says Pausanias, in Arcad. Vales.

[c] Amongst the Egyptians, the chief Priest, who was over the other Priests, and distributed to them the Revenue of the Temple, was called a Prophet. For the first Officer of the temple was the Cantor, then the Horoscopus, after him the Scriba, then the Vestitor: last of all the Propheta took his place, who carried a water-pot in his bosom. See Epiphan. in 3 B. adverss. Hæres. &c. Concerning these Prophets of Antinous instituted by Adrian there is mention made in an old Greek inscription, quoted by Casaubon in his notes on Spartianus. Wherefore its no wonder that Antinous, deified by Adrian, had his Prophets, seeing he was worshipped chiefly by the Egyptians. Vales.

AMongst which flourished [a] Hegesippus, out of whom we have quoted many words in our foregoing books, when we delivered some passages of those things done in the Apostles times from his relation thereof. He therefore having in five books set forth the certain relation of the Apostolick doctrine in a most plain series, evidently shews the time wherein he flourished: writing thus concerning those who at first set up images--For whom they made Monuments and Temples, as untill now they doe. Of which number is Antinous the servant of Cæsar Adrianus, in honour of whom there is a sacred [b] game instituted, called Antinoium, which is celebrated now in our days. For Adrian also built a City, and named it Antinous, and instituted [c] Prophets. At the same time also Justin, a sincere lover of the true Philosophy, as yet spent his time about, and was studious in, the writings of the gentile Philosophers: he in like manner declares this very time, in his Apologie to Antoninus, writing thus; We judge it not absurd here to mention Antinous also who lived very lately; whom all men through fear have undertaken to worship as a God, notwithstanding they evidently know who he was, and from whence he had his original. The same Authour, mentioning also the war then waged against the Jews, adds thus much; For in the [d] late Jewish war, Barchochebas, who was the Head of the Jewish Rebellion, gave command that the Christians onely should be most cruelly tormented, unless they would deny Jesus Christ, and blaspheme. But moreover, declaring in the same book, his own conversion from the gentile Philosophy to the worship of the true God, that it was not done by him rashly and unadvisedly, but with judgment and consideration, he writes thus; "I also my self, being much addicted to "and affected with the Platonick Philosophy, hear-"ing the Christians calumniated, and seeing them "undaunted at death, and at what ever else is ac-"counted terrible, thought it impossible that such "men should live wickedly and be given to vo-"luptuousness. For, what sensual or intemperate "person, and one who accounts humane flesh good "food, could willingly embrace death, which "would deprive him of his desires? and would "not rather use his utmost endeavour to live con-"tinually in this life, and conceal himself from "the Magistrates? much less would he voluntarily offer himself to be put to death. Moreover the same Authour relates, that Adrian (having received letters from that most eminent Governour [e] Serenius Granianus concerning the Christians, setting forth how unjust it was they should be slain uncondemned, meerly to gratifie the clamours of the people, when no accusation appeared against them) wrote an answer to [f] Minucius Fundanus Proconsul of Asia, wherein he commanded that no one should be put to death without a judiciary prosecution, and an accusation lawfull and allowable. And Justin there produceth the copy of the Rescript in Latine, the language wherein it was originally written. But before it he premiseth these words; "[g] And al-"though from the letter of the most excellent and "renowned Cæsar Adrianus your father, we "might request you would give command, that "the judiciary proceedings against us be made ac-"cording as we desire; yet we crave this, not so "much because it was commanded by Adrian, but, "in regard we know and understand our petition "to be just: And moreover, that you may per-"ceive what we say herein to be true, we have in-"serted the copy of Adrian's letter; which is thus. To these words Justin hath annexed the Latine copy of the Letter; which we, as well as we could, have done into Greek, after this manner.

[d] Ἐν τῷ νῦν γενομένῳ, &c. i. e. in the Jewish war which was not long since. For the Greek word [νῦν] is sometimes used in such a sense, as to signifie [nuper] i. e. lately. In which sense Justin uses it, when he speaks of Antinous in this chapt. Vales.

[e] Or, Serennius; he was Proconsul of Asia, and predecessour to Minutius Fundanus in that Government. Vales.

[f] It may be deservedly questioned, why Adrian answered not Granianus from whom he received these letters, but wrote to Minutius Fundanus his successour: the reason, as I suppose, might be this; either Granianus died soon after he wrote to Adrian; or else he left that Government; For the Proconsuls were annual. Vales.

Wherefore "if the men of your Province can by a due way "of complaint openly charge the Chriſtians with "any accuſation, and ſo doe it, as that they ap- "pear and anſwer it before the ſeat of judicature; "let them make it their buſineſs onely to take ſuch "a courſe as this againſt them; but let them not "uſe [a] tumultuous outcries and clamours. For "its moſt requiſite, if any perſon preferr's a com- "plaint, that you ſhould have the cogniſance of "the matter. If therefore any one does accuſe "them, and make out that they doe any thing con- "trary to the Laws, doe you give ſentence ac- "cording to the nature of the offence. But if it be "certain, that any does frame an accuſation meerly "out of a malicious detraction, doe you determine "according to the heinouſneſs of the crime, and "take care that due puniſhment be inflicted on "him. And thus much concerning the Reſcript of Adrian.

[a] He means the out-cries, which the people were wont to make in the Theatres, - The Chriſtians to the Lyons! as Tertullian atteſts. Sometimes it ſo happened that the Proconſuls and Governours were forced to yield to theſe tumultuous clamours, though unwilling to it of themſelves. Wherefore the Emperour Adrian admoniſheth Fundanus the Proconſul not to ſuffer himſelf to be induced by ſuch requeſts to the perſecution and ſlaughter of the Chriſtians. It was an old cuſtom in the Roman Empire, for the populace both in the City and in the Provinces, as oft as they met at the publick ſhews, to ask of the Emperour, or Governour what they had a mind to, with loud outcries all at once. Inſtances hereof are frequent in the Writers of the Roman Hiſtory. Valeſ.

Who in the Reign of Antoninus were Biſhops of the Roman and Alexandrian Sees.

ANTONINUS PIUS. But, Adrian having paid the dues of nature after he had reigned one and twenty years, Antoninus, ſurnamed Pius, ſucceeded in the Roman Empire. In whoſe firſt year Teleſphorus departing this life in the eleventh year of his preſidency, Hyginus aſſumed the Epiſcopal Government of the Roman Church. Moreover, Irenæus relates that Teleſphorus ended his life with a glorious Martyrdom; manifeſting in the ſame place, that in the times of the aforeſaid Hyginus Biſhop of the Romans, flouriſhed at Rome both Valentinus the introducer of his own Hereſie, and alſo Cerdo the Founder of the errour of the Marcionites; his words are theſe.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning thoſe who were Arch-Hereticks in theſe times.

"FOr Valentinus came to Rome when Hygi- "nus was Biſhop there: but he flouriſht "in the times of Pius, and continued to thoſe of "Anicetus. Cerdo alſo, who was maſter to "Marcion, flouriſht in the times of Hyginus who "was the [a] ninth Biſhop; he went into the Church, "and openly confeſſing his errour, ſo continued at "Rome; ſometimes teaching "privately, other while a- "gain acknowledging his "errour; but being now and "then reprehended for his "impious doctrine, he [b] with- "drew himſelf from the aſ- "ſembly of the brethren.

[a] Theſe words of Irenæus are extant in his 3 B. chap. 4. where the old tranſlatour ſeems to have read the eighth: which reading is moſt agreeable to Irenæus, as appears from the 3 chapt. of the ſame book; where he, reckoning up the Roman Biſhops, counts Hyginus the eighth from the Apoſtles. But in the 1 B. of Irenæus chap. 28. its written [the ninth] ſo alſo in Epiphan. in Hæreſ. Cerdon. and in the Epiſtle of Cyprian to Pompeius. Valeſ.

[b] Irenæus does not ſay he was excommunicated; but that he ſeparated himſelf from the Church; whence it appears, that Cerdo condemned himſelf, in his own judgment, and ſo prevented the ſentence of the Church. Valeſ.

Thus far Irenæus, in his third book againſt Hereſies. Moreover, in his firſt book he again ſays this concerning Cerdo: "But one Cerdo, deriving "the original of his errours from the Tenets of "Simon, came to Rome in the times of Hyginus "(who was the ninth that in the Epiſcopal ſuc- "ceſſion from the Apoſtles had that See) and "taught, that that God, who was Preacht under "the Law, and by the Prophets, is not the father "of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: For the one is known, "the other unknown; the one is juſt, the other "good: Marcion of Pontus, an impudent blaſphe- "mer, ſucceeding him, did mightily propagate "that opinion. But the ſame Irenæus, having ſounded the bottom of that immenſe depth of matter, full of various errours, which Valentinus, had put together, does fully diſcover the ſecret and occult deceit and wickedneſs, that like a Serpent lurking in its hole, lies hid within him. Moreover, he ſays there was at the ſame time another perſon (by name Mark) who was moſt expert at Magical deluſions: and further, he declares their prophane rites of initiation, and their moſt deteſtable myſteries in theſe very words; "For ſome "of them prepare a nuptial-bed, and perform a "ſecret ceremony by pronouncing ſome words "over ſuch as are to be initiated; and a marriage, "they ſay, thus made by them, is ſpiritual, and "conformable to the celeſtial nuptials: But others "of them bring [thoſe that are to be initiated] "to the water, and dipping them, uſe this form of "words, In the name of the unknown Father of "all, In the truth the Mother of all, In Him who "deſcended upon Jeſus: Another ſort of them "pronounce Hebrew names, to put thoſe that are "to be initiated into the greater conſternation. But Hyginus dying, [c] after he had been Biſhop four years, Pius undertook the Government of the Roman Church. Moreover, at Alexandria Mark was choſen Paſtour, Eumenes having ſat there thirteen years compleat. Which Mark dying after he had preſided there ten years, Celadion aſſumed the Government of the Alexandrian Church: and at Rome, Pius departing this life in the fifteenth year of his preſidency, Anicetus was preferred to that See. In whoſe time Hegeſippus relates that he himſelf came to Rome, and continued there untill Eleutherus was made Biſhop. But at that time flouriſhed Juſtin and was ſingularly eminent, one that in a Philoſophical habit was an aſſertour of the Divine Word, and earneſtly contended for the Faith in his writings: who, in the [d] book he wrote againſt Marcion, mentions the man to be alive at that time when he compiled that work. His words are theſe; "And one Mar- "cion of Pontus; who now "at this time teacheth his followers, and inſtructs "them [to believe] there is another God grea- "ter than him that made the world. This man "alſo, aſſiſted by devils hath perſwaded many "throughout the world to ſpeak blaſphemy, to "deny the Maker of the univerſe [e] to be the Fa- "ther of Chriſt, and to affirm there is another

ANTONINUS PIUS.

[c] Rufinus ſeems to have read it otherwiſe; for he tranſlates it thus; Quarto autem Epiſcopatûs ſui anno cùm deceſſiſſet Hyginus, &c. i. e. Hyginus dying in the fourth year of his being Biſhop, &c. Valeſ.

[d] Our Euſebius forgot himſelf here, in that he ſays, that theſe following words of Juſtins were taken out of his book againſt Marcion: they are taken out of Juſtins ſecond Apologie; pag. 70. Edit. Paris. Valeſ.

[e] Theſe words [to be the Father of Chriſt] are wanting in the common Editions of Juſtin; and they ſeem to be ſuperfluous. Marcion aſſerted, there were two Gods, the one the Creatour, by whom this world was made; the other ſuperiour to him; who framed the better and more excellent things: this God, he ſaid, we ought to confeſs, and to deny the other. This is the meaning of Juſtins words: to whom agrees Epiphan. in Hæreſ. Marcion. Marcion held, that that moſt High God was the Father of Chriſt; and that Chriſt came down from heaven to reprehend the other God the maker of this world, whom he called the God of the Jews. Valeſ.

To this he adds fur- ther, saying, "We have compiled a book against "all the Heresies that ever were, which, if you be "willing to read it, we will deliver to you. The same Justin, having wrote many elaborate works against the Heathens, dedicated also some other books, containing an Apology for our faith, to the Emperour Antoninus, surnamed Pius, and to the Roman Senate: For he dwelt at Rome: But in his Apologie, he makes known himself, who and whence he was, in these words.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Justin's Apologie to Antoninus.

"TO the Emperour Titus Ælius Hadria- "nus Antoninus Pius Cæsar Augu- "stus, and to Verissimus his son the Philosopher, "and to Lucius (By [a] Nature son of Cæsar the "Philosopher, but by Adoption son to Pius) the "lover of Learning: To the sacred Senate also, "and people of Rome, I Justin the son of Priscus, "the Grandchild of Bacchius, who were of [b] Fla- "via Neapolis a City of Syria-Palestine, make "my Request and [c] Petition in behalf of those "men (being my self one of them) who are un- "justly hated and most injuriously treated by all "mankind. And the same Emperour, being addrest too by other brethren, Inhabitants of Asia, who were vexed with all manner of mole- stations by the men of their own Province, voutsafed to send this Edict to the [d] Common- Council of Asia.

[a] Lucius was by Nature the son of Ælius Verus Cæsar whom Adrian adopted. He dying, Adrian adopted Antoninus Pius, upon this condition, that Pius should adopt Marcus and Lucius; as Spartianus and Capitolinus doe declare. But others say, that Lucius was adopted by Marcus; so Capitolinus in the life of Marcus. Wherefore in these words of Justin, can be no other person meant by Cæsar the Philosopher, than Ælius Verus, whom Adrian adopted. For Justin says, that Lucius was by nature the son of Cæsar the Philosopher, and the adoptive son of Antoninus Pius. Now, its evident, Lucius was Ælius Verus's own son: therefore by Cæsar the Philosopher must be meant Ælius Verus. But there are two things which seem to withstand this exposition of this passage. The first is, the surname of Philosopher is no way agreeable to Ælius Verus. Indeed, Ælius Verus (who was adopted by Adrian) was a learned man, and studious, especially in Poetry, as Capitolinus says in his life: but his Moralls were in no wise agreeable to the study and profession of Philosophy. Then further, if Justin would here mean Ælius Verus why does he not mention his name? For the Appellation of Cæsar the Philosopher seems not sufficient to evidence him to be meant; in as much as that appellation might be common to Marcus also. We could easily clear our selves of these difficulties by admitting the reading of the four M. SS. Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil. where this place is thus written [And to Lucius the Philosopher, by nature the son of Cæsar] which reading Casaubon approves of, in his notes on Spartianus. But we judge it not to be good. For it follows in Justin [the lover of Learning] where you see Marcus and Lucius have each their Epitheres: Marcus is termed [the Philosopher] and Lucius [the lover of Learning] Vales.

[b] Neapolis, a City of Palestine, is called Flavia, because there was a Colony brought thither by Flavius Vespasianus. Before, it was called Sichem. Yet Pliny does not say there was a Colony there. Afterwards, the Emperour Severus deprived it of its priviledges, and reduced it to a village, because it favoured Nigers side. Vales.

[c] In the Original 'tis [ἔντευξιν] Rufinus translates it [postulatum, i. e. a Petition] The Greek word [ἐντυγχάνειν] signifies, to goe to the Emperour, and make a request to him; which was most commonly done in writing: There is extant a form of such a Petition (presented by Marcellinus the Presbyter to Theodosius Augustus) which Syrmondus published lately: it begins thus; Deprecamur mansuetudinem vestram; i. e. We earnestly intreat your Graciousness, &c. Vales.

ANTONINUS PIUS.

CHAP. XIII.

The Rescript of Antoninus to the Common Council of Asia, concerning our Religion.

"THE Emperour Cæsar [a] Marcus Aurelius "Antoninus Augustus Armenicus, Ponti- "fex Maximus, Tribune of the People XV, Con- "sul III. to the [b] Common [Councill] of Asia, "sendeth greeting. We know "indeed that the Gods doe "take care, this sort of men "should not continue undis- "covered. For it is much "more sutable for them to "punish such as refuse to pay "them Adoration, than for "you. You confirm those, "whom you molest and dis- "quiet, in their opinion "which they have embraced, "whilest you accuse them "of impiety. And it would "please them much more "to seem to be accused and put "to death for their own God, "than to live: upon which ac- "count they are become con- "querours, and doe willingly "lose their lives, rather than "they will be induced to doe "what you command them. "But concerning the Earth- "quakes, which either have "been or yet doe happen, it "will not be inconvenient to "advertise you (because you "despond and are out of "heart when such accidents "come to pass) to compare "[c] your [manner of life and "behaviour] with theirs. "They [at such times] put "a greater confidence in God; but you, du- "ring the whole time (upon which account "you seem to us to err through ignorance) neg- "lect the Gods, and are careless both of all other "[religious performances,] and also of the wor- "ship of the immortal God: And the Christi- "ans, who adore him, you are enraged at, and "persecute even to death. Concerning these "men many Governours of Provinces heretofore "wrote to [d] our most divine "father. To whom he re- "turned answer, that such "men should not be mole- "sted, unless it appeared they "attempted any thing preju- "dicial to the State of the "Roman Empire: And ma- "ny also have given us in- "timation concerning these "men, whom we answered "pursuant to our Fathers decree. If therefore "any one shall still persevere to give disturbance "to any one of these sort of men, because he is a "Christian, the party accused shall be acquitted, "although it evidently appears he is a Christian; "but the accuser shall be obnoxious to punishment. This Edict was [e] publisht at Ephesus in the

[a] Eusebius is mistaken in attributing this Rescript to Antoninus Pius, whenas it was M. Aurelius's (as appears by the Title) written in the first year of his Reign, when he was Consul III. See Onuphrii Fast. ad ann. Vrb. 914. The testimony of Melito (which Eusebius produces to confirm his opinion in this point) destroys it. For Melito, in his Apologie, reckons up all the Rescripts of Antoninus Pius in favour of the Christians; to wit, his Epistle to the Larisæans, to the Thessalonians, the Athenians, and to all the Grecians: Now if this Rescript to the Common Council of Asia had been Antoninus Pius's, doubtless Melito (being of the Province of Asia) would not have omitted it. For he could not be ignorant of it, since it was publisht at Ephesus: and, when he had reckoned up the other Rescripts of Pius, why should he not make mention of this, which was written to the people of his own Province? Vales.

[b] Συνέδριον, i. e. Councill, is to be understood. For the Asians had a Common-Councill of the whole Province, to which each City sent its Representatives; as Aristides declares, in the 4. of his Orat. Sacr. And the same Authour says there, that this Councill met in the upper Phrygia, that is, at Apamea, or Synnada. Yet, as it seems, they met in other Cities. There were, in the other Roman Provinces, such Councills as these. Vales.

[c] It should be ὑμέτερος, i. e. Your: as it is in Justins Apologie, at the end. Vales.

[d] Although this Rescript be not Antoninus Pius's; yet it's here produced in an opportune place. For in it is mention made of that Epistle which Antoninus Pius wrote to the Governours of Provinces, when they enquired of him what they should doe with the Christians. Melito makes mention of this Epistle of Pius's; whose words Eusebius quotes in chap. 26. of this 4 book. Vales.

[e] To some Laws, in the Codex Theodosian. there is put [P.P.] which mark signifies that that Law of the Emperour was made Publick in such a City. There is extant an old Coin of Claudius Auguſtus, whereon there is a Temple to be ſeen with this Title [R. & AUG.] and this inſcription [COM. ASIÆ.] on both ſides of the Temple. This Temple, I ſuppoſe, was at Epheſus, wherein all the Cities of Aſia met to ſolemnize their Religious Rites for the proſperity of the Emperour and the Roman People: and this Temple was for the uſe of all Aſia in common, being built at the publick charge. Valeſ.

Some memoires of Polycarp the diſciple of the Apoſtles.

AT this time, Anicetus preſiding over the Roman Church, Irenæus relates that Polycarp (who till now ſurvived) came to Rome and diſcourſt Anicetus about a queſtion that aroſe concerning Eaſter-day. And the ſame Authour delivers another relation concerning Polycarp, (in his third book againſt Hereſies) which I judged requiſite to adjoyn to what has been mentioned concerning him; it is thus: "And Polycarp, who "was not onely inſtructed by the Apoſtles and "converſant with many that ſaw Chriſt, but alſo "was by the Apoſtles ordained Biſhop of the "Church of Smyrna in Aſia (whom we alſo ſaw "in our younger days; for he lived to a great "age, and being very antient, ended his life by "a glorious and moſt renowned Martyrdom) "This Polycarp, I ſay, continually taught what "he had learned of the Apoſtles, ſuch points as "the Church now teacheth, and ſuch onely as are "true: all the Churches throughout Aſia doe atteſt "this, and alſo all thoſe who to this day have been "ſucceſſours to Polycarp; who doubtleſs is a "witneſs much more worthy to be credited, and "gives a firmer aſſurance to the truth, than either "Valentinus, or Marcion, or any other Au-"thours of corrupt opinions. This Polycarp, "coming to Rome in the times of Anicetus, con-"verted many of the foreſaid Hereticks to the "Church of God, declaring that he had received "the one and onely truth from the Apoſtles, "which was taught by the Church. And there "are ſome yet ſurviving, who heard him relate, "that John the diſciple of the Lord going into the "Bath at Epheſus to waſh himſelf, and ſeeing Ce-"rinthus in it, leapt out having not bathed him-"ſelf, but ſaid, let us make haſt away, leaſt the "Bath fall, Cerinthus that enemy of the Truth "being within it. This ſame Polycarp alſo, when "Marcion on a time came into his preſence and "ſaid to him [a] Take acquain-"tance of us, returned him "anſwer, I take notice of "thee to be the firſt begot-"ten of the devill. So ex-"ceedingly cautious were the "Apoſtles and their diſci-"ples, not ſo much as by "ſpeech to have any con-"verſe with ſuch as were "corrupters of the Truth; "as Paul alſo ſaid, * A man "that is an heretick, after "the firſt and ſecond admonition, reject: knowing "that he that is ſuch, is ſubverted, and ſinneth, "being condemned of himſelf. There is extant "alſo of this Polycarp's a moſt incomparable "Epiſtle, written to the Philippians; from which "thoſe who are deſirous to be carefull about their "own ſalvation, may learn the character of his "Faith, and the publication of the Truth. Thus far Irenæus. But Polycarp, in his ſaid Epiſtle to the Philippians, which is ſtill extant, quotes ſome authorities out of the firſt Epiſtle of Peter. Moreover Antoninus, ſurnamed Pius, having compleated the two and twentieth year of his Reign, died; and was ſucceeded by M. Aurelius Verus (who alſo was named Antoninus, and was his ſon) and his brother Lucius.

[a] In the Original the term is [ἐπιγίνωσκε] which in this place is the ſame almoſt in ſignification with the word [Salutare, i. e. to Salute]. For therefore would Marcion have had himſelf taken notice of, that he might be ſaluted. So, antiently in the Church, when the Faithfull approacht the holy Table, the Deacon was wont to cry aloud often [ἐπιγινώσκεσθε ἀλλήλους, i. e. acknowledge one another] to wit, leaſt any prophane perſon or Jew ſhould come to the Sacrament. Valeſ. S. Paul uſes this term (1 Cor. 16. 18.) where our tranſlation renders it [acknowledge.]

CHAP. XV.

How, in the Reign of Verus, Polycarp, together with others, ſuffered Martyrdom in the City of Smyrna.

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

AT this time, when moſt ſore perſecutions were ſtirred up in Aſia, Polycarp ended his life by Martyrdom: [The account of] whoſe death (as it is yet extant in writing) we judged moſt requiſite to be inſerted into this our Hiſtory. It is an Epiſtle, written from the Church over which he preſided to the Churches throughout [a] Pontus, which ſets forth the ſufferings of Polycarp in theſe words: "The Church of God which is "at Smyrna, to the Church at Philomelium; and to "all the congregations of holy Catholick Church "every where, the mercy, "peace and love of God the "Father, and of our Lord Je-"ſus Chriſt be multiplied; "we have written unto you, "brethren, both concerning "others who ſuffered Mar-"tyrdom, and alſo about the "bleſſed Polycarp; who by "his own Martyrdom ſealed "up, as it were, and put an "end to the perſecution. [b] After theſe words, before their relation concerning Polycarp, they give an account of the other Martyrs; deſcribing their conſtancy of mind during their torments: "For "thoſe, they ſay, who ſtood "round were aſtoniſhed, when "they ſaw them firſt lacera-"ted with ſcourges even as deep as their in-moſt "Veins and Arteries; (inſomuch that the hidden "parts of their bodies, and their bowels were vi-"ſible;) then laid upon the ſhells of a ſort of Sea-"fiſh, and on ſome very ſharp heads of darts and "Javelins ſtrewed on the ground, and undergoing "all ſorts of puniſhments and torments; and in "fine, thrown to the wild beaſts to be devoured. But moſt eſpecially they relate, that Germanicus was moſt ſignally couragious, who being [c] corroborated by divine grace, overcame that fear of bodily death implanted by nature on the mind of man. For when the Proconſul, deſirous by perſwaſion to prevail upon him, propoſed to him

[a] Inſtead of [χατ πόντον, i. e. throughout Pontus, the reading, as I judge, ſhould be [χατ πάντα τόπον, i. e. Every where: which is confirmed by the inſcription of the Epiſtle, which is thus χατ πάντα τόπον, &c. i. e. every where, &c. Neither is there any mention of the Churches of Pontus in the title of this Epiſtle. For Philomelium is not a City of Pontus, but of Lycaonia, as Pliny ſays, or (as others) of Piſidia. For ſo in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, one Paul, a Philomelian, is named among the Biſhops of Piſidia. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens Edit. it is [χατ πόντον, i. e. throughout Pontus.

[b] This whole Epiſtle, concerning the Martyrdom of Polycarp, is put out by the Learned Biſhop Uſher. Our Euſebius does not inſert the whole Epiſtle; the Learned reader may ſee it entire in that Edit. of Biſhop Ushers.

[c] In Biſhop Ushers Edit. of this Epiſtle this place is different from what is here. The words there are theſe [ὁ γὰρ γενναῖος Γερμανικὸς ἐπῤῥώννυεν αὐτῶν τὴν δειλίαν διὰ τῆς ἐν αὐτῷ ὑπομονῆς; i. e. For the moſt couragious Germanicus ſtrengthened the imbecillity of others by his great patience in undergoing the Tortures.

him his youthfullness, and earnestly entreated him that, being young and in the prime of his years, he would have some compassion on himself: he made no delay, but readily and couragiously enticed the wild beast to devour himself, and almost forced and stimulated it, that he might the sooner be dismist out of this unrighteous and wicked life. Immediately upon his glorious death, the whole multitude, greatly admiring the couragiousness of the divine Martyr, and the fortitude of all the other Christians, on a sudden began to cry out, destroy the impious: Let Polycarp be sought after. Moreover, there following a great tumult upon these clamours, a man, by name Quintus, by extract a Phrygian, lately come out thence, seeing the wild beasts, and the other tortures they threatned to make use of, was daunted and dispirited, and at length gave way to a desire of saving his life. The contents of the foresaid Epistle doe manifest, that this Quintus (together with some others) ran with too much rashness, and without any religious consideration, to the place of judicature; but being forthwith apprehended, he gave all men a signal example, that none should be so audacious, as to precipitate themselves into such dangers without a considerate and pious circumspection. But thus far concerning these men. Now the most admirable Polycarp, when he first heard these things, was not at all disturbed, but continued to keep himself in a steadfast, serene, and unmoved temper of mind; and resolved with himself to continue in the City. But his friends and those who were about him, beseeching and entreating him, that he would withdraw himself, he was prevailed with, and went out of the City to a countrey-house not far distant therefrom; where he abode with a small company, spending the time day and night (being intent upon nothing else) in continued prayers to the Lord; wherein he craved and made humble supplications and requests for the peace of all the Churches throughout the world: For that was his constant and continual usage. Moreover, three days before his apprehension, being at prayer in the night time, and falling into a sleep, he thought he saw the pillow, whereon his head lay, on a sudden consumed by a flame of fire. Whereupon being awaked out of his sleep, he forthwith expounded the vision to those who were then present, and having little less than predicted what was in future to be, he expressly declared to those that were about him, that he should be burnt to death for [the testimony of] Christ. Further, when those that sought for him used their utmost care and diligence to find him out, he was again constrained through the love and affection of the brethren to remove, as they say, to another countrey house. Whither his pursuers soon after came, and catcht up two boys that were there; by the one of which, after they had scourged him, they were conducted to the house where Polycarp lodged; and coming in the evening, they found him reposing himself in an upper room. Whence he might easily have removed into another house, but he would not, saying, The will of the Lord be done. Moreover, when he understood they were come, as that Epistle relates, he went down, and with a very chearfull and most milde countenance talked with the men: insomuch that they (to whom Polycarp was before unknown) thought they saw a wonder, when they beheld his exceeding great age, and his venerable and grave [d] behaviour; and they admired so much diligence should be used to apprehend such an old man. But he, making no delay, presently ordered the table to be spread for them: then he invites them to a sumptuous feast and requested of them one hours space, which he might without disturbance spend in prayer: when they permitted him that, he arose and prayed, being so full of the grace of the Lord, that those who were present and heard him pray were struck with admiration, and many of them altered their minds and were now very sorry that so venerable and divine an old man was forthwith to be put to death. Afterwards, the foresaid Epistle contains word for word this subsequent relation concerning him, "But after he had ended "his prayer (wherein he made mention of all per- "sons who at any time had "been [e] conversant with him, "both small and great, noble "and obscure; and also of "the whole Catholick Church "throughout the world) the "hour of his departure being "now come, they set him up- "on an Asse, and brought "him to the City on the day "of the [f] great Sabbath: He- "rod the [g] Eirenarch and his "father Nicetes met him; "who taking him up into "their Chariot, as they sate "together, endeavoured to "perswade him, and said: "For what harm is it to say "these words, Lord Cæsar, "and to sacrifice, and so to "evade punishment? He at "first made them no answer; "but, they continuing to be "importunate with him, he "said, I will never doe what "you endeavour to induce "me to. They, despairing "of perswading him, gave "him opprobrious language, "and thrust him out of their "Chariot so hastily, that in "his going down he very "much bruised the fore part "of his leg. But he, no more "concerned than if he had "suffered no harm, went on "chearfully and made haste, "being brought [by a guard] "to the †Stadium: but (there "being so great a noise made "in the Stadium that few "could perfectly hear) this "voice came from heaven to "Polycarp as he entred the "Stadium, Be couragious, "Polycarp, and behave thy "self valiantly: no person "indeed saw him that spoke, "but many of us Christians "heard the voice. When "therefore he was brought "before the Tribunal, a great "shout was made, because "the multitude heard Polycarp whas apprehended. "After that, when he was come near him, the [h] Pro- "consul asked him whether he were Polycarp;

[e] In the Mazz. and Med. M.SS. in stead of [συμβεβηκότων, i. e. which happened, &c.] the reading is [συνδεδληκότων, i. e. which had been conversant] and so Rufinus read this place, as appears from his Version: and the old Translatour of this Epistle, put forth by Bishop Usher, is found to have read it so likewise. Vales. In Rob. Stephens Edit. it is [συμβεβηκότων αυτῷ, i. e. which had happened to him.

[f] So it was called whenever the first day of the feast of unleavened bread fell on the Sabbath day. See Jo. 19. 31. & 7. 37. For that which among the Jews is חג a feast, מקרא קדש, the day of solemn assembly in any feast, (and such were the first day, and the last of the feast of tabernacles, the first and seventh of the feast of unleavened bread, and the day of Pentecost) is by the Jews, writing in Greek, called μεγάλη ἡμέρα, a great day. So the 72 render it, Isa. 1. 13. where we read calling of assemblies. See Scalig. proleg. de Emend. Temp. p. 6, & 7. Bishop Usher (in his tract De anno Macedon. chap. 3.) says that the great Sabbath, mentioned here, was that which immediately preceded Easter; the Learned reader may see the Authour and his reasons.

[g] It was the office of this Magistrate to apprehend seditious persons, and disturbers of the publick peace, and, having before sent their indictments, to bring them to the places of judicature: so says August. in his 140, and 159 Epist. Hence 'tis here said, that Herod, the Irenarch of Smyrna, took up Polycarp into his Chariot, whom he had commanded to be found out and apprehended by his guards. These Irenarchs were made of some of the members of the Court of Judicature, as the 49th Law in the Codex Theodos. does shew. At last Theodosius Junior wholly abolished that office in the East: his constitution is extant in the Codex Theodos. They had under their command horsemen; and the Diogmitæ, [i. e. pursuers] a sort of Souldiers that were lightly armed, and so more expedite to pursue and take such as were thieves. Vales.

† That was the place where their sacred games and shews were exhibited.

[h] This Proconsul's name was Statius Quadratus; for so 'tis truly Printed in the old Latine translation of this Epistle, which the most learned Arch B. Usher published. This man, as I judge, was the same person with L. Statius Quadratus, who was Consul in the reign of Antoninus, anno urb. condit. 895. Aristides makes makes mention of this Proconſul of Aſia, in the firſt and fourth of his Sacred Orations: where he alſo calls him a Rhetorician. I doubt not therefore but he was the ſame man with Quadratus the Conſul, who, as Philoſtratus ſays, was the maſter of Varus Sophiſta, who was wont to declaim extempore upon any ſubject given; and was a great emulatour of Favorinus Sophiſta. In what year he bore the office of Proconſul of Aſia, Ariſtides indeed ſays not. But that, as it ſeems to me, may be made out from his relation. For, in the 4 of his Orat. Sacr. Ariſtides ſays, that a little after that Plague which raged in Aſia, Severus was Proconſul. Euſebius, in his Chronicon, places that Plague on the 8 year of M. Aurelius Antoninus. Therefore Severus was Proconſul of Aſia in the 9 of M. Aurelius. When he was Proconſul, Ariſtides writes, that he received letters out of Italy from the Emperours; to wit, from the ſeniour Auguſtus and his ſon: where by the name of Auguſtus he underſtands Marcus; and the ſon of the Emperour is Commodus, who was then called Cæſar. Next before Severus, Pollio was Proconſul, as Ariſtides atteſts in the ſame place; and immediately before Pollio, our Quadratus was the Proconſul of Aſia: for ſo ſays Ariſtides in the ſame Oration. So that Quadratus was Proconſul of Aſia in the 7 of Marcus's Empire. On which year alſo Euſebius, in his Chronicon, places the Martyrdome of Polycarp. They are in an errour therefore, who ſay the Martyrdome of Polycarp happened on the ninth of Marcus. For, whereas tis manifeſt from the atteſtation of Ariſtides, that Quadratus (under whom Polycarp ſuffered) bore the Proconſulate of Aſia in the ſeventh year of Marcus, the death of Polycarp is neceſſarily to be placed on the ſame year. Valeſ.

"Then they all cryed out "with a joynt conſent, that "Polycarp ſhould be burnt "alive. For it was neceſſary that the viſion which "appeared to him upon his "pillow ſhould be fulfilled; "when, being at prayer, he "ſaw that burning, he turned "to the brethren that were "with him and ſaid Prophetically, I muſt be burnt alive. Theſe things therefore "were with no leſs celerity "done then they had been "ſpoken; the multitude immediately brought together "wood and dried branches "of trees out of their ſhops, "and from the Baths; but the "Jews eſpecially moſt readily (as it was their uſage) "aſſiſted in this buſineſs. Now "when the pile of wood for "the fire was made ready, "Polycarp, having unclothed "himſelf, and unlooſed his "girdle, endeavoured alſo to "put off his own ſhoes; a "thing which before he never did, becauſe every one "of the faithfull continually "ſtrove who ſhould ſooneſt "touch his skin: for he was "always reverenced for his "godly courſe of life, even "before he came to be gray"headed, preſently therefore "all the [l] inſtruments pre-

[k] Theſe Aſiarchs were the Prieſts of the community (or whole body of inhabitants) of the Province of Aſia: for as the people of Aſia had Temples built by common charge, ſacred games, ſacred feaſts in common, and a Common-council; ſo alſo they had a Prieſthood called Aſiarchia, that is, the common prieſthood of Aſia; and thoſe who executed this ſacerdotal office (which conſiſted in the managing their publick ſports or ſpectacles) were termed Aſiarchs. Theſe Aſiarchs were elected after this manner: each City of Aſia, at the beginning of every year (that is, about the Autumnal equinox) had a publick meeting, wherein they appointed one of their own Citizens to be an Aſiarch; then they ſent Deputies to the Common-council of the Province, who declared to them his name whom they had made choice of at home: after which the Common-council choſe about ten to be Aſiarchs, out of the number of all thoſe, whom each City had elected to that office. See Ariſtides, in Orat. Sacr. 4tâ. Now the difficulty is, whither all theſe, who were elected by the Common-council, executed this office altogether, or whither onely one of them was Aſiarch: Valeſius thinks there was but one Aſiarch; his reaſons are theſe; thongh more than one were elected by the Senate of Aſia, yet that perhaps was done that out of them the Roman Proconſul might chooſe one, as he uſually did in the Election of the Irenarchs: again, the Senate might elect more than one, becauſe if the firſt that was choſen Aſiarch ſhould die, before he had ended his year, there might be another to ſupply his place: laſtly, that there was but one Aſiarch every year, is apparent from the words at the latter end of this Epiſtle (which Euſebius leaves out in his quotation, but the learned reader may ſee them in Arch B. Uſhers's Edit. of it) where 'tis ſaid, Polycarp ſuffered under Philip the Aſiarch, and Statius Quadratus Proconſul of Aſia. This is the opinion of Valeſius, and theſe are his reaſons for it. On the other ſide, the incomparably learned Uſher affirms that there were more Aſiarchs than one at the ſame time; which he collects from Acts 19. 31. with whom agrees the learned Dr Hammond in his Paraphraſe and Notes on that Text, and alſo Mr Fo. Gregory of Oxford, pag. 49. of his works, Edit. Lond. 1665. This office (ſays Valeſius) was very chargeable, therefore the richeſt perſons were elected to it. Hence 'tis that Strabo affirms, that the Aſiarchs were commonly choſen out of Trallis, the Citizens whereof were the wealthieſt of all Aſia.

In fine therefore, when those impious "wretches saw the body could not be consumed by "the fire, they commanded "the [n] Confector to approach "it, and sheath his sword in "it; which when he had "done, there issued forth so "great a quantity of bloud, "that it extinguisht the fire; "and the whole multitude "admired, in that there was so great a difference "shewed between the infidels and the Elect. Of "which number this most admirable person was "one, who was the Apostolical and Prophetical "doctour of our age, and Bishop of the Catholick "Church at Smyrna. For every word, which pro-"ceeded out of his mouth, either hath been, or "shall be fulfilled. But the envious and malevo-"lent devil, that deadly enemy to the generation of "the just, understanding the couragiousness of his "Martyrdom, and his unblameable conversation "even from his youth, and [perceiving] that "he was now encircled in a Crown of immorta-"lity, and had most undoubtedly obtained the "glorious reward of his victory; the devil, I say, "used his utmost diligence that his body should "not be born away by us Christians, although "many of us were desirous to doe it, and to have "[o] been conversant with his "sacred dead body. Some "therefore suggested to Ni-"cetas the father of Herod, "but the brother of [p] Dalcis; "do address to the Gover-"nour, that he would not give "us his body; least (as they "said) they leave him that "was crucified, and begin to "worship this person: and "this they spoke upon ac-"count of the suggestion and "importunity of the Jews, "who very diligently watcht "us when we were about to "take his body out of the "fire: but they were igno-"rant, that we could ne-"ver at any time relinquish "Christ (who suffered for "the salvation of all those "throughout the world who "were to be saved) nor yet "worship any other. For "we adore him as being the "Son of God; but we have a worthy affection "for the Martyrs (as being the disciples and fol-"lowers of the Lord) because of their most ex-"ceeding great love shown to their own King and "Master; whose [q] companions and fellow disci-"ples we wish our selves to be. The Centurion "therefore, perceiving the "contentious obstinacy of "the Jews, caused the body "to be brought forth, and "(as 'tis customary with "them) burnt it: and so we at length gathered "up his bones, more highly to be prized than the "most pretious gemms, and more refined than the "purest gold, and deposited them in a decent place "of burial: whereat being assembled together, "the Lord grant we may with joy and gladness "celebrate the [r] Birth-day of his Martyrdom, both "in memory of those who have heretofore under-"gone and been victorious in "this glorious conflict, and "also for the instruction and "preparation of such as here-"after shall be exercised "therein. Thus much con-"cerning the blessed Polycarp, who together with "[s] twelve Philadelphians was crowned with Mar-"tyrdom at Smyrna: who alone is so eminently "famous and memorable a-"mongst all men, that e-"ven the heathens every-"where doe make mention "of him: [t] Such was the [m] From this passage I conjecture, that Polycarp said this foregoing prayer of his with a low voice; but pronounced Amen aloud. That this of old was the custom of the Christians (that is, loudly to resound the Amen at the end of the prayer) the rite now observed in the Church does demonstrate, to wit, that after each prayer repeated by the Priest, all the people doe with a loud voice answer Amen. Vales.

[n] This officers charge was (not to fight with the wild beasts, as the Bestiarii did, but) to dispatch them, if at any time they were enraged, and like to endanger the spectatours, as sometimes it happened. They were also called Lancearii. Vales.

[o] The phrase in the Original is this [κοινωνῆσαι τοῦ ἁγίου αὐτοῦ σαρκίου] κοινωνεῖσιν (says Hesychius) οἱ μεταδιδόντες ἀλλήλοις, καὶ μεταλαμβάνοντες παρ' ἀλλήλων φιλίας ἢ γνώσεως. i. e. They are said to communicate, who distribute to one another, and they that partake and receive from one another, whether friendship, or knowledge. Whence it appears that the word [κοινωνῆσαι] is appliable to friendship or society; which the primitive Christians expresst to the Martyrs, &c. departed, when, meeting yearly at the place where their sacred reliques were interred, they celebrated the anniversary day of their Martyrdom: thus they maintained a friendship or society (as it were) with the departed Martyr. The following words of this Epistle doe declare the resolution of the Church of Smyrna about the celebration of the day of Polycarps Martyrdom, after this manner, and also the reason of that their so doing.

[p] Or, Alce, for so it is in Bishop Ushers Edit. Vales.

[q] In the learned Ushers Edit. 'tis [κοινωνούς] that is, companions; from the verb [κοινωνέω] used here in the same sense, as we said (note o.) it is sometimes taken to signifie.

[r] Ἡμέραν γενέθλιον is the original phrase: so the primitive Christians called the days whereon the Martyrs suffered, because at their deaths they were born sons (as it were) and heirs of the Kingdom of Glory.

[s] This passage is otherwise (and truer) in B. Ushers Edit. thus [who together with those of Philadelphia was the twelfth that suffered Martyrdom in Smyrna.] So that, those Martyrs of Philadelphia were not 12 in number but 11 onely; and Polycarp was the twelfth. Vales.

[t] Eusebius purposely omitted the conclusion of this letter, as being unserviceable to his present design; and because he had inserted the entire Epistle into another work of his, to wit, into his book concerning the sufferings of the Primitive Martyrs: the learned Reader may see this whole Letter (as before we intimated) put forth by Arch B. Usher, from the conclusion whereof he may observe, (1.) that this Epistle was not written immediately after Polycarps Martyrdom, but that there was some distance of time between that and the writing thereof: for the Philomelians, hearing hearing a report of the ſuffering of Polycarp, ſent Letters to the Church of Smyrna, deſiring an account of all particulars that happened at the ſuffering of this B. Martyr: which thoſe of Smyrna willingly undertook, and wrote them this Letter, moſt part whereof Euſebius quotes in this Chapter. (2.) That Polycarps Martyrdom is there called Evangelical; and the reaſon is given, to wit, becauſe Polycarp fled from thoſe who purſued him, (agreeable to the example of our Saviour.) Laſtly, 'tis obſervable therefrom, that Polycarp was Martyred the 2d day of the month Xanthicus, that is, the 7th of the Calend. of March. Valeſ. But Arch B. Uſher diſſents (in this particular, that is, concerning the day of Polycarps Martyrdom) from Valeſius, as the learned reader may ſee in his notes on that Epiſt. and in his tract De Anno Solar. Maced. & Aſian.

glorious exit of the admirable and Apoſtolick Polycarp, whoſe ſtory the brethren of the Church in Smyrna have in the fore-cited Epiſtle recorded: and to the ſame writing concerning him are annexed other Martyrdomes undergone at the ſame City of Smyrna, and at the [u] ſame period of time wherein Polycarp ſuffered. Amongſt which number Metrodorus, ſuppoſed to be a Presbyter of the Sect of the Marcionites, was burnt to death. But the moſt famous and eminent Martyr of thoſe times was one Pionius. Whoſe particular profeſſions, boldneſs and freeneſs in ſpeaking, Apologies and moſt learned orations in defence of the faith, made both before the people and in the preſence of the Governours; and moreover, his affectionate invitations and encouragements to thoſe who in time of perſecution fell into temptation, and the conſolatory ſpeeches he uſed to ſuch brethren as made him viſits during his impriſonment; and further than all this, the torments, and beſides them the exquiſite tortours he endured, his being nailed to the ſtake, and his fortitude amidſt the fiery pile, and laſtly his death which was ſubſequent to all theſe miraculous ſufferings: whoſoever are deſirous to know all theſe particulars, we remit them to the Epiſtle (which contains a moſt ample account concerning him) which we have inſerted into that collection we made of the ſufferings of the Primitive Martyrs. Moreover there are extant the Acts and Monuments of others who ſuffered Martyrdom at Pergamus, a City of Aſia, to wit, of Carpus and Papulus, and of a woman named Agathonica, who after many and moſt eminent confeſſions of our faith, were made perfect by a glorious death.

[u] Euſebius is here much miſtaken in that he thought, Pionius, Metrodorus, Carpus, and the reſt ſuffered in the Reign of M. Antoninus, at the ſame time when Polycarp was Martyred: for 'tis manifeſt from the Acts of Pionius, Carpus, and Papulus, that they were Martyred in the Reign of Decius. Valeſ. See Uſher, in his book De Anno Solar. Maced. & Aſian. cap. 3.

AT the ſame time alſo Juſtin, of whom we made mention a little before, having preſented [a] a ſecond Apology to the foreſaid Emperours in defence of our faith, was crowned with divine Martyrdom; Creſcens the Philoſopher (whoſe life and manners were anſwerable to the appellation of a Cynick; of which Philoſophical Sect he was a follower) formed and contrived the treacherous plot againſt him: becauſe Juſtin confuted him often in ſeveral diſputes had in the preſence of many auditours, at length by his own Martyrdom he obtained the reward of that truth he was an aſſertour of. Thus much, this moſt ſtudious follower of the truth (perceiving before hand what was about to befall him) does, in his foreſaid Apology, expreſly predict in theſe ſame words; "[b] And I alſo my ſelf doe expect to be "treacherouſly betraied by ſome one of thoſe cal-

[c] The Maz. Fuk. & Med. M. SS. interpoſe here the prepoſition [ἐν, i.e. in] which we have followed in our tranſlation. The term [ξύλω] we have rendered [ſtocks;] in which ſenſe this word is frequently uſed in Euſebius; for example, in the beginning of his 5 B. The learned Petavius (in his notes on Themiſtius, Orat. 9.) remarques that the word [ξύλον] which there occurs, is the ſame in ſignification with [nervus, i.e. a kind of ſtocks] For theſe ſort of fetters were made of wood. Valeſ. The ſame word is uſed Acts 16. 24. where our tranſlatours render it thus [And made their feet faſt in the ſtocks.]

[d] In the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. the reading is [πλανωμένως τῶτο περὶτῶν]; i. e. Creſcens did very ill, to defame the Chriſtians, (the points of whoſe religion he was altogether ignorant of) meerly to win the applauſe of the multitude. Valeſ. In *Rob. [e] He means that incomparable ſaying of Socrates, that is in Plato's works: which Valeſius thought good to inſert into his tranſlation; (ſuppoſing it was left out by the negligence of the tranſcribers of Euſebius;) and we alſo have expreſt it in our Verſion; but it is not in this original Edit. of Euſebius, nor in Rob. Stephens Edit. and is therefore Printed in a different Character.

[f] Σοφιστεύσας is the term in the original; which though it be ſometimes taken in that ſignification Euſebius here uſes it in; yet by other Writers (and particularly by Tatianus in his book here quoted by Euſebius, about the end of it) it is uſed in ſuch a ſenſe, as to comprehend all the learning of the Grecians, and the Liberal Sciences. Valeſ.

[g] This work of Tatianus's is extant at the latter end of Juſtin Martyrs works, Edit. Paris. 1636. It is there called Tatiani Aſſyrii contra Græcos oratio. This paſſage here quoted by Euſeb. occurs p. 157, 158, where the tranſlatour renders theſe words [μεσάλη πόλι] in Megalopolis: but we, following Valeſius, have tranſlated it thus [in the great City, i.e. Rome.]

Grecians

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

Grecians in these words; "And the most admirable Justin said truely, that the foresaid persons were like thieves. Then, interposing some words concerning these Philosophers, he adjoyns thus much; "Indeed Crescens, who had made his nest in the great City [Rome,] was most notorious for the sin of buggering boys, and above all men most addicted to covetousness: and he, who exhorted all men to despise death, did so mightily dread it himself, that he made it his business to procure Justin to be put to death, (as judging that to be the worst of evils) because he Preacht the truth, and manifestly proved, that the Philosophers were gluttons, and deceivers. And this indeed was the true cause of Justins Martyrdom.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning those Martyrs, whom Justin makes mention of in his Apology.

THe same Justin, before his own Martyrdom does in his [a] first Apology make mention of some others who suffered as Martyrs before him. which words of his, because they are accommodate to our Subject, I will here recite: He writes thus "A certain woman had an husband who led a lascivious and libidinous course "of life; she her self also "had formerly been addicted to lightness and a dishonest behaviour, but after she had been acquainted with the doctrine of "Christ, she became modest "and chast, and made it her "business to perswade her "husband to live in like manner continently and chastly; advertizing him of the "Christian precepts, and declaring to him the future "punishment in eternal flames "prepared for such as lead "an obscene and disorderly "course of life. But he, persevering in his wonted lasciviousness, by such his "doings, alienated his wife's "affection from him. For "the woman at last judged it a wicked thing for "her to cohabit with an husband who wholly "practised all manner of lustfull courses, contrary "to the law of nature, and disagreeable to justice "and honesty; and therefore she resolved to be "divorced from him. But the woman was obedient to the instructions of her friends, who advised her to continue married a while longer, in "expectation that her husband would in future alter his mind, and ere long lead a more regular "course of life; so she constrained her self and "continued with him. But after this, her husband, "having made a journey to Alexandria, was discovered to have committed more notorious acts "of lewdness; the woman therefore (fearing, that by her continuing married to him, and by her being his consort at bed and board, she should "be partaker of his wickednesses and impieties) sent him that which we call a bill of divorce, and departed from him. But this excellent fellow her "husband (who ought to have rejoyced, because his wife (who formerly had committed "lewdness with servants and mercenary fellows, and took delight in drunkenness and all manner "of vice) did now both desist from those wicked "doings, and also desired him to leave them off; "which because he would not doe she was divorc't from him) drew up an accusation against "her, and said she was a Christian. And she presented a [b] Libell to thee, O Emperour; wherein she requested liberty might be allowed "her first to set in order her domestick affairs; after which settlement she promised to put "in an answer to her accusation. And You granted the "womans Petitions. But her "(heretofore) husband, "being within that [c] space "unable to say any thing against her, set upon one "Ptolemæus (whom [d] Urbicius put to death) who "had been the womans instructour in the Christian "Religion, after this manner: he perswaded a Centurion, who was his friend, "to apprehend Ptolemæus, "and having put him in "bonds, to ask him this one "question, whether he were "a Christian? And Ptolemæus, (being a lover of "truth, and no deceitfull person, nor falsifier of his own "judgment) confessing that he was a Christian, "the Centurion caused him to be bound in fetters, "and afflicted him with a long imprisonment. "At length, when the man was brought before "Urbicius, he was again asked this one question, "whether he were a Christian? And he, assuredly "knowing that he should obtain glory and happiness by the doctrine of Christ, again made "profession of that divine and virtuous institution. "For, he that denies himself to be a Christian, "declines the confession of that Religion, either "because he is a disallower as well as a denier of it, "or in regard he knows himself to be unworthy "of, and estranged from its Rules and Precepts: "neither of which can happen to him that is a "true Christian. When therefore Urbicius had "given command that Ptolemæus should be led away to be put to death, one Lucius, (who also was "a Christian,) considering the injustice of the sentence

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

[a] It should be [in his second Apology, &c.] as the learned Petavius has conjectured (in his notes on Heresy 46. Epiphan.) For Eusebius does not recount the Apologies of Justin in the same order wherein they are now Printed. For that which in the ordinary Editions is termed the second, and is dedicated to Antoninus Pius, Eusebius calls the first, as appears from chapt. 12. B. 2. and from chapt. 12, and 18. B. 4. And that, which in the vulgar Editions is said to be his first Apology, and is dedicated to the Senate, Eusebius calls the second, (See chap. 16. of this book,) and says (chap. 16. and 18, of this 4 B.) it was presented to M. Aurelius Antoninus, after the death of Pius. As to the order of Justins Apologies I agree with Eusebius, and doe grant that to be the latter which is in the vulgar Edit. inscribed to the Senate. But whereas Eusebius says, Justins former Apology was presented to M. Aurelius Antoninus; I cannot assent to him. For, in the beginning of that Apology Justin says, that the woman (which was a Christian) being accused by her husband, presented a Petition to the Emperour [and she presented a Libell to thee O Emperour:] (see these words in this chapter.) Now if that Apology had been presented to the Successours of Antoninus Pius, as Eusebius thinks it was, doubtless Justin would have used the plural number, and said [To You, O Emperours:] For Marcus and Verus were both Emperours together. Again, Justin says, that one Lucius, seeing Ptolemeus a Christian led away to be put to death, used these words to the Judge [these judiciary proceedings are misbecoming both Pius the Emperour, and the son of Cæsar the Philosopher, &c.] (in chap. 12. of this 4th B. the reading is better, thus, [and the Philosopher] which is confirmed by our M. SS.) Who therefore sees not, that Antoninus Pius is meant in these words? For his surname [Pius] evidently shews so much; and [the Philosopher son of the Emperour] manifestly confirms this our opinion. Lastly, Urbicus the Prefect (See note d. in this chap.) whom Justin there mentions, lived in the times of Antoninus Pius. For he was that Lollius Urbicus, who, being the Emperours Deputy, appeased the Rebellion of the Brittans, as Capitolinus relates in the life of Antoninus. Apuleius (in the beginning of his Apology) affirms that this Lollius Urbicus was Prefect of the City in the Reign of Pius. These are the reasons by which I am induced to affirm, that the latter Apology of Justin was not presented to M. Aurelius, but to Antoninus Pius: under which Emperour he suffered Martyrdom, and not under Marcus Aurelius, as Eusebius here places his Martyrdom: But, in his Chronicon (whom Georg. Syncellus also follows) he seems to place it in the Reign of Antoninus Pius; and so does Mich. Glycas, in Annal. Valef. Mr Tho. Lydiat, in his Emend. Temp. says Justin suffered under this Emperour Antoninus Pius.

[b] That is, a Petition, wherein the woman requested of the Emperour, that the proceedings against her might be deferred, which delay was usually granted as well to the accused, as to the Accusor. See Cod. Theod. Tit. 36. ut intra annum, &c. Valef.

[c] To wit, which was prefixt by the Emperour; who had granted the womans Petition, in regard it was reasonable and just. Valef.

[d] This Urbicus was Prefect of the City; whose sentence, pronounced against the two Christians Ptolemæus and Lucius, was the occasion of Justins writing this Apology. He was called Q. Lollius Urbicus, as an old inscription at Rome attests. See Apulcius, in defens. sua: yet, 'tis strange that in all our Copies he is written Urbicius. In Justin he is now and then rightly called Urbicus, to wit, in the beginning of his Apology, and a little after that. Valef.

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

CHAP. XVIII.

What books of Juſtin's are come to our hands.

THis perſon has left us many monuments of his learned and moſt accompliſht [a] underſtanding, and alſo of his ſedulous deligence about divine matters, full of variety of profit: to which we will remit ſuch as are lovers of learning, after we have uſefully remark't ſuch of them as are come to our knowledge. The firſt therefore of his books is his ſupplication to Antoninus ſurnamed Pius, and his ſons, and to the Roman Senate, in behalf of our Religion: the ſecond contains another Apology for our faith, which he preſented to Verus (who was ſucceſſour to, and bore the ſame name with, the foreſaid Emperour Antoninus) whoſe times we are now giving an account of. There is alſo another book of his againſt the Gentiles; wherein he treats at large, both of many queſtions that are uſually diſputed both amongſt us and the Gentile-Philoſo- phers; and alſo declares his opinion concerning the nature of Spirits; which 'tis of no importance for us here to inſert. And further there is another work of his againſt the Gentiles come to our hands, which he entitled, A confutation: and beſides theſe another, concerning the Monarchy of God; which he confirms not onely by the Authority of the ſacred Scriptures, but alſo from the teſtimo-nies of the Writers amongſt the Gentiles. Moreover he wrote another book, the title whereof is Pſal- tes: and another, containing [b] ſome ſhort notes concerning the ſoul; wherein he propoſes divers queſtions pertinent to the explication of that Subject, and produces the opinions of the Philoſophers among the Gentiles, which he promiſeth to con-fute, and to ſet forth his own opinion thereof in another work of his. He alſo compoſed a Dia- logue againſt the Jews, being a conference which he had at the City of Epheſus with one Trypho the moſt famous perſon amongſt the Jews at that time. In which book he manifeſts, after what manner divine grace incited him to embrace the doctrine of the true faith; and with what ſedulous earneſtneſs he before that ſet himſelf about the ſtudy of Philoſophy, alſo with how great an ardency of mind he was laborious in finding out the truth. Moreover, in the ſame book he relates concerning the Jews, how that they formed treacherous plots and contrivances againſt the doctrine of Chriſt; and uſeth theſe expreſs words to Try- pho; "So far were you from a repentance of "your impious doings, that you choſe out ſome
"men fit for ſuch a deſign, and at that time ſent
"them forth from Jeruſalem over the whole "world, to publiſh this, that there was an impious
"Sect called Chriſtians ſprung up; and to divulge
"the ſame reproaches, which all thoſe that are ig"norant of our Religion doe now faſten upon us:
"ſo that, you are not onely the authours of your "own wickedneſs and errour; but alſo give the ſole
"occaſion thereof to all other men. He ſays alſo, in the ſame work, that the gifts of Prophecy even in his time ſhone forth upon the Church. Moreover, he has mentioned the Revelation of John, and ſays expreſly 'twas written by that Apoſtle. Alſo he recites ſeverall teſtimonies of the Prophets, which, in his diſpute with Trypho, he evinces were cut out of the Bible by the Jews. Several other works alſo of his are extant among many of our Chriſtian brethren. Further, the Books of this perſon were ſo highly eſteemed by the Antients, that Irenæus quotes ſome expreſſions of his;
partly in his fourth book againſt Hereſies, where he produces theſe words of his; And Juſtin ſays well, in his book againſt Marcion, I would not have credited the Lord himſelf, if he had Preached any other God than him, who was the Maker of the world: and partly, in his fifth book of the ſame work, where he quotes theſe words of his; It was well ſpoken of Juſtin, to wit, that before the coming of our Lord, Satan never durſt blaſpheme God, becauſe till then he did not certainly [c] know his own condemnation. And let

NOw the foreſaid Emperour being in the eighth year of his Reign, Anicetus, having compleated the eleventh year of his Epiſcopal dignity over the Roman Church, was ſucceeded by Soter. The antient Græcians called [Scholia] ſome ſhort notes; and diſtinguiſh't them from Exegeticks: for Exegeticks were long and large expoſitions, and explained the whole work of a writer: but Scholia were put to explain particular words, or to expound one ſentence. Sometimes, Scholia are called ſhort expoſitions of more obſcure words and ſentences. Such were Cyrill's Scholia concerning the incarnation of the onely begotten ſon of God, which are now extant, and are nothing elſe but ſome ſhort explications of the more obſcure queſtions concerning the Incarnation. And of this ſort was Juſtin's book of the ſoul; to wit, ſome queſtions and opinions, concerning the nature and origin of ſouls; to which were added Juſtin's expoſition and demonſtration thereof. Ferom calls them Excerpta, which Origen termed σχόλια. Valeſ.

Who then Governed the Church of Antioch.

AT that time also Theophilus, the sixth from the Apostles, flourisht in his Presidency over the Church at Antioch: for Cornelius, successour to Heros was the fourth that presided there; after whom Eros, in the fifth remove from the Apostles, succeeded in that Episcopal See.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning the Ecclesiastical Writers who flourisht in that Age.

IN those times Hegesippus flourisht in the Church, of whom we have made frequent mention in the foregoing book; and Dionysius Bishop of the Corinthians; also one Pinytus Bishop of the Cretians. Moreover, Philippus, Appollinaris, and Melito; Musanus also, and Modestus: and lastly Irenæus. All which persons wrote books that are come to our hands, containing the sound doctrine, and true faith, delivered by the Apostles.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning Hegesippus, and those he makes mention of.

MOreover, Hegesippus, in his five books of Historicall memorials, which are come to our hands, has left a most full and compleat account of his own faith and opinion. Wherein he declareth, that travelling as far as Rome, he discourst with many Bishops, and from them all heard one and the same doctrine. You may please to hear him (a after some words of his concerning the Epistle of Clemens to the Corinthians) continuing his discourse thus; "And the Corinthian Church con-"tinued in the true faith untill Primus came to be "Bishop there: with whom I had some discourse "in my voyage to Rome, and was conversant with "the Corinthians a sufficient time; wherein we "received mutual refresh-"ment from the true faith. "But arriving at Rome, I "b staied there till Anice-"tus's time, whose Deacon "Eleutherus then was: after "Anicetus succeeded Soter, "and next to him Eluthe-"rus. Now in every suc-c cession [of Bishops] and "throughout each City the "doctrine is conformable to "what the Law, the Prophets, "and our Lord Preach't. And the same Authour subjoines an account of the Heresies which were broacht in his age, in these words; "And after James the Just "had suffered Martyrdom "(as the Lord had also) for "the preaching of his do-"ctrine, Simeon the son of "Cleophas (which [Cleo-"phas] was Uncle by the "mothers side to our Sa-"viour) was constituted Bishop in his room; "whom all preferred to be second Bishop there, "because he was the Lords c Cousingerman by the "mothers side. Upon which account that Church "was stiled a Virgin; for it was not hitherto cor-"rupted with vain opinions. d Thebuthis (be-"cause he was not made a Bishop) was the first "that began to vitiate it. "This man was e one of "those that took his rise from "the seven Sects, which were "amongst the [Jewish] peo-"ple: of which Simon was "another, from whom the "f Symonians; and Cleobius, "from whom the Cleobi-"ans; f and Dositheus, from "whom the Dositheans; and "Gortheus, from whom the "g Gortheans; and Masbo-"theus, from whom the "Masbotheans, had their "denomination: from these "also came the Menandri-"ans, and the Marcionists, "and the Carpocratians, and "the Valentinians, and the "Basilidians, and the Sa-"turnilians; each of which "men in particular was an "introducer of his own o-"pinion. From these came "the false Christs, the false-"Prophets, and the false-A-"postles; who rent asunder the Unity of the "Church by their corrupt opinions brought in "against God, and his Christ. Moreover, the same Writer gives an account of the Heresies which were heretofore amongst the Jews, in these words; "There were divers Sects and Opinions "in the Circumcision among the children of "Israel, which were opposite "both to the h tribe of Ju-"dah, and also to Christ; "to wit, the i Essæans, the "k Galilæans, the Hemero-"baptists, the l Masbothe-"ans, the Samarites, the "Sadducees, and the Phari-"sees. And he writes many other things, of which we have partly made mention before, and inserted his relations in their proper and opportune places and times. Also, he produces several passages out of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, out of the Syriack, and particularly out of the Hebrew tongue; whereby he plainly intimates himself to have been converted from being a Jew to the faith of Christ. He makes mention also of other things as contained in the unwritten b Sr Henry Savil, at the Margin of his M. S. made it [διατελὼν ἐπισκόπῳ] that is, I staied there. In Robert Stephens Edit. 'tis [διαδοχὴν.] Whether the learned Knight corrected this passage from his own conjecture, or by the autority of some M. S. copie, is to me uncertain: However this emendation is very necessary. Further, Eusebius quotes this passage of Hegesippus's in chap. 11. of this book; between which place and this here there seems to be some disagreement. For Eusebius writes there, that Hegesippus came to Rome in the times of Aniccius, and staid there till Eleutherius was promoted to that See. But Hegesippus himself does not say so here, onely, that he staied at Rome untill Anicetus was Bishop there. Therefore Hegesippus came thither about the latter end of Pius's Reign. Vales.

c See note (a) on c. 11. book 3.

d In the Kings, the Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. his name is Θεβουθὶς, i. e. Thebuthis. In Rob. Stephens Edit. he is called Θεβουλὶς, i. e. Thebulis. Rufinus, in his Version, calls him Theobutes, and Thobutes. Vales.

e That is, he was one that gathered up his errours from the false opinions of those seven Sects amongst the Jews; as did also Simon, Cleobius, Dositheus, &c. Vales.

f Some think that this Dositheus was much antienter than these times he is here mentioned to have lived in: Drusius (in Respons. ad Minerval Scrati, cap. 10.) asserts he lived in the times of Sennacherib King of Assyria; and Jerom is of that opinion, as appears by what he says in Dialog. Adverf. Luciferian. But Scaliger, (in Elencho tribæres.) and Origen (book 1. against Celsus) affirm he lived since our Saviours incarnation, and was co-temporary with Simon Magus. See Photii Bibliothec. cap. 230. Vales.

h By this passage Hegesippus seems to have thought the tribe of Judah clear of all Sects and Heresies; so that none of that tribe were followers of the Essens, Sadducees, and Pharisees, &c. But this is very improbable. Hegesippus said it only in favour of that Tribe, from whence Christ sprang. Vales.

i These were the seven Sects amongst the Jews; of which Hegesippus makes frequent mention, as may be seen from some quotations out of him, which occur in the foregoing books. Justin (in disputat. adverf. Triphon.) mentions them, but calls them by other names, to wit, Sadducees, Genists, Merists Galilæans, Hellenians, Pharisees, and Baptists. Epiphanius terms them, Scribes, Pharisees, Sadducees, Essens, Nazarcans, Hemerobaptists, and Herodians. Vales.

k Judas Galilæus was the original authour of this Sect, (says Josephus, Antiq. B. 18. chap. 2.) who, having joyned Saddock, a Pharisee, to him, sollicited the people to defection, telling them, that God was to be their onely Prince and Master, and no mortal to be acknowledged as such; that the requiring a Tax from them, if it were by them paid, was a manifest profession of servitude, and that 'twas their duty to vindicate their liberty; by which means he raised a great Sedition among the Jews, and was the cause (under pretence of defending the publick liberty) of innumerable mischiefs to the nation. See Joseph. Antiq. B. 18. chap. 2.

l They are called also Marboncans and Morboncans; they must be distinguisht from those whom Hegesippus mentions a little before; for these here were one of the seven Sects amongst the Jews; but those were propagated from the seven Sects; as were also the Simonians, Dositheans, &c. Vales.

CHAP. XXIII.

Concerning Dionyſius, Biſhop of the Corinthians, and the Epiſtles he wrote.

AND firſt we are to ſpeak of Dionyſius: who had the Epiſcopal Chair of the Corinthian Church; and liberally and copiouſly communicated his divine labours, not onely to thoſe committed to his charge, but alſo to ſuch as inhabited Countreys remote and at a great diſtance: rendring himſelf moſt ſerviceable and uſefull to all perſons, by thoſe general Epiſtles he wrote to divers Churches. Of which number one is that to the Lacedæmonians, containing the firſt rudiments of, and inſtitutions in, the true Faith; and moreover an exhortation to Peace and Unity. Another of them is that to the Athenians, which is excitatory to Faith, and to lead a life anſwerable to the Precepts of the Goſpel: in which point he reproves the negligence of [the Athenians] who had in a manner apoſtatized from the Faith, ſince the time that Publius their Biſhop ſuffered Martyrdom, during the perſecutions which then happened: he makes mention alſo of [a] Quadratus, who was conſtituted their Biſhop, after the Martyrdom of Publius; and atteſts, that by his labour and induſtry, the congregations [of the Chriſtians] were re-aſſembled, and the ardour of their faith revived, and re-kindled. He relates moreover, that Dionyſius the Areopagite (who was converted to the Faith by the Apoſtle Paul, according to the account given in the Acts of the Apoſtles,) was made the firſt Biſhop of the Athenian Church. There is alſo extant another Epiſtle of his to the Nicomedians, wherein he impugneth the Hereſie of Marcion, and ſtrenuouſly aſſerts and defends the exact Rule of Truth: He wrote likewiſe to the Church at Gortyna, and to the reſt of the Churches in Creet; and commends Philip their Biſhop, becauſe the Church under his charge was renowned for many ſignal acts of fortitude; and admoniſhes them to uſe caution againſt the deceit and perverſneſs of Hereticks: And in the Epiſtle he wrote to the Church of Amaſtris, together with the other Churches throughout Pontus, he mentions Bacchylides and Elpiſtus, as being the perſons that incited him to write: he annexes likewiſe ſeveral expoſitions of holy Scripture, and by name mentions Palma their Biſhop. He recommends to them many things concerning marriage and chaſtity, and commands thoſe that recover from any lapſe whatſoever, (whether vitiouſneſs, or Heretical errour) to be affectionately received. In the ſame Volume is contained another Epiſtle to the Gnoſſians, wherein he admoniſhes Pinytus the Biſhop of that Church, not to impoſe the heavy yoak of continency upon the brethren, as if 'twere neceſſary; but to have a regard to the infirmity of moſt men. To which Pinytus returning an anſwer, does greatly admire, and extol Dionyſius; but withall exhorts him, that in future he would impart ſtronger food, and nouriſh up the people under his charge by ſending again to them ſome letters that contain more perfect and ſolid doctrine; leaſt, being continually accuſtomed to ſuch milky expreſſions, they ſhould grow old in a childiſh diſcipline. In which Epiſtle, both the Orthodox Faith of Pinytus, and his ſollicitude for the proficiency of thoſe under his care; his eloquence alſo, and underſtanding in divine matters, is moſt accurately and to the life repreſented. Moreover, there is extant an Epiſtle of Dionyſius's to the Romans, ſuperſcribed to Soter, at that time the Biſhop there: out of which it's not amiſs here to inſert ſome words, wherein he much commends the uſage and cuſtome of the Romans, obſerved by them even untill the times of the perſecution raiſed in our own [b] age; he writes thus; "For this hath been your cuſtome even "from the beginning [of your converſion to "Chriſtianity] to be divers ways beneficial to all "the brethren, and to ſend relief to moſt Churches "throughout every City, ſometimes ſupplying the "wants of ſuch as are in neceſſity; at others, furniſhing thoſe brethren with neceſſaries that are "condemned to work in the mines. By ſuch "charitable gifts, which from the beginning you "have been accuſtomed to tranſmit to others, "being Romans, you retain the cuſtom received "from your Roman fore-fathers. Which uſage "your bleſſed Biſhop Soter has not onely diligently obſerved, but greatly improved; being "both inſtrumental and ready in the conveyance "of your bounty deſigned for the Saints; and alſo comforting with bleſſed words (as a tender and affectionate father does his children) "thoſe brethren that come as "[c] ſtrangers to you. In the ſame Epiſtle alſo he makes mention of the Epiſtle of Clemens to the Corinthians, and manifeſts that 'twas very antiently cuſtomary to recite it publickly in the preſence of the Church: for he ſays; "[d] This "day therefore, being the holy day of the Lord, "we have now paſſed over, wherein we read over "your Epiſtle; which (as alſo the former Epiſtle "of Clemens's written to us) we continuing to "read henceforward, ſhall abound with moſt excellent Precepts and inſtructions. Further, the ſame Writer ſpeaking of his own Epiſtles which by ſome forgers were corrupted, ſays thus; "For "I wrote ſome Epiſtles, being thereto requeſted "by the brethren: but the emiſſaries of the devil "have filled them with darnell; expunging ſome "paſſages out of them, and adding other ſome; for "whom a Woe is reſerved. Its no wonder therefore, "that ſome attempt to adulterate the holy writings "of the Lord, ſince they have baſely falſified ſuch as "are of an inferiour authority. Beſides theſe, there is extant another Epiſtle of Dionyſius's, written to Chryſophora a moſt faithfull Siſter, to whom he writes what is agreeable, and imparts to her ſuch Spiritual food as is convenient for her. Thus much concerning the writings of Dionyſius.

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

[a] This Quadratus, I judge, is not the ſame perſon with that Quadratus, the diſciple of the Apoſtles, mentioned by Euſebius (book 3. chap. 37.) For the Quadratus laſt named was not a Biſhop, as it plainly appears from the foreſaid place of Euſebius. But, that Quadratus (ſpoken of by our Authour at the beginning of this fourth book) who preſented an Apology to Adrian for our Religion, was the diſciple of the Apoſtles, as Euſebius, in his Chronicon, expreſly affirms. Now this Quadratus here ſpoken of (who was Biſhop of the Athenians) muſt, as I ſaid, be diſtinguiſhed from Quadratus the diſciple of the Apoſtles: for this latter lived not beyond the times of Adrian; but he that was Biſhop of the Athenians, governed that Church in the times of M. Antoninus, as 'tis evident from Dionyſius's Epiſtle to the Athenians; for he ſpeaks of him, as being his co-temporary: Now Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth flouriſht in the Reign of M. Antoninus. Valeſ.

[b] He means the perſecution in Diocletians Reign. Valeſ.

[c] Dionyſius means thoſe brethren, who uſually came from remote Countreys to Rome, to procure ſome relief for ſuch as in their own Country were in diſtreſs, and neceſſity. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning Theophilus, Bishop of the Antiochians.

THere are extant of this Theophilus's (whom we declared to have been Bishop of the Antiochian Church) three books written to Autolycus, containing the first rudiments of the Faith. He has another Tract also extant, entitled, Against the Heresie of [a] Hermogenes, wherein he quotes authorities out of the Revelation of S^t John: there are besides some other books of his, wherein are delivered the first principles of our Faith. Moreover, whenas in that age the Hereticks (like darnell) did nevertheless corrupt the pure seed of the Apostolick doctrine, the Pastours of Churches were every where very earnest and industrious to chase them away (being as it were savage and wild beasts) from the sheep of Christ; partly by admonishing and exhorting the brethren; and partly by encountring valiantly with the Hereticks themselves; whom they either confuted by dint of arguments and unwritten questions propounded face to face; or else disproved their opinions by written Treatises most accurately compiled. That Theophilus therefore did, together with others, engage these Hereticks, 'tis manifestly apparent from that elaborate piece, (not unworthy of himself) which he wrote against Marcion; which book, together with those other we have recounted, is at this present time extant. Further, Maximinus, the seventh from the Apostles, succeeded this person in the Bishoprick of the Antiochian Church.

[a] Concerning this Hermogenes, and his Heresie, see Baronius, ad annum Christi 170. But, I cannot give my assent to him, as to what he affirms, viz. that Hermogenes taught in Asia. Valef. The Heresie of this Hermogenes is related by Theodoret (Heret. fab. L. 1. cap. 19.) ἐφη (ὁ Ἑρμογένης) τὸ σῶμα ἐν τῷ ἡλίῳ εἶναι τοῦ Κυρίου, ἢ ὃ διάδολον καὶ πῦρ δαίμονας εἰς τὴν ὕλην ἀναχεῖσθαι. i. e. This Hermogenes asserted, that the body of the Lord was deposited in the Sun: and that the devil and the evil spirits should be turned into matter. The Seleuciani and Hermiani taught the same; to wit, that the body of Christ ascended no farther than the sun; the occasion of which assertion they took from those words of the Psalmist, Psal. 19. 5. which in S. Jeroms translation is thus rendred, in sole posuit tabernaculum suum: but in the Psalms used in our Liturgy 'tis thus worded, In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun. See D^r Hammond on that Text. The same opinion Gregory Nazianzen attributeth to the Manicheans: Epist. 1. ad Cledonium, and S. August. Tract. 34. in Joh. This opinion is more largely and clearly set down, but without a name, in the Catena patrum on Psal. 18. where 'tis said, that these [Hereticks] assert, that after his resurrection, our Saviour deposited his body in the sphere of the sun, to be preserved there till his second coming.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning Philippus and Modestus.

MOreover, Philippus (who, as we are informed by the words of Dionysius [even now quoted] was Bishop of the Church at Gortyna) compiled also a most elaborate piece against Marcion. So likewise did Irenæus, and Modestus. But this person last named did most excellently (even better than the other Writers) detect the errours and frauds of the man, and exposed them to the view of the world. Several others also wrote, whose Labours are to this day with exquisite care preserved by many of the brethren.

CHAP. XXVI.

Concerning Melito, and what he has made mention of.

ALso, at that time Melito, Bishop of the Church at Sardis, and Apollinaris Prelate of the Church at Hierapolis, flourished and were eminently famous. Each of which persons did severally dedicate an Apology written in defence of our faith to the foresaid Roman Emperour, who reigned at that time. The Books of each of them, which are come to our knowledge, are these that follow. Two books of Melito's concerning Easter; one of his, [a] concerning the true way of converse, and of the Prophets: another, concerning the Church; and a third, concerning the Lords day: Moreover, one, concerning the nature of man, and another, about the frame and composure of man: and one, concerning the [b] obedience of the senses and their subjection to faith; and moreover, one book, concerning the soul, the body and the mind: a book, concerning Baptism; one, of Truth; one, concerning the [c] Origination and Generation of Christ: his book of Prophecy, another, concerning Hospitality; and that entitled, The key: besides one, concerning the Devil, and, of the Revelation of John; and another, about the incarnation of God; and lastly, his Apology to Antoninus. Now, in his books concerning Easter, to wit, in the beginning of that work, he declares the time when he wrote, in these words, "Servilius Paulus being Pro-"consul of Asia, at that time "when Sagaris suffered Mar-"tyrdom, there arose a great "controversie at Laodicea "concerning Easter, which "happened to fall on those "days in its due season: at "which time I wrote these "books. Clemens Alexandrinus makes mention of this book, in his piece concerning Easter; which book of Melito's was, as he says, the occasion of his composing that work. Now, in that book dedicated to the Emperour, he relates what was acted against us Christians in his Reign. "For now, "says he, that sort of men "who are pious and holy are "persecuted, (a thing which "was never before done) and "molested with new Decrees "throughout all Asia. For most impudent in-"formers, who are desirous to possess themselves "of other mens goods, taking an occasion from the "Imperial Edicts, doe openly commit robberies, "and day and night take away the goods of inno-"cent persons. And, after some words, he continues, thus; "Now if all this be done by Your "command, let it pass for an orderly and due "way of proceeding. For a just Emperour can "never decree or authorize any thing that is "unjust: and we willingly undergoe the reward "of such a death. This request onely we hum-"bly make to you, that you your self would first

[a] In all our M.SS. copies this title [concerning the true way of converse and of the Prophets] evidently appears to be the title but of one book. Ferom (in his book de Eccles. Scriptor. which is almost wholly taken out of Eusebius) entitles this piece of Melito's thus [de vitâ Prophetarum, i. e. concerning the life of the Prophets. Valef.

[b] Melito wrote a book upon this subject, because there were some Hereticks who asserted, that such men as were carnal, believed by the help of their senses; but those who were spiritual believed by reason. So Heraclio expounded that Text in S. Johns Gospel (c. 4. 48.) Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe. Which words Heraclio said, were properly directed to those, who by works and their senses had the nature of obeying, but not of believing through reason. Origen (Tome 13. Enarrat. on S. John's Gospel) mentions, and confutes this opinion: where he declares, that neither spiritual nor carnal men can believe, unless it be by sense. Valef.

[c] In the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. and in Nicephorus, this book of Melito's is intitled [περὶ πίστεως, &c.] i. e. concerning the Origination, &c. which reading, we doubt not but is true. Rufinus, as appears by his Version, and Robert Stephens, as may be seen in his Edit. read [περὶ πίστεως,] i. e. concerning Faith, &c. The antient Fathers, who lived before the Nicene Council, meant (by the word [κτίσεως]) not onely such a creation as is made out of nothing, but also all sort of production whatsoever, and therefore the divine origination of the Word. Those words of the Apostle (Colos 1. 15.) The first born of every creature, they asserted, were to be understood of the eternal generation of the Son. Valef. But as D^r Hammond observes in his notes on that Text, πρωτότοκος, i. e. first born, is used some times for a Lord, or person in power, who hath the priviledge of the first born, dominion over all his brethren: and according to this notion (continues he) 'tis used commonly in scripture for a Prince, or principal person. See Psal. 68. 27. Job 18. 13. Or it may peculiarly refer to his resurrection, in which he was the first born from the dead. See Hammond on Colos. 1. 15.

But when, "in the Reign of the Great "Auguſtus Your Progeni- "tour, it began to be eminent and conſpicuous in "Your Provinces; it brought with it moſt for- "tunate and proſperous ſucceſs to Your Empire. "For from that time the power of the Roman "Empire began to be eminently great, and was "much augmented. Of which Empire You by "ſucceſſion are the moſt acceptable Inheritour "that could be wiſh't for, and ſhall ſo continue, to- "gether with your [f] Son, if "you will be the defender of "that Religion which was "nurſed up together with "Your Empire, which took "its beginning under the "Reign of the Great Au- "guſtus; and which your "Anceſtours did together "with other Religions both "eſteem, and reverence: And "this is a moſt certain evi- "dence that our Religion "(which flouriſht together "with your happily begun "Empire) brought with it "publick ſucceſs and proſpe- "rity; to wit, that from the "time of Auguſtus's Reign "no unſucceſsfull accident hath intervened; but on "the contrary ſuch ſplendour and magnificence "hath always attended Your Empire, as is agree- "able to the deſires and prayers of all men. Of [g] "all the Emperours, onely [g] Nero and Domitian "(induced thereto by the perſwaſion and advice "of ſome malevolent perſons) endeavoured to "fix a calumny and reproach upon our Religion. "From whom that falſe and malicious detraction "happened to be conveyed down to ſucceeding "times, agreeable to the uſage of the rude multi- "tude, which irrationally gives credit to ſuch "groundleſs rumours. But Your pious An- "ceſtours corrected their ignorance: and by "frequent Reſcripts reproved ſuch as audaci- "ouſly attempted to be inſolent and vexatious to- "wards thoſe of our Religion. Amongſt whom "Your Grandfather Adrian wrote both to Fun- "danus Proconſul of Aſia, and alſo to many "other [Governours of Provinces;] and [h] your "Father, even at that time when You were his "Colleague in the Empire, wrote to the Cities that "they ſhould not raiſe tumults, nor commit any "inſolencies againſt us; namely to the Lariſſeans, "to the Theſſalonians, the Athenians and to all "the Grecians. But we moſt confidently per- "ſwade our ſelves that You (who retain the ſame "opinion concerning us that your Anceſtours "had; yea, who are enclined to be much more "gracious and mild towards us, and to entertain "wiſer and diſcreeter thoughts concerning us,) "will doe whatſoever we requeſt of you. This paſſage is extant in the fore mentioned Apologie of Melito. The ſame Authour (in that book of Extracts and Collections written by him) does, at the beginning of that work, make a Catalogue of thoſe books of the Old Teſtament that by general conſent are acknowledged as Canonical: which Catalogue I judged neceſſary to be here inſerted: It is word for word thus. "Me- "lito to Oneſimus the brother ſendeth greeting. "Whereas, becauſe of your love to, and dili- "gence beſtowed about, the word of God, you "have often requeſted me to make you ſome ſhort "Collections and excerptions both out of the "Law and the Prophets about thoſe things that "belong to our Saviour, and all the Articles of "our Faith; and moreover, you being very de- "ſirous to have an accurate account of the books "of the Old Teſtament, how many they are in "number, and in what order they were written; "I have made it my buſineſs to doe all this, and to "ſatisfie your deſire herein. For I well know "with what an ardour of faith you are enflamed, "and how earneſt your deſires are after know- "ledge; and that, by reaſon of your love of God, "you greatly prefer theſe before all other things, "ſtriving earneſtly to obtain eternal ſalvation. "When therefore I travelled into the Eaſt, and "came into that Countrey where theſe things were "heretofore Preacht and done, I made an accu- "rate inquiry about the books of the Old Teſta- "ment, a Catalogue whereof I have herewith ſent "you. Their names are theſe: The five books "of Moſes, to wit, Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, "Numbers, Deuteronomie: Joſhua, Judges, Ruth: "the four books of the Kings, the two books of "the Chronicles: the Pſalms of David, the "Proverbs of Solomon, which is alſo called the "book of Wiſdom, Eccleſiaſtes, the ſong of Solo- "mon, Job, the prophecies of Eſaiah, and Jere- "miah: one book of the twelve [minor] Pro- "phets, Daniel, Ezechiel, Eſdras. Out of theſe "I have made ſome ſhort Collections, which I have "divided into ſix books. But thus much con- cerning the writings of Melito.

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

[d] These words are to be underſtood of the Chriſtians; which appears from what follows. For Melito deſires of the Emperour, that he would firſt look into and examine the cauſe of the Chriſtians; and then determine, whether they deſerved to be puniſhed, or rather preſerved in ſafety. Valeſ.

[e] So he terms the Jews, amongſt whom the Chriſtian Religion firſt ſprang up. Upon this account Porphyrius (whoſe words Euſebius quotes book 6. chap. 19. of this work) termed the Chriſtian Religion [Καθ' ἑαυτὸν πάλαι μυθεῖται] i. e. an audacious Sect that had its beginning amongſt Barbarians. Valeſ.

[f] From this place it is evident, that Melito the Biſhop preſented his Apology to M. Antoninus after the death of Aurelius Verus. For, if Verus had been then living, when Melito wrote this Apology, he would doubtleſs have mentioned him here; and in ſtead of theſe words [together with your ſon] would certainly have ſaid [together with your brother.] For L. Verus was the adopted brother of M. Aurelius. Seeing therefore, Melito does here mention onely the ſon of M. Antoninus (to wit, Commodus) 'tis manifeſt, as I ſaid, that this Apology was preſented to Marcus after the death of L. Verus. And therefore Euſebius (in his Chronicon) places it on the 10th year of M. Aurelius, to wit, the year after Verus's death. Valeſ.

[g] The ſame is aſſerted by Tertullian (Apologet. cap. 5.) whoſe words our Euſebius quotes, partly at chap. 25. B. 2. and partly at chap. 20. B. 3.

[h] The Reſcript of Antoninus Pius (who is here meant) in favour of the Chriſtians, is not now extant. 'Tis mentioned in the Reſcript of M. Aurelius Antoninus to the Cities of Aſia, which Euſebius has ſet down in chap. 13. of this book. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVII.

Concerning Apollinaris, Biſhop of the Hierapolitane Church.

[a] ALthough ſeveral books written by Apolli- naris are extant among many men, yet theſe onely of his are come to our knowledge; to wit, His Apology to the foreſaid Emperour; his five books againſt the Gentiles; his two books

[a] In our M.SS. Maz. Med. and Fuk. there is in this place no beginning of a new chapter, but this 27 chapt. which treats concerning Apollinaris, and the following chapt. concerning Muſanus, are both annext to chap. 26. the title whereof in our ſaid M. SS. is this [concerning Melito, and what he has made mention of, Apollinaris, and Muſanus;] which diviſion Robert Stephens followed in the body of this fourth book. For in the Contents prefixt before this 4th book he follows the Kings M. S. and makes three chap. here, to wit, one of Melito, another concerning Apollinaris, and a third concerning Muſanus: but in the body of that book he follows the Med. M. S. (as he always does in this particular) and has put no diſtinction of a new chap. here; but hath made all the three chapters into one. We, following the autority of the Kings M. S. have divided them into three chap. and the ſame was done before, in the Geneva impreſſion of Euſebius's Hiſtory. Valeſ.

concerning truth; and his [b] two books against the Jews. Also, those books he wrote afterwards against the Heresie of the [c] Cataphrygians; which not long after occasioned great disturbances; but at that time it began to make its first appearance; Montanus with his false Prophets then laying the foundation of his Errour. And this is what we had to say concerning Apollinaris.

[b] These words [His two books against the Jews] are not in the Maz. Med. nor Fuk. M.SS. nor in that copy Rufinus made use of, as appears from his Version: nor yet in Jeroms B. de Eccles. Scriptor. where he reckons up all Apollinaris's books. But Nicephorus mentions them in his History. Vales.

[c] Mr Tho. Lydyat (in his Emend. Tempor.) says this Heresie began in the times of M. Aurelius and L. Verus; the Authour whereof was Montanus.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Concerning Musanus, and his Writings.

THere is extant of Musanus's (whom we mentioned a little before) a most sharp piece written by him to some brethren, who turned to the Heresie of the Encratitæ; which then first sprang up, and introduced a new and most pernicious false opinion into the world. Tatianus, as report says, was the Authour of this Heresie.

CHAP. XXIX.

VVE mean that Tatianus, whose words we quoted a little before, treating concerning the admirable Justin; who, we told you, was a disciple of that Martyr's. Irenæus evidences this in his first book against Heresies, where he writes thus concerning this Tatianus and his Heresie. "From [a] Saturninus and Marcion sprang "those Hereticks called Encratitæ, who taught "that marriage was unlawfull; rejecting that "Primitive institution of God, and tacitely accused "him; because he created Male and Female for the "propagation of Mankind. They were also tours "also of an abstinence from the eating those things, "that (as they termed them) had life; shewing "hereby their ingratitude towards God who "Created all things. They deny likewise that "the first man was saved. And this is a Tenet "lately invented amongst them, of which impious "assertion one Tatianus was the first broacher. "Who having been an Auditour of Justin, as long "as he converst with him, discloséd no such false "opinions: but after his Martyrdom, he revolted "from the Church, and being arrogant and puft up "with the conceit of his being "an [b] Ecclesiastical Doctour "(as if he were better then "any body else) he was the "composer of a new form of "Doctrine of his own ma- "king, inventing stories a- "bout invisible ages, in the "same manner as Valentinus "did: and asserting with "Marcion and Saturninus, "that Matrimony was no- "thing less than corruption "and whoredom; and fra- "ming some new arguments "to disprove the Salvation of Adam. Thus far Irenæus [concerning the Heresie of the Encratitæ which then was broacht.] But not long after, one whose name was [c] Severus did consolidate this Severus to be ancienter than Tatianus; which is a mistake, as 'tis evident from these words of Eusebius. Irenæus makes no mention of this Severus. Theodoret (in his first book Hæret. fabul.) has rightly placed Severus after Tatianus. Vales.

[a] The Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. and also Nicephorus, call him Saturninus. Epiphanius and Theodoret name him Saturnilus; and Hegesippus terms those Hereticks, which had their name from him, Saturnilians. See chap. 22. of this B. 4. Vales.

[b] Jerom (in his book de Scriptor. Eccles.) takes the word [διδάσκαλον] in such a sense as to signifie a master of Eloquence. Such an one Tatianus was before his conversion to the Christian Religion, as may be seen from chap. 16. of this 4th book. But I rather think, that by [διδάσκαλον] (which is the term in the original) should be meant [an Ecclesiastical Doctour] which sense of that term the following words of Irenæus doe confirm; for he says, he was the composer of a new form of Doctrin of his own making. Vales.

[c] Epiphanius makes and strengthen the foresaid Heresie, and so was the occasion that the followers of that Sect were called, by reason of his name, Severiani. They approve indeed of the Law, the Prophets and the Gospels, expounding the sentences of holy Scripture according to a peculiar sense and meaning of their own; but they speak reproachfully of the Apostle Paul, and reject his Epistles; neither doe they admit of the Acts of the Apostles. But Tatianus, their first founder, put together a confused heap of collections extracted out of the four Gospels, which he entitled a [d] Diatessarwn, i. e. a Gospel made up of the four Gospels: which book is at this time extant in the hands of some men. They say also, that he was so audacious as to alter some sayings of the Apostle Pauls, and to express them in more elegant terms, undertaking to correct the composition and order of his phrase. He left a very great number of books; among which, his [e] book against the Grecians is look't upon to be an excellent piece, and is commended by most men: in which work, giving an account of the series of times in the former ages of the world, he has made it evident that Moses and the Prophets amongst the Hebrews, were much more antient, than all the famous men amongst the Grecians. Indeed that book of his seems to be the best and most usefull piece of all his writings. But thus far concerning these things.

[d] Epiphanius (in Hæres. 46.) says, this work of Tatianus's is by some called the Gospel according to the Hebrews. But that Gospel is more ancient than Tatianus. For Hegesippus, who flouriiht some years before Tatianus, makes mention of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, as Eusebius tells us, chap. 22. of this book: Papias also quotes a passage out of that Gospel, as our Authour asserts about the close of the 3d book. Vales.

[e] That is, his Oration gainst the Grecians, which is extant at the latter end of Justin Martyrs works. Edit par. 1636. At pag. 171. he begins the proof of this point, viz. the Antiquity of Moses and the Prophets.

CHAP. XXX.

Concerning Bardesanes the Syrian, and those books of his that are extant.

FUrther, in the Reign of the same Emperour, when Heresies were numerous in [a] Mesopotamia, one Bardesanes a most eloquent man in the Syrian tongue, and an excellent disputant, wrote some Dialogues against Marcion and several others, who were Authours and assertors of different Opinions, which he publisht in his own country language; as also many other works which his Scholars (for he had very many Auditours, and was a powerfull maintainer of our faith) translated out of the Syriack into the Grecian language. Amongst which is his Dialogue concerning Fate, written to [b] Antoninus, an incomparable piece. 'Tis said he wrote several other Tracts, upon occasion of the persecution at that time raised against us. This man was at first a follower of Valentinus's; but having misliik't that Heresie, and confuted many of the fabulous Tenets of the founder thereof, he was satisfied in himself that he had turned to a truer opinion: but notwithstanding he did not wholly clear himself of the filth of his ancient Heresie. Moreover, at the same time Soter Bishop of the Roman Church departed this life.

[a] Tatianus who was the Founder of the Heresie of the Encratitæ, lived in Mesopotamia, and there publisht his Heresie, as Epiphanius attests. And the same may be concluded from what Theodoret writes, to wit, that he found above 200 copies of the Gospel made by Tatianus in the Churches of Osdroëna. Vales.

[b] It's doubtfull whether Antoninus the Emperour, or one of that name, who was a follower of Tatianus's, be here meant. It is not likely that Bardesanes should dedicate his books to the Roman Emperour, which he wrote in the Syriack language. Besides Eusebius (in his 6 B. de præparat.) does declare that Bardesanes dedicated his Dialogues to his followers and friends. Vales.

The PREFACE.

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

[a] The persecution of the Christians in the Reign of Marcus raged not every where at the same time; nor was it ended in one years space. In Asia it began first in the seventh year of M. Antoninus; and that not by the Edict of the Emperour, but by a tumultuous insurrection of the populace against them: where it lasted to the end of that Emperours Reign, as 'tis evident from these words in Melito's Apology [For from that time the power of the Roman Empire began to be eminently great, and was much augmented: of which Empire you by succession are the most acceptable inheritour that could be wisht for, and shall so continue together with your son, &c. See chap. 26. B. 4. note (f.)] Now, Commodus was by his father received as his partner in the Empire, when Melito presented this Apology to the Emperour. His being made Colleague in the Empire, 'tis evident, happened about the latter end of M. Antoninus's Reign: wherefore the persecution of the Christians in Asia must necessarily have lasted till that time. But this persecution was more sharp and violent in Asia, in the Gallias, and in other Provinces, in the seventeenth year of the said Antoninus, as Eusebius does here say expresly. See Baronius, ad annum Christi 179. Vales.

MOreover, Soter Bishop of the Roman Church having presided there eight years, ended his life. In whose place succeeded Eleutherus, the twelfth from the Apostles. It was then the [a] seventeenth year of the Emperour Antoninus Verus; at which time a more sharp persecution being in some parts of the world raised against us by a popular incursion throughout every City; how vast the number was of such persons as were dignified with Martyrdom over the whole world, may be conjectured from what happened in one Province. Which things were by accident put in writing and transmitted to posterity, as being truely worthy of an indelible remembrance. Now the Acts, which contain a most perfect and compleat account of these things, are set down entire in that Collection we made of the Martyrs; which comprehends not onely an Historical relation of what was done, but also Rules and Precepts of Piety and Holiness: But notwithstanding, we will from thence at present make a selection of such passages as are agreeable to the Subject we now have in hand, and here insert them. Other Historians indeed have wholly made it their business to record in their works Warlike Victories, and Trophies erected against their conquered Enemies; the valour of Generals, and brave exploits of Souldiers, besmeared with blood, and polluted with innumerable slaughters, in defence of their Children, Countrey, and Estates: But we, who set forth the History of a Divine society of men, will record upon immortal Monuments, inscribed with indelible Characters, the most pacate Wars, waged for the obtaining of Spiritual peace; and the valiant Acts of those persons who in such encounters contended more for the Truth than their Countrey, and for Religion rather than their dearest Relations: publishing for the perpetual remembrance of posterity, the continued earnestness of those Champions who fought for Piety, their fortitude in undergoing manifold torments, the Trophies erected against the Devils, the victorious conquests obtained over invisible Adversaries, and last of all, their Crowns.

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

CHAP. I.

How many, in the Reign of Verus, underwent most sore Persecution in France for Religion; and after what manner they suffered.

NOw France was the Countrey, wherein the place for performance of the forementioned Combats was appointed. The chief Mother-cities whereof, (and which be more eminently famous than the other Cities there,) are Lyons and Vienna; through both which the river Rhone passes, encompassing with a great and rapid stream that whole Region. The Churches therefore that were most eminent in those parts sent an account in writing concerning their Martyrs to the Churches throughout Asia and Phrygia; relating, after this manner, what was done amongst them: For I will insert their very words: "[a] The servants of Christ

[a] There arises here a double question; (1.) Why this Epistle was written joyntly by the two Churches, that of Vienna, and that of Lyons? (2.) Why the French wrote in Greek to the Churches of Asia and Phrygia? As to the first, I suppose it was for this reason done, because the Churches of Vienna and Lyons were joyned together, not onely by vicinity of place, but also by the bonds of mutual love. And seeing they had together been engaged in the same Persecution, they joyntly wrote an Epistle concerning their own Martyrs. Besides, both Provinces seem at that time to have been under the jurisdiction of one President; which may be conjectured from hence, because as well they of Vienna, as those of Lyons, are in this Epistle said to have been by the President apprehended, and condemned for the Faith of Christ. These therefore are the reasons why they wrote joyntly. For that which some have supposed, (to wit, that then there was but one Bishop of Vienna and Lyons) is easily confuted out of this Epistle, which says that Pothinus was Bishop of Lyons, but not of Vienna. Moreover, those of Lyons doe, out of respect, set the name of those of Vienna first, whenas notwithstanding they of Lyons wrote the Epistle concerning the things which were done at their own City. Which respect also may seem to be attributed to the antiquity, and nobility, of the Colonie at Vienna. As to the second query, we may understand from this Epistle, that there were many Grecians in the Church of Lyons, as was Attalus, and Alexander the Phrygian, and Alcibiades, who was by original extract a Phrygian also, as I think: also Irenæus was born in Asia, and when he was very young, had together with Florinus, been an auditour of Polycarps at Smyrna; as he himself evidences. The very name also of Pothinus the Bishop shews him to be originally a Grecian. 'Tis no wonder therefore, that those who came out of Asia into the Gallia's, should write to their brethren that were in Asia concerning their affairs; from whom, as 'tis probable, they had before received that Epistle concerning the Martyrdom of Polycarp, and others. I suppose Irenæus to have been the Authour of this Epistle, who at that time was a Presbyter of the Church at Lyons. Vales.

"which inhabit Vienna and Lyons in France, to "the brethren throughout Aſia and Phrygia, "which have the ſame Faith and Hope of Redem- "ption with us; Peace, Grace, and Glory from "God the Father, and from Chriſt Jeſus our "Lord. Then, having after this by way of pre- face premiſed ſome words, they begin their re- lation with theſe: "Now the ſore affliction a- "mongſt us, the great rage of the heathens a- "gainſt the Saints, and what the bleſſed Martyrs "endured; we are neither able accurately to ex- "preſs, nor indeed can it be comprized in writing. "For the adverſary invaded us with his utmoſt vi- "gour, ſhewing forth even then his arrival a- "mongſt us, and ſome beginnings of his future "cruelty. For he left nothing unattempted, whilſt "by way of practiſe he prepared, and before hand "exerciſed his miniſters againſt the ſervants of "God. So that we were not onely prohibited to "come into [b] private houſes, "the Baths, and the [c] Forum, "but it was alſo by them in- "terdicted that no one of us "ſhould at all appear in any "place whatſoever. But the "Grace of God fought for "us againſt the Devil; which "both defended ſuch as were "weak, and alſo ſet in array "againſt him ſuch men as, "like pillars, were firm and "immovable, who by reaſon "of their patience in en- "during ſufferings, might "have been able to have "pulled on themſelves the "whole force of the De- "vil. Theſe perſons en- "gaged him hand to hand, "undergoing all manner of "reproach and puniſhment; "and, accounting the greateſt "ſufferings to be ſmall and "trivial, they haſtned unto "Chriſt; truly demonſtra- "ting, * that the ſufferings of this preſent time "are not worthy to be compared with the glory "which ſhall be revealed in us. Firſt therefore "they couragiouſly underwent whatſoever [a- "buſes] were cumulated on them by the whole "multitude, to wit, the ſhouts againſt them, the "ſtripes, the draggings up and down, the taking "away of their goods, the caſting of ſtones at "them, their being [d] ſhut up "within their own houſes; "and all things which an "exaſperated multitude doe "uſually undertake againſt "their enemies and adverſa- "ries: Then, being brought "into the Forum by the Tri- "bune of the Souldiers and "the [e] Magiſtrates of the "City, they were exami- "ned in the preſence of the "whole multitude; and, ha- "ving made their confeſſion, "were ſhut up in priſon un- "till the arrival of the [f] Pre- ſident. Afterwards, when they were brought be- "fore the Governour, (who exerciſed all manner "of cruelty againſt us) [g] Vettius Epagathus, one "of the brethren, who had arrived to an immenſe "degree of love to God and his neighbour; whoſe "courſe of life had been ſo exact and accurate, that "although he was a young man, yet he deſerved "the eloge of Zachariah Seniour; for he had "walked in all the Commandments and Ordinances "of the Lord, blameleſs, and was moſt ready to "perform all good Offices towards his neighbour, "being full of the zeal of God, and fervent in "Spirit: This perſon, Iſay, being ſuch an one, "was not able to bear thoſe ſo unjuſt procee- "dings againſt us, but was greatly moved with in- "dignation, and requeſted that he alſo might be "heard to make a defence in behalf of the bre- "thren, [and to manifeſt] that there was nothing "of impiety or irreligion amongſt us. But when "thoſe about the Tribunal cried out againſt him, "(for he was an eminent perſonage,) and when "the Governour refuſed the requeſt ſo juſtly pro- "poſed by him, and onely ask't him whether he "alſo were a Chriſtian; he confeſt it with a moſt "loud voice, and was received into the number of "the Martyrs, being termed by the Governour the "Advocate of the Chriſtians: But he had with- "in himſelf an Advocate, to wit, the holy [c] Spirit, "in a greater degree than [h] Zacharias had; which "he evidently manifeſted by his abundant love, in "that he was well contented to depoſite his own "life for the defence of the brethren. For he was, "and is, a genuine diſciple "of Chriſt, following the "Lamb whitherſoever he go- "eth. Then others [i] were "diligently proved and exa- "mined; and they were il- "luſtrious and ready proto- "Martyrs, who with all ala- "crity of mind accompliſhed "the ſolemn confeſſion of "Martyrdom. Moreover, "thoſe who were unpre- "pared, unexerciſed, as yet "weak, and unable to under- "goe the ſeverity of ſo great "a combat, were then ap- "parent: of whom about "ten in number fell away, "which was the occaſion of great grief and im- "meaſurable ſorrow to us, and diſturbed that alacri- "ty of mind in others who were not yet apprehen- "ded; who although they ſuffered all ſorts of mi- "ſery, yet were preſent with the Martyrs, and de- "parted not from them. At that time we were all "in a great conſternation of mind, becauſe we were "dubious about the [perſeverance of ſuch as "were to] confeſs [themſelves to be Chriſtians;] "not that we feared the torments that were to be "inflicted, but, revolving in our minds the iſſue of "affairs, we were fearfull leaſt any one ſhould fall "off

[b] The term in the original is [ἰδιωῶν] which ſignifies onely private houſes, from which the Chriſtians were then driven, that is, from the houſes of their friends, relations, &c. For I agree not with Ruſinus, who thought that the Chriſtians were prohibited to inhabit their own houſes. Valeſ.

[c] Ἀγορᾶς is the term in the original; which ſignifies any promiſcuous or popular aſſembly; theſe (ſetting aſide the ſacred aſſemblies, which are otherwiſe expreſſed) are principally of two ſorts, either (1.) to buy and ſell, or (2.) to reſort for juſtice; and the word here uſed commonly ſignifies both, or either of theſe, (1.) a fair or market, (2.) a place of judicature, an hall, or court of judgment. The Romans termed this place Forum; which word they uſed in the ſame latitude that the Grecians did Ἀγορά. At this place, and hereafter, we have made uſe of the Latine term in our tranſlation; and we therefore put this note in here, that the Engliſh Reader might underſtand the meaning of it.

[d] Here in the firſt place is recounted the injurious uſage, which the Chriſtians ſuffered from the whole multitude; wherein impriſonment can have no place. For the Judges, and not the people, had power to impriſon thoſe that were guilty. Ruſinus therefore tranſlates [συγκλείσεις] concludi, i. e. to be ſhut up. For the heathens ſhut up the Chriſtians within their own houſes, and would not ſuffer them to come abroad. Valeſ.

[e] He means the municipal Magiſtrates, who were alſo called the duumviri. Although the term ἔξω τῶν (here uſed) is uſually meant of thoſe judges which have the power of the ſword; (See Ulpian. in tit. de Juriſdict.) yet it denotes the municipal Magiſtrates alſo, who, as the Civilians phraſe it, have modicam coercitionem. Valeſ.

[f] Ἡγεμών (the term that occurs here) has a general ſignification. For all Governours of Provinces are ſo called, be they Procuratours, Proconſuls, or Deputies of Cæſar. It may therefore be deſervedly queſtioned of which of theſe three ſorts the Governour of the Province of Lyons was. Indeed, I think he was the Deputy of Cæſar. Which I am induced to ſuppoſe (1.) becauſe there is mention here made of the Tribune of the Souldiers. For that agrees very well with the Deputy of Cæſar, who lookt after the Military affairs. (2.) In the old inſcription, which Gruter ſpeaks of, pag. 427, he is termed Deputy of the Lugdunenſian Province. See Gruter. Inſcript. p. 427. Laſtly, Spartianus (in Severo) atteſts, that the Province of Lyons was in the Reign of M. Antoninus governed by Deputies of Cæſar. And perhaps in this Epiſtle of thoſe of Lyons, Severus is meant: for he was Deputy of the Lugdunenſian Province under Marcus. Junius Bleſus alſo (whom Tacitus in the B. 1. of his Hiſtory calls Governour of Gallia Lugdunenſis) was Deputy of this Province; and ſo was Vitraſius Pollio in the times of Adrian. [i] Διεκελεύσθη is the term here uſed. It ſeems to be a Metaphor taken from Champions, who before they engaged in the combat, were wont to be examined and proved, whether they were free men, and of the age that Champions ſhould be. And thoſe that were admitted to the combat, were ſaid εἰσκείνεσθαι; ſuch as were repudiated ἐκκείνεσθαι: the examination it ſelf was called διάκρισις, as I collect from this place. Indeed this Epiſtle is very full of Athletical terms, as 'tis manifeſt from this place, and as we will ſhew more plainly hereafter. Valeſ.

For when we were all afraid, and ſhe that "was her miſtreſs after the fleſh (who alſo was "one of the Champions of the Martyrs) feared, "leaſt, by reaſon of the imbecillity of her body, ſhe "ſhould not be able with boldneſs and freeneſs to "make her confeſſion: Blandina was ſupplied with "ſo great ſtrength, that thoſe who by turns tortu-"red her all the time from morning till evening, be-"came feeble and weak; and confeſt themſelves "overcome, having nothing further to doe to "her; they admired alſo that ſhe yet continued to "breathe, her whole body having been mangled "and pierced through; and they atteſted, that one "ſort of torture was ſufficient to have bereaved "her of life, much more ſo many and ſo great tor-"ments. But this bleſſed woman, like a coura-"gious Champion, recovered freſh ſupplies of "ſtrength during her confeſſion: and it was a "refreſhment, and an eaſe to her, and abated the "pain of thoſe torments that were inflicted on "her, to pronounce theſe words, to wit, I am a "Chriſtian, and there is nothing of wickedneſs "acted amongſt us. But Sanctus, having in an "extraordinary, and more than humane, manner, "couragiouſly endured all the torments men could "invent, (the impious wretches hoping by rea-"ſon of the continuedneſs and exquiſiteneſs of his "torments to have heard ſome undecent expreſ-"ſions from him,) withſtood them with ſo great "a degree of courage, that he declared neither his "own name, nor that of his Countrey, nor of the "City where he was born, nor yet whether he "were a ſervant or a freeman: but to all the inter-"rogatories, he made anſwer in the Roman tongue, "I am a Chriſtian: this he declared time after "time ſucceſſively, inſtead of [acknowledging] "his name, his City, his kindred, or any thing "elſe: neither could the Heathens get any other "words out of him. Upon which account the rage "both of the Preſident and of the tormentours a-"gainſt him was exceeding great, and their en-"deavours to maſter him were obſtinate and "earneſt. Inſomuch that when they had nothing "further to torture him with, at laſt they clapt "plates of braſs that were red hot upon the moſt "tender members of his body; which parts of "his body were burnt indeed; but he ſtood up-"right without bending of himſelf at all, was in-"vincible, and continued ſtedfaſt and conſtant in "his confeſſions; being bedewed and ſtrengthened "with that celeſtial fountain of living water which "flowed out of the * belly of Chriſt. His body "was a ſufficient evidence of what had happened, "being all over full of wounds, and prints of "ſtripes, [p] bowed and drawn "together, and having loſt "the external form and ſhape "of a man: in which "Chriſt ſuffering accom-"pliſhed therein great glo-"ry, vanquiſhing the ad-"verſary and demonſtrating for the information "of others, that there is nothing formidable where "the love of the father is, nor any pain where "the glory of Chriſt is preſent. For when thoſe im-"pious wretches ſome few days after began again "to torture the Martyr, and ſuppoſed that if they "ſhould make uſe of the ſame torments whilſt his "body was ſwelled and the [q] wounds thereof in-"flamed, either they might maſter him, when he "could not indure to be touch't by hands, or that "he would die under his torments and ſo ſtrike a "terrour into others: not onely no ſuch thing "happened concerning him, but alſo, contrary to "the opinion of all men, his body became erect "and was repaired in theſe latter tortures; and "he recovered his former ſhape, and the uſe of his "limbs. So that his being tormented the ſecond "time was not a puniſhment to him, but by the "grace of Chriſt proved to be his remedy. Therefore the Judges tortured them all manner of ways, that they ſhould confeſs, that they eat children, and committed inceſt. "be by him already devoured, but was fur her "desirous to have her condemned of blasphemy, "constraining her, being now weak and not coura- "gious, to utter some impious expressions con- "cerning us. But she came to her self again at "the time of her being tortured, and (as we may "so speak,) was awaked out of her profound "sleep, being by the present punishment reminded "of the eternal torments in hell; and she re- "turned a contradictory an- "swer to [r] those that slaun- "dred us, saying, how should "such persons eat little chil- "dren, for whom 'tis un- "lawfull to eat the bloud "even of irrational creatures. "From that instant she con- "fest her self to be a Chri- "stian, and was added to the "number of the Martyrs. "But when the punishments "of those tyrannous persons were rendred inef- "fectual by Christ, through the patient sufferance "of the blessed Martyrs, the devil invented other "subtil devices, to wit, the imprisonments of them "in darkness, and in the most noisome parts of the "prison, the stretching of their feet in the [s] stocks, "which were strained to the fifth hole, and such "other sorts of punishment as enraged ministers "(and therefore full of the devil) doe usually "provide for those that are shut up in prison. So "that many were suffocated in prison, whom "the Lord, manifesting his "own glory, was pleased "should after that manner "depart out of this life. "For some (who had been "so cruelly tortured, that in "all likelyhood they could "not possibly live any lon- "ger, although they should "have had all methods of "cure administred to them,) "continued in prison; des- "titute indeed of humane as- "sistance, but corroborated "by the Lord, and strengthen- "ed in body and mind, who "also encouraged and com- "forted the rest: But others "who were young, and newly apprehended, whose "bodies had not before been accustomed to en- "dure tortures, were not able to bear the bur- "then of confinement, but died in prison. Now "the blessed Pothinus, who was entrusted with "the administration of the Episcopal Office in "Lyons, being above the age of ninety years, and "very infirm of body, scarce able indeed to "draw his breath by reason of his present bodily "imbecillity, but corroborated with alacrity of "mind through an earnest desire of an approach- "ing Martyrdom; He, I say, was also haled to the "Tribunal: his body indeed was both by age "and also by his distemper decayed and spent, "but his life was preserved in him, that Christ "might triumph thereby. He, being carried to "the Tribunal by the Souldiers, the Magistrates "of the City accompanying him, and the whole "multitude raising shouts of all sorts against him, "(as if he had been Christ,) exhibited a good "testimony: but being asked by the President "who was the God of the Christians, he replied, "if you be worthy, you shall know. After this "answer, he was drag'd up and down after a most "inhumane manner, and suffered various sorts of "blows and stripes; both those who were neer, "exercised all manner of injurious usage to- "wards him with hands and feet, shewing no "reverentiall respect to his age; and such as "were at a distance cast at him whatever each "person had ready at hand: yea, they all accoun- "ted it to be a great offence and an impiety, "should any one have been deficient in his inso- "lent usage of him. For by this means they "thought they should revenge their gods. And "when there was scarce any breath left in him, "he was cast into prison, where after two days "he expired. But here there came to pass a sin- "gular dispensation of Gods providence, and the "immense mercy of Jesus was demonstrated; "[an instance whereof] has indeed rarely hap- "pened among the Brotherhood, but which was "not at all disagreeable to the skill, and dexterity "of Christ. For those who, upon their being "first apprehended, renounced the Faith, were "themselves also confined to prison, and partook "of the same miseries which the Martyrs under- "went: for their denial of the Faith was not in "any wise beneficiall to them at that juncture of "time. But those who confest themselves to be "what they really were, were imprisoned as Chri- "stians, no other crimination being laid to their "charge: but these were kept in custody, as "being, besides that, murderers and wicked per- "sons, and underwent double the punishment that "others did. For the joy of Martyrdom, the "hope of the Promises, the Love to Christ, and "the Spirit of the Father comforted those: but "their conscience did heavily torture these; in "so much that * in their passage from the prison "to the Tribunal their countenances might be ma- "nifestly known and distinguished from all the "rest. For those came forth chearfully, their "countenances being intermixt with very much "of majesty, and pleasantness: in so much that "their fetters encompassed them with a beautifull "comliness, like a bride bedeck't with fringes "of gold † wrought about with divers colours: "and moreover they yielded a scent of the sweet "savour of Christ; so that some thought they "were anointed with terrestrial oyntment. But "these had a dejected countenance, look't unplea- "santly and illfavoured, and were filled with all "manner of deformity: moreover they were re- "viled by the very Heathens, as being cowardous "and unmanly; having indeed procured them- "selves the crimination of murderers, but lost that "most honourable, glorious, and vivifick appel- "lation [of Christians.] Which things when the "rest beheld; they were made stedfast; and such "as were apprehended did without any thing of "dubiousness confess themselves to be Christians, "entertaining not the least thought of diabolical "consideration. To these, having interposed some words, they again add, saying,--- "Afterwards "therefore, their Martyrdoms were divided into "all sorts of death: for, having platted one Crown "of different colours, and of all sorts of flowers, "they offered it to the Father. It was indeed fit, that "those courageous Champions, who had under- "gone a various combat, and been egregious con- "querours, should receive the invaluable Crown of "incorruption. Maturus therefore, and Sanctus, [t] "and Blandina, and Attalus were brought before "the wild-beasts into the [t] Amphitheatre, and into

[s] Ἐν τῷ ξύλῳ; i.e. in the stocks, see chap. 16. B. 4. and the note there, concerning this term. The fashion of this Engine for punishment, and the manner how persons were punished in it, seems to have been this. It was a piece of timber, wherein five paire of holes were made, at a certain distance one from the other: into these holes (as it were into boots) they put the feet of offenders, and fastned them therein with cords and fetters. The meaning of [their feet being strained to the fifth hole] is, they forced them to straddle so wide, as to put their feet into the last pair of holes; which posture, (those holes being at the greatest distance one from the other) was the sharpest degree of torture in this Engine. Valef.

"the publick place, where the inhumanity of the "Heathens was exhibited; [a] "a day for fighting "with the wild beaſts being granted purpoſely "upon the account of thoſe "of our Religion. And Ma- "turus, and Sanctus, did a- "gain undergoe all ſorts of "torments in the Amphithe- "atre, as if they had before "ſuffered nothing at all: but "the rather, becauſe having "already ſubdued the adver- "ſary in many [x] encounters, "and being now to engage "in a Combat for the Crown "it ſelf, they again under- "went ſuch ſtripes in their "paſſage thither as are cuſto- "marily inflicted; the being "torn and drag'd up and "down by the wild-beaſts; "and whatever elſe the en- "raged people, ſome from "one place ſome from ano- "ther, called aloud for, and "commanded; and in fine, "the Iron chair, upon which "their bodies being broyled, "filled their noſes with the "offenſive ſmell of burnt "fleſh. Neither did they "make an end of their cruel- "ty thus, but were yet more "fiercely enraged, being de- "ſirous to overcome the pa- "tient ſufferance of the Mar- "tyrs: But they heard no o- "ther expreſſion from San- "ctus, ſave that which he "had uſually uttered all a- "long from the beginning "of his confeſſion. Theſe "two perſons therefore, af- "ter they had continued a- "live a long while under the "ſufferings of a mighty com- "bat, at laſt were ſlain; ha- "ving been made a ſpectacle "to the world throughout "that day, inſtead of all that "variety which is exhibi- "ted in the combats of the "Gladiatours. But Blan- "dina, being hung upon a "piece of wood fixt in the "ground, was propoſed as "food for the wild-beaſts to "prey upon; who alſo, (in "that ſhe ſeemed to hang in "the form of a Croſs,) by her "ſtrong and earneſt prayer, "implanted much alacrity "upon the minds of thoſe "that were combatants; when "they ſaw (whilſt they were "undergoing their ſuffer- "ings,) even with their out- "ward eyes, under the per- "ſon of their ſiſter, Him who "was therefore crucified for "them, that he might perſwade thoſe which be- "lieve in him, that whoſoever ſuffers for the "glory of Chriſt hath eternal communion with "the living God. Now when none of the wild- "beaſts would then touch her, ſhe was taken "from the ſtake, and caſt again into priſon, being "reſerved for another combat: that ſo, having "been [y] Conquerour in many incounters, ſhe "might render the condemnation of the crooked "Serpent inexcuſable; alſo ſhe encouraged the "brethren, and though ſhe "was a perſon of ſmall eſti- "mation, infirm, and deſpi- "cable, yet having clothed "herſelf with the ſtrength "of Chriſt that great and "invincible Champion, ſhe "vanquiſhed the adverſary in many encounters; "and, after a glorious combat, was encircled with "a Crown of incorruption. Attalus alſo was "by the multitude moſt earneſtly required to be "delivered up to puniſhment, for he was an emi- "nent perſon, and by reaſon of the clearneſs of his "conſcience proceeded forth like a Champion "prepared for the combat, in that he had been "perfectly and throughly exerciſed in the Chri- "ſtian diſcipline, and was always a witneſs of "the truth amongſt us: and after he had been "[z] lead round the Amphi- "theatre, (a table being car- "ried before him whereon "was written in the Roman "tongue, This is Attalus "the Chriſtian,) and the "people had vehemently "ſwell'd with rage and an- "ger againſt him; the Preſi- "dent having underſtood that "he was a Roman, comman- "ded he ſhould again be com- "mitted to cuſtody amongſt the reſt that were in "priſon. Concerning whom he wrote to Cæſar, "and expected an Edict from him. Now, this "interval of time was ſpent neither idly, nor un- "fruitfully by them, but by their patient ſufferance, "the immeaſurable mercy of Chriſt was made "apparent: for thoſe members of the Church that "were dead, were by the living revived; and the "Martyrs conferred * kindneſſes upon thoſe who "were no Martyrs; and there was a great joy "begotten in the Virgin Mother [the Church;] "ſhe having again received thoſe alive, whom "by abortion ſhe had caſt forth as dead. For "through the means of the holy Martyrs many "of thoſe who had renounced the faith, were "newly formed in the womb, born again, had "their vital heat rekindled in them, and learned "to confeſs themſelves to be Chriſtians. And ha- "ving now recovered life and ſtrength, they came "before the tribunal, (God, who deſireth not the "death of a ſinner but is indulgent and kindly in- "vites him to repentance, [a] infuſing a ſweetneſs in- "to them) that they might again be interrogated by "the Preſident. [a] The meaning of this place is, that the Preſident, or Deputy, of the Province of Lyons granted the people an extraordinary ſhew of fighting with the wild-beaſts; a day being appointed for that purpoſe, becauſe of the Chriſtians, who were condemned to the beaſts. For the Romans had ſet days for theſe Spectacles, which fell on the month of December, as may be ſeen in the Calender of Heruuartius. Except on theſe days, it was unlawfull for the beſtowers of theſe ſports, or for the duumviri (on whom the charge of theſe ſhews was impoſed) to exhibit theſe ſpectacles of fighting with wild-beaſts to the people. But thoſe judges, who had the power of the ſword and of condemning perſons to the beaſts, exhibited theſe ſhews as often as they pleaſed, that they might delight the people by deſtroying of offenders. Valeſ.

[x] We noted before, that many Athletical terms were made uſe of in this Epiſtle. Amongſt which is to be accounted the term [κλῆροι,] which occurs here. For the Champions, who were to contend in the games, were wont to be drawn forth by lot, which, after what manner it was done, Lucian (in Hermotimo) tells us. There was a little ſilver box, dedicated to the God that preſided over the Games, into which the Lots were caſt. Upon two the Letter A was written; upon other two the Letter B, and ſo on. Then the Champions drew theſe Lots out of the box. Thoſe two, who drew forth the Letter A, engaged one with the other, and fought in the firſt place: and this was the [πρῶτος κλῆρος.] In like manner, they that drew the Letter B, engaged one another in the ſecond place. So the Lot and the Urn aſſigned every one his Antagoniſt. He that vanquiſhed his adverſary, was not immediately Crowned, but engaged in another encounter with thoſe others who had conquered their adverſaries, untill there remained onely one Victour over all. Upon which account they drew Lots ſeveral times. Hence 'tis, that in the Farneſian inſcription (which Gruter ſpeaks of pag. 314.) one Aſclepiades is ſaid to have gotten the victory in many encounters, τὸ δεύτερον καὶ τρίτον καὶ πρῶτον ἢ δεύτερον κλῆρον φέρων πολὺ ἀνταγωνιστάς; i. e. after the firſt or ſecond caſting of Lots having vanquiſhed the Antagoniſt the ſecond, or third time. For this was uſual for that reaſon I mentioned, as often as there were many couples of Champions. For the conquerours engaged one another, and there was a ſecond and third drawing of Lots amongſt them, untill the victory remained to one. And this is that which, in this Epiſtle, is called ὁλὸς πλόκων κλήρων. Valeſ.

[y] It ſhould be [ἐκβιασαμένη.] So 'tis in the Med. M. S. and in Nicephorus. See Peter Faber, in his firſt book Agoniſtici, chap. 24. Note, alſo, that Blandina, being a ſervant, was crucified; for that was the puniſhment of ſervants. Valeſ. Robert Stephens reads [νικήσασα.]

[z] The Gladiatours and the Beſtiarii, before they began the encounter, were wont to be led about in the preſence of the ſpectatours. See Lucian, in Toxari. This was uſually done not onely with thoſe who let themſelves out to play prizes, but alſo with thoſe offenders, which were condemned to the ſword, and to the wild-beaſts. So Martial, Traducta eſt gyris, nec cepit arena nocentes. Valeſ.

* That is, by making interceſſion for them, &c. Valeſ.

[a] The term in the original is [ἐγγλυκάνουσα,] which is uſed as well in an active as paſſive ſenſe. 'Tis a Metaphor taken from the wild-olive-tree, which being grafted, grows ſweet; of which S. Paul ſpeaks. Valeſ.

[b] Ἀποτυμπανισθῆναι. Lexicographers differ very much in their giving the ſignification of this term (which here occurs.) Stephens (in his Theſaurus,) renders it, fuſtibus concidi, i. e. to be beaten with clubs: Varinus, τὴν κεφαλὴν ἀποκοπῆναι, i. e. to be beheaded: The Etymologicon (publiſht by Sylbergius) ſays it ſignifies, οὐκ ἁπλῶς τὸ ἀποκτανθῆναι, ἀλλὰ τυμπάνῳ, ὁ ἐστι ξύλον ὅπερ σκυτάλην καλοῦσι, not barely to be put to death, but to be killed with the Tympanum, which is a piece of wood called a cudgell: The Reader will find a large and learned account of this term, and of this engine of torture, in D. Hammonds note on Hebr. 11. 35. Where he makes it appear, that this ſort of puniſhment was very painfull, contumelious, and capital.

"should be dismist from their imprisonment. "Now, the publick [c] Assembly here (which is "frequented by a numerous concourse of people of "all nations that meet together at it) being newly "begun, [the President] ordered the blessed "Martyrs to be brought before the Tribunal, ma- "king them a gazing-stock, "and, by way of ostenta- "tion, producing them as "a pompous shew to the "multitude. When there- "fore he had again interro- "gated them, as many as "were found to have the "priviledge of being free of "the City of Rome, he or- "dered should be beheaded; "the rest were cast to the "wild-beasts. But Christ was greatly glorified "through those who formerly had renounced the "Faith, but then (contrary to the expectation of "the Heathens) became to be Confessours: for "these persons were interrogated apart, as being, "in all probability, forthwith to be set at liberty; "but, having confess't themselves to be Chri- "stians, they were added to the [d] number of the "Martyrs. Now, they continued without, who "never had the least impression of Faith, nor "a sense of the Wedding garment, nor a thought "about the fear of God; but by their conversa- "tion defamed the way of Truth, that is, were the "sons of perdition: But all the rest were added to "the Church; during whose examination, one A- "lexander, by countrey a Phrygian, by profes- "sion a Physitian, a person who had dwelt many "years in the Gallia's, and was known almost to "all men by reason of his love to God, and "his boldness and fearlessness in Preaching his "word, (for he wanted not Apostolick grace;) "standing near to the Tribunal, and by nods en- "couraging them to a confession of the Faith, ap- "peared to those who stood round the Tribunal "as if he endured the * pangs of childbirth: now "the multitude being in a great fume, because "those, who had before renounc't the Faith, did "now again make confession of it, cried out against "Alexander, as if he were the occasion thereof: "and the President (having commanded him to be "[e] set before him, and asked "him who he was, and he "having said that he was a "Christian) being in a rage, "condemned him to be cast "to the wild-beasts. And "the day following he entred "the Amphitheatre together "with Attalus; (for the Pre- "sident, to gratifie the multitude, did again deliver "Attalus to the wild-beasts:) which two persons, "having undergone all the instruments of torment "in the Amphitheatre, that were invented to tor- "ture them with, and endured a great combat, "were at last [f] run through with a sword. Alex- "ander indeed did neither sigh, nor utter any ex- "pression at all; but in his heart spoke to God, "and continued praysing of, and praying to him: "but Attalus, when he was set in the Iron chair, "and scortched all over, (when the savour of his "burnt flesh ascended from his body,) said to the "multitude in the Roman tongue, behold, this "that you doe, is to devour men; but we neither "devour men, nor practise any other thing that "is evill: being asked also what name God had, "he answered, God has not a name, as man "has. In fine, after all these persons, on the [g] last "day of the Gladiatours combats, Blandina was "again brought forth, together with Ponticus a "youth about fifteen years "old; (who also were e- "very day led in, to see the "tortures of the rest) and "they constrained them to "swear by their Idols: but "because they continued firm "and constant, and contem- "ned their gods, the multi- "tude was so enraged against "them, that they neither had "compassion on the age of "the young man, nor shewed "any reverential respect towards the Sex of the "woman, but exposed them to all manner of "cruell tortures, and made them pass through the "whole circuit of torments, now and then com- "pelling them to swear, but were unable to effect "that. For Ponticus, being encouraged by his sister, "(insomuch that the Heathens perceived it was "she that encouraged and strengthened him) ha- "ving couragiously undergone all sorts of tor- "tures, gave up the ghost. But the blessed Blan- "dina, the last of all, having like a noble and va- "liant mother encouraged her children, and sent "them before as conquerors to the King; af- "ter she had measured over the same course of "Combats that her sons had passed through, "hastned to them, being glad, and rejoycing at "her exit, as if she had been invited to a nuptial "supper, and were not to be cast to the wild- "beasts. And after she had been scourged, ex- "posed to the fury of the wild-beasts, and set in "the [h] Iron-chair, at last she "was inclosed in a net, and "thrown before a [i] Bull: by "which beast after she had "been very much tossed, (ha- "ving been all along wholly "insensible of the tortures "she underwent, because of "her hope and her retaining "a firm assent to those things "she believed, and also by "reason of her familiar con- "verse in prayer with Christ,) "she also was run through "with a sword: and the very "Heathens themselves con- "fessed, that there never was any woman among "them, which suffered so many and so great tor- "tures. But their rage and cruelty towards the "saints was not thus satiated: for the Savage and "Barbarous Nations, having been stirred up by "that [k] fierce wild-beast, could not without great "difficulty be appeased; but their cruelty was "begun afresh, in a new and peculiar manner, a- "gainst the bodies of the Saints. For they were "so far from being ashamed that they had been "vanquished by the Martyrs (because they were "destitute of humane reason and consideration,) "that their rage was more enkindled; both the "President and also the people (like a fierce beast) "most unjustly demonstrating the same degree of "hatred against us: that the Scripture might be "fulfilled, [l] He that is unjust, let him be unjust still, [ὁ ἄδικος ἀδικησάτω ἔτι,] as the reading in the original is here; we now read [ὁ ἀδικῶν, ἀδικησάτω ἔτι, i. e. He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; See the original of the Text.

* Ὡσπερ ὠδῖνων is the phrase in the original; 'tis S. Pauls expression, Galat. 4. 19.

[b] Τήγανον is the Greek term; which Rufinus translates craticulam, i. e. a Grid-iron: it is the same, which before is called the Iron-chair, on which the Martyrs being set, were broyled, as it were on a Gridiron. Thus the Christians were used before they were cast to the wild-beasts. Vales.

[i] Amongst the sports of an Amphitheatrical shew this was one; a Bull was brought in; to whom (being first enraged) they cast offenders in closed in a net; whom, like balls, he tossed on high. Martials verse on this subject are well known, Taurus ut impositas jactat ad astra pilas. Vales.

[c] Rufinus translates this passage thus, qui à Præside in medium statui Jussus, i. e. who being commanded by the President to be set before him. Which translation pleases me best. For [ἐπιστήσαι,] which is the word here used, does properly signifie, to set before the Judge; in which sense also ἐφεστῶτα is used. Vales.

[f] Ἐνύβησε; Rufinus translates it, jugulati sunt, that is their throats were cut; I would rather have it thus rendred, they were run through with a sword. For it was the custom that the Confector should slay the bestiarii; as we noted before, in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, B. 4. chap. 15. Vales.

[k] That is the devill; the Greek word [θηρ] signifies, a wild-beast; but [ὁ θηρ] is often taken for the devill. Vales.

CHAP. II.

How the Martyrs beloved of God, kindly receiving ſuch as fell away in the perſecution, wrought a cure upon them.

SUch were the Calamities which befell the Churches of Chriſt, in the times of the foreſaid Emperour; from which may be conjectured what alſo was done in the other Provinces. It is worth our adjoyning hereto ſome other words out of the ſame Epiſtle, whereby the meekneſs and humanity of the forementioned Martyrs is deſcribed in theſe very words; "Who alſo were ſo far followers "and imitatours of Chriſt, (who being in the* "form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal "with God,) that although they were in ſuch an "height of glory, and had ſuffered as Martyrs not "once, nor twice, but often, and had been taken "from the wild-beaſts and [a] committed again to "priſon, although they had the marks of fire,
"the ſcars of ſtripes, and wounds all over their "bodies; yet they neither declared themſelves to "be Martyrs, nor would they ſuffer us to call them
"by that name. But if at any time any one of us,
"either by letter, or in diſcourſe, termed them
"Martyrs, they reproved us ſharply. For they "readily allowed the appellation of Martyr to "Chriſt, (who is the faithfull and true witneſs,
"and the firſt begotten of the dead, and the Prince "of the life of God;) they commemorated alſo
"thoſe Martyrs who were already departed this "life, and ſaid, thoſe are now Martyrs, whom "Chriſt vouchſafed to aſſume whilſt they were "making their confeſſion, he having ſealed their "Martyrdom by their death: but we are mean
"and humble Confeſſours: and with tears they be-"ſeeched the brethren, entreating them, that ear-"neſt prayers might be made that they might be "perfected: they alſo in reality demonſtrated the "power and efficacy of Martyrdom, uſing much "freedom of ſpeech in their anſwers before all the "Heathens, and manifeſted their excellency by "their patient ſufferance, fearleſneſs, and un"daunted courage: but they refuſed the appella-
"tion of Martyrs given them by the brethren,
"having been filled with the fear of God. Again, after ſome few words, they ſay; "They humbled
"themſelves under the mighty hand, by which they "are now highly exalted:
"then alſo [b] they excuſed
"themſelves to all men, but
"accuſed none; they looſed
"all men, and bound none;
"yea they prayed for thoſe
"who tortured them, as did
"Stephen that perfect Mar-
"tyr, [ſaying,] Lord, lay not this ſin to their* "charge. Now if he prayed for thoſe who ſtoned
"him, how much more [is it credible that he "prayed] for the brethren? Again alſo, after ſome other words, they ſay; "For this was the "greateſt encounter they had with the devil, to wit,
"upon account of their genuine and ſincere cha"rity; becauſe the Serpent, being ſtrangled, vo"mited up thoſe alive, whom he ſuppoſed he had "digeſted. They did not proudly triumph over "thoſe that fell; but beſtowed, on ſuch as were in"digent, thoſe good things with which they aboun-
"ded, having motherly bowels of compaſſion, pou"ring forth many tears for them before [God]
"the father. They aſked life, and he gave it them;
"which alſo they imparted to their friends; being "Victours [c] over all, they went to God: having "always loved peace, and continually exhorted
"[us] to it, they departed in peace to God; lea"ving no grief to their mother, no faction nor
"diſſention amongſt the brethren, but joy, peace,
"concord, and love. Let thus much be here profitably placed, concerning the affection of theſe bleſſed perſons towards thoſe of the brethren that fell; upon account of the inhumane and mercileſs diſpoſition of [d] thoſe, who afterwards behaved themſelves moſt cruelly towards the members of Chriſt.

[a] Sr Henry Savil, at the margin of his M. S. copy, has mended this place thus, καὶ τοῖς θείοις ἀθλοθετήσεσι, καὶ ἐξ αὐτῶν ἄνδρας ἀναληφθέντας, i. e. and had been caſt to the wild-beaſts, and taken from them again; Which emendation is put in the margin of the Geneva Edit. Indeed Chriſtophorſon read this place thus, as appears from his tranſlation; but 'tis uncertain whether he did it by conjecture, or from the authority of ſome old copies. Our M. SS. alter not the reading here. Moreover, ἀναληφθῆναι (which is the term in the original) ſignifies in this place, to be caſt again into priſon; in which ſenſe 'tis twice uſed in the foregoing chapter. Valeſ.

[b] Πᾶσι μὲν ἀπελογήσαντο. Muſculus tranſlates it trueſt, thus, omnibus rationem fidei ſuæ reddebant, i. e. they gave all men an account of their faith: it may be rendred thus, they excuſed themſelves to all: for that's the proper ſignification of Ἀπολογεῖσθαι. Valeſ.

[c] The Maz. Med. and Fuk. M.SS. read [κατὰ πάντων, i.e. over all. Valeſ.

[d] He means the Novatians, who afterwards excluded ſuch as fell in time of perſecution from all hope of abſolution. Valeſ.

CHAP. III.

What a Vision appeared to the Martyr Attalus in his sleep.

MOreover, the same Epistle of the forementioned Martyrs, contains also another relation worthy to be remembred; which, for the information of the Readers, we will very willingly insert: Thus it is: "For when Alcibiades, one of "the Martyrs, (who led an austere course of life, "and in the foregoing part of his life hitherto had "fed on nothing at all, but onely made use of bread "and water,) attempted to lead the same course "of life during his imprisonment; it was reveal- "led to Attalus (after the first combat which he "finished in the Amphitheatre) that Alcibiades "did not well, in his not making use of Gods "creatures, and leaving an example of scandall to "others. But Alcibiades submitted, fed on all "meats afterwards promiscuously, and gave God "thanks: For they were not destitute of the grace "of God, but the holy Spirit was their directour. These things were after this manner. Now, when Montanus, [a] Alcibiades, and Theodotus, began, then first of all, to be looked upon in the opinion of most men as Prophets; (for very many miracles of divine grace, at that time wrought in many Churches, made most men believe, that they also were Prophets;) and when there arose a dissention concerning these foresaid persons; The brethren that were in Gallia did again subjoyn their private opinion also concerning these men, (which was Religious and most Orthodox,) and annexed several Epistles of those Martyrs that had ended their lives amongst them, which, being yet in bonds, they wrote to the brethren in Asia and Phrygia, and also to [b] Eleutherus then the Bishop of Rome, being [c] Embassadours for the peace of the Church.

[a] This Alcibiades must be distinguished from Alcibiades mentioned a little before in this chapter. He, that is first named in this place, was a companion of the B. Martyrs of Lyons. This person here was (together with Montanus and Theodotus,) a ring-leader of the Sect of the Cataphrygians. Concerning whom see chap. 16, & 17 of this book. Vales.

[b] Eleutherus Bishop of Rome, was first deceived by the Montanists, who craftily hid their errour under the pretence of a feigned piety. Moreover, being moved thereto by the letters and exhortations of the Martyrs of Lyons, he wrote an Epistle to the Churches of Asia and Phrygia, concerning the receiving of the Montanists into the Church. But being soon after admonished by one Praxeas of Asia, he revoked his pacifick letters which he had sent; and, following the authority of his predecessour Anicetus, refused to admit of a new Prophecy. So Tertullian, in his book, against Praxeas. Vales.

[c] That is, the brethren of Asia and Phrygia, as well as Eleutherus, were Embassadours for the peace of the Church. See B. 3. chap. 24. note (a.)

CHAP. IV.

How the Martyrs, by their Epistle, recommended Irenæus.

BUt the same [a] Martyrs recommended [b] Irenæus (who at that time was a Presbyter of the Church at Lyons) to the forementioned Bishop of Rome, giving the man a very good testimony, as their own words doe manifest, which are these; "We pray that you may in all things "and always rejoyce in God, Father [c] Eleutherus; "we have entreated Irenæus our brother and com- "panion to bring you these letters, and we beseech "you that you would have him recommended, "being a follower of the testament or covenant of "Christ. For if we knew that place would pro- "cure any man righteousness, we would chiefly "have recommended him as being Presbyter of "the Church, which degree he is of. What need we recount the Catalogue of the Martyrs in the foresaid Epistle; some whereof were perfected by being beheaded, others were cast for food to the wild beasts, and others again dyed in prison? Or what need we reckon up the number of the confessours which till that time survived? For he that is desirous, may easily and fully know all these things by taking into his hands that Epistle, which, as I said, is inserted entire into our collection of the Martyrs. And such were the things that happened in Antoninus's time.

[a] Blondell (in his Apology, chap. 8. p. 26.) denies that the Martyrs of Lyons wrote to Eleutherus. For he affirms that the Martyrdom of Pothinus, and the Lugdunenſians, happened on the seventh year of Marcus the Emperour, on the year of Christ 167; at which time Soter was Bishop of Rome. The Martyrs of Lyons therefore could not write to Eleutherus who then had not succeeded Soter. But our Eusebius does refute Blondell, saying plainly, That the same Martyrs recommended, &c. Vales.

[b] Valesius, in his note here, will not allow that Irenæus did actually goe this journey to Rome; the Martyrs indeed, says he, had desired him, and he had promised to undertake it; but the heat of the persecution coming on, and he being fixt in the presidency over that Church, could not be spared personally to undergoe it. But since Eusebius clearly intimates, and S[t] Jerom (in Catalogo) and Baronius (at the year of Christ 179) doe expresly affirm that the Martyrs sent him upon this errand, 'tis safest to grant his journey thither, though it must be while he was yet Presbyter, for so they particularly say he was in their Epistle to the Bishop of Rome, part of which our Eusebius has here inserted. See the learned D[r] Cave's Apostolici; in the life of S. Irenæus; pag. 165. Edit. London, 1677.

[c] The Kings, Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. read Eleuterus; as doe also Nicephorus and Rufinus. But there are some who call him Eleutherius. Vales.

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

CHAP. V.

How God, having from heaven heard the prayers of some of our Religion, sent rain to Marcus Aurelius Cæsar.

REport says, that when [a] M. Aurelius Cæsar, [b] brother to this Emperour, had drawn up his men in Battalia, in order to a fight against the Germans and Sarmatians, his army was brought into so great a streight by reason of thirst, that he knew not what course to take: and that the Souldiers of the Legion of [b] Melitina, (so it was called, *which Legion, upon account of their faith, has continued from that time hitherto,) kneeling down upon the ground (whilst the Army was setting in aray against the enemy) according to our usual custom in prayer, betook themselves to the making supplications to God. Which sight seeming very strange to their Adversaries, report says, that there soon after followed another thing much more wonderfull; to wit, both a terrible Lightning, which put the Enemy to flight and destroyed them; and also a great shower of rain, which fell upon that Army who had prayed to God, and refreshed it, when all the men in it were just ready to perish with thirst. Which story is related both by those Writers, (who are wholly estranged from our Religion,) whose care it was to commit to writing matters done in those times; and 'tis also set forth by our own writers. But the [c] Heathen Historians, because they are ali-

[a] Eusebius is here much mistaken, who says, that M. Aurelius was brother to Antoninus the Emperour, whenas M. Aurelius Antoninus was one and the same person. His Adoptive brother was not named Marcus, but Lucius Ælius Verus, as all men know. But he, who fought against the Germans and Sarmatians (to whom God granted a sudden shower to allay his Souldiers thirst,) was not L. Ælius Verus, but M. Aurelius Antoninus, as all Historians do attest; which our Eusebius does confirm also in his Chronicon, where he says this was done in the 14[th] year of Antoninus, that is, four or five years after the death of L. Ælius Verus. Vales.

[b] Melitina is a Countrey of Cappadocia, scituate between Commagenes and Cataonia, sayes Strabo in his 12 Book; who also relates, that that Country had no Cities. But afterwards Melitina became a famous City, which, upon a new division made of the Provinces, was attributed to Armenia the less; so says Amm. Marcelinus, who always calls it Melitina. Vales.

* That is, the name of that Legion; he means not the very persons, which then were in it.

[c] Some of the Heathen writers, who have mentioned this thing, say the Rain was procured by the inchantments of Magicians: others assert it to have been done by the prayers of Marcus the Emperour. So Capitolinus in the life of Marcus, and Claudian in the sixth Consulate of Honorius. Moreover, they have set down the very words of the prayer, that Marcus used; which are these, Hanc dextram ad te, Jupiter, tendo, quæ nullius unquam sanguinem fudit; i. e. I stretch forth this right hand to thee, O Jupiter, which never shed the bloud of any man. Vales.

M. AURELIUS & L. VERUS.

enated from the Faith, have mentioned the wonder indeed, but confeſs not that it was done by the prayers of thoſe of our Religion. But our men, in that they are lovers of Truth, have delivered what was done in a plain and ingenuous manner. Amongſt which number is Apollinaris; who ſays, from that time that Legion, which by prayer had wrought that miracle, had a name given it by the Emperour accommodate to what was done, being called in the Roman tongue [d]Fulminea. Tertullian alſo is a witneſs of this matter worthy to be credited, who dedicated to the Roman Senate an Apologie for our faith, (which we have before made mention of;) wherein he confirms this ſtory by a greater and more manifeſt demonſtration. Thus therefore he writes, ſaying, [e] that the Letters of the moſt intelligent Emperour Marcus were extant in his time, wherein he atteſts, that his Army in Germany, being ready to periſh for want of water, was preſerved by the Chriſtians prayers. He ſays moreover, that this Emperour threatned thoſe with death, who attempted to accuſe them of our Religion. To which the forementioned Writer adds theſe words alſo. "[f] What manner "of Laws therefore are theſe, which the impious, "unjuſt, and cruel perſons bring againſt us? ſuch "Laws as Veſpaſian did not obſerve, although he "had conquered the Jews; which Trajan in part "diſanulled, forbidding that the Chriſtians "ſhould be ſought for; which neither Adrian, "(although an inquiſitive ſearcher into all things "that were curious,) nor he who was ſurnamed "Pius, did make authentick. But let every one determine concerning theſe things according to his own pleaſure; we will proceed upon the Series of the ſubſequent parts of our Hiſtory. Pothinus therefore having finiſhed his life, (together with thoſe that ſuffered Martyrdom in Gallia,) when he was ninety years old compleat, [g] Irenæus ſucceeded in the Biſhoprick of Lyons, which See Pothinus preſided over. This Irenæus was, we underſtand, an auditour of Polycarps in his younger years. This perſon ſetting down (in his third book againſt Hereſies) the ſucceſſion of the Biſhops of Rome, cloſes his Catalogue with Eleutherus, (whoſe times and actions we now make our reſearches into) becauſe in his time he compiled that elaborate work; he writes thus.

[d] That is, the Lightning Legion. Scaliger has long ſince remark't, (in his Animad. Euſeb.) that the Legion was not named Fulminea upon account of this miracle, for it was ſo called long before Antoninus's time. Dio Caſſius makes this evident, in his 55 B. where he reckons up all the Legions. Alſo the old inſcription, produced by Scaliger, confirms this. Wherefore, as to the miracle of the rain obtained by the prayers of the Chriſtian ſouldiers, we doe readily give credit to the atteſtation of Apollinaris and Tertullian; but Apollinaris has not yet perſwaded me to believe, that the Legion Melitina was named the Lightning Legion upon that account. Some may object, that there was indeed a Legion, called the Lightning Legion, before Antoninus's time, but that he gave the Legion Melitina that name alſo, becauſe of the benefit he received by their means. But, if it were ſo, it ought to be called the ſecond Lightning Legion: and yet Dio makes no mention of any ſuch Legion, although he reckons up exactly all the Legions enrolled by the former Emperours. Moreover, Dio ſays, that the Lightning Legion had its ſtation in Cappadocia, which agrees very well with the Legion Melitina. In the book called Notitia Imperii Romani, the prefecture of the 12 Legion, termed Fulminea, at Melitina, is reckoned under the diſpoſition of the Duke of Armenia. Whence tis collected that Melitina was not the name of the Legion, but of the Town, wherein the 12 Legion, called Fulminea, abode. But 'twas not uſual to give the Legions their denomination from the places where they were in Gariſon, but from the Countreys wherein they were inrolled. Therefore, what Euſebius ſays concerning the Legion Melitina, ſeems to me ſcarce probable. Beſides, Ruſinus purpoſely omitted this name of the Legion, as I ſuppoſe, becauſe he knew that Melitina was the name of a Town in Armenia the leſs, wherein the 12 Legion, called Fulminea, kept guard in his time. But (that I may freely ſay what I think) it ſeems not very probable to me, that a whole Legion of Roman Souldiers ſhould at that time be Chriſtians; which yet Euſebius ſeems to affirm: who errs in this alſo, becauſe he has not produced the place of Apollinaris, nor ſhown the book wherein he wrote theſe things. But the words, with which Euſebius cloſes this whole ſtory, doe ſufficiently ſhew, that he himſelf doubted of the truth of this matter: for thus he ſays, in this chap. Let every one determine concerning theſe things according to his own pleaſure. Valeſ.

[e] Tertullians words are theſe; At nos è contrario edimus protectorem; ſi literæ Marci Aurelii graviſſimi Imperatoris requirantur, quibus illam Germanicam ſitim Chriſtianorum forte militum precationibus impetrato imbriodis cuſſam conteſtatur. Tertul. Apol. pag. 6. Edit. Regal. Paris 1634.

That, even to thoſe times, miracles were wrought by the faithfull.

ALl this, being agreeable to what we have delivered in the foregoing Books of our Hiſtory, Irenæus has given his aſſent to in thoſe five books of his, which he entitled The Confutation and Overthrow of Knowledge falſly ſo called; in the ſecond book of which Subject he does in theſe words manifeſt, that even in his days there remained in ſome Churches examples of the divine and wonderfull power of God in working miracles, ſaying; "So far are they from raiſing

"soul of the defunct has returned into his body, "and the man has had the benefit of life conferred "upon him by the prayers of the Saints. And again, after the interposition of some words, he says; "But if they say, that the Lord wrought such miracles as these in appearance only, not really, we "will bring them to the oracles of the Prophets, "and from thence demonstrate that all things were "thus predicted concerning him, and most undoubtedly done by him, and that he onely is the "Son of God. Therefore they which are his "true disciples, receiving grace from him, doe in "his name perform all things for the benefit of "the rest of mankind, according as every one of "them hath received the gift from him. For some "of them do certainly and truely cast out devils, in "so much that those very persons, who were cleansed from evil spirits, frequently become believers, "and continue in the Church. Others have the "fore-knowledge of things future, and visions, and "utter prophetick predictions. Others by the "imposition of their hands heal the sick, and restore them to their former soundness: and moreover, as we said, the dead also have been raised, "who continued with us many years after. What "shall we say more? We cannot declare the number of the gifts, which the Church throughout the "whole world having received from God, in the "name of Jesus Christ who was crucified under "Pontius Pilate, does daily perform for the benefit "of the Nations; She uses no deceit towards any "person, neither does she sell her gifts: for as she "has freely received them from God, so she freely "ministers them to others. And in another place the same Authour writes thus; "In like manner as "we have heard many brethren in the Church who "had prophetick gifts, and by the Spirit spoke all "sorts of languages; who also revealed the secrets of men, in such cases as 'twas profitable "and necessary, and explained the mysteries of "God. And thus much [concerning this matter, to wit] that diversities of gifts continued "with such as were worthy, untill those times before manifested.

CHAP. VIII.

After what manner Irenæus makes mention of the divine Scriptures.

But because in the beginning of this work of ours, we promised, that we would produce in due place the words of the ancient Ecclesiastick Presbyters and Writers, wherein they have delivered in writing the traditions concerning the books of the Old and New Testament which came to their hands, ([a] of which number Irenæus was one;) Come on, we will here adjoyn his words; and first what he has said of the sacred Gospels, after this manner; "Matthew published "his Gospel among the Hebrews, written in their "own Language, whilest Peter and Paul were "Preaching the Gospel at Rome, and founding the "Church. [b] After their death, Mark the disciple "and interpreter of Peter, delivered to us in writing what Peter had Preached. Luke also, the "follower of Paul, compiled in a book the Gospel Preach't by him. Afterwards John the "disciple of the Lord, he that leaned on his breast, "publisht a Gospel, when he lived at Ephesus "[a City] of Asia. Thus much the forementioned Authour has said in the third book of the foresaid work: And in his fifth book he discourses thus concerning the Revelation of John, and the number of Antichrist's name, "These things be"ing thus, and this number being extant in all ac"curate and antient copies, and those very per"sons who saw John face to face, attesting the "truth of these things, even reason doth teach us, "that the number of the beasts name according to "the computation of the Grecians, is made appa"rent by the letters contained in it. And after some other passages, he speaks thus concerning the same John, "We therefore will not run the ha"zard of affirming any thing too positively con"cerning the name of Antichrist; for if his name "were to have been openly declared in this age, "it would have been expres't by him who saw the "Revelation. For it was not seen long since, "but almost in our age, about the end of Domi"tian's Reign. Thus much is related by the foresaid Authour concerning the Revelation: He mentions also the first Epistle of John, and produces many authorites out of it; as also out of the second Epistle of Peter. He not onely knew, but also approved of the book, called Pastor, saying, "Truly therefore hath that book said, which con"tains this, Before all things believe that there is "one God, who created and set in order all things, "and so forth. He quotes some words out of the [c] Wisedom of Solomon, saying in a manner thus; "The "vision of God procures in"corruption, and incorrupti"on makes us neer unto God. He makes mention also of the [d] sayings of an Apostolick Presbyter, (whose name he has concealed,) and annexes his expositions of the divine Scriptures. Moreover, he makes mention of Justin Martyr and Ignatius, quoting also authorities out of their writings. The same person has promised to confute Marcion, in a separate Volume, by arguments pickt out of his own writings. And concerning the translation of the divinely inspired Scriptures, hear what he writes word for word; "God there"fore was made man, and the Lord himself saved "us, having given the sign of the Virgin. But not "as some say who are so audacious as to traduce "the Scripture thus, Behold, a young woman "shall conceive, and bring forth a Son; as "[e] Theodotion the Ephesian "has translated it, and A"quila of Pontus, both "Jewish proselytes. Whom "the Ebionites having fol"lowed, say that Christ was "begotten by Joseph. Hereunto, after a few words, he adds, saying; "For before the "Romans had firmly com"pleated their Empire, (the

[a] These words [τῶν δὲ καὶ εἰρηναῖος ἓν, i. e. of which number Irenæus was one] seem to be superfluous, and written in the margin onely, by some Scholiast. But they are in the Maz. Med. Fus. and Savil. M. SS. Vales.

[b] Irenæus, in that he affirms here that The Gospel according to Mark was written after the death of Paul and Peter, does contradict what Eusebius related before, at the 15th chap. of the second book: where he says Mark's Gospel was publish't at Rome, whilest Peter was alive, and approved of by that Apostle. But 'tis no wonder that the antient fathers disagree amongst themselves in this matter: seeing we have almost nothing of certainty about the writing of the sacred Gospels, save that they are four, and written by four several Authours. But when, or for what reason they were written, and whether the Gospel of S. Matthew were first penned in Hebrew, its not very evident. Vales.

[c] All the ancient Ecclesiastick Writers (as before was noted) call that book the Wisedom of Solomon, which we now call the Proverbs. But that B. entitled now the Wisedom of Solomon, is Apocryphal. Vales.

[d] Ἀπομνημονεύματα (the term here in the original) does properly signifie, the sayings of wise men, which are repeated by heart. Vales.

[e] Irenæus is the ancienteſt writer that makes mention of Theodotion. Wherefore we will see, if from hence we can make out the time when Theodotion lived. Epiphanius (in his book de ponderib.) says Theodotion flourished under Commodus, and then put forth his translation. The Chronicon of Alexandria follows Epiphanius's opinion, and says he publisht that work in the fifth year of the Emperour Commodus. I Judge Theodotion to be somewhat ancienter. For, seeing Irenæus has mentioned him in his books against Heresies, (which books, tis manifest, he wrote when Eleutherus was Bishop of Rome, for he says so in the 3d B. of that work,) we must necessarily grant that Theodotion flourisht before Eleutherus was made Bishop of Rome. " Macedonians as yet poſſeſſing the Government " of Aſia,) [f] Ptolemæus the ſon of Lagus, endea- " vouring with much care and induſtry to adorn " the Library he had prepared at Alexandria, " with the writings of all men, which were ac- " curately compiled, requeſted thoſe of Jeruſalem, " that he might have [g] their " Scriptures tranſlated into " the Greek Language. They " (for till that time they " were ſubject to the Ma- " cedonians) ſent to Ptole- " mæus the Seventy Seni- " ours, which were the moſt " skilfull perſons among " them in the Scriptures, " and moſt expert in both " the Languages ; [h] ſatiſ- " fying the Kings deſire " herein. [Ptolemy] de- " ſirous to make tryal of " every one of them, and " being fearfull leaſt by com- " pact they ſhould agree to " conceal the truth of the " Scriptures by their tran- " ſlation, [i] ſeparated them " one from another, and " commanded every one of " them to write a tranſla- " tion : and this he did " throughout all the books. " When they were come " all together into the ſame " place in the preſence of " Ptolemy, and had com- " pared together the ver- " ſion of every particular " perſon amongſt them, God " was both glorified, and " the Scriptures acknowledged to be truely di- " vine : For they all from the beginning to the " end, ſet down the ſame things in the ſame words " and in the ſame expreſſions ; in ſo much that the " Gentiles which were preſent, acknowledged the " Scriptures were tranſlated by the inſpiration of " God. Neither need it ſeem marvellous that " God ſhould doe this ; ſeeing that in the capti- " vity of the people under Nebuchodonoſor, (the " Scriptures being then corrupted,) when after " Seventy years the Jews returned into their own " Country, afterwards in the times of Artaxerxes " King of the Perſians, He inſpired Eſdras the " Prieſt of the tribe of Levi to recompoſe all the " books of the former Prophets, and reſtore to " the people the Law delivered by Moſes. Thus far Ireneus.

[f] Some of the Ancients doe declare that the Greek tranſlation of the holy Scriptures was performed under Ptolemæus the ſon of Lagus ; others mention it to have been done under Ptolemæus Philadelphus. Which latter opinion, in that 'tis confirmed by the authority of the greater number of writers, has at laſt prevailed. Anatolius ſays the tranſlation of the 72 was made both in the Reign of Ptolomy the Son of Lagus, and alſo in that of his ſucceſſour Philadelphus : which to me ſeems very probable. For, ſeeing Ariſtobulus, Joſephus, and Tertullian doe ſay in expreſs words, that Demetrius Phalereus put Ptolomy upon this buſineſs ; and it being manifeſt that the ſaid Demetrius was in great favour with, and authority under, Ptolomy the ſon of Lagus, and died ſoon after him, we muſt neceſſarily ſay that this tranſlation (if it were done by the procurement of Demetrius) was begun in the Reign of Ptolomy the ſon of Lagus. And, ſeeing that Philadelphus reigned about two years together with his father, being made his Colleague in the Kingdom, therefore perhaps 'tis related that this tranſlation was made under both the Princes. Valeſ. The Learned Petavius is of the ſame opinion with Valeſius, in this matter ; as may be ſeen from his Annotations on Epiphanius's Book de ponderib. pag. 379. Edit. Paris. 1622.

[g] Clemens Alexandrinus ſays the 72 Seniours tranſlated all the books (as well thoſe of the Law, as thoſe of the Prophets) of the Scripture into Greek. To whom agrees Theodoret, in his Preface to his comments on the Pſalms, &c. Iympiodorus, and almoſt all other writers. But Ariſtobulus and Joſephus, both Jewiſh writers, doe intimate that the Law onely was by them turned into Greek. Ariſtobulus's words may be ſeen B. 13. of Euſebius de præparat. and Joſephus's in his Preface to his Antiquities. But to this it may be anſwered, that the Jews, under the name of the Law, doe ſometimes comprehend the Prophets alſo. See Maſius's Preface to the Greek Edition of Joſhua. Valeſ.

[h] Valeſius reads this paſſage thus [ποιήσας τῷθ' ὅπερ ἐβούλετο, i. e. Jatisfying the Kings deſire herein.] He ſays Chriſtophorſon read this place ſo, and S[r] Hen. Savill in his M.S. But the Kings, the Maz.Med. and Fuk.M. SS. (as he ſays) and Robert Stephens, in his Edit. read it thus [ποιήσας τῷ θεῷ ὅπερ ἐβούλετο, i. e. God having done according to his own will. We follow Valeſius ; but leave the Reader to his liberty.

[i] Juſtin the Martyr (in his παραίνεσις to the Gentiles) ſays the 72. Seniours were by Ptolomy put into ſo many cells ; the ruines of which he ſaw at Alexandria: Epiphanius (in his book de ponderib.) ſays the King placed them two and two in a cell. Theſe words of Irenæus agree beſt with Juſtin's account of this matter. Others there are, who deride this whole ſtory about the cell ; becauſe neither Joſephus, nor Ariſteas, nor Philo make any mention of them. See Petavius's Annotat. on Epiphanius, pag. 378. Edit Paris ; and M[r] Gregorie's diſcourſe (of Oxford) concerning the 70 Interpreters.

CHAP. X.

Concerning Pantænus the Philoſopher.

AT that time there was a man, Governour of the School of the Faithfull * there, who upon account of his learning was moſt eminent, his name was Pantænus ; for from a very ancient cuſtom there had been an Eccleſiaſtical School among them, which alſo continued to our days ; and we have been informed that 'tis furniſhed with men who are very able Scholars, and induſtrious about divine matters : but Fame ſays that the forementioned Pantænus was at that time the moſt eminent perſon among them, becauſe he was bred up in the precepts and inſtitutions of that Philoſophical Sect called Stoicks. Moreover, 'tis ſaid, he ſhewed ſo great a willingneſs of mind and ardency of affection towards the [publication of the] divine Word, that he was declared the Preacher of Chriſts Goſpel to the Nations of the Eaſt, and jorneyed as far as India. For there were many Evangelical Preachers of the Word even at that time, who inflamed with a divine zeal, in imitation of the Apoſtles, contributed their aſſiſtance to the enlargement of the divine Word, and the building men up in the faith. Of which number Pantænus was one, and is reported to have gone to the Indians. Where, as 'tis famed, he found the Goſpel according to Matthew, amongſt ſome that had the knowledge of Chriſt there, before his arrival. To whom Bartholomew one of the Apoſtles had Preacht, and [a] left them the Goſpel of S[t] Matthew written in Hebrew ; which was preſerved to the foreſaid times. Moreover, this Pantænus, after many excellent performances, was at laſt made Governour of the School at Alexandria ; where by his Diſcourſes and Writings he ſet forth to publick view the Treaſures of the divine points.

* At Alexandria.

[a] Ruſinus, and Jerome (in catalogo) doe ſay, that Pantænus, returning from India to Alexandria, brought with him that Goſpel of S[t] Matthew in Hebrew. But Euſebius does not ſay ſo. For by that which he adds, [ἦν καὶ σωζόμενος εἰς τὸν δηλούμενον χρόνον] he meanes onely thus much, viz. that that Copy of Bartholomew's was preſerved untill Pantænus came into India. So Nicephorus expounds Euſebius's words B. 4. chap. 32 ; but I aſſent not to Nicephorus, in that which he ſays further, to wit, that that Goſpel of S[t] Matthew, which Pantænus found in India, was dictated there by Bartholomew. I rather believe that Copy was brought thither by Bartholomew, out of Judea. Further, Jerom (in catalog.) ſays, the Goſpel of S[t] Matthew, written in Hebrew, was preſerved in the Library of Cæſarea (collected by Pamphilus the Martyr) even in his time. But I doubt 'twas the Goſpel according to the Hebrews, which the Nazareans uſed. For ſome thought, that this Goſpel of the Hebrews was the original Copy of S[t] Matthews Goſpel ; but that's a miſtake. Valeſ.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning Clemens Alexandrinus.

AT the ſame time flouriſht Clemens at Alexandria, (being laborious together with Pantænus in the ſtudies of the divine Scriptures,) who had the ſame name with that ancient Prelate of the Roman Church, that was a diſciple of the Apoſtles.

COMMODUS.

Apostles. He (in his book [a] of Institutions) makes expres's mention of Pantænus, as having been his Master. To me he seems to mean the same person also, in the first book of his Stromateon, where recording * the most eminent succes-sours of the Apostolick doctrine by whom he had been instructed, he says thus; "Now this work "of mine I have not composed for ostentation, "but these memoires I have treasured up, as a re-"medie against the forgetfulnes of mine old age; "that they may be a true representation and adum-"bration of those lively and powerfull discourses, "which I have had the happiness to hear from bles-"sed and truely worthy and memorable persons. Of "which one was Ionicus, [whom I heard] in Greece; "another in † Magna Græcia; the first of them "was a Cælo-Syrian, the other an Egyptian. Others "of them lived in the East: of which one was an "[b] Assyrian; the other in Palestine, by original "extract an [c] Hebrew. The last [Master] I met with, (who yet was the first and chiefest in power and virtue, whom I inquisitively sought out and found lying hid in Egypt,) I did fully acquiesce in, and searched no further. These therefore preser-ving the sincere tradition of the blessed doctrine, which they had immediately received from the holy Apostles Peter, James, John, and Paul, (like children from the hands of their Parents, al-though few children be like their Parents) are by Gods blessing come down to our time, sowing those Primitive and Apostolic seeds [of Truth.]

[a] These books of Clemens's contained a short and compendi-ous exposi-tion of both Te-staments, says Pho-tius, in his Bibliotheca. But, be-cause of the errours with which they a-bounded, they were disregar-ded, and at length lost. Neither is there any other rea-son, in my opinion, why the books of Papias, He-gesippus, and others of the An-cients, are lost. Yet the Excer-pta out of Theodotus, which are extant after his Stromateon, seem to be taken out of his Institutions; which I wonder no body has taken no-tice of before. This I conclude to be true, both because in those Excerpta out of Theodotus there are the same things said of Christ, which Photius attests he read in Clemens's books of Institutions; and also because the Authour of those Excerpta does, about the end of them, call Pantænus Master. Now Pantænus was Clemens's Master, as Eusebius says in this chapter; whom Clemens in his Institutions, does often quote, as Photius relates. Vales.

* Or, the most eminent persons of the Apostolick succession.

† It was that part of Italy, which since is called Calabria.

[b] Valesius thinks this person was Tatianus, Justin the Martyrs Scholar; Baronius says 'twas Bardesanes, of whom see B. 4. chap. the last; but he was no Assyrian; for he was of Edessa, the chief City of Osdroëna.

[c] Baronius says, this was Theophilus Bishop of Cæsarea; but I ra-ther think him to have been Theodotus; which I conjecture from hence, because the Epitome of Clemens's institutions is entitled, [ἐκ τῆς Θεοδότου ἀνατολικῆς διδασκαλίας, i. e. the Epitome of Theodotus his Oriental Doctrine.] For Clemens calls that the Oriental Doctrine, which he learned from his masters in the East. I have two argu-ments to perswade me, that Clemens does not here mean Theophilus of Cæsarea; (1) Theophilus was contemporary with Clemens, for he flourisht in the times of Victor Bishop of Rome, as we are informed by our Eusebius. (2) None of the antients ever said that Theophilus was an Hebrew, or, which is all one, a Jew. Vales.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the Bishops of Jerusalem.

AT that time Narcissus, Bishop of the Church at Jerusalem, flourished, a man very fa-mous amongst many even at this time: he was the fifteenth in succession from the siege of the Jews un-der Adrian. From which time we have before manifested, that the Church of the Gentiles was first constituted there, after those of the circumci-sion; and also that Mark was the first Bishop of the Gentiles that Presided over them. After whom the [a] successions of the [Bishops] there doe shew that Cassianus had the Episcopal Chair: after him Publius; then Maximus; and after these Julianus; then Cains; to whom succeeded Symmachus; then another Caius, and again Julianus the second; more-over Capito, [b] Valens, and Dolichianus; last of all this Narcissus, who in a continued series of succession was the thirtieth from the Apostles.

COMMODUS.

[b] Before this Valens, the names of two Bi-shops are wanting, to wit, Maximus, and Antoninus, which were omitted by the negligence of the Transcribers. For, seeing Eusebius affirmed Narcissus to have been the fifteenth Bishop of Jerusalem from Mark, and the thirtieth from the Apostles; that can't be unless you add two Bishops here. Eusebius indeed, in his Chronicon, after Capito the twenty sixth from the Apostles, reckons Maximus, and An-toninus; after these Valens, and Dolichianus; and then Narcissus. Georg. Syncellus and Nicephorus doe agree with Eusebius; onely be-tween Julianus and Capito they insert one Helias, whom Eusebius does not admit of. Vales.

[a] The most famous Churches, especially those which were foun-ded by the Apostles, did with great care keep the successions of their Bishops laid up amongst their Archives, recording their names, and the day of their deaths, in a pair of Writing-tables. These our Eusebius had diligently examined, as appears from this place; and he has digested the Bishops of the principal Sees from the authority of these tables onely. Wherefore, the successions of Bishops which are recounted in the History and Chronicles of Eusebius, are highly to be prized, as being the ancientest, and most certain. Vales.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning Rhodon, and the dissention of the Marcionites, which he has made mention of.

ABout the same time also Rhodon, born in Asia, (who, as himself relates, had been instructed at Rome by Tatianus, whom we men-tioned before,) wrote many books, and together with others ingaged against the Heresie of Mar-cion. Which, he relates, was in his time divided into several opinions. He has recorded the Au-thours of this dissention, and with exquisite dili-gence confuted the lies invented by every one of them. Hear therefore what he has written in these words. "Wherefore also they disagree amongst "themselves, because they are assertours of an opi-"nion which is ill put together. For Apelles, "one of their gang, ([a] who boasts of his age and "pretends to lead a more abstemious and strict "course of life,) confesses there is but one prin-"ciple; but says the Oracles of the Prophets pro-"ceed from an opposite spirit, being induced to be-"lieve this by the responses of a Virgin, possessed "with a devil, by name Philumena. But others "of them, (in like manner as does Marcion "himself, the [b] Mariner) assert there are two "Principles; of which number are [c] Potitus, and "Basilicus; and these followers of that * Wolfe "of Pontus, being unable to find out the distinction "of things, (which neither could he doe,) have "given themselves over to rashness, and have "simply and without any thing of demonstration "affirmed there are two Principles. Others a-"gain [differing] from these, and running them-"selves into worse [assertions,] suppose there "are not onely two, but also three natures. Of "which sort Syneros was the ringleader and first "founder, as the defenders of his doctrine doe say. The same Authour writes that he discours't with A-pelles; he says thus; "For the old man Apelles, ha-"ving had a conference with us, was convinc't that "he

[a] Rufinus does well translate this pas-sage thus, qui absti-nentiæ & senectutis prærogati-va usus, &c. who making an advan-tage of his abstinence and old age, &c. For [πολιτεία] does usual-ly signifie abstinence and a more strict course of life. But I understand not how A-pelles could boast of his continen-cy; who was reject-ed by Marcion, because he was a fornicatour, and afterwards retreated to Alexandria, as Tertullian affirms in his book de præscription. Wherefore let us see whether the word [πολιτεία] does not signifie something else here; it sometimes denotes the Office of a Decurio, or, Captain over ten horsemen; for these Commanders are by the Græcians called πολίδλαι, or πολιδόμφοι, as I have observed in my notes on Amm. Marcellinus. Also, a man may conjecture, that this place should be written thus, τῇ πολιᾷ σιμνῇ καὶ τῷ γήρᾳ, i. e. his venerable hoary hairs and old age. For Apelles was commonly cal-led old man; and so Rhodon terms him in this chapter. Eusebius fa-vours our conjecture, B. 6. chap. 39. where speaking of Alexander the Bishop, he uses this very phrase. Vales.

[b] The Kings M. S. and Stephens Edition doe here insert these two words [ὁ ναύτης, the mariner] but they are wanting in the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. Indeed Tertullian, in his book de præscription. does testifie that Marcion was at first a Mariner. Ubi tunc, says he, Marcion Ponticus nauclerus, Stoicæ studiosus? Vales.

[c] The Kings M. S. and Robert Stephens Edition call this man's name Potimus; the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savill M. SS. term him Potitus; so does Rufinus, in his Version; and Theodoret B. 1. Hæret. Fab. Vales.

* He means Marcion; see B. 4. chap. 11.

"he maintained many things that were falſe; upon "which account he ſaid faith ſhould in no wiſe be "too ſeverely inquired into, but, that every one "ſhould perſiſt in what he had believed. For he "aſſerted that thoſe who hoped in [Chriſt] cru-"cified ſhould be ſaved, provided they be found "doing of good works. He concluded the [que-"ſtion] concerning God, to be to him (as we "ſaid before) the moſt obſcure thing of all. For "he affirmed there was but one principle, as our "religion [aſſerts.] Then, having ſet forth his whole opinion, he ſubjoyns theſe words; "But "when I ſaid to him, whence have you this demon-"ſtration, or for what reaſon can you affirm there "is but one principle, tell us? He anſwered, that "the prophecies confuted themſelves, becauſe they "uttered nothing that was true: For they diſ-"agree, and are falſe, and oppoſite to them-"ſelves; but, how there was but one principle, he "profes't he knew not, but was induced onely to "think ſo. After this, when I conjured him to "ſpeak the truth, he ſwore he ſpoke what was "true, to wit, that he knew not how there could "be one unbegotten God, but he believed it. I "laughed, and reprehended him, becauſe he ſtiled "himſelf a Doctour, and knew not how to make "good what he taught. But, in the ſame book which he dedicated to Calliſtion, the ſaid Rhodon doth confeſs that he himſelf was inſtructed at Rome by Tatianus. Moreover he ſays, Tatianus compiled a book of Queſtions; wherein Tatianus having promiſed to explain the dark and obſcure paſſages of the ſacred Scriptures, this Rhodon profeſſes he would ſet forth the ſolutions to his Queſtions. There is alſo extant of this Perſons, a Comment upon the ſix days Work of the Creation. Indeed, this Apelles uttered many impious expreſſions againſt the Law of Moſes, in many books ſpeaking irreligiouſly of the divine Scriptures, and uſing his utmoſt diligence to confute, and (as he thought) to overthrow them. But thus much concerning theſe things.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning the Falſe Prophets of the Cataphrygians.

MOreover, that adverſary of Gods Church, (who hates goodneſs, and makes miſchief his chiefeſt delight,) omitting in no wiſe any ways or methods of Treachery towards men, cauſed new Hereſies again to grow up againſt the Church: the followers whereof crawl'd, like venemous Serpents, all over Aſia and Phrygia; and boaſted that Montanus was the Paraclete*, and that the two women Priſcilla and Maximilla, his companions, were his propheteſſes.

* That is, the holy Ghoſt; whom S[t] John, in his Goſpel, does, ſeveral times call παράκλητον, comforter. See Jo. 14. 6.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the Schiſm of Blaſtus raiſed at Rome.

OThers alſo ſprang up at Rome, whom Florinus, degraded from being a Presbyter of the Church, headed. Blaſtus was in like manner intangled in the ſame [a] errour. Which two perſons drew away many from the Church, and inticed them to imbrace their opinion; each of them ſeverally endeavouring to introduce innovations againſt the Truth.

[a] Rufinus, and Criſtophorſon ſuppoſed the term [πάθωμα] to ſignifie errour: Nicephorus takes it in ſuch a ſenſe as to ſignifie, a diſcharging; and thought that Blaſtus, as well as Florinus, was degraded from being a Presbyter. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVI.

What has been committed to memory concerning Montanus, and his Falſe Prophets.

MOreover, That power, which is the defender of the Truth, raiſed up Apollinaris [Biſhop] of Hierapolis, (whom we made mention of before,) and together with him many others, who at that time were eloquent and learned men, as it were a ſtrong and inexpugnable defence againſt the ſaid Hereſie of the Cataphrygians. By which perſons we have a copious ſubject left us for this our Hiſtory. [a] One of the ſaid perſons therefore, in the preface to his work againſt the Cataphrygians, does in the firſt place ſhew that he aſſaulted them with unwritten arguments. For he begins after this manner: "Having "a ſufficient while ſince been "enjoyned by thee, Beloved "[b] Avircius Marcellus, to "write a book againſt the "Hereſie of [c] Miltiades, till "now I have in a manner "continued doubtfull and un-"reſolved; not that I wan-"ted ability both to confute "falſehood, and alſo to give "evidence to the truth; but "I was fearfull and cautious, "leſt to ſome I ſhould ſeem "by writing to add to, or "make a further determina-"tion about, the doctrine of "the new covenant of the "Goſpel: to which nothing "muſt be added, nor any "thing taken away from it, "by him that reſolves to lead "a life agreeable to the Go-"ſpel it ſelf. But, being lately "at Ancyra [a City] of Gala-"tia, and finding the Church "[d] then [e] filled with the "noiſe of this New (not, as "they call it, Prophecy, but, "as it ſhall be demonſtra-"ted,) Falſe Prophecy; as "well as I was able, (God "aſſiſting me,) I diſcourſt "[f] frequently in the Church "many Days both concer-"ning theſe very things, and "alſo about other [points] "propoſed by them: inſo-"much that the church did "greatly rejoyce, and was "confirmed in the Truth; "but the adverſaries were at "that time confuted, and "[g] the enemies of God made New Prophecy, inaſmuch as, by reaſon of the ſtrangeneſs of this great matter, all men talk't of it. Hence it appears, that the gift of Prophecy was in thoſe times rare and unuſual in the Church; ſeeing that the Prophecy of Montanus, which then aroſe, ſtirred up at that time ſuch commotions in the Church. Which certainly had not happened, had the gift of Prophecy been then common in the Church. Valeſ.

[a] The opinions of Writers are various and different, concerning this perſon, whoſe authority Euſebius quotes in this chapter. Rufinus, Nicephorus B. 4. chap. 23. and Baronius thought it was Apollinaris of Hierapolis, whom Euſebius mentioned a little before. Ferom (in his book de Scriptor. Eccleſ.) ſuppoſed him to be Apollonius, and afterwards thinks 'twas Rhodon. Apollinaris of Hierapolis was not the Authour of this book, 'tis from hence manifeſt, becauſe he wrote againſt the Cataphrygian Hereſie when it newly aroſe, as Euſebius atteſts at the end of B. 4. But this unknown authour compiled his books after the death of Montanus, Maximilla, and Theodotus, as appears by the fragments of them quoted in this chapter. See Halloixius in his notes on the life of Apollinaris, chap. 3. Valeſ.

[b] In the Greek Menology at the 22 of October, mention is made of the holy Avercius, (ſo Nicephorus calls him B. 4.) Biſhop of Hierapolis, a worker of Miracles. Halloixius put forth this perſons life in Greek, Tome 2. concerning the famous Writers of the Eaſtern Church. Valeſ.

[c] Why this Authour without a name calls the Hereſie of the Cataphrygians, the Sect of Miltiades, rather than of Montanus, 'tis hard to be determined. For he means not here that Miltiades, of whom Euſebius ſpeaks in the following chapter. For he wrote for the Catholick Truth againſt the Cataphrygians. The Learned Langus, who tranſlated Nicephorus, at this place put in Alcibiades in ſtead of Miltiades. Indeed Alcibiades is by Euſebius (B. 5. cha. 3.) named amongſt the principal Abettours of the Cataphrygian Hereſie. Therefore we muſt either read Alcibiades here, or Miltiades there. Valeſ.

[d] The Kings M. S. and Nicephorus (B. 4. chap. 23.) in ſtead of [κατὰ πόντον, i. e. throughout Pontus] reads it [τὴν κατὰ τόπον ἐκκλησίαν, i. e. the Church of the place,] to wit, Ancyra. Valeſ.

[e] Διαπεθορυβημένην. that is, filled with the noiſe of, &c. For the whole Church of that place ſounded with the rumour of this

[g] The reading of the Fuk. and Savill M. SS. is [ἀντιθέους, i. e. the enemies of God. So he calls the Montaniſts, becauſe they were the introducers of a new Paraclete, or holy Ghoſt. Valeſ.

COMMODUS. "sorrowfull. When therefore the Presbyters of "that place requested me to leave some written "Record of what had been spoken against those "adversaries to the Word of Truth; [h] (Zoticus "Otrenus our fellow Presbyter being then present "also;) I did not indeed doe that; but promised, "that, (by the assistance of "the Lord,) I would write "here, and send it quickly "and carefully unto them. Having said these words and some others after these in the Preface of his book, he proceeds, and sets forth the Authour of the foresaid Heresie after this manner. "This their stub-"born contention therefore against the Church, "and this New Heretical separation [from it] "had this original. There is said to be a certain "Village in that [i] Mysia [which borders upon] "Phrygia, called by the name of Ardaba. There "they say, one of those who had newly embraced "the Faith, by name Montanus, (when Gratus "was Proconsul of Asia,) by "reason of his immoderate "desire after, and love for, "the chief place, gave the "adversary an entrance in-"to himself, and was filled "with the devil; and being "on a suddain possest with "a furious and frantick tem-"per of mind, became per-"fectly mad, and began to "utter strange and barba-"rous expressions, foretel-"ling what was to come; "[a thing which is] con-"trary to the order and in-"stitution of the Church received from antient "tradition, and [propagated] by a continued "succession. Now, of those who at that time "were at the hearing of his counterfeited expres-"sions, some with indignation rebuked him, as "being moved by, and possest with, a devil and a "spirit of errour, and as being a disturber of the "multitude; they prohibited him also to speak; "[for] they were mindfull of the Lords * pre-"monition and his menaces, [whereby we are com-"manded] with vigilancy to beware of the coming "of false Prophets. But others, as if they had been "inspired by the Holy Ghost and with the gift of "Prophecy, conceiving also very high thoughts of "themselves, and being unmindfull of the † Lords "premonition, provoked that infatuating, flattering, "and seducing spirit [to speak;] and being en-"ticed and deceived by it, forbad it should any "more be silenc't. By this art, or rather by this "method of subtilty and mischief, the devil plot-"ted destruction against those who were disobe-"dient to [the Lords premonition;] and, being "undeservedly honoured by them, he excited and "enkindled their minds, "which had [k] forsaken the "true Faith. For he stir-"red up two other women, "and filled them with a "counterfeit spirit: so that "they (like the fore-men-"tioned person) uttered ex-"travagant, foolish and strange expressions; and "those who delighted in and boasted of that mat-"ter, that spirit pronounced blessed, and puft them "up with the greatness of the promises. Sometimes "also, making use of conjecturall and credible ar-"guments, he condemned them publickly, that so "he might also seem a [l] reproving [Spirit.] Those "few, who were deceived, were Phrygians. But "this insolent spirit taught them to revile the "whole Church under heaven, because this spirit "of false Prophecy received neither honour from, "nor found any way of entrance into it. For when "the faithfull throughout Asia had met often and "in many places of Asia upon this account, and "had inquired into this new doctrine, and deter-"mined it to be prophane, and rejected this He-"resie, they were expelled out of the Church, and "interdicted communion [with the Faithfull.] Having related thus much in the beginning [of his work] and subjoyned, throughout that whole book, a confutation of their errour; in his se-cond book he says these words concerning the death of the forementioned persons. "Whereas "therefore they have termed us the Murderers of "the Prophets, because we have not admitted of "their prattling and lying Prophets, (for these, "they say, are those whom the Lord promised to "send his people,) let them answer us for God's "sake, is there any one of those, (most excellent!) "who even from Montanus and his women began "to speak, that hath been persecuted by the Jews; "or slain by the impious? not one: Is there any "one of them who has been apprehended and "crucified for the name [of Christ?] None at "all. Neither hath any of their women been "scourged in the Synagogues of the Jews, or "stoned: [not one of them] any where or in "any wise: yea, Montanus and Maximilla are "said to have dyed another manner of death. "For, tis famed, both these persons, incited there-"to by that furious spirit, hanged themselves; "not together, but each of them at the time of "their death, as tis strongly reported. And so "they dyed and put an end to their lives after the "same manner that the traitour Judas did. In "like manner also common fame says, that that "admirable [fellow] Theodotus, who was as it "were the first [m] Procura-"tour of that they stiled "their Prophecie, was pos-"sest with a [n] false ecstasie "of mind, as if at some time "or other he should be lifted "up, and assumed into hea-"ven; and that having gi-"ven himself wholly up in-"to [the power of] that "spirit of errour, he was "thrown into the air [by "him,] and dyed miserа-"bly. 'Tis said indeed, that "this thing was thus done; "but in as much as we saw "it not, we doe not suppose "(O Macarius!) that we "certainly know any thing "hereof. For peradventure "Montanus, Theodotus, and "the foresaid woman dyed "after this manner, perhaps "they did not so die. A-gain, in the same book he says the holy Bishops of that time did attempt to confute the spirit which was in Maximilla; but were pro-hibited by others, to wit, those that were favourers of that spirit: He writes thus; "And let not the spirit in Maximilla say "[to [h] This Zoticus Otrenus must be distinguished from Zoticus of Comanes the Bishop, whom this Authour mentions hereafter in this chapter. For he of Comanes was the antienter of the two. Vales.

[i] There were heretofore two Mysia's, (as also two Phrygia's,) says Strabo, B. 12. The one called the Greater, which Strabo calls Olympene; the other the less, which Ptolemy calls Hellespontia. Both of them bordered on Phrygia. Whence arose the Greek proverb [χωρὶς τὰ μυσῶν] concerning which see Erasm. Adag. p. 171. Edit. Wechelian. There was also another Mysia in Europe, which the Latines call Masia, but the Greeks always Mysia. To difference this Mysia therefore from the other, 'tis stiled here [ἡ πρὸς φρυγίαν μυσία, i. e. that Mysia which borders on Phrygia; or Mysia in Asia. In the Maz. M. S. this Town is called Ardabab. Vales.

* Or, distinction, for the term in the original is διαστολὴ.

† See Mat. 24. 11.

[k] Ἀποκεκοιμημένην. 'Tis a Metaphor taken from women, who leaving their husbands bed, go by stealth to that of the Adulterer. For [κοιμᾶσθαι] to sleep, is often used for these adulteries, as it occurs frequently in sacred Writt. Vales.

COMMODUS. [l] Montanus, or rather the devil who spoke through the mouth of Montanus, knew, that 'twas predicted by the Lord, that the spirit of God, at his coming should reprove the world of sin. Therefore, the devil, that he might make his Auditours believe he was the true Spirit of God, did sometimes reprove, and rebuke them. Vales.

[m] Amongst the Montanists there was a certian Chest, into which those of their party put money, which was for the maintenance of the Prophets. Theodotus was the first that lookt after this Chest; whom this Authour does therefore call the procuratour of their Prophecy. Montanus with his Propheteses was otherways a great cozener, who under a pretence of offerings, scraped much money together. He usually gave salaries to the Preachers of his doctrine. 'Twas necessary therefore he should have his Treasury, and one to oversee and look after it, who also might deliver out the stipends to such as Montanus ordered should be paid. Vales.

[n] Παρεκστῆναι signifies, to be seized with a false extasie or trance. For there are true extasies; such was Peter's Act. 10; and Pauls, when he was caught up to the third heaven. There are also false extasies amongst hereticks, which this Authour does elegantly call παρεκστάσεις. These false extasies differ little from madness, because the devil is the procurer of them: but those which proceed from the divine spirit doe not at all disturb the state of the mind, but are calm and pleasant, as Epiphanius says (in Heres. Cataphryg.) Vales.

COMMODUS.

"[to me,] (° as 'tis related in the same book of "Asterius Urbanus,) I am driven as a wolf from "the sheep. I am not a wolf. I am the Word, the "Spirit, and the Power: but let him evidently "manifest and prove that Power in the Spirit; "and let him by that Spirit compell those that "were then present to con- "fess that they tried and "conferred with that bab- "ling spirit; [I mean] those "approved men and Bishops, "Zoticus of the Town Co- "manes, and Julianus of "Apamea: whose mouths "P*Themison* and those of "his party having stopped, "would not suffer that ly- "ing spirit to be reproved by "them. Again, in the same book, (having interposed some words to confute the false Prophecies of Maximilla,) he evidences both the time when he wrote these things, and also mentions her predictions, wherein she had foretold there should be Wars and Commotions; the falsehood of which [predictions] he reprehends in these words, "And has not this lie been already made "apparently manifest? For to this day 'tis more "than thirteen years, since this woman died; and "yet there has not been either a particular, or an "universal war in the world. Yea rather, by the "mercy of God, the Christians have had a firm "and lasting peace. And thus much out of his second book. Out of the third I will also add some few words, where he says thus to those who boasted, that many even of their [party] had suffered as Martyrs. "When therefore they can "return no answer, having been confuted in all "passages we have mentioned, they endeavour to "flee to the Martyrs; saying they have many "Martyrs, and that is a certain and undoubted evi- "dence of that power by them called the Pro- "phetick spirit. But this, in my judgment, is "much more untrue. For some [followers] of "other Heresies [doe boast] they have many "Martyrs, and yet we shall not, I think, upon this "account embrace their opinion, nor confess they "have the truth amongst them. Those also "who first followed the Heresie of Marcion, "called Marcionists, say they have very many "Martyrs of Christ, and yet they doe not in truth "acknowledge Christ himself: And after some few words, he subjoyns hereunto, saying, "Where- "fore also, as often as those of the Church, being "called to [undergoe] Martyrdom for the true "Faith, have by accident happened into company "with some of those of the Phrygian Heresie, who "are called Martyrs, they dissent from them, and, "having avoided all communion with them, are "perfected by a glorious Martyrdom; for they "are unwilling to give their assent to the spirit of "Montanus and his women: and that this is true, "'tis manifest from what has been done in our "times in [the City] Apamea, scituate on [the "River] Meander, by Caius and Alexander of "Eumenia, who suffered Martyrdom.

° These words within this parenthesis seem to me to be a Scholion, which some old Scholiast, or Eusebius himself put in the margin of his book at this place. Besides, from hence it may be collected that Asterius Urbanus was the Authour of these three books against the Cataphrygians, and not Apollinaris, as Rufinus and Christophorson supposed. Vales.

P This was a great man amongst the Montanists, who boasted himself to be a Confessour, and a Martyr; and was so audacious, as, like an Apostle, to write a general Epistle to the Churches, in recommendation of this New Prophecy. Apollonius speaks much concerning this man in the following chapter. Vales.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning Miltiades, and the books he compiled.

IN the same book he makes mention of one Miltiades, a writer, who also wrote a book against the foresaid Heresie: having therefore cited some words of those [Hereticks,] he proceeds, saying; "Having found all this in a certain "book which they wrote in answer to a book of "our brother [a] Alcibiades's, wherein he proves, "that a Prophet ought not to speak in an extasie of "mind, I epitomized them. A little after this, in the same book, he enumerates the Prophets of the New Testament; amongst whom he recounts one Ammias, and Quadratus, he says thus, "[b] but a false Prophet in a "false extasie, (whose con- "comitants are licentious- "ness and audaciousness,) "takes his beginning indeed "from a voluntary igno- "rance, but ends, as I have "said in an involuntary mad- "ness of mind: they shall "not be able to show any "of the Prophets, either un- "der the Old, or New Te- "stament, who was inspired "after this manner [by such "a spirit.] They shall not "boast of Agabus, nor of "Judas, nor of Silas, nor "of the daughters of Philip, "nor of Ammias in Phila- "delphia, nor of Quadra- "tus, nor of many others "which do not at all belong "to them. Again, after some few words, he says thus, "For if, as they say, "Montanus's women suc- "ceeded in the gift of Pro- "phecy after Quadratus "and Ammias in Philadel- "phia, let them show us, "who among them have been "the successours of Monta- "nus and his women. For "the Apostle is of opinion that the gift of Pro- "phecy ought to continue in every Church untill "the last Advent [of our Lord.] But they are "unable to shew [any Prophet,] although this "is now the fourteenth year since the death of "Maximilla. Thus far he. Now that Miltiades, whom he mentions, has left us other monuments of his diligence about the divine Scriptures, both in the books he composed against the Gentiles, and also in those against the Jews; having prosecuted each subject particularly in two Volumes. Moreover also, he made an Apology for the [Christian] Philosophy, which he profest, [and dedicated it] to the [c] Presidents of the Provinces in that Age.

COMMODUS.

[a] In the foregoing chapter we observed that the name [Miltiades] was put for [Alcibiades.] On the contrary, here [Alcibiades] is crept into the Text of Eusebius, instead of [Miltiades.] In Nicephorus tis [Miltiades;] but neither he, nor Christophorson, understood this place. Vales.

[b] Rufinus, and Baronius, were mistaken, in that they supposed these following words were taken out of Miltiades's book. For this nameless Authour quotes nothing out of Miltiades's book, but onely out of the Cataphrygians answer to Miltiades's book: which thing translatours understood not. Now the meaning of this place is this; there is a great difference between the true Prophets, and the false. For the true Prophets, who were filled with the spirit of God, did foretell things future in a quiet and serene temper of mind. But the false Prophets, as was Montanus, uttered what they said in a raging and mad temper of mind. Indeed this was the chief objection of the Ecclesiasticks against the Montanists, who boasted they were inspired with a Prophetick spirit, because they Prophecied in an extasie. But we read that no Prophet either under the Old or New Testament did ever Prophecy in an extasie. Therefore Miltiades wrote a book against them, which was thus entitled [περὶ τοῦ μὴ δεῖν προφήτην ἐν ἐκστάσει λαλεῖν, i.e. a Prophet ought not to speak in an extasie of mind. See Epiphanius, adverss. Hæres. Montanist. chap. 2, & 4; and Chrysostom. Homil. 29. on the 1 Epist. Corinth. Vales.

[c] Jerom, Rufinus, and other Translatours thought Miltiades dedicated his Apology to the Roman Emperours, called here [κοσμικὰς ἀρχοντας.] But because at that time there was onely one Roman Emperour, (to wit, Commodus,) I judge the Governours of Provinces are here rather meant. For the term [ἄρχοντες] does commonly signifie the Presidents of Provinces. To these therefore Miltiades dedicated his Apology, as did Tertullian afterwards; who calls this Miltiades, the Rhetorician of the Churches. Vales.

CHAP XVIII.

How Apollonius also confuted the Cataphrygians, and whom he has made mention of.

APollonius also, an Ecclesiastick writer, imploying himself about a confutation of that called the Cataphrygian Heresie, which in his time

COMMODUS. was prevalent in Phrygia, composed a peculiar Volume against them; wherein he does both word by word disprove the false Prophecies vented by them, and also laies open the life and manners of the Founders of that Heresie, [shewing] how they behaved themselves. Hear what he says, in these very words, concerning Montanus. "But "who is this new Doctor? His works and do- "ctrine doe demonstrate: this is he who has "taught a dissolution of marriages: who has im- "posed [a] Laws of fasting; "who has named Pepuza "and Tymium (little Cities "of Phrygia) Jerusalem; "being desirous to gather "together their men from "all parts; who has con- "stituted exactours of mo- "ney; who, under the name "of oblations, has subtilly "mask't his taking of gifts; "who gives stipends to "those that Preach up his "doctrine, that so by stuffing "of the paunch the doctrine "he professes may thrive and "prevail. Thus much [he says] concerning Montanus. Concerning his Prophetesses, a little after these words he writes thus; "We have de- "monstrated therefore, that these principal Pro- "phetesses, for the time they were filled with the "Spirit, forsook their husbands: how falsly then "doe they speak, who term [b] Prisca a virgin? Then "he goes on, saying: Does not the whole Scripture "seem to you to prohibit a Prophet to receive gifts "& money? When therefore "I see a Prophetess receive "Gold, and silver, and rich "garments, how can I choose "but abhor her? Again, af- ter some words, he says this concerning one of those whom they call Confessours. "Moreover, "Themison, who has covered himself with a "[c] specious pretext of ava- "rice, (he who would not "bear the [d] sign of confes- "sion, but rid himself of his "bonds by a great sum of "money, when as upon that "account he should in future "have behaved himself sub- "missively,) does [not- "withstanding] boast him- "self to be a Martyr, and "has been so audacious, as, "in imitation of the Apostle, to write a general "Epistle, for the instruction of those who have "behaved themselves more like true believers than "he, but does [therein] defend the Tenets of his "own vain Doctrine, and speaks impiously of the "Lord, his Apostles, and holy Church. Again, he writes thus concerning others, who amongst them have been honoured as Martyrs; "But that "we may speak of no more, let the Prophetess "answer us concerning Alexander, who terms "himself a Martyr, with whom she feasts, whom "many of them pay a reverence to. Whose rob- "beries, and his other audacious facts (for which "he has been punished) we need not speak of "since they may be seen in that place where the "publick [e] Registers are kept. Which therefore "of these two forgives the others sins? Does the "Prophet [pardon] the Martyrs robberies, or "does the Martyr [forgive] the Prophets ava- "rice? For when as the Lord has said, * Provide "neither gold, nor silver, neither two coats, these "persons, wholly on the contrary, have commit- "ted heinous sins in possessing themselves of things "that are forbidden. For we will evidence, that "those which they call Prophets, and Martyrs, "have extorted money not onely from the rich, "but also from the indigent, from Orphans, and "Widdows. And if they are confident [of their "innocency] herein, let them stay, and decide "the matter with us concerning these things, that "so, if they shall be convinced, for the future they "may leave their viciousness. For the fruits "[that is, the deeds] of a Prophet must be ap- "proved. For a tree is known by its fruit. That "therefore those who are desirous may know the "truth concerning Alexander, judgment was past "upon him at Ephesus by Æmilius Frontinus the "Proconsul [of Asia] not for the name [of "Christ,] but the robberies he had audaciously "committed, being at that time an [f] Apostate "from Christ. Then, after he had counterfeited "[a profession of] the name of the Lord, and "deceived the faithfull [brethren] there, he was "dismist; but his own Church, where he was "born, admitted him not, because he was a thief. "Those who are desirous to know all matters con- "cerning him, may have recourse to the publick "Register of Asia [where they will find them.] "And yet the * Prophet does pretend himself ig- "norant of this man, whom he has converst with "for many years. Having evidently shown what "this man is, we have also by him declared the im- "posture of the prophet. We are able to de- "monstrate the like in many other things. But "if they have any confidence in themselves, let "them undergoe the test. Again, in another place of the same work, he adds these words con- cerning those Prophets they boast of: "If they "deny that their Prophets have received gifts, let "them confess this, [to wit] if they be con- "vinced that they have taken gifts, they are not "Prophets: And then we will produce infinite "demonstrations hereof. 'Tis necessary that all "the fruits of a Prophet should be approved of: "tell me, does a Prophet "[g] colour [his hair?] does "a Prophet paint his eye- "brows with * Stibium? "does a Prophet make it his "business to deck and adorn "himself? does a Prophet "play at tables, and at dice? "does a Prophet put money "to usury? Let them con- "fess ingenuously whether these things are lawfull "or no? But I will demonstrate they are done "amongst them. The same Apollonius does relate in the same work, that at that time of his writing that book, it was [h] fourty years since Montanus undertook [to vent] his forged Prophesie. And

[a] Montanus instituted three Lents every year, and besides them, two weeks of abstinence, wherein nothing but dry meats were to be eaten. So Tertullian, in his book, de jejuniis, and Jerom, in his Epistle to Mercella. Apollonius objects here against Montanus, his instituting fasts by a Law; not that 'tis a fault to observe fasts; or as if 'twere not lawfull for some in the Church to proclaim fasts: for the Apostle St John appointed a three days fast at Ephesus, before he betook himself to the writing his Gospel. But Montanus had no power to proclaim a fast, being an Heretick, an excommunicated person, and no Presbyter. Apollonius therefore does deservedly blame him, because of his own head, not by Apostolick tradition, he instituted fasts. Vales.

[b] In the Maz. Med. Fuk. M. SS. and in Nicephorus, this woman is called Prisca: which is confirmed by Rufinus, Tertullian, and Firmilianus, Robert Stephens calls her Priscilla. Vales.

[c] The Montanists covered their avarice under the pretext of Religion, and specious term of Oblations, as Apollonius says a little before in this chapter. Vales.

[d] Christophorson thought the Cross was meant here: but doubtless Apollonius means bonds, which Themison could not endure for Christs sake. For that which he calls [the sign of confession] here, in the next words he terms [τὸ δεσμὸ] bonds. Vales.

[e] Ὁμοδ- δμ© is the term in the original. At Athens there was an house so called, behind the Temple of Minerva Polias, wherein the publick treasury was laid. So says Harpocration, on that word. In all the Temples there was such a place, as Varro asserts, B. 4. But here this term must mean the publick Registry, where the publick Records are kept. Vales.

COMMODUS.

* Mat. 10, 9, 10.

[f] Παραβάτης is the term, which Rufinus translates [an Apostate.] Vales.

* He means Montanus.

[g] The Greeks call that ἐλαφὴν τὴν θρίξ, which the Latines term, crines tingere seu rutilare, to die, or make the hair red. To doe which they made use of ashes which had been put into lye, as Varro says. See Hesychius in the word ξανθίζειν. Vales.

* That is, a kind of colouring stuff, which is used to make the eye-brows black.

[h] I perceive now why Eusebius places Apollonius after the Authour without a name, of whom he spake in the foregoing Chapter. For because that anonymous authour says he wrote his books fourteen years after the death of Montanus and Maximilla; and in regard Apollonius does here say Montanus broacht his new Prophecy 40 years before he wrote; therefore Eusebius supposed Apollonius to be a later writer than that anonymous Authour: In which, as I judge, he is much out. For Apollonius wrote his book whilest whileſt Montanus, and his mad Propheteſſes Priſcilla and Maximilla, were yet alive, which appears from theſe paſſages [Let the Propheteſs anſwer us concerning Alexander, who terms himſelf a Martyr, with whom ſhe feaſts, &c] and again [And yet the Prophet does pretend himſelf ignorant of this man whom he has converſt with for many years] Euſebius quotes in this Chapter. Apollonius therefore does not ſay, 40 years were paſt from the death of Montanus, when he wrote this book; but onely, that Montanus had ſet a broach his falſe Prophecy 40 years before he went about to write this book againſt him. Let us ſuppoſe therefore Montanus to be thirty years old when he ſet up to be a Prophet; he could not be above 70 years old when Apollonius wrote his book againſt him. Neither had he Maximilla and Priſcilla for his companions, as ſoon as ever he began his hereſie; but, as I judge, they were enſnared by him a long while after. Valeſ.

COMMODUS. again, he ſays, that Zoticus (whom the former Writer made mention of) reſolved to oppoſe Maximilla, who then feigned her ſelf to Propheſie at Pepuza, and attempted to reprove the Spirit ſhe was moved by; but that he was forbidden by thoſe that were her favourers. He makes mention alſo of one Thraſeas, who at that time was a Martyr. Moreover he ſays, as from tradition, that our Saviour commanded his Apoſtles, they ſhould not for the ſpace of twelve years depart from Jeruſalem: he quotes authorities alſo out of the Revelation of John: and relates that John, by the divine power raiſed a dead man to life at Epheſus. And he ſays many other things, whereby he ſufficiently and fully ſets forth the deceit of the foreſaid pernicious hereſie. Thus much Apollonius.

CHAP. XIX.

Serapion's [Opinion] concerning the Hereſie of the Cataphrygians.

BUt Serapion, (who, as report ſays, was about this time Biſhop of the Church of Antioch after Maximinus,) makes mention of the writings of Apollinaris againſt the foreſaid hereſie: he mentions him in that Epiſtle he wrote to [a] Caricus and Ponticus; wherein, refuting the ſame hereſie, he ſubjoyns theſe words; "And "that you may ſee, that the operation of that diſ-"ſembling party called the [b] New-propheſie is abo-"minated [c] by all the Brotherhood in the world, I "have ſent you alſo the Letters of Claudius Apolli-"naris of moſt bleſſed memory, who was Biſhop "of Hierapolis in Aſia. In that ſame Epiſtle of Serapion's, are contained the ſubſcriptions of ſeveral Biſhops. One of whom has ſubſcribed thus, I Aurelius Cyrenius Martyr wiſh You health: another, after this manner, Ælius Publius Julius Biſhop of [d] Develtum a Colony of Thracia: As God liveth who is in heaven, Sotas of bleſſed memory, who [e] was at Anchialus, would have caſt out Priſcilla's devil, but the Hypocrites would not ſuffer him. In the ſaid Letters are extant the ſubſcriptions of many other Biſhops, written with their own hands, who were of the ſame opinion with theſe. And of this ſort were the matters appertaining to the ſaid [Hereticks.]

[a] Euſebius (in his 6th B. cha. 12.) calls theſe men [Pontius and Caricus.] Ferom (in Catalogo) calls them Carinus, and Pontius. Valeſ.

[b] So the Ancients termed the propheſie of Montanus and his aſſociates; as may be ſeen from Tertullian, de Jejuniis; Ferom, in Catalogo; Firmilian, in his Epiſtle to Cyprian; and the old Authour quoted by our Euſebius, chap. 16. of this B. Valeſ.

[c] The reading of the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savill M. SS. agrees with our tranſlation, to wit, [by all the Brotherhood in the world.] The Kings M. S. and Robert Stephens read it thus [by all the Brotherhood in Chriſt, over the whole world.] Valeſ.

[d] Debeltum, or Develtum, a Colony in Thracia, is mentioned by Geographers, and in the old Coyns, which John Triſtan put forth. Anchialus alſo, hereafter named, is a City of Thracia, ſufficiently known. But why ſhould the ſubſcriptions of the Biſhops of Thracia be put to the Epiſtle of Serapion Biſhop of Antioch? If I may make a conjecture, I ſuppoſe the Biſhops of Thracia had written an Epiſtle to the Churches of Aſia and Phrygia againſt Montanus's Prophecy; wherein they gave their opinion thereof, after the ſame manner that thoſe of Vienna and Lyons did, as our Euſebius related before. That theſe ſubſcriptions were put to the bottom of ſome Epiſtle, 'tis apparent from Cyrenus's ſubſcription here mentioned. But 'tis no way likely that thoſe Biſhops did ſubſcribe Serapions Epiſtle; (1) becauſe Euſebius does not ſay ſo, but onely that the ſubſcriptions of many Biſhops were contained in Serapions Letter, as was alſo Apollinaris's Epiſtle to the ſaid Serapion. For Serapion did this with good adviſement, that he might confute the hereſie of Montanus by the authority of many Biſhops. (2) How could the Biſhops of Thracia ſubſcribe the letter of a Biſhop of Antioch? 'Tis moſt probable therefore, as I ſaid, that the Biſhops of Thracia had with a joynt conſent written to the Churches of Aſia and Phrygia. Valeſ.

COMMODUS.

[e] That is, Biſhop of Anchialus, a City of Thracia, as we ſaid before. This Sotas the Biſhop, hearing of this new Prophecy, ſailed out of Thracia into Phrygia, where having ſeen Priſcilla, not filled with the holy Spirit, but actuated by the devill, he undertook to caſt him out of her by Exorciſm. Not onely Sotas, but alſo many other Biſhops went at that time into Phrygia, to examine that new Prophecy, ſays the Anonymous authour, chapt. 16. of this B. Moreover, we may obſerve, that Sotas was dead, when Ælius Julius wrote this; which is ſhown by the word [μακαρίτου] a term which the Greeks uſe when they ſpeak of a dead perſon: had Sotas been alive, he would doubtleſs have confirmed this thing by his ſubſcription. The ſame term Serapion uſes, when he ſpeaks of Apollinaris, who alſo was then dead. Valeſ.

CHAP. XX.

What Irenæus wrote againſt the Schiſmaticks at Rome.

[a] Irenæus compoſed ſeveral Epiſtles againſt thoſe at Rome who adulterated the ſound law of the Church: He wrote one to Blaſtus concerning Schiſme; another to Florinus concerning [b] Monarchy, or, that God is not the maker of Evil. For Florinus ſeemed to be a maintainer of that opinion: upon whoſe account, (being afterwards lead into the errour of Valentinus,) Irenæus compiled that work of his, [entitled,] [c] concerning the number eight. In which piece he intimates himſelf to have lived in the firſt ſucceſſion after the Apoſtles: there alſo at the cloſe of that work, we found a moſt profitable [d] note of his, which we judged uſefull to be inſerted into this our Hiſtory; it is thus; "I adjure thee (who ſhall tranſcribe this book) by our "Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and by "his glorious coming to "judge the quick and dead, "that you compare what "you ſhall tranſcribe, and "correct it diligently ac-"cording to that copie "whence you ſhall tran-"ſcribe it; and that in like "manner you tranſcribe this "adjuration, and annex it to "[thy] copy. And let thus much have been profitably ſaid by him, and related by us, that we may always have [before our eyes] thoſe antient and truely holy men, as the beſt pattern of a moſt accurate care and diligence. Moreover, in that Epiſtle (we ſpake of) which Irenæus wrote to Florinus, he makes mention of his being converſant with Polycarp, ſaying; "Theſe opinions, "(O Florinus!) that I may ſpeak ſparingly, doe "not appertain to ſound doctrine; theſe opinions are diſſonant from the Church, and drive thoſe who

[a] Here we began the 20 chapter; following therein Rufinus, Muſculus, and Chriſtophorſon. The Kings, the Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. begin the chapter from theſe words [And of this ſort were the matters, &c.] which are the cloſe of the foregoing chapter. Valeſ.

[b] The antient Chriſtians did frequently uſe this term; as often, as they diſputed againſt the Gentiles, under which title they put forth many books, to ſhew that there was one God, the maker and King of all things, which term [to wit, Monarchy] they aſcribed to God the father; but [οἰκονομίαν, i. e. the diſpenſation, and adminiſtration] they aſſigned to the Son and holy Ghoſt; ſo Tertullian, (in his book againſt Praxeas,) and Tatianus, (adverſus Græcos.) There is a book of Juſtin the Martyrs, now extant, which has this title. Moreover, from this title of Irenæus's book we may conclude, that Florinus aſſerted two principles, and embraced the opinions of Cerdo and Marcion, affirming one to be the Authour of Good, the other of evil. Valeſ.

[d] Σημείωσιν is the term in the original. Thoſe notes which were ſet at the margin of M. SS. that the reader might underſtand ſomething remarkable occurred there, were properly ſo called. Therefore we tranſlate it [adnotationem, i. e. a note.] This note is now to be found in many Greek M. SS. expreſt onely by the two firſt letters, thus [ση.] which doe ſignifie [σημείωσαι, i. e. note.] This adjuration of Irenæus's did ſo well pleaſe Euſebius, that he put it at the beginning of his Chronicon. "who give their assent to them into the greatest "impiety; these Sentiments even the Hereticks, "who are without the Church, have not dared to "publish at any time; these opinions the Presby- "ters, who lived before our times, who also were "the disciples of the Apostles, did in no wise de- "liver unto thee. For I saw thee (when being "yet a child I was in the Lower Asia, with Poly- "carp,) behaving thy self very well in the Pa- "lace, and endeavouring to get thy self well "esteemed of by him. For I remember the things "then done, better than what has happened of late. "For what we learnt being children, increases "together with the mind it self, and is closely "united to it. In so much that I am able to tell "even the place where the Blessed Polycarp sate "and discourst; also his [c] goings out and comings "in; his manner of life; the shape of his body; "the discourses he made to the populace; the "familiar converse, which, he said, he had with "John, and with the rest who had seen the "Lord; and how he rehearsed their sayings, and "what they were, which he had heard from them "concerning the Lord; concerning his miracles, "and his doctrine, according as Polycarp re- "ceived them from those, who with their own "eyes beheld the Word of life, so he related "them, agreeing in all things with the Scriptures. "These things, by the mercy of God bestowed "upon me, I then heard diligently, and copied "them out, not in paper, but in my heart; and by "the grace of God I doe continually and sincerely "ruminate upon them. And I am able to protest "in the presence of God, that if that blessed "and Apostolick Presbyter should have heard any "such thing, he would presently have cried out, "and [f] stopped his ears, and according to his "usual custom would have said; Good God! For "what times hast thou reserved me, that I should "suffer such things! and he would have run out "of the place, where he was either sitting or "standing, should he have heard such words as "these. And this may be manifested from those "Epistles of his, which he wrote either to the "neighbouring Churches to confirm them, or to "some brethren to admonish and exhort them. "Thus far Irenæus.

CHAP. XXI.

How Apollonius suffered Martyrdom at Rome.

AT the same time of Commodus's Empire, our affairs were converted into a quiet and sedate posture; peace, by the divine grace, encompassing the Churches throughout the whole world. In which interim the saving Word [of God] allured * very many of all sorts of men to the religious worship of the universal God. So that now many of those at Rome, who were very eminent both for riches and descent, did, together with their whole households and families, betake themselves to [the attaining of] salvation. But this could not be born with by the envious devil, that hater of good, being by nature malicious. Therefore he [a] arms himself again, inventing various Stratagems against us. At the City Rome therefore, he brings before the judgement seat [b] Apollonius, a man who was at that time one of the faithfull, and very eminent for his Learning and Philosophy; having stirred up [c] one of * his ministers, who was fit for such a [wicked enterprize] to accuse this person. Now this wretch, having undertaken this accusation in an unseasonable time, (for, according to the [d] Imperial Edict, the informers against those that were [Christians] were to be put to death;) had his legs forthwith broken, and was put to death, Perennis the Judge having pronounc't this sentence against him: but the Martyr, most beloved by God, (after the Judge had [e] earnestly beseeched him by many entreaties, and requested him to render an account [of his Faith] [f] before the Senate,) having made a most [g] elegant defence before them all for the faith he profest, [h] was, as it were by a decree of the Senate, condemn'd to undergoe a capital punishment. For by an ancient [i] Law 'twas established amongst them, that those [Christians] who were once accused before the judgment-seat, should in no wise be dismist, unless they receded from their opinion. Moreover, he that is desirous to know Apollonius's speeches before the Judge, and the answers he made to the interrogatories of Perennis, the oration also which he spoke before the Senate in defence of our faith, may see them in our collection of the sufferings of the antient Martyrs.

COMMODUS.

[b] This Apollonius was not the same person with him, mentioned chap. 16. of this book. Ferom (in Catalogo) calls him a Roman Senatour. Eusebius does not say he was one of the Senate, in this place. But more of this hereafter. Vales.

[c] Ferom (in his book de Scriptor. Eccles.) Supposes the person here spoken of to be Apollonius's servant; and calls his name Severus. Vales.

* That is, the devil having stirred up one of his own instruments, or, ministers, &c.

[d] He means the Rescript of Marcus, mentioned chap. 13. B. 4. See that place, and the notes upon it. Rufinus thought the Edict of Trajan, (which Eusebius mentions B. 3. chap. 33,) or the Rescript of Adrian, (see chap. 9. B. 4.) to Minucius Fundanus, was here meant. Vales.

[e] The judges, who interrogated the Christians that were brought before them, were wont to perswade and entreat them to have a regard for their own safety, by embraciug the worship of the heathen Gods. There are infinite Examples hereof in Tertullian, Eusebius, &c. Vales.

[f] From this passage I am induced to think that Apollonius was of the Senatorian order, as Ferom has said. Who upon the information of some desperate fellow (whose name is unknown) was brought before Perennis, the Prefect of the prætorium, (i. e. the officer to whom the oversight of the Souldiers was committed) as being a Christian; being ask't by the Judge what order he was of, and making answer that he was of the Senatorian order, Perennis commanded him to give an account of his faith before the Senate. Which when Apollonius had with much eloquence done, by the sentence of the Senate he was put to death. Why may we not therefore believe Ferom, who (in his book de Ecclesiast. Scriptor. and in his Epistle to Magnus) has said in expres terms, that Apollonius was a Senatour? And although Eusebius does not expresly say so here; yet from this relation of his thus much may be collected. Besides, Ferom might have read the Acts of Apollonius's suffering, to which Eusebius does here refer us. In which Acts, tis probable, Apollonius was called a Roman Senatour, and was said to have been betrayed by his servant. These Acts were written at Rome in Greek, by men that were Grecians, after the same manner as the Acts of the Lugdunensian Martyrs were written in Greek. Vales.

[g] Ferom (in his book de Scriptor. Eccles.) misunderstanding this place of Eusebius, has accounted Apollonius, amongst the Ecclesiastick Writers. But Eusebius onely says, that Apollonius made a most elegant oration before the Judges in defence of the faith he profest, not that he wrote an Apology. Scaliger takes notice of this mistake of Ferom's in his Animadvers. Eusebian. p. 208. But he has there altered the reading of part of this place in Eusebius, thus [But the Martyr, most beloved of God, after he had beseech't the Judge by many intreaties, that he might have leave to give an account of his faith before the Senate.] Which emendation is contradicted by all our M. S. copies, and by reason it self. Vales.

[h] All Translatours have rendred this place without taking any notice of the particle [ὡς] in their Versions; supposing it to be useless. Which as I judge, is not true: first because the Senatours were not Judges, neither had they Jurisdiction. [2] Perennis, who was the Judge in this cause, had remitted Apollonius to the Senate, not that the Senate should give judgment upon him, but that Apollonius should give them an account of his religion: He honoured the Senate so far, that he would not condemn a Senatour, before the Senate had had cognizance of his crime. When therefore the Senate had heard Apollonius, their anſwer was, that the man ſhould be judged according to the Law. After this Apollonius was puniſhed with death, by the ſentence indeed of Perennis himſelf, but by the decree of the Senate, becauſe the Senate had heard him, and given their conſent that he ſhould be condemned. Valeſ.

[i] He means the Reſcript of Trajan, which Euſebius mentions B. 3. chap. 33, at the latter end. See the place and the note upon it. Valeſ.

What Biſhops flouriſht at that time.

MOreover, in the tenth year of Commodus's Reign, Eleutherus, having executed the Epiſcopal office [a] thirteen years, was ſucceeded by Victor. In the ſame year alſo, Julianus having compleated his tenth year, Demetrius undertook the Government of the Churches at Alexandria. At the ſame time likewiſe Serapion, (whom we ſpake of a little before,) flouriſht, being the eighth Biſhop from the Apoſtles of the Antiochian Church. At Cæſarea in Paleſtine preſided Theophilus; and in like manner Narciſſus (whom we made mention of before) at that time had the publick charge over the Church at Jeruſalem. At Corinth in Achaia, [b] Bacchyllus was then the Biſhop, and at the Church of Epheſus, Polycrates. Many others, 'tis likely, beſides theſe were eminent at that time; but we, at it was meet, have onely recounted their names, by whoſe writings the doctrine of the true faith has been derived down to us.

[a] In his Chronicon Euſebius aſſigns fifteen years to Eleutherus, and continues his Preſidency to the laſt year of Commodus. Between which two accounts of his there is a great diſagreement. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIII.

Concerning the Queſtion then moved about Eaſter.

AT the ſame time no ſmall controverſie being raiſed, becauſe the Churches of all [a] Aſia ſuppoſed, as from a more antient tradition, that the * fourteenth day of the Moon ought to be obſerved as the ſalutary feaſt of Eaſter, [to wit] the ſame day whereon the Jews were commanded to kill the Lamb, and that they ought always [b] on that day, (whatever day of the week it ſhould happen to be,) to put an end to their faſtings: when as [notwithſtanding] 'twas not the uſage of the [c] Churches over the reſt of the world to doe after this manner; which uſage, being received from Apoſtolick tradition, and ſtill prevalent, they obſerved, [to wit] that they ought not to [d] put an end to their faſtings on any other day, ſave that of the reſurrection of our Saviour: upon this account Synods and aſſemblies of Biſhops were convened. And all of them with one conſent did by their letters inform the [Brethren] every where of the Eccleſiaſtick decree, [to wit] that the Myſtery of our Lords reſurrection ſhould never be celebrated on any other day but Sunday, and that on that day onely we ſhould obſerve to conclude the Faſts before Eaſter. There is at this time extant the Epiſtle of thoſe who then were aſſembled in Paleſtine, over whom [e] Theophilus Biſhop of the Church in Cæſarea, and Narciſſus [Biſhop] of Jeruſalem, preſided. In like manner, another [Epiſtle] of thoſe [Aſſembled] at Rome concerning the ſame queſtion, having Victor the Biſhops name prefixt to it: alſo [another] of thoſe Biſhops in Pontus, over whom [f] Palmas, as being the moſt antient, preſided. Alſo [an Epiſtle] of the Churches in Gallia, which Irenæus had the overſight of. Moreover, of thoſe in Oſdroëna and the Cities there; and [g] a private Letter of Bacchyllus's Biſhop of the Corinthian Church; of many others alſo; all which having uttered one and the ſame opinion and ſentiment, propoſed the ſame judgment; and this we have mentioned, was their onely definitive determination.

[a] The reading of the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savill M.SS. is [the Churches of all Aſia,] as we have tranſlated it. Aſia maybe taken in a threefold ſenſe; ſometimes 'tis taken for the third part of the world; ſometimes for a Province, divided into nine Juriſdictions, which was governed by a Roman Proconſul; at other times 'tis more ſtrictly taken for that region which lies by the River Meander. In theſe words of Euſebius, 'tis, in my judgment, to be taken in the ſecond ſenſe, to wit, for a Province which a proconſul governed. Valeſ.

* That is, the fourteenth day after the appearance of the new Moon: for the religious part of the Jewiſh Calendar was concerned in theſe appearances of the new Moon, the reports whereof were made by the country people. See the whole manner hereof deſcribed particularly, by the Learned Doctor Cudworth, in his excellent diſcourſe concerning the true Notion of the Lords Supper, pag. 67. See alſo Mr Jo. Gregory of Oxford, in his diſcourſe concerning upper-rooms. p. 14, &c.

[b] The Learned Arch-Biſhop Uſher, in his diſſertation prefixt before Ignatius's Epiſtles, chap. 9. ſays, that the Aſiatics, who celebrated Eaſter, with the Jews, on the firſt day of unleavened bread, paſſed over that day with mourning and faſting; after which day was ended, they concluded their Lent-faſt. Which opinion Euſebius does here contradict, in that he affirms expreſly, that the Aſiatics did put an end to their faſtings on the 14th day of the firſt month, although it were not Sunday. Valeſ.

[c] Here Euſebius does plainly declare that the Aſiatics onely did at that time celebrate Eaſter with the Jews; but that all the other Churches obſerved that feſtival on another day. Wherefore I diſſent from Halloixius, Arch-Biſhop Uſher, and others, who ſuppoſe that the Syrians, Meſopotamians, and Cilicians, did then keep Eaſter at the ſame time with the Aſiatics. 'Tis evident that the Syrians and Meſopotamians, were then right in their ſentiments about this matter, which appears from their councills here mentioned by Euſebius. For Oſdroena is a part of Meſopotamia: But afterwards they fell to the Jewiſh obſervation of this Feſtival, and that before the Nicene Councill, as Athanaſius aſſerts. On the contrary, the Aſiatics forſaking their former errour, embraced the ſounder opinion in their obſervation of Eaſter; which they did before the Nicene-Councill, as appears from Conſtantines Epiſtle, which Euſebius relates B. 3. chap. 18, and 19. of Conſtantines life. Valeſ.

[d] It was queſtioned amongſt the Antients, at what hour the Faſt before Eaſter was to be concluded; ſome were of opinion, that it was to be continued to the dawning of Eaſter day, after the Cock-crowing, as may be ſeen in Epiphanius, and Clemens: others thought it was to be finiſhed on the Saturday-evening before Eaſter-day; So Cyrill, in Homil. Paſchal. Valeſ.

[e] The Biſhop of Cæſarea, (before the Nicene-Council, and a long-time after,) had the dignity and honour of a Metropolitan, and preſided in all the Councils of Paleſtine, as being Biſhop of the chief See. Nevertheleſs, the Biſhops of Jeruſalem had a reſpect ſhown them; theirs being the Apoſtolick Church, which firſt had a Biſhop. Therefore the Biſhops of that See were not under the Biſhops of Cæſarea, but were αὐτοκέφαλοι, i. e. were, as to their priviledges, independent of the See of Cæſarea. See the ſeventh Canon of the Nicene-Council. Valeſ.

[f] He was Biſhop of Amaſtris in Pontus, of whom Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth makes mention, in his Epiſtle to the Church of Amaſtris, which Epiſtle our Euſebius ſpeaks of B. 4. chap. 23. There was one, which bore the ſame name, (to wit, Palmas) of the conſular order, whom Adrian commanded to be killed; ſo ſays Spartianus. Moreover, Euſebius ſays, this Palmas preſided, as being the moſt antient Biſhop, not that he was a Metropolitan. For Heraclea not Amaſtris, was Metropolis of the Cities of Pontus. But in the Eccleſiaſtick Councils the precedency was different, according to the diverſity of times and places. The plaineſt and moſt reaſonable cauſe of precedency was, that the antienteſt Biſhop ſhould take place of the reſt. Afterwards the Biſhops of the Metropolitan Churches had that honour given them. Valeſ.

[g] Jerom (in his book de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt.) expounds this place ſo, as if Bacchylus had convened a Council in Achaia, apart by himſelf: for in this ſenſe he takes the term [ἰδίως] here uſed by Euſebius: But there may another ſenſe be given hereof, to wit, that Bacchylus wrote a private Epiſtle in his own name concerning Eaſter, not a Synodicall Letter, as the reſt did. Euſebius (Book 6. chap. 11.) calls a private Letter, ἰδίαν ὁπιστολήν. Valeſ.

That he was a Priest, 2, a Martyr; 3, a Dr, or Evangelist. Now as he was a Doctor of Christ, and a Martyr for him; so also must he be understood to be a Priest of Christ. 'Tis probable those first Christian Priests, in imitation of the Jewish High-priests, did wear a plate of Gold, as a badge of honour. Epiphanius (in Hæres. Nazaræor.) says, James the brother of our Lord, who was ordained the first Bishop of Jerusalem, wore such a plate of Gold on his forehead. The same is said of Mark the Evangelist, in a M. [b] This is Thraseas the Martyr, whom Apollonius mentions in his Book against the Cataphrygians; whose words our Eusebius quotes chap. 18. of this book; Rufinus says he suffered Martyrdom at Smyrna. Vales.

[c] Melito Bishop of Sardis makes mention of this Martyr, in his Book concerning Easter; in those words which our Eusebius quotes B. 4. chap. 26. This Sagaris was Bishop of Laodicea in Asia; in whose times the Question concerning Easter was raised at Laodicea. Vales.

[d] In the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. this mans name is thus written, [παπίριον, Papirius.] Tis a Roman name. Polycrates does not say where this Papirius was Bishop. But I find in Simeon Metaphrastes, (in the Life of Polycarp) that this Papirius was successour to Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna. Vales.

[e] Polycrates does here stile Melito, an Eunuch, that is, in our Saviours explication, one of those, who make themselves Eunuchs for the Kingdom of heavens sake; who are content to deny themselves, and to renounce the lawfull pleasures and comforts of the world, for the service of Religion. Jerom (de Scriptor. Ecclesiast.) attests that this Melito was by many accounted a Prophet. Vales.

[f] Rufinus thought that seven of Polycrates's Ancestours, or Relations, were Bishops of Ephesus. But Polycrates does not say they were all Bishops of Ephesus; we may suppose they were Bishops in several Cities of Asia. Vales.

[g] In the Kings, and Maz. M. SS. this place is plainly written thus [ὅταν ὁ λαὸς ἤνυε τὴν ζύμην, i. e. when the people removed the Leaven. So Rufinus read this place, as appears by his Version; viz. Qui omnes ita observarunt hunc diem ut convenirent cum illo quo fermentum Judæorum populus auferr; i. e. All which so observed this day, that it might agree with that wherein the people of the Jews removed their Leaven. I wonder why Robert Stephens read it [ὅταν ὁ λαὸς ἤρξω, when the people prepared, &c?] For on the 14th day of the first month, the people did not prepare, but cast away their Leaven. See Exod. 12. 18. Vales.

these words, speaking of all the Bishops who were present with him when he wrote, and were of the same opinion with him, he adjoyns thus much, saying, "I could make mention of the Bishops "who are present with me, whom you [h] requested "me to convene, and I "have called them together: "whose names should I an-"nex [to this Epistle,] "they would be very nu-"merous; all which persons "having visited me, (who "am a mean man) did by "their consent approve of "this Epistle; well knowing that I have not born "these hoary hairs in vain, but have alwaies lead "my life agreeable to the precepts of the Lord "Jesus. After this, Victor the Bishop of Rome, did immediately attempt to cut off from the common unity the Churches of all Asia, together with the adjoyning Churches, as having given their assent to heterodox opinions; and [i] by his letters he publickly declares, and pronounces all the brethren there to be wholly excommunicate: but this pleased not all the Bishops: therefore they perswade him to the contrary, [advising him] to entertain thoughts of Peace, of Unity and love of Christians among one another. Moreover their Epistles are now extant, wherein they have sharply reproved Victor. Among whom Irenæus, having written a Letter in [k] the name of those brethren in Gallia, whom he presided over, does indeed maintain, that the mystery of our Lords Resurrection ought to be celebrated onely on a Sunday; but does in many other words seasonably advise him not to cut off whole Churches of God for observing an antient custom derived down to them by tradition: to which words he adjoyns thus much; "For the controversie is "not onely concerning the "day; but also concerning [h] Hence 'tis apparent that Victor Bishop of Rome had written to Polycrates to convene the Bishops of Asia; and threatned to excommunicate him, unless he obeyed his determination about Easter. As to his menaces, Polycrates answers I am not at all terrified at what I am threatned with. Vales.

[i] Valesius (in his note at this place) is of opinion that Victor did not excommunicate the Churches of Asia; but onely endeavoured, and threatned, to doe it. The reasons he brings for this are these: (1) Eusebius says expressly [ἀποπέμψειν πειρᾶται, i. e. he endeavoured to cut off from the communion, &c.] (2) The Epistles written to Victor by Irenæus and other Bishops doe shew that the sentence of excommunication was not then pronounc't by Victor; for thus Eusebius writes concerning Irenæus's Letters [But does in many other words seasonably advise Victor not to cut off whole Churches, &c.] (3) Photius (in Biblioth. chap. 120.) writes that Irenæus wrote many letters to Victor, perswading him not to excommunicate any one for their dissent about the observation of Easter; therefore, before Irenæus wrote, Victor had excommunicated no body: now, it cannot be supposed that Victor did it after receipt of Irenæus's Letters; for then Eusebius would have made mention of it; but he intimates the contrary to all this, calling Irenæus [εἰρηνοποιὸν,] i. e. Peacemaker, because his Letters restored Peace to the Church. These are Valesius's reasons. On the contrary Socrates, (B. 5. chap. 22.) Halloixius in his life of Irenæus, pag. 668; and Dr Cave in the Life of Irenæus pag. 168; are of opinion, that this sentence of excommunication was actually pronounc't by Victor. Their main argument for this, is grounded on these words of Eusebius, which here follow [καὶ συνιλλύει γε διὰ γραμμάτων, ἀκοινωνήτους ἅπαντας τοὺς ἐκεῖσε ἀνακηρύττων ἀδελφούς] which we have thus rendred [And by his Letters he, i.e. Victor, publickly declares, and pronounces all the brethren there to be wholly excommunicate.] Which, whether it does not outweigh all that Valesius has said to the contrary, is left to the determination of the Learned Reader.

[k] This Epistle therefore of Irenæus's was a Synodical Epistle; because 'twas written in the name of the Churches of France, the chief City whereof then was Lyons. This Epistle is mentioned by Eusebius, in the foregoing chapter: for I judge it to be one and the same Epistle, because 'tis unlikely there should be two Synods convened in so short a time, to determine of one and the same matter. Vales.

COMMODUS. "the very [l] form of the [m] Fast: for some sup"pose they ought to [n] Fast [o] one day, others [p] two, [l] Irenæus says, that at "others more; [q] others computing forty [con-

there was a twofold dissention in the Church; the first concerning Easter day; the second about the form of the Fast; i. e. how many days were to be kept as a Fast; for so he explains himself in the following words. For all, as well those who celebrated Easter on the Sunday, as those who, with the Jews, kept that festival on the fourteenth day of the Moons appearance, did agree in this, to wit, that they Fasted before Easter. Which Fast, as well as the Feast of Easter, they had received from Apostolick Tradition: See Eusebius, book 2. chap. 17. And the notes there. Vales.

[m] Amongst the antient Christians there were three kinds of Fasts: the first was the Fast on Wednesdays, and Frydays, which ended at the 9th hour of the day, (i.e. at three a clock in the afternoon,) after the end of the Station, or Holy communion. The second sort was the Lent-fast, which ended about the evening. The third sort was the strictest of all, and lasted to the cock-crowing; which was therefore by the Greeks called [ὑφέσεις,] in Latine Superpositio. Epiphanius (in his Expositio fidei Catholic. at the end of his books, against Heresies) does plainly distinguish these 3 sorts of Fasts. So does Dionysius Alexandrinus, in his Epistle to Basilides. But now, it may be demanded, which of these 3 sorts of Fasts Irenæus does here speak of? 'Tis manifest, he means not the first sort; for he evidently speaks of a whole days Fast, some suppose, says he, they ought to fast one day, &c. Dionysius Alexandrinus, and Epiphanius, (in the places before mentioned) seem to be of opinion, that Irenæus means the 3d sort of Fast. Vales.

[n] These words of Irenæus are variously understood. Bellarmine thinks he speaks of Lent. Cardinal Perron supposes he speaks of the week that precedes Easter: which opinion is confirmed by Dionysius Alexandrinus, and Epiphanius, in the places before cited. Vales.

[o] Without doubt Irenæus means, the Friday of the Great week; (i. e. the week before Easter;) on which day was kept a publick Fast, says Tertullian, in his book De Orat. and in that De Jejunio. Vales.

[p] To wit, on the Preparation day, (which we call Good-Friday,) and on the Great Sabbath (i. e. the Saturday before Easter.) For on these two days all persons, except the sick, were wont to Fast, says Tertullian, in his book De Jejunio. Vales.

[q] The Kings, Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. doe read and point this place thus [οἱ δὲ τεσσεράκοντα ὥρας ἡμερινὰς τε καὶ νυκτερινὰς συμμετρῶσι τὴν ἡμέραν αὐτῶν.] And Musculus has faithfully translated it thus [alii quadraginta horas diurnas & nocturnas computantes, diem suum statuunt.] whom we follow in our Version of this place; having rendred it thus [others computing forty continued] hours of the day and night make that [space] their day [of Fasting.] This reading is doubtless the truest: For Irenæus having said that some Fast one day, others two, others more; what need is there of his adding this [others Fast fourty days] when as in those words of his [others Fast more days] fourty days are comprehended? Besides, if the stop be put at [τεσσεράκοντα. fourty.] (as 'tis in the Savil. M. S. and in Rufinus and Christophorsons translations) to what shall the following words [ὥρας ἡμερινὰς τε, &c.] be referred? If they be referred to those that Fast fourty days, (as 'tis certain they must) then 'twill necessarily follow, that those who Fast fourty days during that time doe eat nothing at all, seeing that they account their Fast must be continued all the hours of the night, as well as of the day. Having made out the true reading of this place, we come to explain the meaning of it. Irenæus therefore says, that some Fasted fourty continued hours of the day and night. Some think this Fast of fourty hours was kept by them in memory of that space of time which was between the Death of Christ and his Resurrection: which space of time contained about fourty hours; to wit, from the 6th hour of the preparation day (that is, between 12 and 3 a clock on Good-Friday) to the dawning of Easter-day: But I suppose 'twas kept in honour and memory of Christs fourty days Fast in the wilderness. Three things may be collected from these words of Irenæus. (1) That the Fast before Easter was usually observed in the Church from the very times of the Apostles. (2) This Fast was celebrated in honour and memory of Christ's Fast: (3) That the space of time, allotted for this Fast, was various and different. But we ought always to remember that Irenæus does here speak of the Fast of Superposition, (See note (m) in this chap.) which the Christians usually observed throughout the Great-week; (i. e. the Passion-week:) the Fast in which week being once admitted, the Fast of Lent must also be admitted: for the week before Easter is part of Lent. Sometimes indeed we see the Fast of this week is distinguisht from the Lent Fast; (as in Epiphanius's Expositio fidei, &c.) but 'tis not so distinguisht, as if it did not really belong to Lent; but 'tis distinguished from it, as the part is from the whole. The reason of this distinction is twofold; (1) it was kept with a more strict Fast, to wit, the Fast of Superposition, as we shewed before, (note m.) (2) this week does properly belong to Easter. For the Feriæ (or Days) of it have their denomination from the following Sunday, as shall hereafter be manifested. Hence 'tis called the Great-week; the reasons of which term Chrysostom does give in his 30 Homily on Genesis. This Week began from the second Feria, (i. e. Monday,) says Cyrill in Homil. Paschal. and Epiphanius in Arianis. Vales.

Indeed, Irenæus, being truly answerable to his own name, was after this manner a Peace-maker, and advised and asserted these things upon the account of the Peace of the Churches: The same person Wrote not onely to Victor, but sent Letters also, agreeable hereunto, to several other Governours of Churches, concerning the said controversie which was then raised.

[2] That is, Anicetus had so great a respect for the venerable Polycarp, that he permitted him, in his own presence to consecrate the Sacrament in his own Church. Vales.

[a] BUt, besides the fore-mentioned works and Epistles of Irenæus's, there is extant a most concise and most necessary book of his against the Gentiles, entituled concerning Knowledge. And another, (which he dedicated to a brother, by name Marcianus,) [containing] a [b] Demonstration of the Apostolick Preaching. And a Book of Various [c] Tracts, wherein he makes mention of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and that called The wisdom of Solomon, and quotes some sentences out of them: And thus many are the [writings] of Irenæus, which came to our knowledge. But Commodus having ended his Government after he had reigned thirteen years, Severus obtained the Empire, Pertinax having not Governed full out six months after the death of Commodus.

[a] The chapters of this fifth book, were, even in our M.S. Copies, very much disordered; but we have put them into due order, from the authority of Rufinus; with whom agrees the Maz. and Fuk. M.SS. For those copies begin the chapter at these words, with this Title [How many [Monuments] &c.] but they call it chap. 28. when as 'tis truly the 26; as appears from the Index of the chapters prefixt before the Book. The cause of the mistake was, that the Titles of the former chapters were set down twice in the foresaid Copies, through the negligence of the Transcribers. Vales.

[b] The reading in the original is, εἰς ἀπόδειξιν. Valesius thinks it should be [εἰς ἀπόδειξιν, a Demonstration.]

[c] Rufinus translates it [dialogos, dialogues] Ferom renders it [Tractatus, Tracts.] It may be taken to signifie Sermons or Discourses to the people: for in that sense our Eusebius takes the word διαλέξεως, in his 6 B. chap. 19. and in the 35 chap. of that book he calls Origens homilies [διαλέξεις.] Vales.

CHAP. XXVII.

How many also of [the works of others] who then flourished, [are come to our knowledge.]

SEVERUS.

INdeed, very many Monuments of the virtuous and laudable diligence of those antient and Ecclesiastick men which then [flourisht] are to this day preserved amongst many: But [the works] of those, whom we our selves could [a] discern to be such, are, Heraclitus's [Comments] upon the Apostle, and the [Book] of [b] Maximus concerning that question so much talk't of amongst Hereticks, whence evill proceeds: and concerning this that matter is made. Also Candidus's piece, on the six days work; and that of Apion upon the same Subject. In like manner, Sextus's book Concerning the Resurrection; and another piece of Arabianus's; and of very many more; whose times wherein they lived, because we want assistances from the proof thereof, we can neither commit to writing, nor yet [c] declare any memorable passages [of their's, in this our History.] There are also come to our hands the books of many others, whose very names we are unable to recite: all which were indeed Orthodox and Ecclesiastick [persons] as the interpretations of the Sacred Scripture [produced] by every one of them doth demonstrate; but yet they are unknown to us, because what they have written has not their name prefixt to it.

[a] Διαγνῶναι (which is the term here) does properly signifie, internoscere, ac distinguere, i. e. to discern, or distinguish: The import of Eusebius's words is, that those Writers which by some certain mark he was able to distinguish from heretical authours, were Heraclitus, Maximus, &c. Rufinus and Ferom, instead of Heraclitus, read Heraclius. Our Historian does here relate, first the Ecclesiastick Writers of that time, whose names he knew: afterwards he mentions those, whose books were still extant; but their names were unknown. Vales.

[b] The Title of Maximus's Book was, περὶ τῆς ὕλης, concerning matter: it was composed by way of Dialogue. Eusebius quotes a most excellent piece of it in his last chap. of his 7 B. Preparat. Evang. where he gives the Authour this Elogue: Μαξίμῳ δὲ τῆς χειρὸς διαλεκτικῆς ἀνδρὶ οὐδαμῶς ἀφανεῖ, καὶ λόγου οἰκείου συγγεγραφέναι ὁ περὶ τῆς ὕλης· i.e. Maximus, a person in no wise obscure for his Christian life and conversation, Wrote a seasonable piece entitled, concerning matter. Vales.

[c] Eusebius does usually quote some passages out of those Authours works which he mentions: So he did, as we see, out of Irenæus, Clemens, Hegesippus, Papias, and others; whenever he knew the time of the Authours Writing. But in these Writers, whom he mentions in this chapter, Eusebius says he could not perform this, because he could not certainly know the times they lived in, but was in want of arguments and proofs thereof. Vales.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Concerning those, who from the beginning were defenders of Artemon's Heresie; what manner of persons they were as to their moralls, and how that they were so audacious as to corrupt the Sacred Scriptures.

IN an Elaborate piece of one of those Authours, composed against the Heresie of Artemon, (which Heresie Paulus Samosatensis has again attempted to revive in our age,) there is extant a certain Relation very accommodate to the History we now have in hand. For the [a] Book now cited, evincing that the foresaid Heresie, which asserts our Saviour to be a meer man, was an innovation of a late date; (because the indroducers of it had boasted it was very ancient,) after many [arguments] brought to confute their blasphemous lie, has this Relation word for word; "For they "affirm that all the Ancients and the very Apostles "received and taught the same things which they

[a] Nicephorus (B. 4. chap. 21.) says, the name of this book (the Authour whereof is unknown) was The Little Labyrinth: Photius (in Biblioth. chap. 48.) relates that Caius was the Authour of this book; and makes it not the same book with the Little Labyrinth: But Theodoret (B. 2. Heret. Fabul.) confirms Nicephorus's opinion, and mentions this very story of Theodotus the Tanner, and Natalis the Bishop, attesting he had taken it out of the book called The Little Labyrinth. Peradventure this "ſaying of theirs might ſeem probable, did not "in the firſt place the Sacred Scriptures con-"tradict them, and then the writings of ſome bre-"thren antienter than the times of Victor, which "books they wrote in defence of the truth, againſt "the Gentiles, and againſt the Hereſies of their "own times. I mean the [writings of] Juſtin, "Miltiades, Tatianus, and Clemens, and of "many others: in all which books the Divinity of "Chriſt is maintained. For who is he that is "ignorant of the books of Irenæus, Melito, and "the reſt, which declare Chriſt to be God and "man? The [b] Pſalms alſo "and Hymns of the brethren, "written at the beginning "by the faithfull, doe ſet "forth the praiſes of Chriſt "the Word of God, and "attribute Divinity to him "Seeing therefore this Eccle-"ſiaſtical opinion has been manifeſtly declared for "ſo many years ſince, how can it be that the [An-"tients] ſhould have preacht that doctrine, "which theſe men aſſert, untill the times of "Victor? How can they chooſe but be aſhamed "of framing ſuch lies of Victor; when as they "know for certain that Victor excommunicated "Theodotus the Tanner, the Founder and Father "of this Apoſtacy which denies God, who firſt "aſſerted Chriſt to be a meer man? For if Victor "were (as they ſay) of the ſame opinion with "that, which their blaſphemie does maintain, why "did he proſcribe Theodotus the Inventour of this "Hereſie? And ſuch was the face of affairs in "the times of Victor: to whom, having preſided "in his publick charge ten years, Zephyrinus was "made ſucceſſour about the ninth year of Severus's "Empire. [Further,] the Perſon that compiled "the foreſaid book concerning the Authour of the "now-mentioned Hereſie, relates another thing "which was done in the times of Zephyrinus, in "theſe very words; I will therefore advertize ma-"ny of the brethren of a thing done in our Age; "which, had it happened in Sodom, would, I ſup-"poſe, have put thoſe inhabitants in mind of [Re-"pentance.] "There was one "[c] Natalis, a confeſſour, "who lived not a long time "a goe, but even in our "times; this man had been "ſeduced by Aſclepiodotus, "and another Theodotus, a "Banker; both which Per-"ſons were diſciples of Theo-"dotus the Tanner, who before had been excom-"municated, as I ſaid, by Victor then Biſhop, for "this doctrine or rather madneſs: Natalis was "perſwaded by them to be [d] Elected a Biſhop of "this Hereſie, upon the conſideration of a Salary, "whereby he was to receive of them monthly an "hundred and fifty pence. Being therefore be-"come one of their aſſociates, he was by viſions "[in his ſleep] frequently admoniſhed by the "Lord: For our compaſſionate God and Lord "Jeſus Chriſt was unwilling that he, [who had "been] a witneſs of his own ſufferings, ſhould "periſh whileſt he was under excommunication. "But after he was regardleſs of the viſions [in "his ſleep,] being beguiled with the bait of pri-"macy among thoſe [of that Sect,] and of "filthy lucre, (which is the deſtruction of many "men,) at laſt he was ſcourged by the holy An-"gels, and ſorely beaten all night long. [b] Hence it appears, that 'twas an antient cuſtom in the Church to compoſe Pſalms and Hymns in honour of Chriſt. Pliny (in his Epiſtle to Trajan) mentions this uſage amongſt the Chriſtians; as we have already obſerved, at B. 2. chap. 17.

[c] Perhaps this perſon was that Cæcilius Natalis, who by a diſpute of Octavius Januarius's before Minucius Fælix at Rome was converted to the Chriſtian Faith; as Minucius Fælix relates, in his dialogue. Indeed, the name, the time, and the profeſſion of this Perſon doe all agree to make this probable. Valeſ.

[d] The Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savill M.SS. read [χληρω-θῆναι, i. e. to be elected.] The Kings M. S. and Rob. Stephens read [χληθῆναι, i. e. to be called.] Valeſ.

[f] Theſe are Logical terms: συνημμένον is properly ſuch a propoſition, as this [if it be day, there is light.] διεζευγμένον is ſuch an one as this [either it is day, or it is night.] See Diogen. Laert. in Zenone. Valeſ.

[g] He ſpeaks of the laſt advent of our Saviour; which the Antient fathers uſually ſpeak of not as future, but preſent. Valeſ.

[h] Galen wrote books concerning the forms of Syllogiſms, and concerning the whole ſyſteme of Philoſophy, as appears from the catalogue of his works. From this place 'tis evident that Galen is a very antient Authour, which may be collected not onely from the Teſtimony of this Writer, but from many others, who have made him contemporary with Ariſtotle, Theophraſtus, and Plato. See Alexander Aphrodiſ. B. 8. Topic. at the beginning. Valeſ.

[i] Some call him Aſclepiades; but Nicephorus and Ruffinus term him Aſclepiadotus. A little after this inſtead of [Apollonius] we read [Apollonides] as did Ruffinus, and Nicephorus. Valeſ.

How much of audaciousness there is "in this wicked fact, 'tis probable they themselves "are not ignorant: for either they doe not believe "the divine Scriptures to have "been dictated by the holy "Spirit, and then they are "Infidels: or else they ac-"count themselves wiser then "the holy Ghost; and what "are they then but mad-"men? For they cannot deny this audacious fact "to have been done by their own selves, because "[the Copies] have been written out by their "own hands: [l] Neither did they receive such "Copies as these from those who were their in-"structours; nor yet can they shew the Copies "out of which they transcribed these things. But "some of them have not indeed vouchsafed to "adulterate the Scriptures, but having wholly "rejected both the Law, and the Prophets, [m] by a "Lawless and Atheistical doctrine under a pretext "of Grace, they are fallen into the deepest pit of "destruction. And let thus much be after this manner related, concerning these things.

SEVERUS.

[l] The following words [Neither did they receive such Copies as these from those who were their instructours; nor yet can they shew the Copies out of which they transcribed these things] are wanting in the Kings M. [k] St Henry Savill in the margin of his M. S. had made it [ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, by him.] Our other M. [m] Ἔνεκα, or διὰ, i. e. by, or, by reason of, is here to be understood. These Hereticks, under a pretence of the Grace given by the Gospel, rejected both the Law, and the Prophets: upon which account he calls their doctrine Lawless and Atheistical. Vales.

THE SIXTH BOOK OF THE Ecclesiastical History OF EUSEBIUS PAMPHILUS.

CHAP. I.

Concerning the Persecution under Severus.

MOreover, when Severus stirr'd up Persecution against the Churches in every place throughout all the Churches; noble Martyrdoms were perform'd by the Champions of Religion; but [the number of the Martyrs] at Alexandria far exceeded the rest, the [a] choicest of the Champions having been conveyed thither out of all Egypt, and Thebaïs, as to the noblest stadium of God; who in reward of their most patient suffering divers sorts of Torments, and several ways of death, were encircled with crowns from God: amongst whom Leonides, said to be the father of [b] Origen, was beheaded, and left his son very young. And here 'twill not be unseasonable briefly to relate what zeal and affection he bore to the [c] Gospel from this time of his childhood, and for this reason especially, because his fame is much celebrated by all men.

[a] ἀειστίνην, lectissimi, i. e. the choicest, 'tis the neareſt signification of the word, but does not fully explain it, for the word imports something more. See Viger. Idiot. pag. 195.

[b] 'Tis a critical dispute whether the Greek word be ὠριγένης, or ὠριγένης with an Aspirate, or a Tenuis: some say 'tis ὠριγένης because 'tis derived from ὠρὴ maturè and γενηθεὶς natus, i. e. born in a fit season: and for this reason the Med. Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. always write it with an Aspirate. Vales.

[c] Θεῖος λόγος Eusebius always uses both for the Gospel, and the Christian Religion, as in Chap. 3, and 5. of this Book, and this Rufinus renders divinæ legis studia: Christoph. Sacrarum literarum studium; and Musculus translates it divinam doctrinam. Vales.

CHAP. II.

Concerning Origens virtuous course of life from a Child.

NOw should any one undertake accurately and at his leisure to commit to writing this man's life, he must say much, and a strict collection of all passages concerning him, would require even a particular Subject; but our aim at present is to abbreviate most things, and in short, and as well as we can we will give an account of some few passages concerning him; relating what things have been manifested by some Epistles, or by the discourse of those his Scholars, who were alive till our times. The passages concerning Origen (as one would say) even from his Cradle seem to me worth remembrance. Severus therefore being in the tenth year of his Reign, and Latus being Governour of Alexandria and the rest of Ægypt; Demetrius also having lately taken upon him the Episcopal Office over the Churches there, after Julianus; when the flame of Persecution now raged grievously, and many thousands were Crown'd with Martyrdom, such a desire of Martyrdom possess'd the soul of Origen being yet very young, that he would expose himself to dangers, and was very ready, and willing to rush forward, and leap into the combate: so that now he was not far from death, had not the Divine and Celestial providence, for the good of many, hindred and restrained his willingness to die, by SEVERUS. his mothers meanes. Firſt therefore ſhe intreated him like a Suppliant, and beſeech't him to take pitty of her motherly love: but when ſhe ſaw him more intent upon his purpoſe, and when he underſtood his father was apprehended and impriſon'd, he was wholly poſſeſs'd with a deſire of Martyrdom: wherefore ſhe hid all his cloathes, and by this meanes neceſſitated him to abide at home: but he, ſeeing he had no way left, (the alacrity of his mind ſurmounting the ripeneſs of his years,) could not be at reſt, but compos'd a moſt perſwaſive Epiſtle concerning Martyrdom, and ſends it to his father, in which he thus exhorts him word for word, ſaying, [Father,] take heed: let not your care for us make you change your reſolution. Let this be noted as the firſt token of Origen's acuteneſs of wit from his childhood, and of his moſt ſincere zeal for Religion. For he had already got no ſmall ſtock of knowledge in the doctrine of the faith, continuing whilſt he was yet a child, to exerciſe himſelf in ſearching the holy Scriptures; about which he was not a little laborious; his father having taken great care, both in inſtructing him in the Liberal [a] Sciences, and alſo in theſe not ſlightly: wherefore he always perſwaded him to exerciſe himſelf in the ſtudy of holy things, rather than in the Learning of the Greeks, enjoyning it him as a daily task to learn ſomething by heart out of Scripture and repeat it: nor was the child unwilling, or ſlack in the performance, but moſt cheerfully laboured in theſe things, ſo that the ſimple, and common readings of the ſacred Scriptures could not ſatisfie him, but he would ſearch after ſomething more, and even from that time buſily enquired into the more profound meanings thereof: Inſomuch that he troubled his father by asking him, what was the true meaning of ſuch a ſentence of Scripture inſpir'd by God. He ſeemingly before his face reprov'd him, admoniſhing him not to ſearch into any thing above the capacity of his years, nor [to enquire] any further then the plain meaning [of Scripture.] But he privately with himſelf rejoyc'd exceedingly, and gave the greateſt thanks to God the Authour of all good, that he vouchſaf'd to make him the father of ſuch a child: and 'tis reported, he has often ſtood by the child as he ſlept, and laying his breaſt bare, would kiſs it with reverence, as if the ſacred Spirit of God had been inſhrin'd in it, and accounted himſelf bleſſed for his happy off-ſpring. Theſe, and ſuch like, they record, were the paſſages concerning Origen in his childhood: But when his father was now crowned with Martyrdom, he is left deſolate (together with his mother and younger brothers, ſix in number,) being no more then ſeventeen years of age: Moreover his father's eſtate having been confiſcate, he was brought into extream want of neceſſary ſubſiſtance, together with his relations, but God thought him worthy of his providence. And he obtains entertainment and reſt from a woman who was very rich in reſpect of her eſtate, and very eminent otherways. Moreover; (who carefully miniſtred to a very famous man, one of that Heretical Sect then at Alexandria, but by birth an Antiochian.) Him the foreſaid woman having adopted for her ſon, kept him with her and ſhew'd kindneſs to him in a moſt eſpecial manner. But Origen, though forc'd to converſe with the ſaid [Heretick] yet from that time ſhew'd powerfull proofs of his ſound Opinion concerning the Faith. For when great multitudes of people, not onely Hereticks, but alſo them of our Religion, flock'd to Paul (for this was the mans name) becauſe he ſeem'd to be a perſon of great eloquence; [Origen] could never be induced to aſſiſt him in prayer: always from a child obſerving the Cannon of the Church, and abominating the doctrines of Hereſies, (as he himſelf in expreſs words ſomewhere ſays:) and having been educated in the Greek learning by his father at firſt, after his death he devoted himſelf wholly and more earneſtly to the ſtudy of the Liberal Sciences; ſo that he was furniſhed with an [b] indifferent skill in the Art of Grammar; and having profeſt this Art ſoon after his father's death, he got plenty of neceſſaries, conſidering the age he was then of.

SEVERUS.

[a] Τῶν ἐγκυκλίων παιδείας, are the words in the Original: the Greeks, call ἐγκύκλια μαθήματα, the Liberal Arts which children learn'd; but Philoſophy, by the teſtimonies of ſeveral Authours is not included in that phraſe, as Diogenes Laertius, Clemens Alexan. and Euſebius himſelf in chap. 18. B. 6. do aſſert; hence is that Ariſton Ceus, a noble Philoſopher, ſays, they who place all their ſtudie, in ἐγκυκλίοις παιδεύμασι, are like Penelopes Woers, who when they were repuls'd by the Miſtreſs, courted the Maid. Orators alſo exclude Rhetorick out of this number; but ſome include both, who miſtake; for the word ἐγκύκλιον ſignifies aliquid in triviis poſitum, vulgare, i.e. what is trivial and vulgar; now Philoſophy and Rhetorick are more noble Sciences: hence Demoſthenes uſes ἐγκύκλιοι λειτουργίαι for mean and baſe Offices. Valeſ.

CHAP. III.

How Origen being very young Preach't the word of Chriſt.

[a] WHileſt he yet applied himſelf to his School, (as he in his Writings recordeth,) no one reſiding at Alexandria [b] to teach the Principles of Chriſtianity, but all being driven away by the threatning perſecution: ſome of the Heathens reſorted to him, to hear the word of God. Of which number he notes Plutarchus to have been the firſt; who when he [c] had lived a virtuous ſecular life, was crown'd with divine Martyrdom. The ſecond was Heraclas Plutarchus's brother, who having under him ſhew'd many inſtances of a Philoſophical and ſevere courſe of life, was honour'd with the Biſhoprick of Alexandria after Demetrius. He was now in the eighteenth year of his age when he was maſter of the Catechetical School; in which he made great proficiency in the perſecutions during the time of Aquila's Prefecture over Alexandria. At which time he purchas'd to himſelf a famous name amongſt all them who were well affected towards the Faith, for the ſingular friendſhip and alacrity which he ſhew'd to all the holy Martyrs known, and unknown. For he convers'd not onely with ſuch as were in bonds, nor with them who liv'd a pious ſecular life being a man. Valeſ.

[a] Some diſpute there is concerning the beginning of this chapter: Valeſius (whom we follow) follows the diviſion of Rufinus, but Chriſtophorſon begins it at theſe words [when Origen was 17 years old,] the Kings M. S. ſomething lower then Valeſius, [when he was 18 years old.] Fuk. M. S. at theſe words, [his father's eſtate being confiſcate.]

[b] This word κατηχέω ſignifies originally, inſono, to ſound: this prepoſition [κατ] makes it, being a verb Neuter, to have an Active ſignification, and he is properly ſaid κατηχεῖν who tells us any thing which he would teach us by way of inſtruction: hence it ſignifies to teach the rudiments, or firſt grounds of an Art, but peculiarly to teach the principles of Chriſtian Religion which we call Catechiſing in Engliſh, fitly made out of the Greek. Some ſay Heathen Authours knew not this uſe of this word, but they miſtake, for Lucian uſes it in this ſence, to teach the Rudiments of any Art. Stephan. Lexicon.

[c] Μετὰ τὸ βιῶναι, i.e. after he had lead a pious ſecular life: this word βιῶν is by Chriſtians uſed to ſignifie ſecularem, vitam agere. For βίος is ſeculum, as Chryſoſtom uſes it in his 23d Homily on the Epiſtle to the Romans, where he calls βιωτικὰς them whom we call Laicks, to diſtinguiſh them from the Clergy, in theſe words; δείκνυς ὅτι ταῦτα διατάττεται καὶ ἱερεῦσι καὶ μοναχοῖς, ἐχὶ πᾶσι βιωτικοῖς μόνον. In this ſence muſt the word here be underſtood; one of Origen's diſciples a Laick, the other was a Clergyman.

SEVERUS. h'd been examined untill their last sentence, but with those blessed Martyrs also who, after that was pronounc't, were led to Execution; making use of great boldness he went to meet dangers: so that the furious multitude of the Heathens standing round, were frequently not far from stoning of him, when he boldly came forth, and with great freeness of speech communed with the Martyrs, and kissed them, had not he once miraculously escap'd, having the Right-hand of God for his assistance. The same divine and heavenly Grace at other times again and again (so that tis impossible to say how often,) preserv'd him from them who then lay'd wait for him, because of his exceeding cheerfulness and confidence in Preaching the doctrine of Christ: Indeed, so great was the hostility of the Infidells against him, (because such multitudes were instructed by him in the things which appertain to the holy faith,) that having made a [d] concourse, they set Souldiers to watch about the house in which he abode. And the Persecution against him waxed so hot daily, that all the whole City of Alexandria could no longer secure him; he removes indeed from house to house, but is driven from all places, because of the multitude which through him were made Proselytes to the Divine Doctrine. For his common actions contain'd the most admirable Rules of the truest Philosophy: indeed, (as the common saying is) such as his doctrine was, such was his manner of life, and such as his manner of life was, such he demonstrated his doctrine to be: by this means especially, together with the Divine power assisting him, he induced many to a zealous imitation of him. But when he saw many Scholars now flocking to him, (the exercise of Catechising being committed solely to him by Demetrius, who was Bishop of the Church,) supposing the teaching of Grammar disagreeable to his studies in divine Learning, he forthwith breaks off his Grammar School, as unprofitable and contrary to the Sacred learning. Then entring into a prudent consideration with himself, how he might not stand in need of assistance from others, he sold all the Volumes he had of [e] Antient Heathen Writers, which were most elaborately compil'd, and was content with four * oboli a day that were brought him by the buyer. For many years he persevered in this Philosophical course of life, depriving himself of all [f] matter [which might nourish] youthfull lusts; both undergoing no small labour of severe exercise in the daytime, and also assigning to himself the greater part of the night for his study in the holy Scriptures, patiently persevering in the most Philosophical life imaginable. Sometimes he inur'd himself to the exercises of fasting; at other times to houres measur'd out for his repose; which he would by no means enjoy upon a bed, but made it his business to take it on the bare ground, for he thought those Evangelical Words of our Saviour ought most especially to be observ'd, which exhort us not to [g] have two coats nor to wear shoes, nor to be sollicitous about the cares of the time to come. Moreover, with a courage far greater then his age, he patiently endur'd both cold and nakedness, and came to that height and extremity of want, that he made those of his acquaintance admire exceedingly. And he caus'd grief in many, who entreated him that they might communicate of their estates to him, because they saw him bring such labours on himself for the Gospel's sake, but he remitted nothing of his patience. 'Tis reported he walk'd upon the ground barefoot many years, in no wise wearing any shoes. And also for many years he abstained from the use of wine, and from all other things, except necessary sustenance, so that now he fell into a great danger of spoiling and turning his [h] stomach. He deservedly excited most of his Scholars to imitate him, shewing them, who look'd upon him, such examples of a Philosophical life; Insomuch that now, not onely the [i] vulgar unbelieving Heathens, but also they who were learned Philosophers, were [k] through him brought to submit themselves to his doctrine. And it came to pass that they who receiv'd by him in the bottom of their hearts sincerely the faith of the Gospel, were famous in the time of the then Persecution: so that some of them after apprehension, finished their lives by Martyrdom.

SEVERUS.

[d] Συσεφὰς ποιησαμένους, i. e. having made a concourse: συσεφὴ signifies an Assembly or Tumultuous crowd met together to Plot mischief or raise Sedition. Rufinus and Christophorson will have these words to be referr'd to στρατώτας, the Souldiers, which is improper and improbable; we must without doubt understand ἀπίστους, the Infidells, as best agreeing with the propriety of the Greek, and sence of the place: but Nicephorus, worst of all, explains the place thus, as if Origens disciples, fearing the outrages of the tumultuous populace, should get a guard of Soldiers for their own safety. Vales.

[e] Λόγων ἀρχαίων συγγράμματα, Rufinus translates, his Library of Heathen Writers; better then Christophorson, who takes this phrase of Eusebius's to signifie onely the books of old Oratours: as if the word λόγοι were never us'd for Grammar and Philosophy, but for Orations onely; or as if Origen parted with his old Oratours onely, and not with his Grammarians, and Philosophick books also. Musculus says they were notes upon Authours gather'd by Origen and compos'd into Volumes; but Rufinus's Version is most natural. Vales.

* Or, five pence.

[f] This word ὕλη primarily signifies any matter of which a thing is made; but amongst Divines it peculiarly signifies the filth and dregs of this world, out of which proceed unlawfull lusts, desires, and contempt of God.

[g] The word ἔχειν, to have, is left out in the Greek; but must necessarily be added.

[h] Ὁρμῆς here signifies the stomach; and Ῥόμβου & ἀναστροφὴ, in Galen and Dioscorides, is us'd as here, for the spoyling, or turning of the stomach, to wit, when it loaths any thing; in Latine 'tis termed subversio stomachi. Vales.

[i] Οἱ πολλοὶ, the vulgar; πολλοὶ ἄνθρωποι, homines ex trivio.

[k] The Med. M.S. leaves out [διὰ αὐτοῦ,] i.e. by his meanes; and reads onely τῇ αὐτοῦ διδασκαλίᾳ, by his doctrine; which is the better reading: for the place seems to be corrupted, this [διὰ αὐτοῦ] creeping out of the Margin into the Text; or out of the line following into this place. The Kings, and the Maz. M. SS. alter nothing here, but the Fuk. M. S. reads τῇ ἑαυτοῦ διδασκαλίᾳ. Vales.

CHAP. IV.

How many of those who had been instructed by him, became Martyrs.

THe first of them was the aforementioned Plutarchus, whom (when he was led to Execution) *he of whom the discourse is, accompanied to the last hour of his life, and again wanted little of being kill'd by the men of his own City, as seeming the cause of Plutarchus's death. But then also the providence of God preserv'd him. Next to Plutarch the second of Origen's disciples, that was a Martyr, was Serenus. Who by fire gave a triall of the faith which he had receiv'd. Heraclides was made the third Martyr of the same School. The fourth after him was [a] Heron. Both which persons were beheaded, the former of them while he was yet learning the Principles of Christianity, the latter when he was newly [b] Baptiz'd. Besides these, another Serenus, different from the former, is declared the fifth Champion of Piety [who came out] of this School. Who, 'tis reported, was punish'd with the loss of his head, after a most patient sufferance of many Torments. And of women, Herais

* That is Origen.

[a] Christophorson calls him Heronex.

[b] Νεοφώτιστος, i. e. newly Baptized. φωτίζω in Gregory and Chrysostom, and many other divines is peculiarly us'd in this sence, to Baptize, and rendred by the Translatours Baptizare.

SEVERUS. [c] I long ſince conjectured it ſhould be [Ἡραΐς] in one word, not [ἡ ῥαΐς,] two words; which conjecture I found confirmed by the Kings, and Fuk. M. SS. Rufinus agrees hereto, who tranſlates this place thus, Sed & mulieres plurimæ, in quibus Hera quædam Catechumena. 'Tis a proper name derived from Juno, who is called in Greek Ἥρα: whence comes Ἡραΐσκος, Heraiſcus, the name of an Egyptian Philoſopher, concerning whom ſee Suidas. The Greeks celebrate the memory of this Heraïs on the fourth, or rather the fifth day of March, as 'tis in the Menologie ſet forth by Caniſius. I am not certain whether this perſon be the ſame with Irais the Alexandrian Virgin, who in the Roman Martyrologie is ſaid to have ſuffered Martyrdom (together with ſome others) at the City Aminoe on September 22. In Cardinal Sirletus's Menologie, at the fifth of September theſe words occur; Natalis B. Martyris Rhaïdis, quæ igne conſumpta eſt; i. e. the birth-day of the B. Martyr Rhaïs, who was burnt. This is the ſame whom Euſebius mentions here. Therefore there were three Heraïs's; the firſt is ſhe mentioned in the Menæum, at the fifth day of March: the ſecond Heraïs is the Catechumen, of whom mention is made in the Menologie, on the fifth of September: the third Heraïs the Egyptian Virgin, born at a place called Tamma; whoſe fathers name was Peter, a Presbyter: ſhe ſuffered Martyrdom when ſhe was twelve years old, as 'tis in the Menæum, at the 23[d] of September: where ſhe is called Hieraïs: in the Roman Martyrologie ſhe is termed, Irais. Valeſ.

[c] Heraïs, who as yet was learning the Principles of Chriſtianity, did, as he himſelf ſomewhere ſays, depart this life, having received Baptiſm by fire.

CHAP. V.

Concerning Potamiæna.

LEt Baſilides be reckoned the ſeventh among theſe, who lead the moſt renown'd Potamiæna to Execution, concerning which woman, even yet there is a famous report amongſt the inhabitants of thoſe Countries, for that ſhe combated many times with her lovers, in defence of the chaſtity and virginity of her body; for which ſhe was famous: (for beſides the vigour of her mind, there flouriſht in her a comlineſs of body:) who, having ſuffer'd many things for her faith in Chriſt, at laſt after grievous Torments and horrible to be related, was together with her mother Marcella conſumed by fire. Moreover they ſay that the Judge, (whoſe name was [a] Aquila,) after he had inflicted grievous ſtripes upon every part of her body, threatned at laſt he would deliver her to the [b] Gladiatours to abuſe her body. But ſhe (having conſidered of the matter ſome ſhort time,) being asked what her determination was, return'd [they ſay] ſuch an anſwer, as thereby ſhe ſeem'd to ſpeak ſome thing which was accounted impious amongſt them. Forthwith therefore ſhe receiv'd the definitive ſentence [of the Judge,] and Baſilides one of the Military Apparitors, took and lead her to Execution: but when the multitude endeavour'd to moleſt and reproach her with obſcene words, he prohibited them, [c] thruſting away them who reproach'd her, ſhewing much commiſeration, and humanity towards her. She taking in good part the mans commiſeration ſhown towards her, exhorts him to be of good courage, for when ſhe was gone hence ſhe would entreat her Lord for him, and within a little while ſhe would make him a requital for what he had done for her. When ſhe had ſpoken theſe things, they ſay ſhe valiantly underwent death, hot ſcalding pitch being leiſurely, and by little and little poured upon all the ſeveral members of her body, from the ſole of the foot, to the crown of the head; ſuch was the combat fought by this famous virgin. But not long after, Baſilides upon ſome occaſion being deſir'd by his fellow-ſoldiers to ſwear, avouch'd twas not lawfull for him to ſwear at all; for he was a Chriſtian, and he openly confeſs'd it: at firſt they thought he onely ſpake in jeſt; but when he conſtantly maintain'd it, he is brought before the Judge, and after he had made profeſſion of his ſtedfaſtneſs before him, he was put into bonds: And when ſome of the brethren in the Lord came to him, asking him what was the cauſe of this ſudden, and unexpected change, he is reported to have ſaid, that Potamiæna, three days after her Martyrdom, ſtood by him in the night, put a crown about his head, and ſaid, ſhe had entreated the Lord for him, and had obtain'd her requeſt: And within a little while the Lord would take him up to himſelf. After theſe things the brethren imparted to him the [d] Seal of the Lord, and the day after, being famous for his teſtimony of the Lord, he was beheaded; they relate, that many more throughout Alexandria came thick at that time to the doctrine of Chriſt; to wit, ſuch as Potamiæna had appear'd to in their ſleep, and [e] invited them to be converted to the Goſpel: But for theſe things let thus much ſuffice.

SEVERUS.

[a] This Aquila was Governour of Ægypt, as Euſebius before relates in the 3[d] Chapter: at which time Origen was in the eighteenth year of his age. Valeſ.

[b] The Gladiators were commonly noted to be laſcivious wicked men; therefore Aquila threatned to deliver her to them, thinking ſhe, who had ſuch ſpecial care of her chaſtity, would rather revolt from her faith, then hazard the purity of her body, by being put into their power.

[c] Ἀποσβέω, properly ſignifies to fright birds away, but here, as alſo in Demoſthenes, it ſignifies to thruſt aſide out of the way, ἀποσβῶν τὴν ἀγορὰν. Demoſt.

[e] Rufinus tranſlates this place ſo as to make Potamiæna Origen's ſcholar; neither dare we contradict him in that. For although Euſebius does not mention it particularly, yet we may gather ſo much from this his narration; for, reckoning up the Martyrs which were of Origen's School, he adds to them Baſilides and Potamiæna; whence 'tis collected theſe two alſo were his diſciples; and though we cannot for certain ſay Baſilides was, yet 'tis probable Potamiæna might be one of them. Valeſ.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning Clemens Alexandrinus.

[a] CLemens, who ſucceeded Pantænus, was Maſter of the Catechetick School at Alexandria, till this time. So that Origen when he was a boy was one of his Scholars: Moreover, this Clemens, committing to writing the ſubject of that work of his entitled Stromateis, in his firſt Volume explains the ſeries of times, and determines his computation at the death of Commodus. So that it is plain thoſe books were elaborated by him in the Reign of Severus, the Hiſtory of whoſe times this book of ours contains.

[a] There is little connexion betwixt this and what he ſaid before. Clemens was not then the Catechiſt at Alexandria; but Origen, Clemens's, Scholar. Moreover concerning Clemens, and his books, Euſebius writes in the foregoing book. And Caius in his little Labyrinth. reckons him among the Eccleſiaſtick Writers which writ in the time of Victor; the words of Caius are at the end of the 5[th] Book: therefore Rufinus rightly places this and the following chapter in the 3[d] Chapter of this book where he ſpeaks of Demetrius the Biſhops committing the office of Catechizing to Origen. Valeſ.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning Judas the Writer.

AT this time alſo liv'd Judas another Writer, who commented upon the Seventy Weeks in Daniel, and puts an end to his computation of the times at the tenth year of Severus's Reign. His Opinion was that even at that time the coming of Antichriſt, which was ſo much talk'd of, drew nigh. So great a diſturbance did the raiſing of the Perſecution then againſt us cauſe in many mens minds.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the bold Act of Origen.

AT this time while Origen perform'd the Office of Chatechizing at Alexandria, an act of an unripe and youthfull mind was committed by him, but which withall contain'd a most manifest token of Continence, and true faith; for he taking these words [some * Eunuchs there are which have made themselves Eunuchs for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake] in the more simple meaning, unadvisedly like one of his juvenile years, thinking it both his duty to fulfill our Saviours words, and also [considering] that during his youthfull years he was to converse not onely with men, but women about the things which appertain to God: that he might exclude the Infidels from all suspition of obscene slanders, his mind was full bent to perform really our Saviour's words, taking great care that it might escape the knowledge of many of his familiars: but 'twas impossible for him although he was desirous, to conceal such a fact. But when Demetrius understood it, as being then Governour of the Church there, he both greatly admires him for his boldness, and also, (having commended his alacrity of mind, and sincerity of faith,) forthwith encourages, and excites him to a more diligent imployment about the duty of Catechizing: for such at this time was [Demetrius's] opinion of this act: but no long time after, when he saw Origen doe well, and that he was famous, and well reported of by all men; being affected with the frailties of Mankind, he endeavoured by letters, sent to all the Bishops in the world, to describe what was done as a most absurd action. [a] For the Bishops of Cæsarea and Jerusalem, the most approved and most famous of all the Prelates in Palestine, judging Origen worthy of dignity and the highest pitch of honours, had by imposition of hands ordain'd him Presbyter. Therefore when he had ascended to great honour, and had purchas'd a name amongst all men in all places, and no small fame for his virtue, and wisdom; Demetrius, being furnisht with no other accusation, made a great and malicious complaint against that act which he had done in his youth. Daring also to involve the Bishops in his accusations who had promoted him to the Office of a Presbyter. These things were done a little after. But then Origen [b] freely and without any impediment perform'd his Office of teaching the divine doctrine to all that came to him by day or by night: laboriously spending all his time either in divine learning, or upon them who came to him. [c] After Severus had held the Empire eighteen years, his son Antoninus succeeds him. At this time there [lived] one [d] Alexander, one of their number who had behav'd themselves manfully in the Persecution, and also by the providence of God had been preserv'd after their combats during their confessions; him we before manifested to have been Bishop of the Church in Jerusalem. Now because he was famous for his confession of Christ in the time of the Persecution, he is promoted to the afore-mentioned Bishoprick, whilest Narcissus, his predecessour was yet alive.

ANTONINUS. CARACALLA

[c] Rufinus's old book which was in the Church at Paris begins a new Chapter here, and so does Christophorson. Vales.

[d] Concerning this Alexander, Eusebius, in his Chronicle, in the 12 year of Severus's Reign, which was the second year of this Persecution, writes thus. Alexander was accounted famous for his confession of the Name of the Lord. Vales.

* Matth. Chap. 19. v. 12.

[a] Eusebius here laies open the the reason why Demetrius who was formerly so much Origen's friend, should now so persecute him by his letters; which was, because the Bishops of Cæsarea and Jerusalem had ordain'd him Priest. In which thing no small injury was done to Demetrius, both by the Bishops, and Origen; by Origen because he had yielded to be ordain'd by forreign Bishops; and by the Bishops, because by doing this they had translated the Catechist of Alexandria into their Church. Moreover, there arises a difficulty not to be pass'd by, viz. why two Bishops together should ordain Origen? By this means he had power to sit in two Churches, and to communicate with other Priests. See the 23. and 27. chapters following; where this conjecture is confirm'd. 'Twas the order when either Deacons or Priests were ordain'd, some Bishops should be present, that the ordination might be more solemn, (saies Innocentius in his Epistle to Marcianus the Bishop.) Photius, in Biblioth. Chap. 118. says that Theoctistus solemniz'd the ordination, but Alexander gave his approbation. Christophorson also says these were the names of the Bishops; Theoctistus was Bishop of Cæsarea, and Alexander of Jerusalem. Vales.

[b] Ἀφυλάκτως (the word here) has several significations; Rufinus explains it thus, when a man has free power to do a thing all impediments being remov'd; which explanation seems best; for, before Origen made himself an Eunuch, for fear of a scandalous report he had reason to be cautious of conversing with women, and teaching them; but when he had unman'd himself, as he did, he might do it freely without suspicion. Vales.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning the Miracles of Narcissus.

THE Inhabitants of this Dioceſs report many Miracles of this Narcissus, by tradition derived from a continued succession of the Brethren: Amongst which they relate such a like Miracle as this done by him; 'tis reported that on the great vigils of Easter the Ministers oil fail'd them, for which great pensiveness of mind having seized the whole multitude, Narcissus gave command to them who took care of the Lights that they should draw water out of the well which was nearest at hand, and bring it to him, which being forthwith done, he prayed over the water, and commanded them to pour the water into the Lamps with a sincere faith in the Lord. When they had done this also, contrary to all reason and expectation, by a miraculous and divine power, the nature of water was changed into the [a] fatness of oil. Some small specimen of this miracle then done, has been preserv'd amongst many of the brethren for a long time, even from that to our age. They also relate several other things worth remembrance cencerning this mans life. Amongst which there is such a [story] as this: Some vile fellows who could not endure this persons vigour, and his perseverance in leading of a pious life, fearing least when they were caught they should suffer punishment, because they were conscious to themselves of many evil actions, they [resolve to] prevent him by patching up a plot against him, and utter a grievous calumny against him. Then, that they might perswade the hearers to credit them, they confirm'd their accusations with oaths: one of them swore it was true which he said, or he wish'd he might be consum'd by fire; another, if 'twas not true, that his body might be wasted by some terrible unhappy [b] disease; and the third,

[a] Εἰς ἐλαίου ποιότητα, into the nature or quality of oil; we should rather read it πότητα the fatness of oil. Rufinus translates it thus, aquæ naturâ in olei pinguedinem versâ, and in Moræus's book 'tis so corrected in the margin; the Fuk.M.S. also reads πότητα. Vales.

[b] Σκωλῷ νόσῳ Rufinus renders thus, Regio morbo: But Langus calls it morbus sonticus, the falling sickness. Christophorson, morbus scevus & fœdus, an unfortunate, or cruel and filthy disease; which comes nearest to Rufinus's Version: for by this morbus Regius he means the Leprosie, as appears by what follows. For in the 10 Book and 25 chapter he speaks thus of Eunomius; vir corpore & anima Leprosus, & interiùs, exteriùsque morbo Regio corruptus. Gregorius Nyssenus also in his first Book against Eunomius certainly affirms he was a Leper. pag. 307. Ὁ εἰσδύων εἰς τὰς οἰκίας αὐτόκλητος & δὲ τὴν ἀνδίαν ὁρῶν τῶν πάθων τὴν κατ' ἑαυτὸν διαγωγὴν παρεστέλλων, οὐδὲ τὴν φυσικὴν τῶν ὑγιαινόντων πρὸς τοὺς νοσοῦντας ἀποστροφὴν λογιζόμενος. He who goes into another mans house not invited, and keeps not the filthiness under his own Roof, considers not what natural abhorrence they who are sound have towards those who are infected. Hieronymus in the Life of Hilario speaks thus, of his Scholar Adrianus, post aliquantum temporis computruit morbo Regio. Vales.

third, that he might be depriv'd of his ſight: but none of the faithful gave heed to them although they ſwore thus, becauſe Narciſſus's continency was alwaies reſplendent amongſt all men, and his courſe of life moſt eminently virtuous and pious; but he being in-no-wiſe able to endure the wickedneſs of what had been ſaid againſt him; and, beſides this, for a long time being deſirous to embrace a Philoſophical life; retired from the whole Congregation of his Church, and liv'd many years lying hid in ſolitudes and in obſcure fields. But the great Eye of juſtice could not quietly wink at what was done: But was quickly revenged upon theſe wicked men by thoſe curſes with which they had bound themſelves, being [c] forſworn againſt themſelves. The firſt therefore was burnt together with his whole family, the houſe in which he liv'd being burnt in the night by [d] the fall of a little ſpark of fire upon it, which upon no occaſion given came out of it. The ſecond perſon's body was totally infected from the bottom of his feet to his head with the diſeaſe he had puniſh'd himſelf with. But the third, ſeeing the end of the two former and fearing the unavoidable vengeance of the all-ſeeing God, [e] publickly confeſs'd to all what they had plotted together in common amongſt themſelves, and he pin'd away with ſo great complaints, repenting of what he had done, and never ceas'd weeping ſo long, till he loſt both his eyes. And theſe ſuffer'd ſuch puniſhments for their lying accuſation.

[c] Καθ' ἑαυτῶν ἐπιορκήσαντες. The interpreters ſeem not to have rightly underſtood this place. Euſebius's meaning is this, thoſe perjur'd men did not forſwear themſelves againſt Narciſſus, but againſt themſelves, alluding without doubt to that of the Pſalmiſt, he ly'd miſchief to himſelf; For craft often falls upon the Author's own head, though he intends it for another. Valeſ.

[d] Διαπεσόντος; Nicephorus thinks 'twas the ſnuff or ſpark which fell from a candle. Chriſtophorſon and Muſculus render the place, as if fire had fell from heaven upon this perjur'd man's houſe, but Euſebius confutes that, ſaying it came ἐφ' ἧς κατέμενεν οἰκίας. Valeſ.

[e] Ὁμολογεῖ μὲν τὰ κοινῇ, makes a publick confeſſion. So the Kings M. S. reads, but the Med. and Fuk. M. SS. read ὡμολόγει which tenſe the following word κατεύχετο confirms. Valeſ.

CHAP. X.

Concerning the Biſhops of Jeruſalem.

WHen Narciſſus was retired, it being altogether unknown where he was, 'twas the opinion of the Biſhops of the bordering Churches that they ſhould proceed to the Ordination of another Biſhop. This mans name was Dius. To him having preſided no long time Germanio was ſucceſſour. Gordius ſucceeds him, in his time from ſome place or other Narciſſus again appear'd, as riſen from death to life, and is immediately invited by the Brethren to his Biſhoprick; all men admiring him much more both for his retreat, and alſo for his Philoſophick [courſe of life:] But above all for the revenge which was vouchſaft him from God [upon his Accuſers.]

CHAP. XI.

Concerning Alexander.

Narciſſus being no longer able to officiate by reaſon of his very great Age, the providence of God by Revelation made known to him in a viſion by night, call'd the fore-mention'd Alexander Biſhop of another Church to be coadjutour in the diſcharge of his Office. By this Revelation therefore, as if he had been warned by ſome Oracle from God, Alexander made a journey to Jeruſalem from Cappadocia (where he had before been honour'd with a Biſhoprick,) upon account both of praying there, and alſo of ſeeing the places: The Brethren there receiv'd him moſt kindly; and would not permit him to return home, becauſe of another Revelation, made known alſo to them by night, and a [a] voice moſt plainly utter'd to ſome who were the moſt eminent for piety amongſt them. For it told them if they went out of their gates, they ſhould meet him who was predetermin'd by God to be their Biſhop. When they had done this with the Common [b] conſent of the Biſhops who Govern'd the Churches round about, they forc'd him of neceſſity to continue there. Indeed, Alexander himſelf, in his own Epiſtles to the Antinoites which are preſerv'd amongſt us till this time, makes mention of Narciſſus's preſidency together with him, writing thus word for word, at the end of that Epiſtle: "Narciſſus ſalutes you "who before me govern'd "this Epiſcopal See, and he "now is my [c] Aſſociate in "prayer, being an hundred "and ſixteen years old, and "exhorts you to be of the "ſame mind with me. Theſe things were thus done. Now when Serapion was dead, Aſclepiades ſucceeded in the Biſhoprick of the Church of Antiochia. And he alſo was famous for his confeſſions in the time of Perſecution. Alexander alſo makes mention of his conſecration, writing thus to the Antiochians: "Alexander the "ſervant and priſoner of Je-"ſus Chriſt, ſendeth greeting in the Lord to "the Bleſſed Church of the Antiochians. The "Lord made my bonds eaſie and light in the "time of my [d] impriſonment, when I heard that "by divine providence Aſclepiades (a man moſt "fit by reaſon of the worthineſs of his faith) was "intruſted with the care over the holy Church "of the Antiochians: he ſignifies that he ſent this Epiſtle by Clemens, writing on this manner, at the End. "I have ſent theſe letters to you, "(my Lords and Brethren) by [e] Clemens a bleſ-"ſed Presbyter a virtuous and approved perſon; "whom ye have known, and ſhall know better: "who, while he was here, by the providence, and "care of God confirmed and increas'd the Church "of the Lord.

ANTONINUS.

[a] Μιᾷ τε φωνῇ. Chriſtophorſon, and Muſculus alter the reading thus μιᾷ τε φωνῇ σαφεστάτῃ; which alſo Nicephorus follows: but the reading ought not to be alter'd. Ruſinus very well corrects this ſtory of Euſebius's (which he makes ſomething obſcure) thus. He ſaies that that Revelation concerning Alexander was ſent by God to Narciſſus and other holy men; but the voice was heard by all men; here Ruſinus, like a good interpreter, lightly corrects what the Authour ſaies amiſs. Valeſ.

[b] Nicephorus and Hieronymus write that Narciſſus alſo conſented; which without doubt he did. Here are two things contrary to the Canon of the Church committed in the Election of Alexander, firſt his tranſlation from one Biſhoprick to another, ſecondly that he was joyn'd as an aſſiſtant to another Biſhop while he was yet alive which was afterwards forbid in the Council of Sardis. Valeſ.

[c] Συνεξεταζόμενος μοι διὰ τῆς εὐχῆς. Ruſinus and Chriſtophorſon doe not tranſlate this place well; but Hieronymus renders it truly according to the ſenſe, though not word for word, he tranſlates it thus: Narciſſus ſalutes you who before me govern'd this Biſhoprick, and now governs the ſame in prayers with me. Alexander's meaning was undoubtedly this; that, Narciſſus onely aſſiſted him in prayers, but in no other part of the Office of Biſhop. Which makes him adde that he was an hundred and ſixteen years old, ſignifying thereby that he perform'd the Office, and Narciſſus being very old had onely the Title, and name of Biſhop. Valeſ.

[d] Alexander wrote this Epiſtle in the heat of Perſecution while he was in priſon, before he was elected to the Biſhoprick of Jeruſalem, as appears by theſe words, calling himſelf the priſoner of Chriſt. Hence Euſebius does not well by reckoning, in his Chronicon, Aſclepiades's Conſecration in the firſt year of Antoninus Caracalla: for Aſclepiades was Conſecrated when Alexander was in Priſon; which Euſebius in his Chronicle ſaies, happen'd in Severus's Reign. Valeſ.

[e] Hieronymus (in Catalogo) conjectures this to be Clemens Alexandrinus. Clemens Alexandrinus certainly liv'd till the times of Severus, and travelled into theſe Countreys, as he witneſſes in the firſt book of his Stromateon, he was alſo a familiar friend of Alexander the Biſhop, for to him he dedicates his work concerning the Canon of the Church, as Euſebius writes in the 13 Chapter of this book. Valeſ.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Serapion, and his Books that are extant.

'TIs likely that other monuments of [a] Serapion's studiousness and learning are preserv'd amongst other men; but those [writings] onely came to our hands which he wrote to one Domninus, a man who in the time of Persecution fell from the faith in Christ to the Jewish superstition. And what he wrote to Pontius, and Caricus Ecclesiastical men; and other Epistles to other persons. Another book also was compos'd by him, concerning that Book Intituled The Gospel according to Peter; which Book he wrote to confute the Errours in that, for some mens sakes in the Church of [b] Rhosse, who, taking an occasion from the foresaid Gospel, inclin'd to Heterodox doctrines. Out of which Book 'twill not be unfit to set down some few words, in which he sets forth the opinion he had concerning that Book, writing thus; "For we, my brethren, doe "admit of Peter and the other Apostles, as of "Christ himself; but, like wise men we reject "those writings which are forg'd in their "[c] names, knowing that we have receiv'd no "such [Books.] For I, when I came to you, "thought all of you had adhered to the Right "faith. And when I read "not the Gospel which was "offer'd me, that bears Peters "name, I said, if this be "the onely thing which seems "to breed this dejected spirit "in you, let it be read. But "now understanding, from "what has been told me, that their minds were "covered with some Heresie, I will make haste to "come to you again; wherefore, brethren, ex-"pect me suddenly: But we, Brethren, have "found out what heresie Marcianus was of, for he "contradicted himself, not understanding what he "said, which you shall understand by some things "which have been written to you. For we have "been able to [d] borrow this very Gospel of some "who have been continually exercised in it, (that "is of some of their successours who preceded "Marcianus, whom we call Doceti, for many of "[Marcianus's] Tenets are derived from their "doctrines,) and read it; and we find indeed "many things agreeable to the true doctrine of "Christ: but some things that are particularly "to be excepted against and avoided, which also "we have here subjoyned upon your account. And thus much concerning Serapion's Books.

[a] The Greeks write this name Serapion with an α, thus, Σαραπίων; but the Latines with an e. So the Greeks write Σάραπν, but the Latines Serapin. This name is always writ thus in the Med. Maz. and Fuk. M.SS. Vales.

[b] This Rhosse is a City of Cilicia; it lyes upon the right hand to them who sail into the Gulf of Issus. Some write this Cities name with a single s, So Stephanus in his tract De Urbibus, and Theodoret in his Religious History, Chap. 10, and 11. The name of this place in Plutark is corrupted; for he calls it Ὀρσοῦς, Orossus. Vales.

[c] The Maz. Med Fuk. and Savill's M.SS. read πῷ ὀνόματι, i. e. in his name. So Rufinus seems to have read it. Serapion, also a little lower saies προφερώνου ὀνόματα αὐτῷ εὐαγγέλιον. Origen in his Commentaries upon the 13th Chapter of Matthew makes mention of this Gospel of Peter. Vales.

[d] Here Serapion saies he borrow'd this Gospel from the successours of some of those Hereticks who were call'd Δοκηταὶ, Doceti, of which Hereticks Marcianus was one; the Translatours take no notice in this place of that Hereticall Sect called the Doceti. They held that Christ was not really incarnate, nor did truely suffer, but in opinion onely: Clemens Alexandrinus in his 7th book Stromat. and also Theodoret in his book Divinorum Decretorum mentions them. The Ring-leader of this Sect was one Julius Cassianus, as Clemens tells us in his third book. Vales.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the writings of Clemens.

CLemens his [a] Stromata's, which are in all eight books, are extant amongst us, which books he thus intituled, The variegated contexture of [b] discourses of Titus Flavius Clemens concerning all things which appertain to the knowledge of the true Philosophy: of the same number with these are his books intitul'd Institutions: in which he by name mentions Pantænus, as being his Master, and he writes down his [c] opinions he had receiv'd concerning the scope of Scripture, and explains his traditions: he has also an Hortatory discourse to the Gentiles. And three books Intitl'd the Tutor. And another book of his with this title, What Rich man can be sav'd? And a book concerning Easter. Disputations also concerning the Fasting. And concerning detraction. And an exhortation to patience to those who were newly baptiz'd. And a book intitl'd the Ecclesiastick Canon, or against those who Judaized, which book he dedicated to Alexander the fore-mention'd Bishop. Moreover, in his Stromata he does not onely compose miscellaneous discourses out of the holy Writings, but he also mentions some things out of the Gentile Writers, if any thing seems profitable which was spoken by them: he also explains various opinions [which occur] in several books both of the Greeks, and Barbarians. He moreover confutes the false opinions of the Arch-hereticks. He laies open much of History, affording us large subject-matter of several sorts of learning. Amongst all these he intermixes the Philosophers Opinions. Hence he fitly made the Title Stromata, answerable to the subject of the book. In the same book he produces authorities out of those Scriptures which are not allow'd of [as Canonical;] out of that which is call'd The Wisdom of Solomon, and out of the book of Jesus the son of Sirac. And out of The Epistle to the Hebrews. And out of the [Epistles] of Barnabas, Clemens, and Jude. He also makes mention of Tatianus's book against the Grecians, and of Cassianus, [d] who also made a Chronographie. Moreover, he mentions Philo, [e] Aristobulus, Josephus, Demetrius, and Eupolemus, Jewish Writers; who all have prov'd by their writings, that Rufinus believe, that the preceding person Tatianus wrote a Chronographie as well as Cassianus: but we must in no-wise think that true. Vales.

[a] Rufinus very well translates this Title στρωματεῖς thus, Opus varie contextum. Plutark calls some books of his, which are part History, and part Poetry, στρωματεῖς. Eusebius takes the books to be so call'd from the divers sorts of matter which they treat of, and so says Baronius in his Annals, and Suidas in his History: στρώματα, in Greek signifies Carpets or Hangings which were woven of divers colours: hence these books are metaphorically entitl'd στρωματεῖς, from the mixture of things they treat of: for he intermixes Grecian, Barbarian, and Latine Opinions, confutes Hereticks, and composes a kind of a various History. Photius Biblioth.

[b] Ὑπομνήματα (which is the term here,) are such writings as contain onely the heads, and some particulars of some special things, or as Cicero in Verrem says, sunt scripta quæ domi continentur, nec in vulgus efferuntur; but now the word has got a larger signification.

[c] Langus renders this word ἐκδοχὰς Dictates, Masculus verbally, Excerptions, Rufinus, expositions, and Christophorson Commentaries upon the Scriptures, but none of them sufficiently explain the propriety of the word: ἐκδοχαὶ, are the sence and meanings of Scripture. So Origen uses it in his 4th book de principiis Chap. 2. speaking of the double sence of Scripture, that is the literal, and the spiritual sence, and so also does Methodius, Epiphanius and Dionysius Alexandrinus use the term. Vales.

[d] These words ὡς καὶ αὐτῶ χρονογραφίαν πεποιημένου, made

[e] Some Copies read, ἀριστόβουλος, but in all our M. SS. and in Nicephorus 'tis ἀριστόβουλος. This Aristobulus here is that same Aristobulus the Peripatetick who wrote books of the Explications of the Mosaical Law to Ptolomy Philometor, as Eusebius records in his Chronicle, and he produces a fragment of these books, in his 8th book Præparationis. Origen also mentions something of these books in his 4th book against Celsus, pag. 204. Vales.

ANTONINUS.

MOSES, and the Originals of the Jewiſh Nation are ancienter then any thing of antiquity amongſt the Grecians. And this mans books afore-mention'd are ſtuff'd with very much excellent learning, of ſeveral kinds. In the firſt of theſe books he ſaies concerning himſelf, that he was born next to the firſt ſucceſſours of the Apoſtles. He promiſes alſo in them that he would write Commentaries upon Geneſis. And in his book concerning Eaſter, he confeſſes he was conſtrained by his friends to commit to writing [for the benefit of] poſterity thoſe traditions which he had heard from his Anceſtours. In that ſame book alſo is mention'd Melito, Irenæus, and ſome others, whoſe explications he ſets down.

CHAP. XIV.

What Writings Clemens has mentioned.

THat I may ſpeak briefly, in his [a] Inſtitutions he makes [b] ſhort explications of all the [c] written word of God, not omitting thoſe Scriptures whoſe authority is [d] queſtioned by ſome: I mean the Epiſtle of Jude, and the other [e] Catholick Epiſtles, and that of Barnabas, and that which is ſaid to be the Revelation of Peter: And The Epiſtle to the Hebrews, which he affirms to be Paul's, but was written to the Hebrews in the Hebrew tongue; which when Luke had with much care and pains tranſlated, he publiſht it for the [uſe of the] Grecians. Wherefore we may find the ſtile of the tranſlation of this Epiſtle, and Of the Acts of the Apoſtles to be the ſame. "[f] But 'twas for a very good [g] reaſon, that this "Title [Paul the Apoſtle] was not ſet before "it, for he (ſaies he) writing to the Hebrews "who were poſſeſt with a prejudice againſt, and "a ſuſpicion of him, very wiſely did not prefix "his name at the beginning, leaſt he ſhould cauſe "an averſion in them to his Epiſtle. But a little "after, he continues, ſaying; Now, as a bleſſed "Presbyter ſaid, becauſe the Lord, being the "Apoſtle of the Almighty, was ſent to the "Hebrews, Paul through modeſty, in that he was "ſent to the Gentiles, does not entitle himſelf the "Apoſtle of the Hebrews, both in reverence to "the Lord, and alſo becauſe 'twas over and above "his duty that he writ to the Hebrews, being the "Preacher and Apoſtle of the Gentiles. Again Clemens in the ſame books writes a tradition concerning the order of the Goſpels which he receiv'd from the Elders before him, and it is this: "Thoſe Goſpels, he ſaid, which contain the "Genealogies were written firſt. And this "was the occaſion of writing Marks Goſpel: "when Peter Preach'd the word publickly in "Rome, and declared the Goſpel by the Spirit, "many who were there preſent entreated Mark, "(who had been his follower [h] a long time, and "remembred what he had ſaid,) that he would "write down the things which had been ſpoken. "When he had compos'd the Goſpel, he imparted "it to thoſe who had intreated it of him. Peter "having underſtood this, [i] uſed no perſwaſives "either to hinder him, or to incite him to it. But "John, being the laſt of all, when he ſaw how thoſe "things which appertain'd to Chriſts humanity "were already manifeſted in the Goſpels, was "mov'd [to the enterpriſe] by his [k] acquaintance, "and being inſpir'd by the Spirit, he wrote a Go-"ſpel concerning Chriſt's Divinity. Thus much "Clemens. But again, the ſaid Alexander in an Epiſtle of his to Origen, mentions Clemens, and Pantænus alſo, as men who were his familiars: he writes thus. "For this, as you know was the "will of God, that the friendſhip, which was be-"gun betwixt us from our Anceſtours, ſhould not "onely remain inviolable, but alſo become more "fervent and firm. For we know thoſe bleſſed "Fathers who went before us, with whom we, "after a ſhort time ſhall be joyn'd, I mean the "truely bleſſed Pantænus my Maſter, and the "holy Clemens my Maſter, who alſo profited me "much; and if there be any others like them, by "whom I came to the knowledge of you, my moſt "excellent Lord and Brother: And after this manner were theſe things. Moreover, Adamantius (for that alſo was Origen's name,) in theſe times, when Zephyrinus Preſided over the Church of Rome, [l] travell'd to Rome, (as he himſelf ſome where ſays) having a deſire to ſee the moſt antient Church of the Romans: where he made no long ſtay, but return'd to Alexandria. And with all diligence there perform'd his cuſtomary duty of Catechiſt, Demetrius the then Biſhop of thoſe Churches exciting him to it, and little leſs then beſeeching him to labour earneſtly for the utility of the Brethren.

ANTONINUS.

[a] For the explication of the title of this book; See the note (a) upon the 11th chap. of the 5th book, where 'tis prov'd by ſeveral quotations, that the true rendring of this title is Inſtitutions, or, Informations.

[b] This phraſe ὁπτελεμιβώδεις ὑπογήσεις, Langus tranſlates compendioſam enumerationem, Muſculus, contractas explicationes. And ſo Chriſtophorſon alſo: but Rufinus calls them compendioſas diſſertiones. Ὑπογήσεις therefore is the ſame as ἐξηγήσεις, or διεξηγήσεις; which words Photius uſes in that ſence, that is explications, interpretations; though ὑπήγησις ſignifies narrations onely. Valeſ.

[c] Λόγῳ ἐνδιάθετῳ, according to Heſychius's interpretation, is rendered the written word; aliquid Scripto conſtans. Heſych.

[d] Γεγραφὰς ἀντιλεγομένας are Scriptures, whoſe authority is queſtion'd, diſputed of, and by ſome contradicted, we muſt not therefore call them Apocrypha, as Rufinus does, for Apocrypha are thoſe which are certainly falſe and compos'd by Hereticks; but ἀντιλεγόμενα are thoſe which ſome approve of, others not: of which here Euſebius gives us a Catalogue, ſome of which in St Hieromes Catalogue are accounted Apocryphal, as the Revelation of Peter, which is concluded to be undoubtedly falſe. Valeſ.

[e] Catholick Epiſtles are thoſe which were not written to certain perſons, particular Cities, or Provinces, but to whole Nations, and the Univerſal Church. Thus Themiſon, one of Montanus's diſciples, impudently wrote a Catholick Epiſtle, like an Apoſtle, to the Univerſal Church, as Apollonius teſtifies book 5. chap. 16. Euſebius alſo mentions Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth's Epiſtles to 4 Cities; which he calls Catholick. The Revelation of Peter which Euſebius mentions here, is quoted in Theodotus's excerptions which is printed at the end of Clemens's Stromata: hence 'tis plain that theſe Collections of Theodotus are nothing elſe, but fragments of Clemens's Hypotypoſeon. Valeſ.

[f] This quotation Clemens has out of Macarius.

[g] This reaſon alſo St Hierome confirms upon the firſt chapter of the Epiſtle of Paul to the Galatians, where he ſays that St Paul does not after his accuſtomed way prefix his name before this Epiſtle, becauſe he was about to ſpeak of Chriſt, and thought it not fit to call himſelf an Apoſtle where Chriſt alſo muſt be ſtil'd an Apoſtle. Valeſ.

[h] Though this word [πόρρωθεν] ſignifies a far off; yet here it muſt be rendred as ἐκ πολλοῦ for a long time; which word Niceph. Cal. uſes in this place, inſtead of [πόρρωθεν.] Valeſ.

[i] All Copies read μετατρεπτικῶς μᾶλλον κωλύσας; and ſo alſo does Niceph. but Chriſtophorſon boldly alter'd the reading, ſaying, that this paſſage impugned the authority of the Goſpel. Euſebius relates this ſtory in the 2d book at the 14th chapt. otherwiſe; ſaying, that Peter was mightily pleas'd with the Goſpel which was written by Mark and confirm'd it, appointing it ſhould be read in the Churches. But if we weigh the words of Euſebius and Clemens carefully, theſe places will appear not in the leaſt contradictory, as Chriſtophorſon ſays they are: for although St Peter, as Clemens ſays, did neither openly prohibit nor further him; yet he may be ſaid to have tacitly approv'd of what he had done. Rufinus has very well tranſlated the place, whom we ought to imitate, becauſe by his tranſlation he explains it very well, rendring it thus, licet fieri ipſum non juſſerit tamen factum non prohibuit: by which 'tis very plain that he did not diſallow of it. Valeſ.

[k] This Hieronymus atteſts, ſpeaking of John, in his Preface to his Commentaries upon St Matthew. Valeſ.

[l] Baronius places Origen's coming to Rome, on the year of Chriſt 220; which was the firſt year of the Reign of Elagabalus the Emperour: but we muſt in no-wiſe yield to this, ſeeing that Euſebius ſays he came to Rome in Antoninus Caracalla's Reign. Baronius alſo affirms that he came again to Rome in the Reign of Philip the Emperour, that is in the year of Chriſt 248: but we muſt not believe Baronius in this; for Euſebius, who carefully and truely wrote the Hiſtory of Origen, makes no mention of Origen's ſecond coming to Rome: but rather ſeems to confute this of Baronius, ſaying thus, that Origen ſent Letters concerning the profeſſion of his faith to Fabianus, who was Biſhop of Rome, therefore Origen went not to Rome, as Baronius ſays, onely ſent Letters to Fabianus the Biſhop of Rome. But hence ariſes Baronius's miſtake; he follows Porphyrius, who, in his life of Plotinus, mentions one Origen, who was Plotinus's and Herennius's School-fellow; but this is not that Origen Adamantius which we mean here; but another Origen, therefore we muſt carefully make a diſtinction betwixt theſe two Origens; which we will ſhew hereafter. Valeſ.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning Heraclas.

BUt when he perceived himself not supplied with sufficient strength both for the more profound study of Divinity, for his researches into, and interpretation of the holy Scriptures, and moreover for the Catechizing of them who came to him; (having scarce time to breathe, so many flocking together to him; One company after another coming from morning to evening to his School;) he divided the multitudes, and electing Heraclas, one of his familiars; made him his assistant in Catechizing; a man who was very studious in Divinity, most eminently skilfull in other Learning; and one who was not unexperienced in Philosophy. He commits the instruction of the New-beginners to him, but reserves to himself the hearing of those who had made some proficiency.

CHAP. XVI.

What Pains and Study Origen bestowed about the Holy Scriptures.

ORigen now intended to make such accurate researches into the Holy Scriptures, that he learn't the Hebrew tongue. And bought the [a] Authentick Scriptures written in Hebrew letters, which were extant among the Jews. And he search'd after other Editions of Translatours of the Sacred Scriptures besides the Seventy. And he sought out some other Versions besides those [b] Common ones of Aquilas, Symmachus and Theodotion, different from them, which he, having search out, first brought to light, from I know not whence, nor out of what Corners, having been forgotten for a long time: concerning which, because he was uncertain who were the Authours of them, by reason of their obscurity, he onely Noted this, that one of them was by him found at [c] Nicopolis near Actium; and another, at some other place. Moreover in his Hexapla of the Psalms, after those four excellent Editions, he adds [d] not onely a fifth, and sixth, but also a seventh Version; and upon one of them again he has Noted, that it was found at Jericho in an Hogs-head, in the times of Antoninus the son of Severus. When he had thus Collected all these Versions into one body, and divided them into [e] Verses, [f] having placed them directly one against the other, together with the [g] Hebrew Text, he left us those Copies which are call'd [h] Hexapla. He [i] afterwards prepared apart by themselves, Aquila's, Symmachus's and Theodotion's Edition, together with the Septuagint [and put them out] in his Tetrapla.

ANTONINUS.

[a] Πρωτοτύπους Budæus calls exemplaria, Copies, by which we doe any thing or make any thing. Valesius translates this Phrase [πρωτοτύπους γραφὰς] the Authentick Scriptures; because, says he, Eusebius's meaning is plainly the same, for he implies thus much, that these were not the very first Copies which were writ by Esdras; but Authentick in respect of the Septuagint, and other Translatours; and he says this word πρωτοτύπους is commonly rendred in Latine Authenticas: but Christophorson translates it the old copies.

[b] Καταμαξέων signifies properly curru tero, hence ὁδὸς καταμαξδομένη via curru trita, the highway καθ' ἣν αἱ ἅμαξαι διέρχονται, hence Metaphorically (as the Latine word tritum does to which it exactly answers) it signifies aliquid vulgare, that which is trite, or common; 'tis sometimes written καταμαξεύω, as here in Eusebius.

[c] In the Med. Maz. Fuk. M. SS. we find πρὸς ἀκτίοις, but 'tis not so well as πρὸς ἀκτίῳ; for ἄκτια signifies Ludi Actiaci, but Nicopolis had not it's name from those Games; but from the Promontory near which it was scituate, 'twas called Nicopolis near Actium. Vales.

[d] Instead of [ἕκτην καὶ ἑβδόμην, a sixth and seventh] I read [ὃ μόνον πέμπτῳ καὶ ἕκτῳ, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἑβδόμῳ, not onely a fifth and sixth, but also a seventh;] and judge this emendation to be altogether necessary. For Eusebius, having before spoken of a fifth and sixth Edition found by Origen, here adds this further, that Origen put a seventh into the Copies of his Hexapla of the Psalms. Therefore his Edition of the Psalms was seven-fold. But because this seventh Edition had onely the Psalms, Origen altered not the Title of his Edition, to wit, Hexapla. This amendment and exposition of ours is evidently confirmed by Johannes Zonaras, in his History of the Emperour Severus. See the Authour's words. But that which Zonaras there adds, to wit, that the seventh Edition was found at Jericho, is not expressly said by Eusebius here. Epiphanius (in his Book De ponderib.) and Athanasius (in Synopsi,) affirm that the fifth Edition was found at Jericho in an Hogs-head: But Nicephorus thought that both the sixth and seventh were found there. Although the particular Authours of this fifth and sixth Edition are unknown; yet 'tis manifest they were Jews: which is asserted by Hierom, in his B. 2. Advers. Rufinum. Vales.

[e] Κῶλα (the term here) signifies verses, or such parts of the Text as contain an entire sense. Hierom was the first amongst the Latins, who divided his translation into verses: See his Preface to Isaiah. This he did in imitation of Origen, who had done the same in his Hexapla. Origen herein had a regard to the profit of the Readers. For what is thus distinguisht by verses, is both more easily understood, and also more readily gotten by heart. Besides, this distinction was altogether necessary in order to a comparing of the Greek Editions. Origen's example was afterwards followed by many; who did the same in the New-Testament, which Origen had done in the old. Vales.

[f] This was another of Origen's inventions, to wit, the placing of the translations one against the other; that so, if one differed from another, it might be presently discerned by one view. See Hierom, in his Preface to Chromatius, upon the Chronicles. Vales. See a Scheme of Origen's contrivance herein in Dr Cave's life of Origen, pag. 228.

[g] Σημείωσις (the term which occurs here) signifies properly Annotation; See B. 5. Chap. 20. note (d.) but Eusebius does here call the Hebrew Text, σημείωσιν, because 'twas prefixt before the six Greek Translations; in like manner as in Comments the words of the Authour are prefixt before the exposition: this term [σημείωσις] signifies not onely the exposition, but the text, at which the exposition is set. Vales.

[h] From this place 'tis evident, that this work of Origen's was called Hexapla, because there were six Greek translations contained in it, besides the Hebrew Text, which was written in two columns two manner of ways, in the one in Hebrew, in the other in Greek Letters. See Epiphan. Hæres. Originist. cap. 3. And the reason why this work was thus termed, is plain; for, as the Tetrapla were so called, because they contained four Greek translations collected into one body; so the Hexapla were thus termed, because they comprehended six Greek Versions, to wit, that of Aquila, Symmachus, the seventy two, Theodotion, and lastly the fifth and sixth transl tion. But the Hebrew Text must not be reckoned amongst the Versions; that being the original. Zonaras (in his History of the Emperour Severus) is of the same opinion with us, and explains this place of Eusebius (though he mentions not his name) as we doe. Vales.

[i] The Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. have it written [ἐπιχαλασκευάσας;] which is all one as if Eusebius should have said [ἐπὶ τὰ ἥδη ἑξαπλῶν ἐκδόσει καλασκευάσας, i. e. after the Edition of his Hexapla, having prepared, &c.] For when Origen perceived that his Hexapla required too much cost and labour, he composed his Tetrapla, (which were more ready and useful,) having taken away the two Editions of the Hebrew Text, and the fifth, sixth, and seventh translation. Hitherto it has been the opinion of the Learned, that Origen made his Tetrapla before his Hexapla: Usher (in Syntag. de Sept. Interpret. cap. 5.) and Salmasius (in his book De Linguâ Hellenist.) are of this opinion. But this passage in Eusebius, (as it is corrected by the Authority of our M. SS. Copies) does wholly confute it. Vales.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning Symmachus the Translatour.

MOreover, We must understand that this Symmachus, one of the Translatours, was an Ebionite. For there is an Heresie called the Heresie of the Ebionites, who say that Christ was born of Joseph, and Mary, and suppose him to have been meer Man, who also stiffly affirm that the Law ought to be strictly observ'd according as the Jews kept it, as we have before made known somewhere in our History. Symmachus's Commentaries are even yet extant; in which he seems to confirm the foresaid Heresie, but that Goſpel of the Ebionites was not the ſame Goſpel of S[t] Matthew which we now have, but a forged one, and which wanted the Genealogie of Chriſt, as Epiphanius declares (in Hereſ. Ebion.) For the Goſpel according to the Hebrews, which they made uſe of, (as Euſebius ſaies B. 3. chap. 25. where ſee note (c.) they called the Authentick Goſpel of S[t] Matthew. Theſe words therefore [πρὸς τὸ κατὰ μᾶλλον ἀποτεινόμενον εὐαγγέλιον] we have rendred thus [diſputing ſtrongly againſt Matthews Goſpel,] to wit, ours, and the true Goſpel of S[t] Matthew. From this Symmachus the Ebionites were afterwards termed Symmachians, becauſe he ſtrongly aſſerted their opinions. Valeſ.

ANTONINUS. [a] The Ebionites admitted onely S[t] Matthew's Goſpel to be genuine:

CHAP. XVIII.

Concerning Ambroſius.

[a] Τὰ πνὸς φερειν is elegantly us'd for alicujus partibus favere, to be a favourer of ſuch a mans party: So Euripides in Hecuba, when Polyxena ſpeaks to her mother ſaying, Ἀγαμέμνων τὰ ἡμῶν φερνεῖ, Agamemnon is on our ſide: thus much for the Phraſe. Now that Ambroſius was of Valentinus's Sect, or at leaſt favour'd that opinion, Origen teſtifies in the Proœmium of his fifth Tome of Explications on S[t] John's Goſpel, where he commends Ambroſius for relinquiſhing thoſe dangerous principles. But ſome will have Ambroſius not to have been a Valentinian, but a Marcioniſt, and Epiphanius is of that opinion. Valeſ.

AT this time Ambroſius ([a] who favour'd the Valentinian Hereſie) being convinc'd by the truth Preach'd by Origen, and having his mind cleared as it were with light, aſſents to the doctrine of the Orthodox faith of the Church. And (Origen's fame being noiſ'd abroad every where) ſeveral men of great learning flock'd to him, intending to make tryal of this man's ſufficiency in the Scriptures. Alſo infinite multitudes of Hereticks, and not a few Philoſophers, and them moſt famous, gave [b] diligent attention to him, almoſt like Schollars learning from him beſides Divinity, thoſe things which appertain to * External Philoſophy: For he initiated [c] thoſe, whom he perceived to have acute parts into Philoſophical Learning: Teaching them Geometry, and Arithmetick, and the other previous Sciences. Alſo guiding them into the knowledge of the various Sects among Philoſophers: explaining the writings that are amongſt them, and Commenting on and ſearching into all things. So that even amongſt the Gentiles this man was openly declared to be a great Philoſopher. He alſo incited many of meaner capacities to the ſtudy of the Liberal Sciences: telling them that from hence would accrue to them no ſmall fitneſs and preparation for the Contemplation of the divine Scriptures: for which reaſon he eſteem'd the ſtudy of Secular and Philoſophical literature moſt neceſſary for himſelf.

[b] Περσέχειν here ſignifies to give attention to any one, ſo as to learn ſomething from him, or to come often to any one, to learn as Scholars; and therefore he adds μονονυχὶ παιδευόμενοι, almoſt like Scholars. Valeſ.

* That is, Grecian Philoſophy. [c] That is, who were his Scholars. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIX.

What things have been recorded concerning Origen, [by the Gentiles.]

THE Heathen Philoſophers who flouriſh'd in his Age are witneſſes of his great proficiency in theſe ſtudies: in whoſe writings we have found frequent mention of this man; [ſome of them] both dedicating their books to him, and alſo delivering up their private labours to his Cenſure, as to a Maſter. But I need not ſpeak of theſe things, when as [a] Porphyrius, (who liv'd in Sicilie [almoſt] till our Age, having written ſome books againſt us, and in them endeavoured to cavill at the holy Scriptures, when he had mentioned thoſe men who made explications upon them) was unable in any wiſe to caſt any baſe aſperſion upon their Opinions, and through want of Arguments betakes himſelf to railing, and reviles the Commentators. Of whom he attempts chiefly to reproach Origen, ſaying, that when he was young, he knew him; but he unawares commends the man; partly by ſpeaking the truth in ſome things where he could not do otherwayes; and partly by lying, wherein he thought he ſhould eſcape being detected. Sometimes he accuſes him as being a Chriſtian; by and by, he admires, and deſcribes the acceſſion he made to Philoſophick Literature. Hear therefore what he ſays word for word: "Some men, deſirous to find out not a de-"fection from the pravity "of the Jewiſh Scriptures, "but an explication [of the "obſcuritie in them] have "betaken themſelves to ex-"poſitions, which have no "agreement nor coherence "with thoſe Scriptures, and "which contain the Authour's approbation and "praiſe, rather than a defence of thoſe ſtrange "Sectaries. For, having boaſted that what things "were plainly ſpoken by Moſes were obſcure "Riddles, allowing them the Authority, and "quoting them as divine Oracles full of hidden "Myſteries; And having "[b] bewitched the judge-"ments and minds of men, "with their pride, they af-"terwards put forth their "Expoſitions. Then after ſome few words he ſaies; "Let an example of this ab-"ſurdity be taken from a "man whom I ſaw, when I "was [c] very young, being a "perſon then of great repute, "and yet eminently renowned "upon account of his writings "which he left behind him, "I mean Origen, whoſe re-"nown is very much ſpread a-"broad amongſt the teachers "of thoſe Doctrines. For this "Man, having been an [d] hearer ANTONINUS. [a] Eunapius, in his vitâ Philoſophorum, ſaies this Porphyrius was a Tyrian by birth, and was firſt call'd Malchus, which in Syriack ſignifies a King: but afterwards, by his Maſter Longinus a Platonick, whom he was an Auditour of at Athens, he was call'd Porphyrius, which ſignifies one cloath'd in purple, a king; becauſe Kings onely wore the true πορφύρα. S[t] Hierom ſaies he was a Few, born in the City of Batanæa; thence he calls him Batanæotes or Batanætes: Socrates atteſts that this man was once a Chriſtian, but could not endure the reproofs of thoſe Chriſtians who reprov'd him, and therefore turn'd an Apoſtate. Lactantius, who liv'd in his time, ſaies he wrote his books againſt the Chriſtians in the ſame year the Emperour pull'd down the Churches; but S[t] Hierom affirms he left his Maſter Plotinus, and Rome, and went to Sicily for his healths ſake, and dwelt at Lilybæum; where he wrote thoſe books: but we ought rather to believe Lactantius, who liv'd in his time. S[t] Auguſtine ſays there were two Porphyrius's; one who liv'd in Sicily a famous man; and another who wrote againſt the Chriſtians: but all agree that 'twas one and the ſame Porphyrius the Platonick who liv'd in Sicily and wrote againſt the Chriſtians. Baronius's Annals.

[b] Κρίσιν τῆς ψυχῆς; their own judgment, and underſtanding being bewitched or miſleaden by their pride. So Langus, Rufinus and Chriſtophorſon underſtand theſe words: but Valeſius otherwiſe. He ſaies Porphyrius's meaning was this, that the Authours of theſe expoſitions through the loftineſs of their words bewitch'd or inchanted the minds and judgements of their hearers, and then impos'd upon them with their expoſitions. Valeſ.

[c] 'Tis probable Origen was ſeen by Porphyrius in his younger daies, in the City of Tyre, where Origen, having left Alexandria, ſtaid ſome time. For Porphyrius was a Tyrian; and he was a young man at the ſame time when Origen made his abode at Tyre. But Porphyrius could by no means ſee Origen at Alexandria when he was an old man; becauſe when Origen left Alexandria he was not compleat fifty years old. Valeſ.

[d] We muſt believe Porphyrius, whenas he ſo expreſly affirms here, that Origen Adamantius (ſo he was called) was an Auditour of Ammonius Alexandrinus. But amongſt the Auditours of Ammonius there was at that time another Origen, School-fellow to Herennius and Plotinus; mentioned by Porphyrius (in vitâ Plotini,) by Longinus (in his book de fine,) by Eunapius, and Hierocles (in his book De Providentia.) Baronius (in his Annals,) and Lucas Holſtenius (in 2 and 6 cap. De vitâ Scriptiſque Porphyrii,) ſuppoſed this Origen to have been the ſame perſon with Origen Adamantius. But I diſſent from them, for theſe two reaſons eſpecially. (1.) Longinus the Philoſopher sopher (in his book De fine) reckons Ammonius and Origen, (Platonick Philosophers) among those, who would not commit to writing their Opinions for the benefit of posterity, but thought it sufficient to deliver them by word of mouth to their Auditours. If any thing be written by any of them, (these are the words of Longinus,) as indeed Origen did write one book De Dæmonibus, it is very little: for they seemed not to have made it their business to write books. These words cannot be supposed to have been spoken of Origen Adamantius, who, 'tis manifest, was a Voluminous Writer, as the Catalogue of his works recorded by Eusebius does manifest: Moreover, Porphyrius (in these words of his here quoted by Eusebius) saies Origen was eminently renowned upon account of his writings which he left behind him. (2.) Porphyrius (in his life of Plotinus, not far from the beginning,) has these words: But when Herennius, Origen, and Plotinus, had agreed amongst themselves, that they would not publish the Opinions of Ammonius, which having heard from him they approved of as most especially pure and refined; Plotinus was as good as his word: but Herennius first broke the compact; and afterwards Origen followed him: But Origen wrote nothing besides a book concerning Dæmons, and a piece in Gallienus's time, wherein he proved that the King was the onely Poet. This last book Origen wrote in praise of Gallienus the Emperour, to commend his Poetical faculty. For Gallienus was given to Poetry; and there are some nuptial verses of his extant amongst the fragments of Petronius Arbiter. Now, if it be true, that this Origen, School-fellow to Plotinus, wrote this book under Gallienus the Emperour, doubtless he must necessarily be distinguished from Origen Adamantius. For Origen Adamantius survived not the times of Gallienus, but died when Gallus and Volusianus were Emperours, in the year of Christ 252, having compleated the sixty ninth year of his age. Vales.

ANTONINUS. "of that Ammonius, who in our Age made a "great proficiency in Philosophy; as for his "knowledge in Philosophick Literature he pro- "fited much by this Master. But as concerning "a right course of life, he undertook a way quite "contrary to him: for Ammonius, having been "educated a Christian by Christian Parents, "when he arriv'd to understanding, and, [the "knowledge of] Philosophy, quickly betook "himself to a course of life which was agreeable "to the Laws. But Origen being a Gentile and "brought up in the Learning of the Grecians, "diverted to the [e] Impu- "dence of the Barbarians. "Being devoted to this [Re- "ligion] he [f] corrupted "both himself, and also that "proficiency he had made "in Philosophick Learning: "as to his manner of life he "liv'd like a Christian, and "contrary to the Laws: but "in respect of his Opinions "concerning things, and "concerning God, he imi- "tated the Grecians, [g] sub- "stituting the sayings of the "Heathens in the room of "those strange fables. For "he was continually con- "versant in Plato's [works,] "and in those of [h] Numenius "and Cronius, and he revol- "ved the works of [i] Apollo- "phanes and [k] Longinus, and "[l] Moderatus, and Nicomachus, and the works of "all the famous men amongst the Pythagoreans, [l] This Mo- "he also made use of the works of [m] Chæremon, deratus was "the Stoick, and of [n] Cornutus's books, when he born at "had learn'd from them the Gades now "Allegorical mode of ex- call'd Cales, an Island on the "plaining the Grecian My- South side of Spain without the "steries, he appli'd it to the Straits of Gibraltar: he wrote "Jewish Scriptures. These eleven books ἀγλῶν πυθαγορείων. "are Porphyrius's words in his Concerning Nicomachus; See third book of that piece he Photius, and Suidas. Vales. wrote against the Christians; [m] Chæremon was a Stoick Phi- who has said the truth con- losopher: Origen, in his books cerning the mans hard study against Celsus quotes Chæremon's and great learning; but here- book De Cometis: he taught Philo- in he has plainly lied, (for sophy at Alexandria, and Diony- what would not he say who sius Alexandrinus succeeded him wrote against the Christians?) in his School. See Suidas in Dio- in that he saies, that [Origen] nysio. Vales. Of this Chæ- was converted from a remon, see Martials Epig. book 11. Heathen to a Christian, and Epig. 57. that Ammonius fell from a [n] This Cornutus Afer Leptita- pious course of life to the nus taught Philosophy at Rome Heathenish way of living. in the Reign of Claudius Nero: For, (as our History has be- he wrote many things concerning fore manifested) Origen kept Philosophy, and Eloquence: Per- the Christian Doctrine re- sius dedicates his fifth Satyr to ceiv'd from his Ancestours: him, as to his Master: he wrote a And the precepts of the divine Philosophy re- book De Græcorum Theologia, which main'd uncorrupted, and unshaken in Ammonius is cited by the Etymologist in the even till his death; as his works even to this pre- word ζεύς. But the name is cor- sent doe testifie; he being famous amongst most rupted by Aldus Manutius and men for his books which he left behind him: as for call'd Phornutus. Vales. example, that book which is thus Intitl'd concerning the concord of Moses, and Jesus, and those other books of his, whatsoever sort they be of, which are found amongst lovers of learning. Let what we have said therefore be an Evidence both of the detraction of this lying Accuser, and also of Origens great knowledge in the Grecian learning. Concerning which, Origen (in an Epistle of his, wherein he makes an Apologie for himself, to some who blam'd him for his too great studiousness about this sort of learning) writes these words: "When I imploy'd my self wholly in the Scri- "pture, the fame of my progress in Learning "spreading it self every where, there resorting to "me sometimes Hereticks, at othertimes those "who studied the Grecian Learning, and especially "such as were skilled in Philosophy, I thought it "convenient to make researches into Hereticks "Opinions, and into whatsoever things are re- "ported to be said by Philosophers concerning "the truth: this we did, both in imitation of Pan- "tænus, who profited many before us, (who was "furnished with no small stock of provisions of "this sort:) And also of Heraclas, who at this "time sits among the Presbyters of Alexandria; "[o] whom I found with a "Philosophy Master, under "whom he studied diligently "five years before I began to "be an Auditour of his do- "ctrine. And for this rea- "son, he wearing a common "habit before, put it off, and "put on a [p] Philosophical "habit, which he [q] retains [e] The Heathens call'd the Christians and Jews Religion barbarous, as Justin, Tatianus and others affirm: So they termed every thing which was not Grecian. Porphyrius calls this barbarous Impudence, to despise the Roman Gods, and the Emperour's Edicts, to be forc'd by no Torments or Persecutions to sacrifice to those Heathen Gods. Vales.

[f] Καπηλεύειν Cauponari, to sell Wine or to keep a Victualling-house. Now because these Cauponæ us'd to cheat the buyers by mixing and dashing their Wines, and so enrich themselves; this word is us'd to adulterate or corrupt; as here, and likewise in holy Writ, in the 2d Epistle to the Corinthians Chap. 2. 17. we find, οὐ καπηλεύοντες τὸν λόγον not corrupting the Word of God. Vales.

[g] Ὑποβάλλομαι; Porphyrius takes this Metaphor from Huckfters, who, by counterfeiting false wares for true, circumvent the buyers: for [ὑποβάλλειν] signifies to suborn, to lay one thing for another: hence ὑποβολιμαῖον, a Changling a false child left in the place of one taken away. Thus Porphyrius saies Origen plaies the Huckster. Vales.

[h] Origen quotes this Numenius in his books against Celsus: he was a famous Pythagorean, born at Apamea in Syria. Longinus, in his book De Fine, mentions these Philosophers, Numenius, Cronius and Moderatus; who, he saies, connected Pythagoras's and Plato's Opinions together. Cronius's book περὶ παλιγγενεσίας is quoted by Nemesius in his book De Naturâ Hominis Cap. 2. Vales.

[i] Apollophanes is call'd by Stobæus, in his ἐκλογαὶ, the son of Ægimius. Vales.

[k] This was Cassius Longinus who has onely one book extant at this day, entitl'd De sublimi Genere dicendi; most men think he was a Grammarian: but he profess'd Philosophy as Suidas and others testifie: he was Porphyrius's Master in Platonick Philosophy at Athens. He liv'd in Origen's time, and was younger then him, and died a long time after him, 'tis a wonder therefore that Porphyrius should reckon him amongst the antient Philosophers. Vales.

[o] We may from these words gather that Heraclas and Origen had the same Philosophy Master, which Porphyrius affirms was Ammonius the most famous Philosopher of that Age. Vales.

[p] The Philosophick habit was the Pallium, or Cloak; which was the usual Badge of the Greek Philosophers, different from that which was worn by the ordinary Greeks; which those Christians still kept to, who before their conversion had been professed Philosophers: this our Eusebius affirms of Justin the Martyr (B. 4. Chap. 11.) ἐν φιλοσόφου σχήματι προσβεύων τὸν θεῖον λόγον, one that in a Philosophick habit was an assertour of the divine Word.

[q] Hence we may conjecture that the Clergie had at that time no peculiar habit; seeing that Heraclas, a Presbyter of Alexandria and afterwards Bishop, always retain'd his Philosophick habit. Vales.

ANTONINUS. "to this day, neither does he deſiſt from a ſtudious "reading of the books of the Learned Grecians. This he ſaid in defence of the ſtudious diligence he uſed about the Grecian [Learning.] At this time while he made his abode at Alexandria there came a Souldier who deliver'd Letters to Demetrius, the Biſhop of that Church, and to the then Prefect of Ægypt, from the Governour of Arabia, that they ſhould ſend Origen to him with all ſpeed that he might impart to him his doctrine. He was therefore ſent by them, and came to Arabia. But in a little time, having finiſht thoſe things which were the cauſe of his coming, he again return'd to Alexandria. Within ſome interval of time, there being kindled in Alexandria no ſmall war, he withdrew out of Alexandria, and judging there was no ſafe dwelling for him in Ægypt, he went to Paleſtine, and made his abode in Cæſarea; where the Biſhops of thoſe parts intreated him, although he was not yet Ordain'd Prieſt, to diſcourſe and to expound the holy Scriptures [r] publickly in the Church. This will be evidenc't by what Alexander, Biſhop of Jeruſalem, and Theoctiſtus Biſhop of Cæſarea wrote concerning him to Demetrius, who thus excuſe him. "[Your [s] Holineſs] has "added in your Letters that "this thing was never heard "of nor done till this time, "[to wit,] that Laicks "ſhould Preach in the pre- "ſence of Biſhops. I [t] know "not how you came ſo ap- "parently to miſrepreſent "the truth: For they are in- "vited to Preach to the peo- "ple, (when they are found "fit to profit the brethren) "by the holy Biſhops. For "example, Euelpis [was in- "vited to Preach] by Neon "at Laranda: and ſo was Paulinus by Celſus at [u] "Iconium. And Theodorus by Atticus at [u] Syn- "nada, who were our bleſſed Brethren. And "'tis not incredible that the like was done in "other places, though we never knew it. On this manner was the above nam'd Origen honour'd, though he was yet [x] young, not onely by his familiars, but alſo by forreign Biſhops. But Demetrius again recalling him by Letters, and urging his return to Alexandria by perſons that were Deacons of that Church, he return'd thither, and there executed his accuſtomed Office.

[r] Hence 'tis conjectur'd, that Origen Catechiz'd at Alexandria in a private Auditory, and not publickly in the Church; for had he before taught in the Church, Demetrius could not have brought this as an objection againſt Alexander, and Theoctiſtus. Wherefore Ruſinus miſtakes, who ſaies Demetrius permitted him to Catechize publickly in the Church. Valeſ.

[s] He writes to Demetrius the Biſhop in the third perſon; underſtanding Ἡ σὴ ἁγιότης Your Holineſs. And without doubt had we the whole Epiſtle we ſhould find theſe words to precede. Valeſ.

[t] Alexander Biſhop of Jeruſalem was a very eloquent man, and without doubt wrote this Epiſtle himſelf, which makes him uſe the firſt perſon here: but the letter was writ both in his name, and in the Biſhop of Cæſarea's. Valeſ.

[u] This Synnada is a very noted City of Phrygia, and as Stephanus, in his book De Urbibus writes, it ought to be written with a double (n,) though ſome write it with a ſingle one, it is deriv'd from συνναίω, cohabito, to dwell together, becauſe many flock'd from Macedonia to dwell together there, from whence it was firſt call'd Συννάδα, but was corrupted by the interpoſition of (ν.) There is alſo ſome old pieces of Caracalla's Coin with this inſcription CYNNAΔEΩN, ΔΩPIEΩN IΩNΩN. Hence it appeares theſe Synnadenſes were Doricks mix'd with Ionians, for they were originally Macedonians, and therefore Doricks, though they liv'd in the midſt of Ionia. Valeſ.

[x] Origen was about 30 years old when he came into Paleſtine: for according to our Euſebius's account in this place, he went thither about the end of Antoninus Caracalla's Reign. Valeſ.

CHAP. XX.

What Books are now extant of ſuch as Wrote in theſe times.

AT this time flouriſh'd many Learned Eccleſiaſtick perſons, whoſe Epiſtles, which they wrote to one another 'tis an eaſie thing to meet with, being preſerv'd till this preſent. For they have been kept even in our Age in the Library of the City Ælia, which was built by Alexander, who preſided over the Church which is there: Out of this Library we our ſelves have gather'd together matter for this ſubject now in hand. Beryllus, Biſhop of Boſtra in Arabia, being one of them, left, together with his Epiſtles and Commentaries, [a] Several other monuments of his Polite Ingenie. In like manner did [b] Hippollitus, who preſided over another Church ſomewhere; there came alſo to our hands a diſputation attempted by one [c] Caius, a moſt eloquent man, at Rome in the times of Zephyrinus, againſt Proclus who was a defender of the Cataphrygian Hereſie. In which diſpute, he ſilencing the adverſaries raſhneſs and boldneſs in compoſing new Scriptures, mentions onely thirteen Epiſtles of the divine Apoſtle [Paul,] not accounting that to the Hebrews amongſt the reſt: Indeed even till this preſent 'tis thought by ſome of the Romans that that Epiſtle was not written by this Apoſtle. ANTONINUS.

[b] Tis true, the Antients call'd φιλοκαλίας, things ſelected, or excerptions out of any Authour, ſuch are Origen's Philocaliæ: Such alſo are Apulcius's libri floridorum. But this ſignification does not well agree with this place; becauſe Euſebius does not mention that Beryllus ſelected them out of any books. And likewiſe he adds Διαφόρους Several. And 'tis not likely that Beryllus ſhould compoſe ſeveral books upon ſo ſlight an Argument: therefore 'tis better to tranſlate it (as we have done) elegantis ingenii monumenta, i. e. monuments of his Polite Ingenie. He ſeems to mean Hymns and Poems. And in this ſenſe, Phrynicus uſes this word in his Epiſtle to Menodorus. Valeſ.

[c] Georgius Syncellus, Nicephorus and others affirm that this Hippolytus was Biſhop of Portua: Theodoret who quotes him much, terms him a Martyr, and a Biſhop, but does not mention where: Gelaſius, in his book, De Duabus Naturis ſtiles him a Martyr, and calls him Biſhop of the Metropolis of Arabia. Valeſ.

[d] This Sect of the Cataphrygæ was divided into two parts; the leader of one part of them was Proclus, and over the other parties Æſchines was their chief, as Tertullian atteſts. Thoſe which adher'd to Proclus were call'd οἱ κατὰ Πρόκλον, or Proclus's men; as Tertullian again witneſſes. Hence we may ſafely conclude, that Proclus was a Grecian. Beſides, Caius wrote againſt this Proclus in Greek: wherefore we muſt not aſſent to Baronius, who ſays that this Proclus and Proculus the African, who as Tertullian ſaies wrote againſt the Valentinians, were one and the ſame perſon. Now if theſe were one and the ſame, why ſhould Tertulliam call one of them Proculus a Latine name, and the other Πρόκλος in Greek: concerning Caius's book againſt Proclus, ſee Photius's Biblioth. But Theodoret inſtead of Πρόκλος writes Πάτροκλος, this book of Proclus was a Dialogue in which Proclus was brought in defending Montanus's Prophecie. See the 3d book of this Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, Chap. 31. Valeſ.

[e] Euſebius before in the 3d book, and 3d Chapter diſputing about Pauls Epiſtles, ſays that ſome rejected the Epiſtle to the Hebrews as falſe, averring that the Church of Rome queſtion'd the Authority of that Epiſtle. Amongſt the Roman Authors, who doubted the Authority of this Epiſtle, Hippolytus the afore nam'd Biſhop of Portua may be reckoned; for he in his book againſt Hereſies, has affirm'd that the Epiſtle to the Hebrews is not Paul's the Apoſtles. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXI.

What Biſhops were eminent in thoſe times.

BUt now Macrinus ſucceeded Antoninus after he had Reign'd ſeven years and ſix moneths, who having continued [Emperour] about a year, another Antoninus again aſſumes the Roman Empire. In the firſt year of his Reign Zephyrinus Biſhop of Rome departed this life, having held that [Epiſcopal] charge eighteen years compleat. After him Calliſtus preſides in the Biſhoprick. He having ſurvived five years, leaves the [care of the] Church to Urbanus. After this Alexander the Emperour ſucceeds in the Roman Empire, Antoninus having Reigned onely four years. At this time Philetus ſucceeded Aſclepiades, in the Church of Antioch: Now [Alexander] the Emperour's mother whoſe name was Mamæa, being a moſt pious woman, and Religious ALEXANDER ligious in her conversation, (Origen's fame being now every where so spread abroad, that it came even to her eares,) was mightily desirous to see the man, and to make tryal of his knowledge in Divine matters, which was so admir'd by all men: She therefore making her abode at Antioch, sends a military guard for him: when he had spent some time with her, and had demonstrated to her most things which tend to the glory of God, and the power of the divine Doctrine, he hastned to his wonted charge.

CHAP. XXII.

How many of Hippolytus*'s works are come to our hands.*

AT this time also Hippolytus, amongst many other works of his, compil'd a book also [a] concerning Easter. In which having explain'd the Series of Times, and set forth a Canon of sixteen years, concerning Easter, he determines his computation at the first year of Alexander the Emperour. Now the rest of his works, which came to our hands are these: Upon the six daies Work. Upon those things [b] which followed upon the six daies Work. Against Marcion. [c] Upon the Canticles. Upon some Chapters of Ezekiel. Concerning Easter. [d] Against all Heresies. And many more which you may find preserv'd amongst many men.

[a] Hippolytus's Canon Paschalis is extant till this day, which Joseph Scaliger has inserted into his book De Emendatione Temporum. And Ægidius Bucherius translated it into Latine, but neither of them takes notice that this Canon is onely a part of the book which he wrote Concerning Easter. And through his inadvertency Scaliger blames this place of Eusebius, and saies that Hippolytus's Canon does not end at the first year of Alexander's Reign, but begins there: which is really true: but Eusebius does not speak concerning the Canon which Hippolytus annex'd to his books, but concerning the book it self, which ends at the first year of Alexander the Emperours Reign. Vales.

[b] He means the second Chapter of Genesis, as Scaliger notes. Where also he reproves Hieronymus as if he had been ignorant of it, but undeservedly: for when Hieronymus says he wrote upon Genesis, he means as well his books on the Hexameron, as those on the Post-Hexameron. Vales.

[c] Theodoret in his book call'd Eranistes quotes this book of Hippolytus. Vales.

[d] Concerning this book of Hippolytus's, See Photii Biblioth, Chap. 121. This book was written against 32 Heresies; the first of which was the Dosithean, the last the Noetian Heresie. Which Heresies Irenæus having confuted in his Sermons, Hippolytus his Schollar wrote an Epitome thereof. Stephanus Gobarus has often quoted this piece of Hippolytus's, as appears from his 7, 10, and 13. chap. B. 2. Vales.

CHAP. XXIII.

Concerning Origen*'s Studiousness, and how he was honour'd with the dignity of Priesthood.*

[a] Here the Maz. M.S. and that most excellent Copie of Rufinus which we have often quoted, begin this chap. 23. But Rufinus's book instead of chap. 23. calls it the 20. Hieronymus takes these words [ὃς ἐκεῖνος] in a bad sence, as if Origen had set himself to write in emulation of Hippolytus; and referrs ὃς ἐκεῖνος to Hippolytus: which is not so, for we must understand χρόνος which thing is common, and so the sence is plain, to wit, from this time. Vales.

ABout this time was the beginning of Origen's writing Commentaries upon the holy Scriptures: Ambrosius chiefly inciting him to it by innumerable instigations, not with supplications and bare words onely, but also with most plentifull supplies of all things necessary: For there were alwaies by him when he dictated, more in number then seven Notaries, which at set times chang'd courses with one another. Neither was there a less number of them which wrote books fair, together with Girls who had been instructed to write neatly and handsomely. To all these Ambrosius liberally afforded a sufficient supply of all things necessary. And indeed he conveigh'd into Origen an unspeakable alacrity, in his study and labour about the divine Oracles. By which means chiefly he induced him to write Commentaries: whilest these things were in this posture, Pontianus succeeds Urbanus who had been Bishop of Rome eight years: And Zebinus [succeeds] Philetus in the Bishoprick of Antioch. At which time, (the necessitie of the [b] Churches Affaires constraining him) Origen made a journey through Palestine into Greece; And received the Order of Priesthood at Cæsarea, by the imposition of the hands of the Bishops there. But what combustions were hereupon rais'd concerning him, and what [c] Decrees were made by the Prelates of the Churches upon these commotions: And what ever else he, continuing to be of great esteem, contributed to the Preaching of the divine Word: [these things] requiring a distinct Volume, we have in some measure declared in the second book of our Apologie, which we wrote in defence of him.

[b] Rufinus's Version may here well serve instead of a Comment upon this place, who has rendred it thus, he was intreated by the Churches of Achaia to come thither to convince Hereticks, who grew strong in those parts. So also says Hieronymus in his Catalogue. Vales.

[c] Eusebius ought here to have recited the decrees of the Bishops against Origen, as being matter most accommodate to an Ecclesiastick History; and might better have omitted other things concerning him, and have inserted these, as most pertinent: but we ought not to blame Eusebius for this omission here, because it had been superfluous, having before declared them in his second book De Defensione Origenis: which books some men, through their immoderate hatred to Origen, envied us the use of. There is nothing of Eusebius, and Pamphilus the Martyrs Apologia Origenis extant, except some fragments which Photius preserv'd as it were from shipwrack. He, in his Biblioth, chap. 118. says that there were two Synods summon'd against Origen; the first decreed that Origen should be banisht out of the Church of Alexandria, but did not divest him of his Priesthood: the second, which was assembled by Demetrius, consisting of Ægyptian Bishops, degraded Origen from the Office of a Priest, to which Decree almost all the Bishops of the world subscrib'd, as Hieronymus says, whose words Rufinus relates in 2 Apolog. Hironymus also adds that he was not onely depos'd but also excommunicated by Demetrius. But this Decree of Demetrius's was ineffectual, for two reasons, first, because he issu'd it out against him, in his absence, without any legal citation; and secondly, because this sentence was not confirm'd by the Authority of many Bishops, particularly not by the Bishop of Rome. Wherefore Origen still retain'd his Priests-Office, and continued Preaching in the Church, as Eusebius witnesses in this book, and Pamphilus in his first book Apologiæ Originis. Vales.

CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning the Expositions he made at Alexandria.

BUt 'twas necessary for us to have annex'd these [a] to the things afore-mention'd; for in his sixth book of his Expositions upon John's [Gospel] he declares he compos'd those five first books while he yet liv'd at Alexandria. But onely [b] twenty two books of his works upon that Gospel are come to our hands. In his ninth book also upon Genesis (for there are twelve in all) he manifests that he did not onely write those first eight books at Alexandria, but also those Comments upon the twenty five first Psalms: And moreover those Comments upon the Lamentations, five books of which came to our hands. In which books there is some mention of his

[a] He means, he ought to have adjoyned these things to what he has said in his second book of his Apology. Vales.

[b] There were thirty four books of Origen's Expositions upon John, as Hieronymus says; but onely nine are now remaining, which are still divided into thirty-four. Vales.

ALEXANDER books upon the [e] Reſurrection: thoſe alſo are two Volumes. Indeed he alſo wrote his books De Principiis, before his removal from Alexandria. He alſo compos'd thoſe books intitl'd [d] Stromata, which are ten in Number, in that City in the Reign of Alexander, as his [e] Annotations written with his own hand, and prefixt before thoſe books do manifeſt.

[c] Hieronymus in his Apology makes this ſhort Catalogue of Origen's Works: 13 books upon Geneſis, two books of Myſtical Homilies: Excerptions upon Exodus: Excerptions upon Leviticus: Alſo Monobiblia: four books De Principiis: two books concerning the Reſurrection; and two other Dialogues concerning the Reſurrection. Methodius the Biſhop wrote an excellent book of the Reſurrection, againſt Origen's books upon the ſame ſubject, as Hieronymus in his book De Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis, and Maximus in his Scholia upon Dionyſius's Eccleſiaſtick Hierarchy, do teſtifie: there are excellent fragments of this Methodius's book of the Reſurrection, in Epiphanius againſt the Origeniſts, and in Photius's Biblioth. And I think 'tis for no other reaſon, that Euſebius never mentions this Methodius, (whereas he mentions ſeveral Eccleſiaſtick Writers far inferiour to him,) but this, that he wrote againſt Origen: Euſebius, being a very great favourer of Origen, could not endure this man's name in his Hiſtory, becauſe he was not his friend. Valeſ.

[d] Hieronymus in his Epiſtle to Magnus the Roman Orator, ſays Origen wrote theſe ten books in imitation of Clemens; for the Argument of theſe books and Clemens's afore-mention'd are alike. Hierom alſo cites a piece of theſe books in his Apology againſt Ruſinus not far from the beginning. Valeſ.

[e] Tranſlatours did not underſtand what theſe ὁλόγραφοι ὑπομνήσεις were: ὁλόγραφοι in this place is the ſame as ἰδιόγραφοι, written with his own hand. The Lawyers call a Will ὁλόγραφον which is written with the Teſtatour's own hand, and not onely confirm'd by his ſubſcription. So Euſebius here calls thoſe notes ὁλόγραφοι which were written with Origen's own hand, and either prefix'd or annexed to every Tome. For 'twas uſuall for Authours to note ſomething with their own hands either at the beginning, or end of their books. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXV.

After what manner Origen has mentioned the Books of the Old and New Teſtament.

BUt in his Explication of the firſt Pſalm, he has exhibited a Catalogue of the holy Scriptures of the Old Teſtament, writing on this manner word for word. "[a] We muſt underſtand that, as the Hebrew Traditions ſay, there "are [b] twenty two bookes of "the Old Teſtament; juſt ſo "many in number as they "have letters. A little after he adds, ſaying; "Theſe are "the twenty two books according to the Hebrews. "That which we give the "Title of Geneſis to, is by "the Hebrews, from the beginning of the book entitl'd Breſith, that is, in the "beginning. Exodus, Velleſmoth, that is, theſe are the "names. Leviticus, Vaicra, "that is, and he hath called. "Numbers the Hebrews call "[c] Hammiſphecodim. Deuteronomie, Helle-haddabarim, that is, theſe are the "words. Jeſus the Son of "Nave, [in Hebrew] Jehoſue Ben Nun. Judges, "Ruth, are by them comprehended in one book, and "call'd Sophetim. The firſt "and ſecond of Kings, among them one book, "termed Samuel, that is, called of God. The "third and fourth of Kings, amongſt the Hebrews "one book, call'd Vammelech David, that is, the "Kingdom of David. The firſt and ſecond "book of Coronicles, in one Volume, call'd Dibre "Hajamim, that is, The words of Days. Eſdras "the firſt and ſecond book, by them made one "book call'd, Eſra, that is, A helper. The book "of Pſalms, Sepher Tehillim [in Hebrew.] Solomon's Proverbs, in Hebrew, Miſloth. Eccleſiaſtes, Coheleth. [d] The "Song of Songs, Sir-Haſirim. [e] Eſaias, Ieſaia, Hierimas with his Lamentations, and his Epiſtle, all in "one book, call'd Jermia. "Daniel, [The Hebrews "alſo call] Daniel. Ezechiel, Jeezchel, Job, Job; "Eſter, Eſter alſo among the "Hebrews. Beſides theſe "there are (but not of their "number) the Maccabees, "which are intitl'd Sarbet "Surbane-el. Theſe Origen has ſet forth in the aforeſaid work. But in the firſt book of his Comments upon Matthew's Goſpel, obſerving the Canon of the Church, he atteſts there are onely four Goſpels, in theſe words: "As I [f] have underſtood by Tradition, "there are four Goſpels, "which, and onely which "are to be allow'd without contradiction by the "Church of God under heaven. As for the firſt, "'twas written by one Matthew formerly a Publican, "but afterwards an Apoſtle "of Jeſus Chriſt, he publiſht "it, being written in Hebrew, for the ſake of thoſe "Jews who believ'd. The "ſecond is Mark's Goſpel; "who wrote it as Peter expounded to him; whom "alſo he confeſſes to be his "Son, in his Catholick Epiſtle, and in theſe words, [g] The Church which "is at Babylon elected together with you ſaluteth "you, and ſo doth Marcus my Son. And the "third is the Goſpel according to Luke, which "is commended by Paul, he wrote it for the ſake "of the Heathens. Laſtly S[t] John's Goſpel. And "the ſame Writer in the "[h] fifth book of his Expoſitions upon John has theſe "words concerning the Apoſtle's Epiſtles. Paul being made a fit Miniſter of "the New Teſtament, not in "the Letter, but in the Spirit, "he who [i] fully Preacht the "Goſpel from Jeruſalem round "about to Illyricum, wrote "not to all thoſe Churches "which he taught; But to "thoſe to whom he wrote "he ſent [Epiſtles that contained] but a few verſes. "But Peter [k] on whom the

[a] This whole quotation is to be ſeen in Origen's Philocalia; chap. 3. but that place of the Philocalia muſt be corrected by this, for there εἴκοσιν inſtead of εἴκοσι is read. And this is the common miſtake of all Editions that they writ εἴκοσιν when the word following begins with a vowel. But in all good Copies εἴκοσι is written, although a vowel follow. Valeſ.

[b] Victorinus upon the Apocalyps ſays, there are twenty four books of the Old Teſtament; twenty two you may find in Theodotus his Excerptions. Some reckon'd twenty two, ſome twenty four books of the Old Teſtament: hence aroſe this different account ſaith Hieronymus, becauſe ſome reckon'd the book of Ruth, and that of the Lamentations of Jeremiah in the Catalogue of Scriptures apart by themſelves. Others, as Hilarius ſays, added Tobias, and Judith to make 24 books of the Old Teſtament; Epiphanius ſays, that ſome reckon'd up twenty ſeven books of the Old Teſtament. Valeſ.

[c] I know not what Copy Robert Stephens follows, who here reads it ἀμμιπαειμ ὅ πεκδλμ. for in the Kings, the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M.SS. ἀμμισφεκωδείμ, is the reading. Valeſ.

[d] Some books adde this clauſe, ἃ δὲ ὡς ἁπολαμβάνοι τινὲς ἆσμα ἀσμάτων, not as ſome think the Song of Songs. This we have omitted in our Edition, but 'tis in the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. and alſo in the King's Copy, and in Ruſinus's Tranſlation of this place. Valeſ.

[e] In this Catalogue the book of the twelve minor Prophets is left out. Hence it comes to paſs that although Origen promiſes to reckon up twenty two books, we can find but one and twenty. In Ruſinus's Verſion this book is reckon'd immediately after the Canticles. So alſo Hilarius and Cyrill of Jeruſalem doe reckon them. The books of the holy Scripture are recounted here in a different order to Epiphanius, Hieronymus, and Melito's reckoning of them: but Hilarius in his Prologue to his Commentaries upon the Pſalmes, agrees all along with Origen; and no wonder, for that Prologue is almoſt all of it a Tranſlation of Origen's Comments upon the Pſalms. Valeſ.

[f] Theſe are Origen's own words, and ſo Ruſinus, Langus and Muſculus Tranſlated them: onely Chriſtophorſon thought they are Euſebius's own words: to whom we cannot conſent, although in the Maz. and Med. M. SS. after the word [μαθὼν] there is a final diſtinction; but in the King's Copy the whole clauſe is continued without any diſtinction. Moreover, beſides this place quoted by Euſebius, Origen alſo in another place (that is, in the beginning of his Comments upon Luke) ſays there were four Goſpels onely which were allowed by the Catholick Church. Valeſ.

[g] 1 Pet. 5. 13.

[h] This place of Origen, which Euſebius here quotes, is in the Preface to the fifth book of his Expoſitions upon John; the greateſt part of this Preface is extant in the fifth Chapter of his Philocalia. Therefore this place here quoted by Euſebius muſt be joyn'd to that fragment. In that Preface Origen raiſes this diſpute, whether many books are to be written concerning Sacred things? And he proves it from Eccleſiaſtes 11. 12. Alſo he brings for proof the examples of holy men, Prophets and Apoſtles, who wrote very little. But theſe examples the Collector of the Philocaliæ on ſet purpoſe omitted, as he himſelf confeſſes. Valeſ. [i] Rom. 15. 19.

Church

"Church of Christ was builded, against which the "gates of hell shall not prevail, left but one E- "pistle which is acknowledg'd to be his. But "let us grant that the second is his too, for it is "question'd whether it be his or not. But what "must we say of John, [1] he who lay in Christ's "bosome? He left behind him but one Gospel, "[though] he professes he could have written "[m] so many books, as the world could not have "contain'd. He also wrote the Revelation: be- "ing commanded to be silent, [n] and not to write "the voices of the Seven Thunders. He also left "to posterity a very short Epistle. But let us "grant that the second and third were his: for "all men do not allow them to be genuine: "both of them doe not contain above an hundred "verses. Besides, he discourses thus concerning the Epistle to the Hebrews in his Homilies upon that Epistle. "For the stile of that Writing en- "titled The Epistle to the Hebrews, has nothing of "that plain homelineſs of the Apostle [Paul,] "who confesses himself to be unlearn'd in his "speech, that is, in his manner of Expression. But "this Epistle as to the composition of the stile "savours much of the Grecian eloquence, this "every one will confess who knowes how to "judge of Stiles, which are different. Again, the "sentences of this Epistle are admirable, and no- "thing inferiour to those books which are acknow- "leg'd to be Apostolick. And this every one "will assent to as true, who gives attention to the "reading of the Apostles writings. After the interposition of some words, Origen addes these, saying: [o] "This is my Opinion that the sen- "tences, are the sentences of an Apostle: but the "Phrase and Composition is some ones else, who "committed to writing the words of the Apostle, "and as it were illustrated with Explications the "words of his Master. If any Church therefore "accounts this to be Paul's Epistle, let it be com- "mended even for so doing: for the Antients did "not inconsiderately declare it to be Paul's E- "pistle. But God alone truely knows who wrote "this Epistle. But of those written records which "are come to our hands, some ascribe the writing "of this Epistle to Clemens who was Bishop of "Rome; others to Luke who wrote the Gospel, and "the Acts. But thus far concerning this.

o Απομνημονεύειν, signifies to remember, to repeat a thing by heart, as Schollars do who repeat their Master's Dictates, ὑπομνηματογραφεῖν, signifies to illustrate, or make a thing plain by short Scholia's, or Explications; that is to explain obscure words, by other words more common and known. The Translatours, and especially Christophorson, seem by their Versions not to have understood this passage. Origen says, that the sentences of The Epistle to the Hebrews, are the Apostles own; but the words and composition of the whole Epistle are some bodies else, who recorded the sayings of the Apostle, and, like a Scholiast, explained them more elegantly. See Chap. 18. B. 4 note (b.) Vales.

CHAP. XXVI.

How Heraclas succeeded in the Bishoprick of Alexandria.

[p] In the Maz. Med. Fuk. & Savil. M. SS. and in Nicephorus, instead of [Δέκατον, the Tenth] it is [Δωδέκατον, the Twelfth.] In Eusebius's Chronicon this remove of Origen from Alexandria to Cæsarea is (in some Copies) placed on the 12 year of Alexander, as Pontacus attests. Eusebius does strangely disagree from himself, who in his Chronicon Records this removal of Origen a year, or two years after the death of Demetrius. But here he says Origen removed from Alexandria a little before Demetrius dyed. This last account I suppose to be truest. For after Demetrius's death, Origen had no reason to leave Alexandria: especially when Heraclas, one of Origen's Schollars succeeded Demetrius. Besides, Eusebius relates in this Chapter, that when Origen departed from Alexandria, he left his Catechetick Office to Heraclas. Whence it appears, that Origen departed from Alexandria a little before Demetrius pronounc't the sentence of Excommunication against him. For after that sentence he could not hold his Office of Catechist in the Church of Alexandria. Baronius therefore has done well in amending Eusebius's Chronicon, in placing Origen's departure from Alexandria on the Tenth year of Alexander's Reign, and the death of Demetrius on the year following. But he mistakes in saying Demetrius pronounc't the sentence of Excommunication against Origen a year before he left Alexandria; which we have evidently refuted. For since Origen kept his Office of Catechist till such time as he resigned it to Heraclas at his departure, 'tis plain he departed before the sentence of Excommunication was pronounc't against him. Moreover, when Origen understood he was Excommunicated by Demetrius in the Synod of the Bishops, he wrote a letter to his friends at Alexandria, in which he inveighs against Demetrius and the rest of the Bishops. Jerom (in B. 2. Adverſ. Rufin.) quotes part of this Letter. Further, Origen had once before retired to Cæsarea, in the times of Antoninus Caracalla; but was in a short time honourably recalled by Demetrius to Alexandria, as was before related. But afterwards, when he went into Achaia, passing through Cæsarea-Palestine, he was there ordained Presbyter. Vales.

sarea, and left the care of his Catechetick School to [b] Heraclas: and not long after dy'd Demetrius, the Bishop of the Church of Alexandria, having continu'd in that Office fourty three years compleat. Heraclas succeeded him. At this time Firmilianus, Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia was very famous.

b Heraclas, as 'tis before related. Chap. 15. was Origen's Assistant onely: but after his departure, he was Catechist. Vales.

CHAP. XXVII.

How the Bishops had him in admiration.

[*] HE had so great an esteem for Origen, that he both invited him into the Countries of his Province for the good of the Churches; and also at another time went into Judæa to visit him, and to stay some time with him, to improve himself in the knowledge of Divine matters. Besides, Alexander Bishop of Jerusalem, and Theoctistus Bishop of Cæsarea, at all times (as one may say,) were attentive to him, as if he had been their Master, and permitted onely him to expound the holy Scriptures, and to perform all other things appertaining to Eccleſiastick doctrine.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Concerning the Persecution under Maximinus

MAXIMINUS.

MOreover, Maximinus Cæsar succeeded Alexander the Roman Emperour, after he had Reign'd thirteen years. He, because of his hatred to Alexander's family, which consisted of many believers, rais'd a Persecution, and gave command that onely the Prelates of the Churches should be slain, as the Authours of the Preaching of the Gospel. And at that time Origen compos'd his book concerning Martyrdom, which he Dedicated to Ambrosius, and Protoctetus, a Presbyter of the Church of Cæsarea. Because no trivial peril and afflictions seized on them both during the times of this Persecution. Fame Records the illustrious eminency of these men for their confession [of the Christian faith,] [a] when Maximinus had not Reign'd above three years. Origen remarkes the time of this Persecution, both in the twenty second book of his Expositions upon John, and in several of his Epistles.

a Christophorson did not at all understand the meaning of this place, for he thinks that Ambrosius, and Protoctetus were afflicted for the Name of Christ about the end of Maximinus's Reign: but Eusebius does not say so; he onely means thus much, that the Persecution continu'd all Maximinus's Reign, but that his days were shortned, as the Scripture pture ſays of Antichriſt. Moreover, this Perſecution begun when Maximin was Emperour, (after a long continu'd Peace in the Church,) becauſe of frequent, and moſt dreadfull Earthquakes, which the Heathens, as they uſually did, imputed to the Chriſtians. Firmilianus in his Epiſtle to Cyprian atteſts this: See Baronius at the year of Chriſt, 237. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIX.

Concerning Fabian, how unexpectedly he was Elected by God Biſhop of Rome.

GORDIANUS. Gordianus having ſucceeded Maximinus in the Roman Empire, Anteros ſucceeds Pontianus, who had been Biſhop of the Church of Rome ſix years. And Fabian ſucceeds him after he had perform'd the Office for a month. They report that after the death of Anteros, Fabian, together with ſome others of his acquaintance, came out of the Countrey to Rome to ſojourn there: where he unexpectedly came to be elected Biſhop, through the Divine and Celeſtial Grace. For when all the Brethren were aſſembled together in the Church, in order to the Election of one who ſhould ſucceed in the Biſhoprick, and many of them had intentions of [Electing] ſeveral eminent and worthy men, Fabian being there preſent, no one ſo much as thought of him. But on a ſudden, as they report, a Dove came flying from above, and ſate upon his head, which ſeem'd to be a repreſentation of the Deſcent of the holy Ghoſt upon our Saviour in the ſhape of a Dove: upon which all the people, being at the ſame time moved as it were by the divine Spirit, cry'd out with all imaginable alacrity and one common conſent, [a] He is worthy: And without any delay they took him, and ſet him in the Biſhops Chaire. At that time alſo Zebinus the Biſhop of Antioch dying, Babylas ſucceeded in the preſidency. Heraclas alſo takes upon him the [Epiſcopal] charge of the Church at Alexandria, after Demetrius [b] had executed that Office for fourty three years. And Dionyſius ſucceeds in the Catechetick School there, who alſo was one of Origen's Scholars.

[a] This was the common acclamation at the Election of Biſhops, of which we have many examples in Philoſtorgius, in his tenth chapter of the 9th book. And in the relation of what things were done at Eradius's Election, (recorded in Auguſtine's Epiſtles) theſe acclamations are read, which were then us'd: they cry'd out twenty times, Dignus, & juſtus eſt, he is worthy and juſt; and five times, bene meritus, bene dignus eſt, he is very deſerving, he is very worthy. Valeſ.

[b] The Med. Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. adde theſe words, had executed that Office for fourty three years: but the Kings M. S. and Rufinus own them not. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXX.

Who were Origen's Schollars.

WHileſt Origen executed his accuſtomed duty at Cæſarea, many, not onely Natives of that Countrey, but alſo infinite others, from places moſt remote, forſaking their own Countries, reſorted to him to be his diſciples. The moſt eminent of them, we underſtand, were Theodorus, (who was alſo call'd Gregorius, one of the moſt famous Biſhops in our Age,) and his brother Athenodorus. He by perſwaſion induc'd them (being too much addicted to the love of the [a] Roman and Greek Learning, having infus'd into them a love of Philoſophy,) to exchange their former ſtudies, for the ſtudy of Divinity: when they had convers'd with him five years compleat, they made ſo great an improvement [of their knowledge] in the divine Scriptures, that while they were both as yet young, they were judg'd worthy of the Government of the Churches in Pontus.

[a] Euſebius means by the Roman Learning, the Civil Law, which Gregory learn't at the City Berytus, at that time when Origen perſwaded him to nobler ſtudies, as he, in his Oration to Origen teſtifies: The ſame thing alſo Origen atteſts in his Epiſtle to Gregory, Chap 13. of his Philocal. Valeſ.

GORDIANUS.

CHAP. XXXI.

Concerning Africanus.

AT this time Africanus, [a] the Authour of the books entitled Ceſti was very famous; there is exſtant an Epiſtle of his written to Origen, in which he ſuſpects the Hiſtory of Suſanna in Daniel, to be ſpurious, and fictitious. Origen very fully anſwers this Epiſtle. There alſo came to our hands five books of this ſame Africanus's Annalls, written with great care and accuracy. In which books he ſays he took a journey to Alexandria, becauſe of the great fame of Heraclas; who, as we before ſignifi'd, was intruſted with the care of the Church there for his eminent knowledge in Philoſophie, and other Heathen Learning. There is alſo exſtant another Epiſtle of this ſame Africanus's to Ariſtides, concerning the diſagreement which is thought to be betwixt Matthew and Luke, in the Relation of Chriſt's Genealogy. In which he manifeſtly demonſtrates the conſent of the Evangeliſts, out of an Hiſtory which came to his hands; which [Epiſtle] we alſo took, and placed it in the firſt * book of this work in hand, being its proper place.

[a] I ſuppoſe that theſe words, (viz.) the Authour of the books entitl'd Ceſti, ought to be raz'd out, for the clauſe is neither in Rufinus's Verſion, nor in Hieronymus. Beſides, it ſeems ridiculous when he here ſpeaks of an Eccleſiaſtick Writer, to mention thoſe books firſt, which contain'd nothing elſe, but certain Medicines made up of Herbs, Metals, Magick figures, Charms, and the like: for, as Suidas witneſſes, theſe Ceſti contain nothing elſe, and have their Title from Venus's Ceſtus, or Girdle, becauſe they treat of love affaires. Beſides, this Africanus, the Authour of theſe Ceſti; ſeems to be a diſtinct perſon from Africanus the Chronologer, whom Euſebius mentions, for as Suidas ſays, this Authour of the Ceſti was a Libyan by birth, and was call'd Σέξ]Θ. But Scaliger in his Animadverſions upon Euſebius calls him Sextus Africanus. But perhaps that Σέξ]Θ in Suidas ought to be made ΚέσΘ. And ſo he may be call'd Africanus Ceſtus from the title of his books, even as Clemens was call'd Stromateus. But this Africanus the Chronologer was born in Paleſtine ſays Euſebius's Chronicle; and in a town call'd Emmaus, and his name was Julius Africanus, this Africanus was a Chriſtian, but the other was a Heathen, as appears by his books. There was alſo another Julius Africanus who wrote a book De Apparatu Bellico, which book in the M. S. Copy of the King's Library has the title of ΚέσΤΟΣ, and under that title it is quoted by Politianus in his Miſcellanies. The Grecians indeed were proud in prefixing titles before their books, they ſeem therefore to call thoſe books Ceſti which were fill'd with knowledge of divers kinds, like the Ceſtus, which amongſt the Grecians ſignifies a Girdle wrought of divers colours: for that ſame reaſon were Clemens's books call'd Stromata. Valeſ. * Book 1. What Expoſitions Origen wrote at Cæſarea in Paleſtine.

ABout this time Origen wrote his [Comments] upon Eſaias, and thoſe upon Ezekiel at the ſame time, of which books, there came to our hands thirty five Volumes upon the third part of Eſaias, unto the Viſion of the four footed beaſts in the wilderneſs: And twenty five Volumes upon Ezekiel, which were all he wrote upon the whole Prophet: making his abode at that time at Athens, he finiſh'd his Commentaries upon Ezekiel: He alſo begun his Comments upon the Canticles, and there proceeded in them to the fifth book: but GORDIANUS. but he afterwards return'd to Cæsarea, and there finish'd them, being ten books in number. But what necessity is there at present to write an exact Catalogue of this mans works, which requires a work it self; which we have also written in our [a] History of Pamphilus's Life, the blessed [b] Martyr of our times. In which, endeavouring to prove how great Pamphilus's care and love towards sacred Learning was, we have publish'd the Catalogues of Origen's works, and of several other Ecclesiastick Writers which he Collected. From whence, he that is desirous, may have a full information concerning all the Monuments of Origen's labours which came to our hands. But now we must proceed to the subsequent series of our History.

[a] Eusebius wrote three most elegant books concerning Pamphilus the Martyr's Life, as Hieronymus witnesseth in his 1. Apology against Rufinus; where he also quotes a piece of that work, out of the third book; he also mentions those books in his Epistle to Marcella; 'twas in Eusebius's third book De Vitâ Pamphili, wherein he wrote a Catalogue of Origen's works. Vales.

[b] The Med. and Fuk. M. SS. read it ἱερομάρτυρ, all in one word, not ἱερὸς μάρτυρ. The Greeks call those ἱερομάρτυρες who were both Martyrs, and Priests: therfore Pamphilus being a Presbyter, and a Martyr, may well be stil'd ἱερομάρτυς. The Greeks in their Menologies have three sorts of Martyrs, some they call μεγαλομάρτυρες, i.e. great Martyrs: some ὁσιομάρτυρες, i.e. holy Martyrs, others ἱερομάρτυρες that is the Bishops, or sometimes Presbyters who suffer'd Martyrdome: all the rest they call μάρτυρες, barely Martyrs: there is also another title yet, namely, πρωτομάρτυρες; but this is onely proper to Stephen, and Thecla he being the first of men, and she the first of women which were crown'd with Martyrdom. Here we may see what decency the Greeks use in comparison of the Latines; they give Epithets to their Saints, with which, as with titles they are honour'd, distinguished from other men. Vales.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Concerning the Errour of Beryllus.

Beryllus, who was mention'd a little before, Bishop of Bostra in Arabia, subverting the Ecclesiastick Canon, endeavour'd to induce some new Doctrines alienating from the Faith; daring to affirm that our Lord and Saviour, before his * coming amongst men [a] had no proper different subsistence: Neither any Godhead of his own, but onely the Deity of the Father residing in him. Many disputes and conferences having been held by the Bishops against this man about that point, amongst the rest Origen was call'd; at first he enters into a friendly discourse with the man, that he might discover what his Opinion was, which when he understood by his discourse, he reprehended him being not Orthodox; and having convinc'd him by Arguments and Demonstrations, he took him as it were [b] by the hand, and set him into the way of the true Doctrine, and reinstated him in his former sound opinion. There are also written monuments extant to this day both of Beryllus, and also of the Synod which was convened upon his account, which contain Origen's questions proposed against him, and the disputes holden in his

* That is, before his incarnation.

[a] This Phrase ἴδιαν ὑφεστῶσαν, is nothing else but difference of subsistence, which may appear by the words of Gregorius Nyssenus in his book De Differentiâ Substantiæ, & Essentiæ. Beryllus seems to take ἰδία to signifie a person, after the manner of his times, which confounded these two terms, ὑπόστασις, and ἰδία: concerning the true signification of them, see Socrates's Ecclesiastick History, book 3 chap. 7. where these terms are largely discus'd. Beryllus erred in that he believed Christ had no proper personality before his incarnation; but he was orthodox in that he holds Christ had not a Godhead proper to himself, onely the Godhead of the Father residing in him; for the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is all one, the Glory equal, the Majesty coeternal; otherwise there would be three Gods, not one God: therefore if this were Beryllus's opinion he may be excused: but he erred in that he asserted the Son by himself is not properly God, but has onely a derivative divinity from the Father. For if he asserted that the Son subsisted not personally before his incarnation, it follows that he deprived him of his Divinity. Vales.

[b] Ἀναλαμβάνειν here may be best explain'd by the words of Nicephorus, who says, he regain'd him gently, and calmly. Vales.

Church, and all that was done at that time. Infinite other Memoirs the Antients of our times have deliver'd to Posterity concerning Origen: which I intend to omit, as not pertinent to this present subject; but what things concerning him, are necessary to be known, may be read at large in that [c] Apology for him which was written by me, and Pamphilus the holy Martyr of our times: which we, fellow-labourers, carefully and joyntly compos'd upon the account of some of his quarrelsome Accusers. GORDIANUS.

[c] Hieronymus in his Catalogue, and also in his first Apology against Rufinus says, Eusebius wrote six books in defence of Origen. Rufinus translated the first of these books, and put it out under the name of Pamphilus the Martyr; for which he is most severely reprov'd by Hieronymus, for that he set forth a book of Eusebius's, (whom Jerome always calls an Heretick) under the name of Pamphilus the Martyr. But Rufinus may make answer for himself from these words of Eusebius, who says that that Apology was written by both of them. Which also Photius confirms with his Testimony; Photius's Biblioth. Chap. 120. From this book, as well as from Eusebius's own words, we may gather, that Origen had many Enemies and opposers, because of the newness of his opinions. The chiefest of them was Methodius; concerning whom, and the reason why he is not mentioned by Eusebius in his History, see B. 6. Chap. 24. note (c.) Vales.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Concerning Philip the Emperour.

WHen Gordianus had held the Roman Empire six complete years, Philip, together with his son Philip, succeeded him. The report is, that he, being a Christian, upon the day which is the last of the Vigils of Easter, was desirous to be a partaker, together with the congregation, of the prayers of the Church: but could in no wise be permitted to enter into the Church by him who was then Bishop, before he had made a general confession of his sins, and recounted himself amongst their number, who were [a] reckon'd the Lapsed, and stood in the place of penitents: for had he not done this he would not have been admitted by the Bishop, because of his many offences: and 'tis reported that he willingly [b] obey'd, and demonstrated in his deeds, the sincerity and devoutness of his affection towards the fear of God. PHILIPPUS.

[a] Ἐξομολόγησις here signifies an numeror, I am reckon'd amongst. Vales.

[b] This story concerning Philip the Emperour, whom Babylas would not admit into the Church, being then Bishop, is told by the Authour of Chron. Alexand. and also by Chrysostom in his Oration concerning holy Babylas; but he does not name the Emperour. Vales.

CHAP. XXXV.

How Dionysius succeeded Heraclas in his Bishoprick.

IT was the third of Philip's Reign in which Heraclas dyed, after he had Govern'd the Church sixteen years, and Dionysius succeeded him in the Bishoprick of Alexandria.

CHAP. XXXVI.

What other books were written by Origen.

AT this time therefore, the faith (as it was meet) daily encreasing, and our doctrine being boldly preach'd amongst all men, Origen ('tis said) was now above sixty years old: and because he had now gotten a most excellent habit of speaking through long use and exercise, he permitted the Notaries to [a] write his discourses which he delivered in publick, but never before this time would he suffer that to be done. About this time he

PHILIP.

he wrote eight books againſt a book of [b] Celſus the Epicurean, intitled The word of Truth. He alſo wrote twenty five Volumes upon Matthew's Goſpel: and thoſe upon the Twelve Prophets, of which books we have found onely twenty five. There is alſo extant an Epiſtle of his to Philip the Emperour, another to his wife Severa: and ſeveral others to divers other perſons: which being ſcattered here and there, in ſeveral mens hands, as many of them as we could find preſerved, being above an hundred in number, we have collected and digeſted into proper books by themſelves, that they may not hereafter be again diſpers'd. He wrote alſo to [c] Fabian Biſhop of Rome, and to ſeveral other Prelates of Churches concerning his own Orthodoxie: you have alſo the declarations of theſe things in the ſixth book of the Apology we wrote in defence of him.

[b] There were two Celſus's, both Epicurean Philoſophers, one of them lived in the Reign of Nero; the other about the times of Antoninus, as Origen writes in his firſt book againſt Celſus: it was againſt this latter Celſus that Origen wrote eight moſt elegant books, which are ſtill extant. This is the ſame Celſus, to whom Lucian Dedicates his book called, Alexander, or, the falſe Prophet; being intreated by him to write the Life of that Impoſtor. In the end of that book, Lucian ſpeaking to him, plainly demonſtrates him to be an Epicurean. In the ſame place alſo he ſeems to mention Celſus's book intitled, The True Diſcourſe. Valeſ.

[c] Hieronymus in his 65th Epiſtle mentions this Epiſtle of Origen's to Fabian. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Concerning the diſſention of the Arabians.

AGain, about the ſame time there ſprang up in Arabia Introducers of another Opinion alienating from the Truth. Theſe affirm'd that mens ſouls even in this preſent life expired together with their bodies, and were turn'd to corruption together with them: but that they ſhould again revive together with the bodies at the time of the Reſurrection. No ſmall Synod being call'd together upon this account, Origen is [a] again ſent for thither, and having diſputed publickly concerning this queſtion, he managed the cauſe ſo well, that thoſe who before were fallen into errour, changed their ſentiments.

[a] 'Twas ſaid before, Chap. 33. that Origen was ſent for into Arabia by the Biſhops, to diſpute againſt Beryllus: wherefore this was the ſecond time that Origen was called thither to diſpute. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Concerning the Hereſie of the Helceſaïts.

AT that time alſo ſprang up another perverſe Errour, call'd the Hereſie of the Helceſaïts, which was ſtifled in its birth. Origen mentions it in [a] his Homily to the people upon the eighty ſecond Pſalm, in theſe words. "Lately there came "one, highly conceited of himſelf for his ability, "to defend that Atheiſtical and moſt wicked "Opinion, call'd the Opinion of the [b] Helceſaïts, which lately was raiſed in oppoſition to [a] Origen wrote three ſorts of books upon the Scripture, Commentaries, Scholia, and Homilies. His Comments he wrote for the ſake of the Learned, and his Scholia alſo: but upon thoſe books which did not require long and tedious Comments he made Homilies, adapted to the Peoples capacity. And this is that which Sedulius aims at in his preface to his Opus Paſchale. See Hieronymus in his Prefaces to Iſaiah, and Matthew, and alſo in his Preface to his Comments upon The Epiſtle to the Galatians: where he mentions this threefold work of Origen's; onely inſtead of the word Homilia he uſes Tractatus, i. e. diſcourſes, which is all one: for Tractatus in Latine is the ſame as Ὁμιλίαι in Greek. Concerning this threefold work of Origen, Rufinus ſpeaks in his Epiſtle to Urſacius, which he prefixes before his tranſlation of Origen's book upon Numbers. Valeſ.

[b] Theodoret in his ſecond book Fabularum Hæreticarum, Chap. 7. calls theſe men Ἐλκεσαΐους, and ſays they were ſo call'd from one Elceſaï. Epiphanius names him Elxæus, a falſe Prophet, who joyn'd himſelf to the Ebionites, and was Authour of a ſtrange, uncertain, and an unfix'd Opinion concerning Chriſt: which he relates, and which little differs from Theodoret's ſtory in the place quoted. Hence it appears that this Elxæus, and Elceſaï are one and the ſame man. Epiphanius, in his Hareſi Oſſenorum, calls him Elxai, and ſays he lived in Trajan's time. At firſt, he ſays, he put forth a book full of Divine wiſdom, and a Propheſying ſpirit: But afterwards he affirmed 'twas no ſin for a man to ſacrifice to Idols, in the time of Perſecution, if ſo be he do it not with his whole heart. The ſame alſo Origen here relates of theſe Elceſaits: but Epiphanius more plainly demonſtrates this in his Hareſi Sampſæorum, where he ſays that theſe Elceſæi (which we prov'd were the ſame as Elceſaits.) had one Elxæus, or Elxai Authour of their ſect. Wherefore Scaliger in his Elenchus Chap. 27. err's, where he ſays that this Ἠλξαΐ is the ſame perſon with Eſſæus; and that theſe Elceſæi or Elceſaits are the ſame as Eſſæi: then which nothing is more abſurd Valeſ.

"the Church. I will explain to you what evil "things that Opinion aſſerts, that ye be not "drawn away by it. It reject's ſomethings of "every part of the Scripture, but makes uſe of "ſome Texts both out of the Old, and alſo out "of the Evangelical Scripture: it rejects the A-"poſtle [Paul] wholly. It ſays 'tis an indif-"ferrent thing to deny [the Faith.] It holds "alſo that upon neceſſity [c] a wiſe man would "deny [Chriſtianity] with his mouth, but not "with his heart alſo at the ſame time. They alſo "carry about with them a book, which they ſay, "fell down from heaven; and every one that "hears it, and believes it, ſhall obtain Remiſſion "of ſins: a Remiſſion different from that which "Jeſus Chriſt beſtowed. But let thus much ſuf-fice concerning theſe things.

[c] The Tranſlatours, Rufinus, Langus, and Chriſtophorſon knew not the uſe and propriety of this Phraſe [ὁ νοήσας,] and ſo miſinterpreted it: the word ſignifies no more then, qui ſapit, or ſapiens, a wiſe man: See that old verſe of Heſiod. Αἶνον τοι βασιλεῦσ' ἐρέων νόεσι καὶ αὐτοῖς, and to wiſe men. Valeſ.

Concerning what happened in the times of Decius.

DECIUS.

BUt in the mean while Decius ſucceeds Philip, after he had Reigned ſeven years; who becauſe of his hatred towards Philip, rais'd a Perſecution againſt the Churches. In which Fabian being Martyr'd at Rome, Cornelius ſucceeds in that Biſhoprick. And Alexander the Biſhop of Jeruſalem in Paleſtine, is again brought before the Governour's Tribunal for Chriſt's ſake. And was very famous for his ſecond confeſſion at Caſarea, where he was impriſoned: being now adorned with a venerable old Age, and reverend gray haires. After his noble and famous teſtimony before the Governour's Tribunal, he expired in Priſon, and Mazabanes was pronounced his ſucceſſour in the Biſhoprick of Jeruſalem. Alſo Babylas Biſhop of Antiochia died (in like manner as did Alexander) in priſon after his confeſſion, and Fabius is preferred to be Biſhop of that Church. Moreover how many, and how great [afflictions] happened to Origen in this Perſecution, and what was the end of theſe things, (the Devil with all his forces enviouſly ſetting himſelf in oppoſition to this man, and fighting againſt him with all ſubtilty and power, aſſailing him particularly above all thoſe who were ſet upon at that time:) how many, and how great things he alſo ſuffered for the Doctrine of Chriſt, as bonds, and bodily torments, the puniſhment of the Iron Chain in the inmoſt receſſes of the Priſon: how he was put upon the [a] Rack, his feet for several days being stretch'd so wide as to the distance of four holes: how valiantly he sustain'd the menaces of fire, and all other [Tortures] inflicted by his Enemies: what also was the exit of these things: (the Judge with his utmost power earnestly endeavouring * that he might not be slain.) Lastly, what expressions he left behind him, and how comfortable to the [b] comfortless: [All these particulars] many of his Epistles do both truly and accurately comprehend.

[a] Ξύλον ſignifies (as we before noted) the ſame as nervus, a paire of ſtocks, wherein the feet are put: but in this place 'tis uſed for Eculeus, a Rack: for, Euſebius in this place means, that Origen, being put upon the rack, patiently ſuſtain'd the threats of fire, and other torments. Ξύλον therefore in this place ſignifies the ſame as the Latine word Eculaeus, which the word added, (viz.) Κολαστήριον ſufficiently ſheweth, for as often as this term ſignifies Stocks, or Shackles, we read ξύλον onely; but when it ſignifies the Rack, κολαστήριον or, βασανιστήριον is commonly added, as here we find it to be. Valeſ.

* That is, the Judge was desirous to prolong his life, that so he might undergo the more Tortures.

[b] Ἀναλήψεως δεόμενα are the comfortless, or helpless; which some Translatours did not understand; this transposition in Eusebius is common. Eusebius here says nothing of the Æthiopian, who was suborn'd against Origen; or concerning his denial of the Faith: Baronius with good reason thought these things were fabulous; But Nemesius, in his book De Naturâ Hominis, Chap. 30. confirms that Narration of Epiphanius's. Vales.

CHAP. XL.

Concerning what things happened to Dionysius.

I Will also Record some things concerning Dionysius, out of his Epistle to Germanus. Where speaking concerning himself, he makes this relation: "I speak in the presence of God, and he knows "that I lie not. I never made my escape "[a] of my self, nor without "the Divine appointment. "But before, to wit, at the "same time when the [b] Decree for the Persecution "came out from Decius, Sabinus sent out his [c] Deputy to "make inquisition for me; and "I stay'd at home four days, "expecting the arrival of "the Deputy: But he went "about searching all places; "both high-ways, Rivers, and "fields, where he thought I "might be conceal'd, or "where he conjectur'd I "might have gone: but he "was so blinded, that he "found not my house. Neither could he imagine that I should stay at home "when there was inquisition made for me. And "at length after the fourth day, (when God "had commanded me to depart thence, and had "miraculously opened a way for me) I, and my "[d] servants, and many of the Brethren, went out "together. Now that that was a special act of "God's Providence the sequel declar'd, in which "peradventure I was profitable to some. Again, after the interposition of some words, he relates what happened to him after his flight, in these words: "I my self, (and my companions) being much about the time of Sun-setting apprehended by some Souldiers, was brought to Taposiris. But Timotheus, according to the providence of God, was not with us, neither was he "taken: But when he at last came, he found the "house empty, and Souldiers keeping Guard about "it, and us reduced to slavery. After some other words he saith thus. "What now was the order "and manner of this miraculous act of providence? (I will tell nothing but truth.) A certain [e] country man met Timothy as he was "flying, and thus disturb'd in mind; and he inquired of him the reason of this great haste; he "told him the real truth. When the man had "heard his relation, (he was then a going to "a marriage feast, and 'tis customary amongst "them to tarry all night at such meetings,) he went "his way, and coming into the house, told the "story to those that were set at the table: All "of them with an unanimous earnestness (as if "it had been by a compact amongst them) rose "up together, set a running, and with great "clamours came speedily upon us. The Souldiers "who guarded us being by them forthwith put "to flight, they came upon us as we were, and "[found] us lying upon "[f] Couches without any furniture on them; I (God "knows) at first supposing "them to be thieves, who "came thither for prey and "pillage, continued lying "on the Couch, naked as I "was, excepting onely a linnen garment which I had "on; and offered to them "my other cloathes, which "lay by me: But they bid "me arise, and come out "immediately. Then understanding what was the cause "of their coming thither, I cry'd out, intreating "and beseeching them to depart and let us alone. "But if their intent was to do me a kindness, I "begg'd of them to behead me, and by that means "to prevent those who brought me prisoner thither. While I thus cry'd out (as my companions and fellow-sufferers in all my troubles "doe know) they compell'd me to rise up: I "threw my self on my back upon the ground; but "they took me by the hands and feet, and dragg'd "me out: There follow'd me those who are my "witnesses of these things, Caius, Faustus, Peter, "Paul; [g] who took me together with that Couch "upon their shoulders, and convey'd me out of "the village; and having set me upon an Ass unsaddled, they carried me away. These things Dionysius relates concerning himself.

[a] Ἐπ ἐμαυτῷ βαλλόμενος, (i.e.) Not by my own counsel, not on my own accord. But the Fuk. M. S. and Georgius Syncellus's Chronicle read ἐπ ἐμαυτοῦ. Maz. and Med. M.SS. ἐπ ἐμαυτόν. The Med. M.S. begins this Epistle where we have begun it. Vales.

[b] Διωγμὸς is here taken for the Decree of the Persecution: and accordingly we have translated the place. Vales.

[c] Frumentarii milites were Souldiers sent to seek after offenders, and to pick up all rumours and news. Constantine put down this sort of Officers; they were also Deputies under Governours of Provinces, such an one was this Frumentarius, whom Dionysius here mentions. Vales.

[d] Οἱ παῖδες, Musculus and Christoph. translate Liberi, Children, which interpretation I doe not approve of. Vales.

[e] Christophor. translates χωρίτης indigena, one born and bred in that Countrey, the Translatour of Georg. Syncell. calls it incola; neither of them rendring it well: for χωρεῖς are Country men, Rustick. So in the Greek Councils we find, οἱ κατὰ χωρεῖς πρεσβύτεροι, instead of οἱ κατὰ χωρεῖς πρεσβύτεροι, The Country Presbyters. The Maz. Med. and Fuk M.SS. instead of χωρεῖς read χωρικῶν, so also does Alexandrinus use χωρικοὶ for Rustick. Vales.

[f] Scimpodia are low beds such as are used in great houses to this day, onely to sit in; call'd Couches. So Libanius in his own Life uses the word: where he saith, pag. 47. that at home he us'd to lye upon a bed, but in the School he lean'd ὅπῃ τῷ σκίμποδι, upon a Couch. Hence 'tis plain those Couches were made for the ease of sick people, ἄστρωτος signifies unmade, without any furniture upon it. So Martial in his Apophoretis, speaking of sheets,

Nudo stramina nè toro paterent,
Functæ nos tibi venimus sorores.
Vales.

[g] We must refer this word ὑποληφθέντες, who took me up, to Caius, and the rest of the Presbyters, and not to the Riotous Countrey men, as Christophor. does. φορείδιον signifies together with the Bed or Couch on which he lay. Dionysius says nothing here of what hapned to him after the Rusticks forc'd him to leave Taposiris, having beaten the Guard: but in his Epistle to Domitius and Didymus, which is in the 7th book, and 11th Chapter, he saith, that he and Peter, and Caius were separated from the rest of their Company, and abode in a desert and dry place of Libya. Dionysius liv'd an Exile till the death of Decius the Emperour, and from that desert place he wrote Letters to Domitius and Didymus. Concerning those who suffer'd Martyrdom at Alexandria.

THe same man in an Epistle of his to [a] Fabius Bishop of Antioch, gives this account of the combats of those Martyrs who suffer'd at Alexandria in the times of Decius. "The Persecution "amongst us did not begin at the time when the "Imperial Edict was issued out, but preceded it "one whole year. For a Soothsayer, and [b] a Poet this Bishop of Antioch. Vales.

[a] The Med. Maz. and Fuk. M.SS. call this man Fabianus, not Fabius: so also Rufinus names

[b] I have tanslated [ποιητὴς] a Poet: first, because there is great familiarity betwixt Poets, and Prophets, for the Diviners or Soothsayers us'd to deliver their Oracles in verse. Besides, the Ægyptians were chiefly delighted with Poetry, which Eunapius takes notice of. Moreover, no people were more malicious towards the Christians then these Soothsayers, moving the People to Persecute them, and encouraging them by their Oracles. Vales.

DECIUS. "(whoever he was who ſo endamag'd this City,) "had ſtirr'd up, and encouraged the tumults of "the Heathens againſt us, exciting them to their "Countrey Superſtition. They being prick't "forward by him, and having obtained free "power of acting all miſchief, thought it the "moſt acceptable ſervice *and worſhip of their "Gods to ſlaughter us. Firſt of all therefore "they lay hands upon an old man named Metra, "and bid him pronounce ſome Atheiſtical words, "and becauſe he obey'd them not, they beat him "with clubs, and prick'd him in the face and eyes "with ſharp Reeds, and when they had led him "into the Suburbs, they ſton'd him to death. Af- "terwards they dragg'd a believing woman call'd "Quinta, to the Temple of their Idol, and com- "pell'd her to fall down and worſhip: but ſhe "turning away her face, and abominating it, they "bound her feet, and dragg'd her through the City, "which is pav'd with ſharp ſtones, and having "daſh'd her againſt Millſtones, and ſcourg'd her, "they led her to the ſame place without the City, "and ſton'd her. Afterwards all with one ac- "cord violently broke into the houſes of pious "men, and every one of them ran to their Neigh- "bours, whom they knew, and plunder'd and "rob'd them; their goods which were of greater "value they [c] purloin'd, but the lumber, and what "was made of wood they caſt forth, and burnt in "the ſtreets: ſo that the City ſeem'd as if it had "been taken by an enemy: but the Brethren "withdrew themſelves thence and privately fled; "and (like thoſe S[t] Paul ſpeaks of) took joy- "fully the ſpoyling of their goods. And not one of "them that I know of, except one who ſomewhere "fell into their hand, renounc'd the Lord till this "time. Moreover, at that time they took a moſt "admirable Virgin who was antient, call'd Apol- "lonia, and buffeting her on the cheeks, they "daſh'd out all her teeth. And when they had "built a pile of wood before the City, they threat- "ned to burn her alive, except ſhe would repeat "together with them ſome [d] profane words. But ſhe, "having begged a little re- "ſpite, being let looſe, forth- "with leapt into the fire, "and was conſum'd to Aſhes. "They alſo apprehended Se- "rapion as he was in [e] his "houſe, and having tortur'd "him with grievous tor- "ments, and broken all his "joints, they caſt him down "headlong out of an upper "room. There was now "no way for us, not the "common highway, not ſo "much as any narrow ſtreet, "through which we could "ſecurely paſs either by day, "or by night: Every body "proclaiming at all times, "and in all places, that who- "ſoever would not repeat "thoſe blaſphemous words, he ſhould be dragg'd "away, and burn't immediately. After this man- "ner theſe things continu'd for a great while: "Afterwards followed Sedition, and a Civil "war, which [ſeized] theſe wretches, and re- "turned the cruelty they us'd towards us upon "themſelves. And we had a little breathing "time, their fury towards us being ſome- "thing appeas'd. But preſently news came of "the [f] tranſlation of that Empire, which had "been more favourable to us: and much fear of "a threatning ſtorm appear'd. And now arrived "the [Imperial] Edict, almoſt like that fore- "told by our Lord, [g] re- "preſenting thoſe moſt ter- "rible [times] in ſo much "that even the Elect, if "it were poſſible, ſhould "be diſcouraged. Indeed all "were put in great fear. "Immediately many of them "who were more eminent, "yielded up themſelves [to "their Idolatry] through "fear: others, who [h] had to "doe in the management of "the Publick Affairs, were "forc'd through the neceſ- "ſity of their offices [they "held;] and they induced "others of their acquain- "tance, who, being ſummon'd "by name, repaired to their "impure and profane ſacri- "fices. Some looked pale, "and trembled, as if they "themſelves were about to "have been ſacrifices and "victimes, not ſacrificers to "their Idols. So that they "rendred themſelves the ſub- "ject of laughter to the mul- "titude that ſtood round a- "bout them: becauſe they de- "monſtrated themſelves to "all, to be fearfull both of "death and of ſacrificing: "But others of them ran to "the Altars more willingly, "proteſting very confident- "ly that they never were "Chriſtians before. Con- "cerning whom the Lords "prediction is moſt true, "that they ſhall hardly be "ſaved. As for the reſt, ſome of them adhered "to the one or the other of thoſe parties we have "mentioned; ſome fled away; others were ap- "prehended. And of theſe [though] ſome pro- "ceeded ſo far as till [they came to] bonds and "impriſonment, and others of them had been im- "priſoned ſeveral days; yet before they were "brought to the tribunal, they renounc'd [the "Faith.] Some of them after they had perſiſted "ſome time in ſuffering torments, yet for fear of "what might follow renounc'd [their Religion.] "But the ſtedfaſt, and bleſſed Pillars of the Lord, "being ſtrengthened by him, and having received "power and patience equal and anſwerable to "their ſtrong faith, became admirable witneſſes "of his kingdom. The firſt of which was Ju- "lianus a Gouty man, who could neither goe "nor ſtand; he, together with two other men who "carried him, was brought before the Judge: "one of thoſe perſons ſtraightway deny'd "[Chriſt.] But the other whoſe name was "Cronion, but was ſirnamed Eunus, together "with the old man Julianus, having confeſſed "the Lord, rode upon Camels through the "whole City (which you know is very "large) and were ſcourged as they ſate on "high, and at laſt in the preſence of all the "multitude ſtanding round, they were conſum'd "by c Νοσφίζομαι, to purloin; See Tit. 2. 10.

* Theſe words [τὴν θρησκείαν καὶ δεισιδαιμονίαν, worſhip of their Gods] ought, as I ſuppoſe, to be expunged: for they diſturb the ſenſe, and were added by ſome Scholiaſt, to explain the preceding term [εὐσέβειαν, ſervice. Valeſ.

* Heb. 10. 34.

d Τῆς ἀσεβείας ῥημάτα, are the terms here: what the words were, 'tis hard to conjecture: in his Epiſtle to Germanus he calls them [ἀθέους φωνὰς, impious words;] and in this Epiſtle [δύσφημα ῥήματα, horrid words.] Valeſ.

e Here we read ἐφέσιον, i. e. in his own houſe, but Nicephorus very ill reads ἐφέσιον. Concerning this Serapion, Bede, and Uſuardus ſpeak at the 14[th] of November. Where they ſay he ſuffered in the Reign of Decius; but they might better have ſaid in the Reign of Philip. For Dionyſius in this Epiſtle to Fabius expreſly affirms that Serapion, and ſome other Martyrs, ſuffer'd before the death of Philip the Emperour. The ſame errour is committed in all Martyrologies concerning Apollonia the Virgin, which ſay ſhe ſuffer'd in the time of Decius upon the 9 day of February. Valeſ.

f Here he means the death of Philip the Emperour, who behav'd himſelf gently and kindly toward the Chriſtians: therefore what paſſages are here next related, happened in the laſt year of the Reign of Philip: which thing Dionyſius intimates in the beginning of this Epiſtle, where he ſays, the Perſecution began a year before the Emperours Edict came out: but Chriſtoph. did not underſtand this place, he rendring [μεταβολὴν βασιλείας] the alteration of the Emperours mind towards us. Baronius follows this errour of his, at the year of Chriſt, 253. Chap. 102. Valeſ.

g In the Kings M. S. and Stephanus's Edition, inſtead of ἀποφαίνων, θεραβεχὺ is read, but in the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. ἀποφαίνων is the term, which is a great deal better as I think. For Dionyſius here means that this Decree of Decius was ſo terrible, that it ſeemed to repreſent thoſe moſt dreadfull times of Antichriſt, foretold by our Saviour. Valeſ.

h Chriſtophor. miſtakes in his tranſlation of this place. I have rendred here [δημοσιεύοντες] as if it had been [δημόσια πεφιλοντες] the Decurions or Magiſtrates: for theſe always aſſembled themſelves at the reading of the Emperours Edicts in the Courts, and firſt of all executed his commands; hence they were compell'd to be preſent at the reading of this decree, and immediately after it was read, to ſacrifice to the Gods, according to the injunction of the Decree. Valeſ.

DECIUS. "by an [i] exceeding hot fire. A Souldier who at"tended on them as they were lead [to the stake,] "thrust away all those who abused them, and "when the people exclaim'd against him, this "most valiant champion of "God (by name Besas)
"was call'd in question, and
"after he had behav'd himself
"nobly in a great combat in "defence of Piety, he was "beheaded. Also another "man, a Libyan born, (both
"according to his name, and
"also agreeable to the divine
"benediction truly stil'd
"[k] Macar,) after much ex"hortation of the Judge to a "renunciation, being nothing
"subdu'd therewith, was "burned alive. After these
"Epimachus, and Alexander,
"after a tedious imprison-
"ment, which they endur'd,
"having suffered infinite sorts
"of tortures, as * iron scrat-
"chers, scourges, were also "burned to death with un-
"slaked lime: with them al"so four women: Ammo-
"narium, an holy Virgin
"(whom the Judge for a long "time and with much ear-
"nestnes tortured, because she had before hand
"said she would utter nothing he should enjoyn
"her,) when she had verified her promise, she "was led to execution. Now the rest were these.
"Mercuria a most virtuous and venerable Ma"tron: and Dionysia the mother of a numerous "issue, but did not love her children more then
"the Lord: [l] also another Ammonarium. The "Judge being now ashamed that he tortured them
"yet in vain, and that he was thus overcome by "women, slew them with the "sword, before they under"went the tryall of tortures.
"For Ammonarium their lea"der had suffered torments
"for them all. Heron also,
"and [m] Ater, and Isidorus,
"Ægyptians, and with them
"Dioscorus, a lad of about "fifteen years of age, were "set before the Judge. Who "first of all endeavoured to "deceive the youth with words, as thinking him
"flexible and easie to be perswaded; he endea"voured also to force him by torments, [sup"posing] him to be remiss and inclineable to "yield; but Dioscorus was neither mov'd with "perswasions, nor yielded he to torments. When "[the Judge] had most barbarously torn the "rest with stripes, and they persisted, he delivered "them also to the fire, but he dismiss'd Dioscо-
"rus, because he was lovely in the eyes of the "people, and he also himself admired him for his
"most prudent answers to his questions: Saying,
"he allow'd him space for repentance because of "his tender age. And now the most excellent "Dioscorus continues with us, reserved for a "greater and more lasting combat. Also one
"Nemesion, another Ægyptian, was falsly accu"sed as a companion of theeves: but having before
"the Centurion cleared himself of this accusation
"brought against him, as being most absurd,
"he was impeach'd as being a Christian, and "brought bound before the Governour: who,
"(most unjust man,) having inflicted upon him
"double as many torments and stripes, as upon the "theeves, [commanded] him to be burnt a"mongst theeves: Blessed man! Who was ho"noured after Christ's example. Moreover, a "whole [n] file of Souldiers, to wit, Ammon, and
"Zeno, and Ptolomy, and Ingenuus, and with them
"the old man Theophilus, stood together before
"the place of judicature. And when a certain
"man was accused for being a Christian, and in"clined to a renunciation [of his Religion,]
"they standing by gnashed upon him with their "teeth, made grimaces at him with their counte"nances, stretched out their hands, and shewed
"mimick and antick gestures with their bodies;
"[in so much that] all mens eyes were turned "towards them: before any one came to lay "hands on them, they ran to the [o] place where "the accused usually sate, confessing themselves to "be Christians: Upon which, the Governour and
"the Assessours were surprized with a great fear.
"The accused seem'd most couragious at what they "were about to suffer, but the Judges trembled. So "they went out of the place of judicature in a "kind of Pomp and State, and rejoyced at the "testimony [they were to give to the Faith,]
"God [p] making them to triumph gloriously.

DECIUS.

[i] This ἀσβέστου πυρὸς may be rendred vivæ calcis incendio, a fire of unslaked lime; so also we may translate the same phrase which is us'd a little after this, speaking of Epimachus and Alexander, where he says, πυρὶ ἀσβέστῳ διεχρήσαντο: instead of which phrase Nicephorus uses πλάνῳ, with lime. In Menæo, on the 30th day of October, there is mention of these Martyrs, Julianus, Cronio, and Macarius, where the words are, ἀσβέστου ζέοντος καὶ ἀυτῆς ἐκχυθέντος; burning lime being poured upon them. Vales.

[k] Macar is derived from the Greek term μακάριος, which signifies blessed: Dionysius seems here to allude to those words of our Saviour, Matt. 5. 10. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousnes sake, &c. Rufinus translates this place thus, Alius quidam, vir nominis sui Macarius, gente Lybicus. Vales.

* Ξυστῆρας is the term in the original: it signifies properly any kind of iron-instrument to make incision: Dionysius does here mean by it, an engine wherewith they scraped the flesh from off the bones of the Christians.

[l] These words [also another Ammonarium.] I have added out of Rufinus: for Dionysius said there were four women; but we find but three, except, according to Rufinus, we adde these words. Vales.

[m] Instead of Ater in Georg. Syncellus, and Niceph. we find Aster: in Rufinus 'tis Arsinus; in the old Roman Martyrologie, which is mostly taking out of Rufinus, he is called Arsenius, at the 19th of the Kalends of January. Vales.

[n] σύνταγμα στρατιωτικὸν, Rufinus renders a Troop of Souldiers; him Christophorson also follows: but I had rather translate it a file of men. Some may perhaps think that these Souldiers were the Prefects Apparitours, and other officers, because they stood before the judgment seat, but I rather think they were legionary Souldiers of that legion which kept Garison at Alexandria, and were under the Command of the Emperours Deputy-Governour of Ægypt; for at that time he who was the Emperour's Prefect in Ægypt, had not onely power in Civil affaires, but also in Military. In the old Roman Martyrologie the birth-day of these Martyrs is set down on the 13th of the Kalends of January. Vales.

[o] By this word βῆμον is meant Subsellium, i.e. the place on which the Criminals while they are examin'd by the Judge sate. It is in some places call'd Ambon, or Pulpitum. Vales.

[p] Θεῷ θριαμβεύοντος αὐτοὺς, Rufinus translates thus, God thus triumphing by his Saints; hence we may suppose he read δι' αὐτοὺς. Musculus and Christophorson follow this translation of Rufinus: but we must take notice and see whether Dionysius meanes not by θριαμβεύοντος αὐτοὺς, θριαμβεύειν ποιοῦντος αὐτὸν, which I think he does, and therefore have so translated it. Vales.

CHAP. XLII.

Concerning some other things which Dionysius relates.

"SEveral others were torn in pieces by the "Heathens, both in the Cities, and in the "Countrey Villages: one of them I will hear
"speak of for examples sake. Ischyrion was a Mer"cenary *Officer under one "of the Magistrates. He,
"whom he served, injoyned
"him to sacrifice: but when "he obeyed him not, he was
"injurious to him; when he "still persisted to be disobe"dient, he basely reproacht him. After he had "patiently sustained all this, he took a great stake,
"and having run it through his guts and bowels,
"murdered him. What need I to reckon up the "multitudes, which wandered in deserts and "mountains, and dyed by Pestilence, thirst, and "cold, and by diseases, thieves, and savage beasts?
"such of them as survived are witnesses of their "choice and victory: but I will adde one fact "for a manifestation of the truth hereof. There "was one Chæremon a very aged man, Bishop of "the City called Nile, he together with his wife

* Ἐπίτροπος (from whence the term [ἐπιτροπεύω,] which here occurs, is derived) signifies one that looketh to another mans business, and that has the charge of his affairs committed to his care.

DECIUS. "fled unto the mountain [a] Arabius, but never re- "turned; neither could they, or any thing of "their bodies ever be found, although the Brethren "ſearched all places careful- "ly. Alſo many about this "mountain Arabicus were "taken captives and inſlaved "by the barbarous [b] Sara- "cens: ſome of which were "with much difficulty re- "deem'd with great ſums "of money; but others of "them are not yet [re- "deem'd] even at this time. "Now (my Brother) I have "not at large related theſe "things to no purpoſe, but "that you may ſee how great, "and how grievous miſeries "happened to us, which "they who have moſt ex- "perienced, do beſt under- "ſtand. Afterwards, after ſome few words he makes an addition to all this, ſaying; "Therefore "thoſe divine Martyrs, (who are now Aſſeſſours "with Chriſt, colleagues of his kingdom, and are "[c] partakers of his judgement, giving ſentence "together with him,) during their being amongſt "us, received to themſelves "ſome of the brethren who "were lapſed, and lay con- "victed as having ſacrificed to "Idols: And when they had "ſeen their converſion and "penitence, judging it might "be acceptable to God, who "in no wiſe willeth the death "of a ſinner, but rather that "he repent, they admitted "them, and [d] brought them "together, and received them "into their congregation, "and [e] communicated with "them in prayer, and in "eating. Now, therefore "(Brethren) how doe you "counſel us concerning theſe "things, what muſt be done "by us? Shall we be of like "mind, and of the ſame Opi- "nion with the [Martyrs?] "Shall we obſerve their de- "termination, and the favour "they [ſhewed ſuch per- "ſons?] and ſhall we be in- "dulgent towards them, to "whom they were merci- "full? Or ſhall we render "their ſentence unjuſt, and "make our ſelves examiners "and Judges of their Opi- "nion? grieve their goodneſs "and clemency? and de- "ſtroy the Order [which is conſtituted?] Dio- DECIUS. nyſius very adviſedly annex'd theſe words, diſ- courſing concerning them, who in the times of Perſecution had lapſed through infirmity of mind.

[a] Herodotus mentions a mountain, called Arabius; which Ptolomy and others call Troicus. Chriſtopherſon therefore does not well in calling it a mountain in Arabia. 'Tis a little after called Arabicus, from its vicinity to Arabia. Valeſ.

[b] This place ought to be taken notice of for this one thing: for of all the Writers which came to our hands, there is none (that I know of) who is ancienter then Dionyſius Alexandrinus, that mentions the Saracens. Indeed Ammianus Marcellinus ſays in his 14th book, that he mention'd the Saracens amongſt the Acts of Prince Marcus. So alſo ſays Spartianus, (in Nigro) ſaying they were conquered by the Roman Souldiers. Valeſ.

[c] It was the opinion of the Ancient Fathers, that Martyrs ſhould be Chriſts Aſſeſſours, and ſhould judge the world together with him. So ſays Eulogius, Biſhop of Alexandria, in his 5th book againſt the Novatians: but Photius in his Biblioth. reproves this Opinion. (Photius ſays) that thoſe words of St Paul in the 1 Epiſtle to the Corinthians 6. 2. Know ye not that the Saints ſhall judge the world? muſt not be underſtood as if the Saints were to be judges with Chriſt: Paul, ſays he, only meaneth thus, that other men who had not lived ſo piouſly ſhould by the Saints means be condemned. As it is in the Goſpel, The men of Ninevie, and the Queen of the South ſhall riſe up in judgement againſt wicked men, and condemn them, Matth. 12. 41. Photius took this Expoſition out of Chryſoſtome; but Eulogius's Opinion ſeems the truer to me. For if the Martyrs are now colleagues of Chriſt in his kingdom, Why may not they be partakers of his judgment? Moreover, Chriſt expreſly promiſed the Apoſtles, That they ſhould ſit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Iſrael, Matth. 19. 28. Valeſ.

[d] This place muſt be rendred according to our tranſlation; though Langus and Chriſtoph. tranſlate it, as if the Martyrs admitted the Penitents into the Church: which they could not doe, being in bonds. Moreover the Biſhops onely had power of reconciling Penitents, the Martyrs could onely intercede for them, and write commendatory letters in their behalf; though this word συγχωρᾶν may be rendred paſſively, as in the 3d Chap. of this 6th book. Valeſ.

[e] Communion in the Church is twofold, of Prayer, and of the Sacraments, that of the prayers was granted to Penitents after a certain time; but the Communion of the body of Chriſt was not granted except to them who were reconcil'd after long time of repentance. But Dionyſius here means private Communion; now that I call private Communion, which was granted to any one by ſome private perſons and not by the Biſhop, whoſe power and duty it was to grant it. The thing theſe private perſons granted, was this; theſe Martyrs and Confeſſours permitted penitents who deſired their pitty and interceſſion, to pray to God with them. Valeſ.

CHAP. XLIII.

Concerning Novatus, what manner of perſon he was as to his moralls; and concerning his Hereſie.

FOr Novatus, a Presbyter of the Church of Rome, being puffed up with pride againſt theſe * men, as if there were no further hopes of ſalvation left for them, although they perform'd all things appertaining to an unfeigned converſion, and a ſincere confeſſion, conſtituted himſelf the Ringleader of a peculiar Sect, of thoſe who by reaſon of their haughty minds ſtil'd themſelves † Cathari. Upon this account a very great Synod was aſſembled at Rome, conſiſting of ſixty Biſhops, but of Presbyters and Deacons [the number] was greater. And when the Paſtours of each reſpective place in the reſt of the Provinces, had conſulted by themſelves concerning what was to be done; [a] This Decree was promulged to all: "That "Novatus, together with all "thoſe who imitated his "pride, and who preſum- "ptuouſly aſſented to his un- "charitable and moſt inhu- "man Opinion, ſhould be accounted as alienated "from the Church: but that the Brethren who "were fallen into the calamity [of the lapſed,] "ſhould be healed and cured by the remedies of "repentance. There came to our hands the Epiſtles of Cornelius Biſhop of Rome, to Fabius Biſhop of Antioch: which ſet forth the Acts of that Synod at Rome, and the Opinions of all thoſe in Italy, and Africa, and the Provinces there. There are alſo extant other Epiſtles written in Latine, by Cyprian and thoſe Biſhops aſſembled with him in Africa: by which it appears that they conſented to the relieving of thoſe who were fallen into Temptation, and that the Authour of this Hereſie ought with good reaſon to be expelled out of the Catholick Church, together with all thoſe who had been ſeduced by him. There is alſo annex'd to theſe [b] another Epiſtle of Cornelius's concerning the Decrees of that Synod: and alſo another concerning the miſchievous Acts of Novatus. Part of which, nothing hinders but that we may here inſert, that ſo they who read this work, may have a perfect knowledge in all things concerning Novatus. Cornelius therefore, informing Fabius what a man this Novatus was as to his courſe of life, writes theſe very words: "But that "you may the better un- "derſtand how this admi- "rable fellow heretofore co- "veted a Biſhoprick, and "concealing this his hot am- "bition

* That is, the lapſed.

† That is, the pure.

[a] Rufinus tranſlates this phraſe δέσμα παείσαλλε τοῖς πᾶσι, Decretus ſignificatur quid facto opus eſſet, but the other Tranſlatours in my Opinion turn it better, by tranſlating it thus; Decernitur ab omnibus. Valeſ.

[b] Rufinus confounds, and miſ- eth this Epiſtle with that which Euſebius afore mentioned, for he owns but two Epiſtles of Cornelius. Hieronymus in his book, De Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis, reckons up four, but Euſebius in this place gives us an account of three onely. The firſt, and the third ſeem as if Cornelius had writ them in Greek, which may be proved by ſeveral Arguments, for Euſebius quotes ſeveral things out of the third Epiſtle, but does not in the leaſt ſignifie that it was ever tranſlated out of Latine into Greek, which thing he always does as often as he quotes any Latine Authours. Moreover, in this very Chapter Euſebius ſignifies that the firſt Epiſtle was writ in Greek, for ſpeaking of it, he adds that there was another Epiſtle of Cyprian annex'd to it, which was written in Latine. Which clauſe certainly he had not added, had not Cornelius's Epiſtle been written in a contrary Language. Valeſ.

DECIUS. "bition continued undiscovered, for a covert for "his folly, usually from the beginning having the "Confessours in his company, I will make this de- "claration to you: [c] Maxi- "mus a Presbyter of our "Church, and Urbanus, "which men have the se- "cond time acquired great "renown to themselves for "their confessions; Sidonius "also, and Celerinus, a man "who has most patiently en- "dured all sorts of tortures "through God's mercy; and "having corroborated the "weakness of the flesh "through the strength of his "faith, utterly vanquished the adversary: These "men [I say,] when they had made enquiry in- "to the man, and [d] detected his subtilty and de- "ceit, his perjury and lyes, his unsociableness and "wolfish friendship, returned to the holy Church; "and divulged all his subtile devices, and his vil- "lanies (which he had kept "conceal'd within himself "for a long time, refusing "to declare them) in the "presence both of a suffi- "cient number of Bishops, "and also of a great many Presbyters and Laicks; "Lamenting, and repenting, because, having been "seduced by this subtile and wicked beast, for "some small time they had abandoned the Church. After some few words, he also adds this ("Dear "Brother) What a wonderfull change and alte- "ration we saw made in a short time in him? For [e] "this most excellent fellow, (who affirmed with ter- "rible protestations and oathes, that he did not in "the least covet the Office of a Bishop,) on a sud- "den appears a Bishop, as if he had been [e] thrown "into the midst by an Engine. For this brave "Doctour, who [pretended himself] to be a Main- "tainer of the Church discipline, when he endea- "voured by force to acquire to himself, and surre- "ptitiously to steal the Bishoprick which was not as- "sign'd to him by God, chose for his confidents two "men, who despaired of salvation, that he might "send them into some little corner, and the most "despicable part of Italy, and there delude three "Bishops, who were simple and unlearned men, by "a certain fraudulent enterprise, affirming and "protesting that with all possible speed they must "post to Rome, that all the disagreement which "had been there, might by their mediation, toge- "ther with the other Bishops, be composed. "When [f] they arrived, being "(as we said before) per- "sons unexperienced in the "plots and subtilty of these "wicked men, having been "shut up close by some per- "sons like himself who were "assign'd for that purpose, "at ten of the clock he com- "pell'd them, being drunk "and dozed with over much [g] "wine, to give him the Bishoprick by [g] an imagi- "nary and an ineffectual imposition of hands: and in his Epistle to Cyprian, says Novatianus was Ordain'd by three Bishops, whereas Pacianus says, in his 2d Epistle to Sempronianus, he was Ordain'd by the letters commendatory of the Confessours: but these differences we may thus reconcile. Novatianus was named to be the Bishop, by the Epistle of the Confessours, but was afterwards Consecrated by three Bishops. Vales.

DECIUS. "And he laid claim to that by craft and subtilty, "which did in no wise appertain to him. One "of those Bishops not long after return'd to the "Church, bewailing and confessing his sin, whom, "through the mediation of all the people then pre- "sent, [h] we received into the "communion of the Laity. "We ordain'd successours "for the other two Bishops, "and sent them away to pos- "sess their Sees. [i] This main- "tainer therefore of the Go- "spel, knew not that 'twas "meet there should be but "one [k] Bishop in the Church "of Rome. In which he was "not ignorant (for how "could he be?) that there "should be [l] 46 Presbyters, "seven Deacons, Seven sub- "Deacons, Clerks 42; Exor- "cists, Readers, together with "Janitors, 52. Widows, "and [m] indigent persons, "which could not maintain "themselves, above a thou- "sand and five hundred. All "these the grace and bounty "of the Lord maintain'd. "But neither could so great "multitude, so necessary in "the Church, (a congre- "gation which by Gods pro- "vidence is both rich, and "numerous, together with a "great and innumerable mul- "titude of people,) make "this man ashamed of this "so desperate an attempt, or "deter him from proceeding "in it, or recall him into the "Church. And again, after "some other words, which intervene, he adjoyns these. "But come on, let us in our "following words declare, "in what works of his own, "or what good practices he "was so confident, as to aspire to a Bishoprick. "Was it upon this account, that from the begin- "ning he had been conversant in the Church, and "had fought many combats in defence of it, and "had been in many and great perils upon account "of Religion? No; this is nothing so. For the "devil who had entered into him, and for a long "time dwelt in him, was the occasion of his being "a believer. He being relieved [thereof] by "the Exorcists, fell into a grievous distemper, and "it being supposed that he would die immediately, "he received Baptism, ([n] being besprinkled with "water,) on the bed whereon he lay: (if that [n] This word ῥαθεὶς Rufinus very well renders perfusus, besprinkled; for people which were sick, and baptiz'd in their beds, could not be dipped in water by the Priest, but were sprinkled with water by him: this Baptism was thought imperfect, and not solemn for several reasons. Also they who were thus baptiz'd were called ever afterwards Clinici, and by the 12th Canon of the Council of Neocæsarea, these Clinici were prohibited Priesthood. Chrysostome describes this sort of Baptism in his 60th Homily Tome the 2d (to the Catechumeni:) Cyprian, in his 76th Epistle, holds this Baptism to be lawfull, and perfect. Vales.

[c] Concerning this Maximus the Presbyter, Urbanus, and Sidonius Confessours, how they deserted Novatianus, and were converted to the Church, see Cornelius the Pope's Epistle to Cyprian. There was also at the same time another Maximus Presbyter of the Church of Rome, whom Novatianus imploy'd as Embassador to Cyprian into Africk, together with Machæus, and others: Afterwards the Schismaticks made this Maximus a Bishop in Africk, as Cyprian in his Epistle to Cornelius tells us. Vales.

[d] Καλύπτω, signifies to catch a man in the very act of Robbery, whilest the φωλεὰ, or things which he hath stolen are yet in his hands, hence it signifies to bring any plot, robbery or any other wickedness to light, to bewray, or disclose. Viger. Idiot. pag. 27.

[e] Ἐκ μαλαγάνης (the phrase here in the originall) has the same import with [ἀπὸ μηχανῆς] which is a proverbial speech in Greek, and signifies, ex insperato, improviso; i.e. unlookt for, or on a sudden. See Erasm. Adag. pag. 46. Edit. Froben.

[f] Theodoret in his 3d book of his Heretic. Fabul. Chap. 5. writes, that Novatus himself went into Italy to fetch these Bishops, and when he, with the Bishops upon their journey, came into some town or other, he forced them to Ordain him, which those Bishops complain'd of when they came to Rome; but this Epistle of Cornelius refutes that story of his. Vales.

[g] Cornelius calls this an imperfect, and ineffectual Ordination, because it was solemniz'd by Bishops of another Dioceſs, and not by those Bishops who had the right and power of Ordaining the Bishops of Rome, which were the Bishops of Ostia, Tibur and others; 'twas also ineffectual and vain, because it was done by men who were drunk, by force, at the tenth hour of the day, none of the Clergy, or people being present, and lastly, because another Bishop was before regularly Ordain'd. Cornelius both here, [h] Hence we may gather that Cornelius degraded the Bishops which assisted in the Consecration of Novatianus, and also excommunicated them all, except one who by the mediation of the people, obtain'd the Priviledge of the communion which the Laicks have: Which was to kiss the Bishop after they had taken the Eucharist of him, as Hieronymus, and Paulus Diaconus affirm. Vales.

[i] This is spoken Ironically of Novatianus, because he himself (as Cyprian in his first Epistle to Cornelius witnesseth) boasted he was a Defender of the Gospel of Christ. Vales.

[k] The same words [ἕνα ἐπίσκοπον δεῖν εἶ ἐν καθολικῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ] are in the Epistle of Cornelius to Cyprian: where the Confessours, who deserted Novatianus, use these words, as a renunciation of their former Principles, by this ἐκκλησία καθολικὴ, is here meant the Church of Rome. Vales.

[l] Hence we may gather how many Churches there were then at Rome, for every Presbyter had his particular Church; so that if there were 46 Presbyters, there were also 46 Churches: See Baronius in the year of Christ 57. Vales.

[m] Some Editions read χλυδώμενοι, others χλινοδώμενοι: but without doubt the true reading is ἀλιδώμενοι, that is, as Rufinus renders it, indigent persons, or as the Roman Clergy explain it, persons who could not maintain themselves. Chrysostome in his 67th Homilie upon Matthew, saith, that the Church of Antioch in his days, though it had but small revenues, yet reliev'd above 3000 widows and virgins daily, besides strangers, Lepers, and Prisoners: and besides Clerks, whom it supplied with meat and cloathing. Vales.

DECIUS. "can be termed Baptiſm:) Neither, when he had "eſcaped that ſickneſs, did he afterwards receive "the other things which the ° Canon of the "Church injoyneth ſhould be received: nor was "he ᵖ ſealed by the Biſhops impoſition of "hands; which if he never received, how did he "receive the holy Ghoſt? And again, a little after, he ſaith; "This man in the time "of perſecution, through "timerouſneſs and a deſire "of life, deny'd that he was "a Presbyter. For being "deſired and intreated by "the Deacons that he would "come out of his Chamber, "in which he had ſhut him-"ſelf up, and ſuccour the "Brethren as far as it was "meet and poſſible for a "Presbyter to ſuccour the "diſtreſſed Brethren, who "wanted aſſiſtance; he was "ſo far from complying with "the Deacons who intreated "him, that with great indig-"nation he went his way, "and departed. For he ſaid "he would no longer be a "Presbyter; but was a fa-"vourer of another kind of "Philoſophy. Having ran over ſome few paſſages, he makes this addition hereto in theſe words: "For this ex-"cellent fellow has deſerted "the Church of God, in "which, after he had re-"ceived Baptiſm, he was "ᵠ vouchſafed the degree of "Presbyter by the favour of "the Biſhop, who by impo-"ſition of hands Ordain'd "him Prieſt. Who being "ʳ denyed [Orders] by "all the Clergy, and many "of the Laity, (becauſe it "was not lawfull for one "who had been baptized in "his bed by reaſon of ſome "infirmity, as he was, to be "admitted into ſ any ſacred "Order,) the Biſhop in-"treated licence might be "granted him to Ordain this "perſon onely. To theſe impious acts he afterwards ſubjoyneth this other, the worſt of all his wicked exploits; ſaying thus: "For he made oblations, and diſtributed to every "one a part thereof, which when he had ᵗ deli-"vered, inſtead of bleſſing them, he compelled "the wretched men to ſwear, holding the hands of "him that received with both his hands, and not "letting them go, till the "perſons had ſworn, pro-"nouncing theſe words: (for "I will here make uſe of "his own words:) Swear "to me by the body and blood "of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, "that thou wilt never deſert "me, and revolt to Cornelius. "So the miſerable man was not permitted to "taſte, before he had ᵘ curſed himſelf. And "at the receiving of the bread, inſtead of ſaying "† Amen, he ſays, I will never return to Cor-"nelius. Again, after ſome other words he ſays thus: "Now you muſt underſtand he is "ſtript naked of all his followers, and left de-"ſolate. The Brethren daily deſerting him, and "returning to the Church: And ˣ Moſes a bleſſed "Martyr, (who lately amongſt us ſuffered a fa-"mous and admirable Martyrdom,) taking no-"tice in his life time, of this man's impudence "and folly, ʸ deprived him of communion, toge-"ther with the five ᶻ Presbyters, who with him "had voluntarily ſeparated themſelves from the "Church. Now at the end of his Epiſtle, he makes a catalogue of thoſe Biſhops who were preſent at Rome, and condemn'd the folly of Nova-tus. He alſo gives an account of their names, and the name of every ones particular Church, in which he Govern'd. He does alſo expreſly men-tion thoſe, who were not then preſent [at Rome,] but by letters approved of the ſentence of the fore-ſaid Biſhops, together with their names, and the names of the Cities, from which each of them wrote. Thus much Cornelius has recorded in his Epiſtle to Fabius Biſhop of Antioch.

° The Canon was this, that they who were baptized in their beds, if they recovered again, ſhould afterwards go to the Biſhop, that he might ſupply what was wanting in that Baptiſm; Novatianus is here accuſed by Cornelius, becauſe, after his recovery he never went to the Biſhop for the completion of Baptiſm, as the Canon of the Church injoyneth: for it is expreſly commanded in the 47th Canon of the Council of Laodicea, and in Chap. 38. of the Council of Eliberis. Valeſ.

ᵖ Ruſinus thinketh that by this phraſe [τὸ σφραγισθῆναι ὑπὸ τοῦ ὀπισκόπου] is meant the Chriſm, but I rather think he means the impoſition of hands, by which the Biſhops gave the holy Ghoſt to them who were baptiz'd. Cyprian, to Jubaianus, confirms our interpretation. 'Tis true σφραγίζειν ſignifies to ſign, or mark, it alſo ſignifies, to lay hands on, as Innocentius uſes it in his 3d and 6th Chap. to Decentius, and Marcus in his life of Porphyrius Biſhop of Gaza, and Ambroſe (or whoſoever it is who is the Au-thour of thoſe books) upon the 4th Chap. of Paul's Epiſtle to the Epheſians. This ſealing of the baptized was ſometimes per-form'd with the Chriſm, (that is) when the Perſon, in caſe of approaching death, had been baptiz'd by ſome of the inferiour Clergy, and not anointed; but if he had been perfectly baptized before, onely impoſition of hands by the Biſhop was required, as the Canon Arauſicanus tells us. Hence I conjecture aroſe the cuſtom of not uſing the Chriſm in Baptiſm amongſt the Nova-tians, (as Theodoret tells us they did not, in his third book Haret. Fabul.) becauſe their Ringlea-der Novatianus received Baptiſm without the Chriſm. Valeſ.

ᵠ Hence we may gather that Novatianus immediately received Prieſts Orders being never Or-dained Deacon, or Subdeacon: which thing was at that time cuſtomary in the Church, as we may ſee in Origen and others. Valeſ.

ʳ Formerly Biſhops could not Ordain Prieſts without the con-ſent of the Clergy, and People. Now concerning the requiring of the peoples votes in the Election of Presbyters, the Nicene Fathers themſelves do evidence that, in their Synodical Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Ægypt. Out of ſeveral places of that Epiſtle we may ga-ther, that the conſent of the people was required in the Ordination of Clergy men. The holy Fathers alſo in that ſame Epiſtle deprive thoſe Biſhops who adhered to Meletius the Schiſmatick, of all authority of propoſing their names to the people, who were to be admitted into holy Orders, and onely granted it to thoſe Biſhops who were pure from all Schiſm. For, in thoſe days, the Biſhops gave up the names of them who were to be Ordain'd to the people, that if they had any thing to object againſt any of them, they might atteſt it openly; as we may read in the Sacramentarium of Gregory the great. There is alſo an excellent paſſage in St Chryſoſtome upon this ſame thing in his 18th Homily upon the 2d Epiſtle of Paul to the Corinthians. We have the whole ſolemnity excellently deſcrib'd in the Sacramentarium of Gregory the Great, pag. 236. upon which place conſult the Annotations of that moſt learned man Hugo Menardus. Valeſ.

ſ Κλῆρος ſignifies a Degree or Order of them who have any Office in the Church. So Cornelius calls κλῆρον καὶ πρεσβυτέριον, the Presbytership. Euſebius, and Irenæus very often uſe κλῆρον καὶ ἐπισκοπὴν for the Dignity of a Biſhop: κλῆρός τις ſignifies any degree whatſoever. Valeſ.

DECIUS.

ᵗ It was the proper du-ty of the Prieſt to deliver the Euchariſt, and the Cup into the hands of the Receivers. See Chry-ſoſtom's 46 Homily upon Mat-thew: in the 2d Council of Or-leans, Chap. 15. the Deacons are forbid to preſume to deliver the body of Chriſt to the belie-vers, when the Prieſt is preſent. Valeſ.

ᵘ Every oath has a curſe an-nexed to it, which though it is not al-ways ex-preſſed (as in this place) yet may be ta-citly under-ſtood; which thing the Latine Transla-tours did not take notice of, and hence they make ἐωπῶ καὶ παρεδίδου to ſignifie, before he had devoted himſelf to him, (i.e.) as they ſuppoſed to Novati-anus; but I had rather read it ἐωπῷ, with George Syncellus. The meaning of the place then is this, that the unhappy man was not permitted to taſt, before he had ſolemnly curſed himſelf. Valeſ.

† This phraſe [ἀντὶ τοῦ εἰπεῖν τὸ ἀμὴν, inſtead of ſaying Amen] has the ſame import with what Cornelius has ſaid a little before, viz. [ἀντὶ τοῦ εὐλογεῖν, inſtead of bleſſing him.] For the faithfull (when they rece.ved the Euchariſt from the hands of the prieſt) uſed to anſwer Amen, after the Prieſt, delivering the Sacrament, had ſaid, The body of our Lord, &c. See Ambroſ. in his B. 4. Chap. 5. De Sa-cramento: Cyrill of Jeruſalem, in his laſt Catechiſm: and Auguſt. B. 12. Chap. 10. againſt Fauſtus. Valeſ.

ˣ Concerning this Moſes, a Presbyter of Rome, Cyprian in his E-piſtles does ſpeak frequently. After the Martyrdom of Fabianus Biſhop of Rome (who ſuffered Anno Chriſti 250.) this Moſes was apprehended, (together with Maximus the Presbyter, and Nicoſtra-tus the Deacon,) caſt into priſon, where after 11 Months, and 11 days, he dyed. See Cyprian's 15th Epiſtle to Moſes and Maximus. Valeſ.

ʸ Moſes being a Presbyter had no authority to excommunicate his fellow-Presbyters: all he could doe was to ſeparate himſelf from their communion, when they came to viſit him in priſon. This phraſe here [ἀκοινώνητον ἐποίησε, i.e. he deprived him of communion] the ancient writers frequently uſed, when they ſpake of thoſe Preſ-byters, who abſtained from communion with others. See Paulinus in the Life of St Ambros. Moſes's depriving of Novatianus of com-munion was, I ſuppoſe, done by him a little before his death. For at firſt Moſes the Confeſſour had communion with Novatianus: and when the Clergy of Rome wrote that Epiſtle to Cyprian (which among Cyprian's Epiſtles is accounted the 31,) Moſes then had communion with Novatianus: for both of them ſubſcribed that Epiſtle. More-over, Novatianus himſelf wrote an Epiſtle, as Cyprian atteſts in his E-piſtle to Antonianus: from which Epiſtle we may perceive the wit and eloquence of Novatianus; for that Epiſtle, we muſt confeſs, is a moſt elegant piece; and it was written when Moſes had been a year in pri-ſon, as may be collected from Cyprian's Epiſtles to Moſes. Valeſ.

ᶻ Who theſe five Presbyters were, who with Novatianus made a Schiſm, 'tis to me unknown. I can't think that Maximus the Presby-ter and Confeſſour, who with Urbanus, Sidonius, Nicoſtratus, and the reſt of the Confeſſours were ſeduced by Novatianus, adhered to his party any long time. For Maximus and the reſt of the Confeſſors went went over to Novatianus's party after Moses's death. Indeed Novatianus separated himself from the Church before Moses's death, which happened in February, Decius 3, and Etruscus being Consuls: but the confessours did not betake themselves to Novatianus's side till after Moses's death. So great was the power and authority of Moses. Besides, 'tis evident the Confessours were not dismist of their imprisonment till Moses was dead: for why should they be freed rather than Moses? Therefore they became Novatianus's followers after Moses's death. One Maximus, name-sake to Maximus the Presbyter and Confessour, seems to have been one of these five Presbyters; whom Novatianus sent as his messenger afterwards into Africa. Vales.

CHAP. XLIV.

Dionysius's story concerning Serapion.

Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria sent Letters to this same Fabius, who was something inclining to this Schism, and having discours'd several things concerning repentance in his Letters to him, and also related the combats of some who had undergone Martyrdom a little before at Alexandria, amongst other stories, he relates a miraculous thing, which I thought necessary here to insert into this our History, it runs thus: "I will "here propose to you one example which hap-"pened amongst us. There was amongst us one "Serapion an old man, a believer: who for a long "time had lived blameless: but in the time of per-"secution he lapsed: he often petitioned for par-"don, [a] but no body gave at-"tention to him, because he "had sacrificed. Being taken "with sickness, he remained "for the space of three days "speechless, and senseless: be-"ing a little refresht on the "4th day, he called his daugh-"ters son to him, and said, "Child, how long do you de-"tain me? I pray make haste, "and absolve me quickly, "call one of the [b] Presbyters "to me: And when he had "spoken these words, he was "again speechless. The child "ran to the Presbyter. It "was now night: and the "Presbyter also was sick, "and not able to come. But "(because I had before given "command, that those peo-"ple who were dying, if "they desired it, and [c] espe-"cially if they had before "humbly requested it, should "be [d] absolved, that they "might depart with a lively "hope) he [e] gave to the "Child a piece of the Sacrament, bidding him to "[f] moisten it in water, and put it into the old "man's mouth: the child returned with it. And "when he approached, before he came in; Sera-"pion again recovered himself a little, and said, "Child thou art come, the Presbyter was not "able to come; but doe thou perform quickly "what he injoyn'd thee, and let me depart. The "boy moistned it in water, and put it into his "mouth immediately. And when he had swal-"lowed it by little and little, he straightway gave "up the Ghost. Is it not plain that he was pre-"served, and his life prolonged till he was ab-"solv'd, that his sin being quite blotted out, he "might for the several good works he performed, "be [g] acknowledged [by Christ.] Thus much Dionysius.

[a] He means that none of the Clergy, or Laity, were moved with his entreaties so as to think him worthy of absolution. (For the people's suffrages were required when any one was to be received into the Church, who for any fault had been excommunicated.) And the Bishop himself sometimes asked the Consent of the people. The people also did often intercede for the penitents to the Bishop, as we may see in the preceding Chap. in the Epistle of Pope Cornelius to Fabian Bishop of Antioch. Vales.

[b] Some one may perhaps ask why Serapion did not rather send for the Bishop, whose Office it was to reconcile penitents. The Bishop had given this authority to the Presbyters for fear least he being absent any one should die without absolution and the Communion. See Epiphanius in his Heresie of the Arrians. This custom of committing this authority to the Presbyters was usual in all great Cities. Vales.

[c] This was the Decree of the African Synod about the same time that Dionysius wrote these things. Vales.

[d] In the Savil. and Fuk. M.SS. before this word [ἀφεθῆ] there are some words inserted which also Christophor. inserts in his translation: it may appear from this place that the Sacrament was delivered to such penitents in case of necessity, without the reconciliatory imposition of hands. And this communion was called, the viaticum. See Canon the 77 and 78 of the 4th Council of Carthage, and the 39th Canon of the first Council of Arausica: this Communion was called also dispensatoria, because it was granted to dying penitents, before the completion of the full time appointed for Repentance, and if the penitent communicant recovered, it was perfected after his recovery by imposition, he compleating his time of repentance. Vales.

[e] This that Dionysius here says concerning the giving of the Eucharist to the boy to carry to the sick person, ought not to seem strange, for it was frequently done a long time after; So that St Udalric thought it necessary expressly to prohibit it, in his Synodical speech which Gretser published together with the Life of Gregory the seventh Chap. 20. But that which Gretser takes to be St Udalric's Oration, I found lately to be the Synodical Epistle of Ratherius Bishop of Verona to his Clergy. And so 'tis intitled in the old Laudunensian M.S. Vales.

DECIUS.

[f] Rufinus translates this phrase ὀπτήξαι κελεύσας, thus, he commanded it should be given him being dipped. So the Antients us'd to dip the Consecrated bread in water, as Adamannus witnesseth in his 2d book concerning the Miracles of St Columba, Cap. 6. And Bede also in the life of St Cuthbert, Chap. 31. and in his Poem upon the same man's life; and several other Ecclesiastick Writers. But the Eucharists being put into the mouth of sick persons, is mentioned in the 75th Canon of the 4th Council of Carthage; which Canon is, concerning sick persons, who desired repentance, but were speechless before the Priest came to them. See the contents of that Canon. Vales.

[g] Langus, Wolfius and Musculus render ὁμολογηθῆναι in this place by the Latine word confiteri; which, in my opinion, is intolerable. Christoph. renders it, in numerum Confessorum referri, to be reckoned amongst the Confessours: which Translation I like, if it be understood thus, referri à Christo, to be reckoned by Christ. For Dionysius alludeth to Christ's words in the Gospel. He who shall confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father, &c. Matth. 10. 32. Vales.

CHAP. XLV.

Dionysius's Epistle to Novatus.

Let us now see what the same person wrote to Novatus, who about this time disturbed the fraternity of the Roman Church. Take notice therefore how he writes to him, because he pretended that some of the Brethren were the Authors of his Apostacy and Schism, and how he yielded to it, being compelled by them. "Dionysius sendeth greeting to our "Brother [a] Novatus. If "you (as you say) were "seduced unwillingly, you "should manifest it by a "voluntary return. For bet-"ter it were to endure any "thing whatever, then that "the Church of God should "be rent asunder. Nor were "Martyrdom less honoura-"ble if a man suffer death "before he will yield to "raise Schism in the Church, "then if he undergoe it ra-"ther than he will yield to "sacrifice to Idols. Yea in "my opinion 'tis much more "glorious, for in that case "man suffers Martyrdom for "his own soul's sake onely: "but in this he undergoes it for the sake of the "whole Church. Wherefore now, if you can per-"swade, or compel the Brethren to return to con-"cord, your good deed will be greater then "your crime; for this will not be imputed to "you: but that will be commended But if you "can effect nothing upon the disobedient, save "your own soul. I wish you health, and that "you may embrace Peace in the Lord. These things he wrote to Novatus.

[a] Hieronymus, in his Catalogue, where he relates the beginning of this Epistle, instead of Novatus more truly writes Novatianus. And so in George Syncellus's Chronicle we read Διονύσιος Νωβατιανῷ. Rufinus says that Dionysius wrote two Epistles after the same Copy; one to Novatus, another to Novatianus; and at the end of Dionysius's Epistle to Novatus, which Eusebius here rehearseth, he addes thus much, and he wrote these same words to Novatianus: which words are no where found in the Greek Text. The Greek writers being deceived through the likeness of the names, make a confusion betwixt Novatus, and Novatianus, using them both to signifie one and the same person. Our Authour Eusebius is also guilty of this mistake. Vales.

CHAP. XLVI.

Concerning Dionyſius's other Epiſtles.

HE alſo wrote an Epiſtle concerning Repentance to them [a] in Ægypt: in which he layeth down his Opinions concerning the lapſed, and makes diſtinctions in the degrees of faults. There is alſo extant a particular book of his concerning Repentance, to Conon Biſhop of the Church of Hermopolis. And another [b] objurgatory Epiſtle to his flock at Alexandria. And amongſt them there is an Epiſtle written to Origen concerning Martyrdom. And an Epiſtle to the Brethren at Laodicea, over whom Thelymidres was Biſhop: He alſo writ concerning Repentance to the Brethren in Armenia, over whom [c] Meruzanes was Biſhop. He writes to all theſe, and alſo to Cornelius Biſhop of Rome, after he had received his Epiſtle concerning Novatus. Where he declares that he was invited by Helenus Biſhop of Tarſus in Cilicia, and thoſe who were with him: and alſo by Firmilianus Biſhop of Cappadocia, and by Theoctiſtus Biſhop of Paleſtine, to meet them at the Synod at Antioch, where ſome men endeavoured to eſtabliſh the Novatian Schiſm. [d] Moreover he ſends him word that he had heard Fabius was dead, and that Demetrianus was appointed to be his ſucceſſour in the Biſhoprick of Antioch. He alſo writes concerning the Biſhop of Jeruſalem in theſe very words: "Alſo bleſſed Alexander being in pri-"ſon, there died a happy death. There is extant beſides this, another Epiſtle of his ſent by Hippolytus to the Brethren at Rome, concerning the [e] Office of a Deacon. He alſo wrote another to them concerning Peace, and concerning Repentance likewiſe. And again he wrote another to the Confeſſours there, who even at that preſent were favourers of Novatus's Opinion. He alſo ſent to thoſe ſame men two other Epiſtles, after their return to the Church. He alſo compiled many more Epiſtles written to divers perſons, wherein he has left to them, who at this time ſtudiouſly peruſe his Works, variety of profit.

DECIUS.

[e] Ruſinus tranſlates διακονικὴ de Miniſterii, as if the Epiſtle were ſo intitled, becauſe it treated concerning the Miniſters of the Church. Jacobus Goar, who publiſhed Georgius Syncellus, and illuſtrated him with his Notes, thinks that this διακονικὴ was a kind of an Eccleſiaſtick Epiſtle, as were the Synodical, the Dimiſſory Epiſtles, and the like: but I rather aſſent to Ruſinus, that it was called διακονικὴ, becauſe it treated concerning the Duty of a Deacon. Valeſ.

THE

The PREFACE.

DIonyſius the Great, Biſhop of Alexandria, ſhall again aſſiſt us with his words in the Compoſure of this Seventh Book of the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory; who particularly relates all the Actions of his own Times, in the Epiſtles which he left to Poſterity: And our Narration ſhall take its beginning from hence.

CHAP. I.

Concerning the wickedneſs of Decius and Gallus.

GALLUS.

GALLUS ſucceeds Decius, who was ſlain in a ſhort time, together with his [a] Children, before he had fully compleated the [b] Second year of his Reign. [c] About this time died Origen, having lived Seventy years wanting one. But Dionyſius in his Epiſtle to Hermammon, writes thus concerning Gallus. "But neither did Gallus "underſtand what was Decius's deſtruction; "neither did he before ſee what brought his "ruine: But he alſo ſtumbled upon the ſame "ſtone, which lay before his eyes. He, (his "Kingdom being in a happy ſtate, and all affairs "ſucceeding according to his [d] deſire) perſecu- "ted the holy men who offered up their prayers "to God for his peace and ſafety, and together "with them, drove away thoſe prayers, by which "they intereeded for him. This he writes concerning Gallus.

[a] Decius the Emperour had 2 ſons, the elder was named, Quintus Herennius Etruſcus Meſſius Decius; The younger, Caius Valens Hoſtilianus Meſſius Quintus. They were both made Cæſars by their father, and afterwards Auguſti, as may appear by their Coins, and the inſcriptions upon them. Valeſ.

[b] Euſebius in his Chronicle ſaith Decius Reigned one year, and three moneths. Aurelius Victor ſaith he died after he had Reigned two years compleat. But Victor in his Epitomy ſaith he Reigned 30 moneths. Euſebius in his Chronicle Aſſigns one year and three moneths to Decius, becauſe he had before ſaid that Philip Reigned ſeven years, whereas he Reigned but ſix. After his death Decius proclaimed himſelf both Emperour, and Conſul, which was in the year of Chriſt 249. And in the year 250. he was again Conſul. And alſo the year after he kept his Government, as we may gather, by a Decree of the Senate which was made in that year, which Pollio in Valerian relates. Wherefore he died the year following, together with his ſons (when Gallus, and Voluſianus were Conſuls,) being all kill'd in the Wars in Thrace. Valeſ.

[c] Baronius placeth Origen's death at the year of Chriſt 256, in the third year of Gallus and Voluſianus; Euſebius here placeth it in the ſame year that Decius died, and Gallus began to Govern. But Euſebius himſelf in the 36th chap. of the 6th book of this Hiſtory confirmeth what Baronius ſaith: for he ſays that in the 3d year of Philip the Emperours Reign, Origen was above 60 years old. And from the 3d year of Philip's Reign to the 3d year of Gallus and Voluſianus's Conſulſhip, 'tis 9 years. Moreover, if we ſay Origen liv'd 69 years, and died in the firſt year of Gallus the Emperour, he muſt neceſſarily be born in the 4th year of Commodus the Emperour: but the Chronicon Alexandr. aſſigns his birth to the ninth year of that Emperour. Valeſ.

GALLUS.

[d] Some Copies, as the King's M. S. and Stephan. Edit. inſtead of χτ ῥᾶν, read χτ ῥᾶν. And make it a Metaphor taken from them who ſail with tide and ſtream. Valeſ.

CHAP. II.

Who about theſe times were Biſhops of Rome.

COrnelius having poſſeſſed the Biſhoprick of Rome about three years, Lucius was appointed his ſucceſſour. He having miniſtred in the Office not eight whole months, died, and relinquiſhed the dignity to Stephen. It was this Stephen, to whom Dionyſius wrote the firſt of his Epiſtles concerning Baptiſm, there being about that time a great controverſie raiſed, whether it were lawfull for the Converts, of what Sect ſoever, to be cleanſed by Baptiſm. [a] For an old Cuſtom had prevailed, that about theſe Converts onely impoſition together with prayer was to be uſed.

[a] At theſe words we ſhould begin the 3d Chapter, for what follows concerning Cyprian, ought to be contained in the ſame ſentence with theſe laſt words in this Chapter. And before theſe words in all books we find a diſtinction, which ſhews, here is to begin another Period. But Muſculus, and Chriſtoph. begin the third Chapter where we doe. Valeſ.

CHAP. III.

How Cyprian, with ſome Biſhops which were of his mind, was the firſt that was of the Opinion, that the Converts of any Heretical Sect whatever, ought to be rebaptized.

CYprian then Biſhop of Carthage was the [a] firſt of all, who thought, that Hereticks ſhould not be admitted unleſs they were Cleanſed

[a] Cyprian was not the firſt Authour of this Opinion; but Agrippinus, who was Biſhop of Carthage a long time before fore him, having aſſembled together the Biſhops of Africa and Numidia, made a Decree that Hereticks ſhould be rebaptized, as Cyprian ſaith in his 71 and 73 Epiſtles. Therefore Cyprian ought here to be excuſed, who onely endeavoured to maintain his predeceſſours Opinion, which was eſtabliſhed by the Authority of a Synod. But this Cuſtom of rebaptizing Hereticks, had been uſed in Cappadocia time out of mind, as Firmilianus Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia teſtifieth in his Epiſtle to Cyprian. Valeſ.

GALLUS. from their former errour by Baptiſm. [b] But Stephen, thinking no innovations ought to be raiſed in oppoſition to the Tradition which had prevailed of Old, was in no wiſe well pleaſed at the Biſhops this.

[b] The Epiſtle of Stephen to the Biſhops of Africa is in the 74 and 75 Epiſt. of Cyprian. Firmilianus alſo, in his Epiſtle to Cyprian, relates ſome heads of that Epiſtle, and confutes them. Valeſ.

CHAP. IV.

How many Epiſtles Dionyſius wrote concerning this Controverſie.

DIonyſius therefore having written at large to * him concerning this buſineſs, at laſt certifieth him, that the Perſecution being allayed, the Churches in all places, which deteſted Novatus's [a] Novelties, had regained a general Peace amongſt themſelves: thus he writes,

* To Stephen.

[a] Νεωτερισμὸς (the term here) has ſome alluſion to Novatus, or Novatianus's name: other Greek Authours call that which the Latines call Novitates hæreſeon, Novelties, innovations, or newneſs of Doctrine, νεωτερισμούς. Valeſ.

CHAP. V.

Concerning the Peace which followed the Perſecution.

"[a] BUt know (my Brother,) that all the "Churches throughout the Eaſt, amongſt which there were formerly diviſions, "are now united: [b] And a little farther he writes; "and all the Prelates every where are in perfect "Concord, as to their ſentiments, and rejoyce "exceedingly for this unexpected Peace: [to "wit,] Demetrianus Biſhop of Antioch; Theoctiſtus of Cæſarea, Mazabanes of [c] Ælia, Alexander being dead; Marinus of Tyre; Heliodorus of Laodicea, Thelymidres being deceaſed; "Helenus of Tarſus, and all the Churches of Cilicia; Firmilianus, and all Cappadocia. For I "have here onely named the more eminent Biſhops, that my Epiſtle might not be too long, nor "my relation troubleſome: Alſo all the Provinces of Syria and Arabia, whom you [d] frequently relieve, and to whom you have now written: "Meſopotamia alſo, Pontus, and Bithynia: And "in a word, all people every where rejoyce for "the concord and Brotherly-love, and praiſe "God. Theſe are the words of Dionyſius. But Xyſtus ſucceeds Stephen after he had executed the Epiſcopal Office two years. To him Dionyſius wrote a ſecond Epiſtle concerning Baptiſm, and ſet forth to him the judgment and opinion of Stephen, and the other Biſhops. Concerning Stephen thus he writes; "Indeed he before [e] wrote letters "concerning Helenus and Firmilianus, and all the "[Biſhops] of Cilicia, Cappadocia, and Galatia. "And moreover, concerning all the neighbouring "Provinces, that he would have no communion "with them for this very reaſon, becauſe (ſays "he) they rebaptize Hereticks. And conſider "the weightineſs of the affaire; for truly I hear, "that there have been determinations made in the "[f] greateſt Synods of Biſhops concerning this "buſineſs, that Hereticks which were converted, "ſhould be firſt Catechized, and then ſhould be "waſhed and cleanſed from the filth of their old "and unclean leaven. And I wrote to him, making "interceſſion for all theſe men. And afterwards "he ſays: alſo to our well beloved and fellow-"Presbyters, Dionyſius, and Philemon (who were "formerly of Stephen's Opinion, and wrote to me "concerning the ſame things) I before wrote "in ſhort, but now I have written more at "large. But thus much concerning the ſaid controverſie.

GALLUS.

[a] Baronius from this Epiſtle of Dionyſius's (at the year of Chriſt 259) gathers that the Eaſtern Biſhops had renounced their Errour, and adhered to Stephen's Opinion, that Hereticks were not to be rebaptized. But any conſiderate reader of this Epiſtle will find it far otherwiſe. For the ſubject of this Epiſtle is twofold. 1. Whether Hereticks were to be rebaptized. 2. Concerning the unanimity of the Oriental Churches, which had abominated the Novatian Hereſie, and Decree'd that the lapſed ſhould be received. He therefore tells him, that Demetrianus Biſhop of Antioch, Metropolitan of the Eaſt, and the reſt had ſubſcribed to this Opinion: which he knew would pleaſe Stephen, becauſe Fabius, Demetrianus's predeceſſour, endeavoured to eſtabliſh the Novatian Hereſie, as Dionyſius before ſignified in the end of the 6 book of this Hiſtory. Valeſ.

[b] Theſe words [καὶ ἔτι μικρὸν προϊὼν λέγει, and a little farther] are not in the Fuk. and Savil M. SS. but Syncellus, Nicephorus, King's Maz. and Med. M. SS. have them, and though ſome will have theſe words to ſignifie μεσογειοτέρω Ἐκκλησίαι the more Remote Churches, yet I think that they are Euſebius's own words, repeating the heads of Dionyſius's Epiſtle. And this is my reaſon, becauſe in moſt of our M. SS. there is a middle diſtinction at theſe words; therefore we tranſlate it thus, a little further he writes. Valeſ.

[c] This City was in Dionyſius's days, and alſo till Conſtantinus's time called Ælia. It was afterwards called Jeruſalem (as I before noted) through the pride of the Biſhops of that See, who termed themſelves the ſucceſſours of James the Juſt: hence is it that Rufinus never calls it Ælia but according to the manner of his times, always Jeruſalem. Valeſ.

[d] The Church of Rome was wont formerly to relieve other Churches, and to ſend money and cloathes to the Brethren in captivity, and to thoſe which wrought as ſlaves in the Mines. So Dionyſius Biſhop of Corinth ſaith in his Epiſtle to Pope Soter; which Epiſtle Euſebius quotes in his fourth book chap. 23. Euſebius alſo in that ſame place ſays that this laudable cuſtom continued in the Chuch of Rome in his days. And to that purpoſe Collections were made in the Church. Ἐπαρκεῖν properly ſignifies, to ſupply one with all things neceſſary for a journey, viaticum præbere, and alſo it ſignifies (as it does here) to relieve charitably, as we do beggers, with money, or Alms. So Clemens Alex. in his firſt book Stromat. and Chryſoſt. in his 67 Homily upon Matthew, uſe the word. Valeſ.

[e] Stephen wrote another Epiſtle, (beſides that we mentioned, before he wrote to the Biſhops of Africa,) to the Eaſtern Biſhops, which Firmilianus mentions in his Epiſtle to Cyprian, near the end: where Firmilianus ſays that he broke off all peace and friendſhip with the Eaſtern Biſhops, but he did not, onely threatned that he would renounce all communion with them, if they perſiſted in their old Opinion, as Dionyſius here expreſly teſtifieth. It is certain that Stephen never proceeded in this matter farther then threats; for after Stephen's death, Dionyſius wrote to Xyſtus deſiring his judgment in that point. For Dionyſius inclined to the Opinion of the Africans, and the Eaſtern Biſhops, as Hieronymus witneſſeth. Firmilianus in his foreſaid Epiſtle does ſtrangely aggravate the buſineſs, ſo that ſome think from his words they may gather that Stephen excommunicated thoſe Biſhops: he was indeed much diſpleaſed that the African Synod ſhould pretend to diſanul ſo ancient a cuſtom, and make Decrees, that Hereticks ſhould be rebaptized, without the knowledge of the Church of Rome: but he never broke peace with them, nor excommunicated them: for he wrote an anſwer to Cyprian. And although his letters to Cyprian were ſomething ſharp, yet they ſtill remained friends: for Cyprian afterwards in his letters to Pompeius, called Stephen brother. In fine the Africans, notwithſtanding Stephen's letters, rebaptized Hereticks till the times of Conſtantine, as we may ſee from the Council of Orleans. Valeſ.

[f] He meanes by theſe great Synods, the Synod of Iconium, of which ſee Firmilianus's Epiſtle to Cyprian; the Gouncil of Synnada, and the Council of Carthage under Cyprian: in which Council above eighty Biſhops gave their opinion, ſome of which were Martyrs and Confeſſours: in the Council of Iconium fifty Biſhops met, as Auguſt. atteſts in book 3. and chap. 3. againſt Creſconius. But the Eaſtern Churches, eſpecially the Churches of Cappadocia, ſtill retained their old cuſtom of rebaptizing Hereticks. And that cuſtom remained amongſt them even till the firſt Synod of Conſtantinople. Valeſ.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Hereſie of Sabellius.

[a] AFter this head of diſcourſe, he informs him [b] of the [b] Sabellian Hereticks, who at that

[a] Inſtead of σημαίνων ἐν τούτῳ, the King's M. S. reads ἐπ' αὐτῷ, which reading we follow, and underſtand κεφαλαίῳ, which word is us'd in Euſebius before. Now ἐπ' αὐτῷ κεφαλαίῳ, ſignifies, poſt illud capitulum, after that chapter, or head of his diſcourſe. Dionyſius's Epiſtle to Xyſtus conſiſted of two principall heads, which were the matter and ſubject of the whole, (viz.) Concerning Hereticks being rebaptized, and concerning Sabellius his Hereſie. Valeſ.

[b] Theſe

[b] These Hereticks were very ancient, even before Sabellius, though those who maintained these opinions were afterwards all so denominated, from Sabellius. For we find this was the opinion of Praxeas, against whom Tertullian wrote. After Praxeas followed Noetus, (See Epiphan. Heref. 57.) from whom they were called Noetiani. Suddenly after Noetus arose Sabellius, from whom all which held the same opinion were afterwards called Sabellians. This Sabellius (the reviver of this Hereſie) was a Lybian, born at Ptolemais a City of Pentapolis: He affirmed the Father, Son, and holy Ghoſt, to be but one ſubſiſtence, one perſon under three ſeveral names, which in the time of the Old Teſtament gave the Law under the notion of the Father: in the New, was made man in the capacity of the Son, and deſcended afterwards upon the Apoſtles, in the quality of the holy Ghoſt. Dionyſius undertakes this man; but managing the cauſe with too much eagerneſs and fervency of diſputation, he bent the ſtick too much the other way, aſſerting not onely ἑτερότητα ἀπὸ ὑποστάσεων, a diſtinction of perſons, but alſo οὐσίας διαφορὰν, a difference of Eſſence, and an inequality of power and glory. Upon which account he is ſeverely cenſured by S[t] Baſil, (Epiſt. 41. ad Magn. Philoſoph.) and others of the ancients, as one of thoſe who in a great meaſure opened the gap to thoſe Arrian impieties which afterwards broke in upon the world.

GALLUS. time abounded mightily, and thus he writes, "For "concerning the opinion which lately ſprung up at "Ptolemais a City of Pentapolis, which is impious, "and full of blaſphemies againſt God Almighty, "Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and contains "much infidelity againſt his onely begotten Son, the "firſt begotten of every creature, the Word that "was converſant amongſt men; and is full of ſtupi- "dity and ſenſeleſſneſs about the holy Ghoſt: when "letters came to me from both parties, and brethren

[b] Dionyſius here ſeems to mean his Epiſtle to Ammon Biſhop of Berenice, and that to Teleſphorus, and that to Euphranor: all againſt Sabellius; Euſebius mentions theſe Epiſtles, in Chap. 26. of this ſeventh book. Athanaſius in his defence of Dionyſius Alexandrinus mentions but one Epiſtle of Dionyſius's to Ammonius and Euphranor. Dionyſius was accuſed by ſome Biſhops of Ægypt, for ſpeaking ſome things about Chriſt in that Epiſtle which were not Orthodox. Valeſ.

"to diſcourſe with me, I wrote ſome [c] Epiſtles ac- "cording to my ability with Gods aſſiſtance, ex- "plaining thoſe [points] more at large like an In- "ſtructour: of which Epiſtles, I have ſent you copies.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the moſt execrable Error of the Hereticks, and concerning the viſion ſent from God which appeared to Dionyſius, and the Eccleſiaſtick Canon he received.

THE ſame Dionyſius in his third Epiſtle, concerning Baptiſm, written to Philemon Preſbyter of the Church of Rome, annexeth theſe words: "I have read over the books and tra- "ditions of the Hereticks, defiling my mind for "a little while with their moſt accurſed inven- "tions: Indeed, I received this advantage from "them, that I can the better confute them in my "own thoughts, and do grow to a greater de- "teſtation of them. And when one of my bro- "ther Presbyters prohibited me, fearing leaſt "I ſhould be mixed and diſordered with the filth "of their wickedneſs; (for he ſaid my mind "would be defiled, and truly I was ſenſible he ſaid "true:) a viſion ſent from God corroborated "me. And a voice came to me, which gave me "this expreſs command, ſaying; Read all things "that thou ſhalt take into thy hands, for thou art "able to ſearch into, and to examine every thing, "and this was the principal cauſe of thy becoming "a Chriſtian: I gladly received the viſion, as "being conſonant with the [a] Words of the A- "poſtle, who ſpeaketh thus to thoſe who are able,

[a] These words γίνεσθε δόκιμοι τραπεζῖται, be ye skilful Tryers or Examiners, are no where found in the Apoſtle, indeed we have, in the firſt Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians chap. 5. ver. 21. theſe words, prove all things, and hold faſt that which is good: which are the ſame in effect with theſe, be ye Tryers, &c. But Origen, and Hieronymus ſay that theſe words, Eſtote boni Trapezitæ, are an expreſs command of our Saviour's. And that the place out of the Theſſalonians above quoted has relation to theſe words δόκιμοι τραπεζῖται, and exactly agrees with them, wherefore I am of the ſame mind with the Learned Uſher, who in his Proleg. to Ignatius's Epiſt. cap. 8. ſays, this command of Chriſt is taken out of the Goſpel according to the Hebrews. Theſe words are alſo quoted in Cyril Hieroſolymit. his 6 Catechiſm, neer the end. Valeſ.

"Be ye skilful * Examiners. Afterwards, having GALLUS. ſpoken ſomething concerning all the Hereſies, he continues ſaying; "I received this Rule and "Canon from Heraclas our bleſſed Pope. For "thoſe who were Converts from Hereſies, (al- "though they were [b] Apoſtates from the Church; "or rather not Apoſtates, but ſeemingly aſſembled "themſelves, and were privately diſcovered to "frequent any of the Heterodox teachers) he "excommunicated, and would not again admit "them into the Church although they intreated "him, before they had made a publick confeſſion "of what they had heard from the adverſe party. "And then he again admitted them to commu- "nion, but thought no ſecond Baptiſm was re- "quiſite for them, becauſe they had before re- "ceived holy *[Baptiſm] from him. Again, after a copious diſcourſe upon this queſtion, he thus concludes. "This furthermore I underſtand, "that the Africans of this Age were not the "onely introducers of this cuſtom, but this was "eſtabliſht long before by Biſhops, who were "before our Age, in their moſt populous Aſſem- "blies, and in the [c] Synods of the Brethren at "Iconium, and at Synnada, and amongſt many "other perſons; whoſe ſentiments and determi- "nations I will by no means overthrow, nor ex- "cite them to contention and ſtrife. For it is

* The term in the original is τραπεζῖται, which word occurs Matth. 25. 27. where our tranſlation renders it Exchangers. The Iſraelites being bound by the Law (Exod. 30. 13.) to come up to Jeruſalem, how far ſoever they dwelt from it, and there to ſacrifice, and offer the half ſhekel for the uſe of the Temple, (which by the length of their journey they were ſometimes diſabled to do) theſe Trapezitæ ſet up their tables in the very Temple, that ſo they might traffick with all that had uſe of them; in like manner as others brought Oxen and Sheep and Doves, to ſell there to them which had not brought their ſacrifices with them. See D[r] Hammond on Matth. 21. v. 12.

[b] Here we may ſee the Difference between Apoſtates, and thoſe which are ſimply called Hereticks. Apoſtates were them, who had been baptiz'd in the Catholick Church, but had deſerted the Church and revolted to Hereticks; Simple Hereticks were thoſe who had never been admitted into the Church. And this was the cuſtom in the Church that Apoſtates as well as ſimple Hereticks ſhould be received (when they returned to the Church) by impoſition of hands. S[t] Auguſt. in his 48 Epiſtle to Vincentius ſaith, the Church dealt more kindly with them who were never received into the Church, (that is with them who were ſimply Hereticks) then with them who had been received into her, and deſerted her, (that is Apoſtates) This is therefore the ſence of Dionyſius's words here, as we may gather by the afore mentioned words of S Auguſt. Dionyſius here ſays, Heraclas his predeceſſour had this form of admitting Converts, who had been Apoſtate Hereticks, into the Church. He required a publick confeſſion (which is called Exomologeſis) of the Principles of that Hereſie which they had followed; but he did not rebaptize them, becauſe they had been before baptized: immediately after this confeſſion he laid hands upon them (as we may gather from Dionyſius's words) this impoſition of hands upon an Apoſtate, and a ſimple Heretick, was different. The one was ad pœnitentiam, in order to Repentance: the other was ad tradendum Spiritum Sanctum, for the delivery of the Holy Ghoſt, the firſt was uſed at the admiſſion of Apoſtates, the other at the admiſſion of them whom they called pure Hereticks. See Cyprians Epiſtle to Stephanus. Valeſ.

* In the Med. M. S. and Rob. Stephens's Edit. the reading is [τῷ γὰρ ἁγίῳ πνεύματι &c. for they had received the holy Spirit, &c.] In the Kings, Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. the word [πνεύματι, ſpirit] is wanting: which in my judgment is the trueſt reading. For Dionyſius gives the reaſon why Heraclas did not reiterate Baptiſm in the admiſſion of Hereticks in theſe words [τῷ γὰρ ἁγίῳ οὐδὲν ἔδει παρ' αὐτῶν τελυχέναι] [underſtand βαπτίσματι, Baptiſm] [for they had before received holy Baptiſm from him.] Dionyſius calls Baptiſm holy, to difference it from the Baptiſm of Hereticks; which Cyprian, Firmilian, and others (who at that time defended the opinion of not rebaptizing Hereticks) call profane: Dionyſius was a favourer of their party, as appears both from his Epiſtles here quoted by Euſebius, and alſo from S[t] Jeroms teſtimony. Valeſ.

[c] That theſe Synods were before Dionyſius Alexand. his time, we may eaſily gather by his own words here: for he expreſly affirms that theſe Synods were πολλῷ πρὸ ἡμῶν, long before our time. The ſame thing Firmilianus witneſſeth, in his Epiſtle to Cyprian concerning the Synod of Iconium. This Synod was a long time before the days of Stephen Biſhop of Rome, as we may gather by Firmilianus's words in his ſaid Epiſtle to Cyprian, where he expreſly affirms that this Synod of Iconium had been long ſince aſſembled: Alſo Dionyſius Alexand. in his Epiſtle to Philemon Presbyter of Rome, which he wrote about the beginning of the preſidency of Xyſtus, ſaith, that this Synod was ſolemnly aſſembled by the Biſhops which preceded him a long time. Therefore this Synod ſeems to have been aſſembled about the end of Alexander Severus's Reign: about which time, as Euſebius in the 6th book of this Hiſtory recordeth, Firmilianus was newly promoted to the dignity of Prieſt in the Church of Cæſarea. Therefore I cannot aſſent to Baronius, and Binius, who reckon this Synod of Iconium in the year of Chriſt 258 which was the 2d year of Stephen's preſidency. Valeſ.

GALLUS. "written: thou ſhall not remove thy neighbour's "land-mark, which thy fathers have ſet in thine "inheritance. His fourth Epiſtle concerning Baptiſm, is written to Dionyſius, who was at that time Presbyter of the Church of Rome, and a little while after obtained the Biſhoprick there. From which Epiſtle we may learn what a learned and admirable man this ſame Dionyſius was, by Dionyſius Alexandrinus's teſtimonies of him. After other things he writes to him in that Epiſtle concerning Novatus in theſe words:

CHAP. VIII.

"FOR we may with ſufficient reaſon abomi"nate [a] Novatianus, who ſtirr'd up Schiſm in "the Church, and ſeduced ſome of the Brethren
"to blaſphemies and impieties, and induced moſt
"profane Doctrine concerning God, and calum-
"niouſly accuſed our moſt gracious Lord Jeſus
"Chriſt as unmercifull; beſides all theſe things he
"[b] diſalloweth of holy Baptiſm; and utterly
"aboliſheth Faith, and the [c] Confeſſion of Faith
"before Baptiſm: and he perfectly [d] baniſheth
"the holy Ghoſt from them, (although there "were ſome hope that it ſtill reſted in them, or "would return to them again.)

[a] The Maz. Med. Fuk. M. SS. read Νοουατιανῷ, and truely, as we afore noted book 6. chap. 45. 'Tis ſtrange that we find the true name of this Heretick only in this place of Euſebius. Valeſ.

[b] Ἀθετεῖν τὸ λυτρὸν ἅγιον what may be the true meaning of ἀθετεῖν, in this place may be beſt conjectured by conſidering the divers ſignifications of the word, for from the various meanings of the word, aroſe the different tranſlations of this place. Ἀθετεῖν ſometimes ſignifies to reject, to ſcorn, ſometimes to diſgrace, or diſhonour, as Heſych. ſaith, ἀθετεῖ, ἀτιμάζει, not to eſteem, or value one, but to deſpiſe: ſo Clemens Alexand. Stromat. book 4. uſes the word. Οὐκ ἄνθρωπον ἀλλὰ τὸν Θεὸν ἀθετεῖ. Novatianus who did not allow but condemn the Baptiſm of the Catholick Church, is fitly ſaid here ἀθετεῖν τὸ ἅγιον βάπτισμα. (i. e.) he rejected, and contemned that Baptiſm as unprofitable and ineffectual to ſalvation. Valeſ.

[c] 'Twas the cuſtom for the Catechumeni, or Catechized, before the receiving of Baptiſm to repeat the Creed. And at every Article the Prieſt asked them whether they believed, to which they anſwered, yes I believe: wherefore when they ſaid that they believed the Remiſſion of ſins, Novatianus who did not allow Remiſſion of ſins, but aboliſhed it, muſt alſo aboliſh that confeſſion of faith which the Catechized repeated before Baptiſm. See Cyprians 70 and 76th Epiſtle. Valeſ.

[d] It is very difficult to underſtand what Dionyſius here means by ſaying Novatianus baniſhed the holy Spirit from the Brethren: Perhaps by the holy Spirit he means the grace which was given to penitents by impoſition of hands when they were admitted into communion, after the performance of the duty of Repentance. But then theſe words are very obſcure (although there was ſome hope that it ſtill reſted in them or would return to them again.) 'Tis plain and evident that Dionyſius here ſpeaks concerning them who had lapſed, but how can the holy Spirit be ſaid to abide in them who had ſinned? indeed it may be ſaid to return again to them after their repentance, but can in no wiſe abide in them, for the Scripture ſaith, Every ſoul which ſinneth ſhall likewiſe periſh. We muſt then underſtand it of them who had lapſed through weakneſs and ignorance: who in thoſe days were called libellatici, or ſacrificers, (who had purchaſed libells of ſecurity from the Heathen Magiſtrate, for fear leaſt they ſhould be compelled to ſacrifice) for ſuch as ſin through weakneſs or ignorance do not forfeit the grace of the Spirit: but if this explication pleaſe not, we will underſtand it ſpoken of the faithfull: ſome of whom retained the holy Spirit which they received in Baptiſm, ſome loſt it. From them who had loſt it, Novatianus utterly expelled and baniſhed the holy Spirit, by denying them Repentance and Peace, by which the grace of the holy Spirit is regained; he drove it away from them who retained it, and kept it, by inſinuating into their minds falſe and ſiniſter opinions of the holy Ghoſt, as that he was unmerciful, implacable, &c. And ſo denied them, and utterly deprived them of all hopes of pardon for ſin committed. Valeſ.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning the Baptiſm of Hereticks, that it is impious.

Dionyſius's fifth Epiſtle was written to Xyſtus Biſhop of Rome. In which after much diſcourſe againſt Hereticks, he relates this very accident which happened in his days. "For truly "(Brother) I want your advice, and deſire your "judgment. Such a thing as this, coming to my "knowledge, I fear leaſt I ſhould err in it. For "one of the congregation of the Brethren, who "was accounted an antient believer, a perſon who "had been a member of the congregation before "my ordination, (yea and as I think) before "ever bleſſed Heraclas was conſtituted Biſhop: "this man (I ſay) being preſent at the Ba-"ptiſm of ſome who were lately baptized, and "having heard the Queſtions, and their Anſwers, "came to me weeping, and lamenting his own "caſe. And falling down at my feet he made a "confeſſion of, and renounced the Baptiſm which "he had received from the Hereticks, that it was "not of this kind, neither had it any likeneſs at "all to this of ours; but was full of impieties, and "blaſphemies. He alſo ſaid that he was now moſt "grievouſly pricked in mind, and had not the "confidence to lift up his eyes to God, having "been initiated by ſuch impious words and cere-"monies. For this reaſon he prayed that he might "partake of the moſt pure Baptiſm, [a] Adoption, "and Grace. Which thing I durſt not perform: "but told him that the daily communion with "the Church he had ſo long enjoyed was ſufficient "for that. For I durſt not rebaptize one who "had heard the [b] giving of thanks, and had to-"gether with the reſt of the congregation ſaid "Amen to it, and who had [c] ſtood before the holy "Table, and [d] ſtretched out his hand to receive "the holy food; and who had received it, and for "a long time had been partaker of the body and "bloud of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Moreover, I "bad him be of a good courage, and approach the "holy Communion with a ſtedfaſt faith, and a "good conſcience. But he ceaſeth not his lamen-"tations, and has been afraid to come to the holy

[a] Υἱοθεσίαν is by Chriſtophorſon rendred ſuſceptio in Eccleſiam, a receiving into the Church; 'tis by Muſculus rendered ſuſceptio only; which Verſion I rather approve of. For Baptiſm is termed υἱοθεσία, becauſe in it God receiveth us as his ſons: υἱοθεσία may alſo be tranſlated perceptio, for ſo Baptiſm is ſtiled in the M. S. Acts of the Paſſion of St Geneſius Mimus. Valeſ.

[b] When the Prieſt had finiſhed the ſolemn prayers at the Euchariſt, all the people with a joynt acclamation uſed to ſay aloud Amen, (that is) ſo be it. We muſt underſtand that place of St Paul in the firſt Epiſt. to the Corinth. Chap. 14. v. 16. to be ſpoken in reference to this Cuſtom, in which place St Paul taxeth the Hebrews, who uſed the Hebrew or Syrian language commonly in their Oblations and Divine Service, when the Grecians were preſent with them, (as the Commentatour ſays upon the place.) This word Amen denotes the aſſent of the people to the prayer made by another before them, and it is an expreſſion of affirmation, which the Church ſtill retaineth. Valeſ.

[c] From theſe words [τραπέζῃ παρεστάναι] we may gather that the Communicants came to the Altar, and received the body of Chriſt from the Presbyter, ſtanding up, and not upon their knees, as we do now: had it not been ſo, Dionyſius would not have added παρεστάναι; which word we find to be properly uſed in reference to them who miniſter at the Altar. Chryſoſtom in his 41 Homilie, upon the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinth. uſeth [ὁ παρεστὼς τῷ συναξείῳ] for the Prieſt; but [ὁι παρεστῶτες, or παρεστηκότες] he uſeth to ſignifie the Laity. But in the 44 Canon of the council of Laodicea all Communicants were prohibited from coming to the Altar, except the Prieſts. Valeſ.

[d] In the Primitive Church the faithful Communicants came to the Altar with their hands carefully waſhed, and when they were about to receive the body of our Lord, they ſtretched out their right hands bending them and making them hollow, and they put their left hands under them leaſt they ſhould drop any of that holy food. See Chryſoſt. 3d Homil. upon the Epheſians, and alſo his 52 Homil. upon Matthew. Valeſ.

"Table

"Table, and can scarce endure to be present at "the prayers, although he be desired. There is also extant another Epistle of his, besides those before spoken of, concerning Baptism, which is directed from him and the Church he presided over, to Xystus and the Church at Rome. In which Epistle he enters into a prolix argumentation about, and discourses at large upon the Question proposed. There is also extant another Epistle of his, besides these concerning Lucianus, which he wrote to Dionysius the Roman. But thus much concerning these things.

CHAP. X.

Concerning Valerian, and the Persecution in his Reign.

VALERIAN. MOreover, Gallus having not possessed the Empire two compleat years, was slain; Valerian and Gallienus his son, succeeded in the Government. Again therefore what Dionysius relateth concerning this [Valerian] we may gather out of his Epistle to Hermammon, in which he makes this Narration; "This also is revealed to "St John, for saith he, [a] And there was given unto "him a mouth speaking great things, and blasphemies, "and power was given unto him, [to continue] "fourty and two moneths. It is matter of wonder "to see how both these things are fulfilled in "Valerian, and especially if we consider how he "behaved himself before the Persecution, how "kind and how loving he was to the servants of "God: For no Emperour of all his predecessours was so courteously, so lovingly dispos'd towards them (no not [b] those who are manifestly "reported to have been Christians,) as he was, who "at the beginning of his Empire seem'd most mercifull, most loving towards them. His whole "household was filled with pious men, and was "[seemingly] a Church of God. [c] But his Master, "and [d] Chief of the Magicians of Ægypt, perswaded him to change his resolution: bidding "him murther and persecute those pure and holy "men, as being impugners and obstructers of "accursed and abominable sorceries. For there "were then, and are yet living, men, who with "their very aspects, or [e] blowing upon, or words, "are powerful enough utterly to dissipate the "cheats of noxious Demons. He advised him to "perform impure rites of initiation, abominable "inchantments and execrable sacrifices; to cut "the throats of miserable Infants, to sacrifice the "children of unhappy parents, to rip open the "bowels of new-born babes; and to tear in "pieces and cut asunder God's own workman-"ship, as if by these Acts he should purchase "for himself a prosperous felicity. He also adds these words. "Indeed, [f] Macrianus offered ac-"ceptable thank-offerings to the Demons for the "Empire which he hoped for, who at first when "he was nam'd the Emperours [g] Rationalist, did "mind nothing that was reasonable, [h] or for the "publick: But he lay under the curse of the "Prophet, which saith, [i] Wo to them who pro-"phesie after their own hearts, and regard not the "publick good. For he did not understand that "there was a providence which over-ruled all "things. Neither had he regard to the judg-"ment of him, who was before all, is in all, and "above all. Upon this account he was indeed an "adversary of his Catholick Church: but he "alienated, and banished himself from the mer-"cy of God, and fled away from his own * sal-"vation as far as he could; in this thing verifying "his own name. After some other passages he again saith. "For Valerian, who was induced "to act these things by his means, was exposed to "affronts and reproaches, according to what was "spoken to Esaias saying, They have chosen their "own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abo-"minations, I also will chuse their delusions, and "recompence their sins upon them. [k] This Macri-"anus was most extraordinarily desirous of the

VALERIAN.

[a] Baronius (at the year of Christ 257. cap. 7.) does excellently well explain this passage of Dionysius's; to wit, concerning the space of time, during which Valerianus's persecution lasted. For whereas Valerian reigned almost seven years, as 'tis acknowledged by all; in his former three years he was mild towards the Christians, but in his latter triennium he raised a persecution against the Church. Valerian began to reign in the year of Christ 253. (about the end of the year) Volusianus 2 and Maximus being Coss. This is manifest from the old Coins produced by Occo and Goltzius, wherein Valerian is inscribed TRIBVN. POTESTAT. 3. Consul 3. Also, TRIB. POT. 5. Cos. 4. The same may be gathered from Gallienus's Coins. Vales.

[b] By these Christian Emperours he means Philip the first Christian Emperour (as many of the ancients doe affirm) of the Romans: but because he speaks in the plural number, we may adde Alexander Severus, who in his private Chappel had Christ's Image, and favoured the Christians. But Dionysius here means those Emperours who were called and thought to be Christians, not that they were really so. Vales.

[c] This ἀρχισυνάγωγος ἦν ἀπ' ἀιγύπτου μάγων, Baronius at the year of Christ 252. saith was the same man that excited the Alexandrians in the Reign of Decius to persecute the Christians. (see Chap. 41, Book 6, of this History:) but I think it was quite a distinct person, namely Macrianus, he that was afterwards Emperour, who stirred up Valerian to persecute the Christians: this Macrianus was Valerian's Master or Tutor, and by his evil counsel it was that Valerian raised this Persecution; which thing Dionysius's following words do confirm. Vales.

[d] This ἀρχισυνάγωγος, is a term borrowed from the Jews; for in their Synagogues there were these degrees of Officers; the ἀρχισυνάγωγοι, or Rulers of the Synagogues; also Fathers of the Synagogues; Priests, Presbyters and Deacons of the Synagogues, whom they called Azanites; there were also Apostles, and Patriarchs, who were set over all these: but what this ἀρχισυνάγωγος may mean in this place, we are yet to seek: neither know we what these μάγοι ἀπ' ἀιγύπτου were, except we call them Aruspices or Diviners, who were at Rome: or we may call them the Priests of Isis and Serapis, over whom this Macrianus was Ruler or Chief. Now these Magicians were prohibited by the Jews, but the Roman Emperours, in imitation of Alexander the Great, had these Magicians with them in their Camps and in all their exploits. Dio says, M. Antony, in his expedition into Germany, took Arnuphis an Ægyptian sorcerer along with him; so Valerian here had Magicians in his Army, and the chief or head of them was this Macrianus, as Dionysius attests. Vales.

[e] This participle ἐμπνέοντες, Vales. renders insufflantes, (i. e.) blowing upon. For the Christians used to blow upon the Demons and their delusions, temples, and images; shewing thereby that they abominated them: concerning this usage amongst the Christians, see Brissonius's Notes in commentar. ad Tit. Cod. Theod. de Feriis. And Heraldus in his Notes on Minucius Felix.

[f] This phrase καὶ γὰρ αὐτοῖς καὶ κεῖνος, is spoken in reference to the δαίμοσι, the Demons, and not βασιλεῦσι, the Emperours, as some think; which interpretation if we should follow, the sence would be lost; but in our translation, the sence is plain and entire. And also although here we find Μακεῖνος, yet the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. read Μακριανός. So likewise the Writers of the Roman History, and the old Coines, name this Tyrant. Vales.

[g] The Greeks call them ὑπὸ τῆς καθόλου λόγων, whom the Latines call Rationales, vel procuratores summæ rei; Receivers General, or Stewards of the Emperours Estate. Whose procurator or steward this Macrianus was, we cannot certainly tell; we must not suppose he was Valerian's. Vales.

[h] Dionysius here jesteth upon the word καθολικὸν, by which he meaneth both the stewards office, and also the Catholick Religion, from which signification some gather our Religion to be called καθολικὸς, quod sit rationalis, because 'tis rational: but I can scarce think that we can hence gather the Catholick Religion to be so called; for this word καθολικὸς does not signifie rationalis, except we understand λογοθέτης a steward, or rationalist. We find this title attributed to the Church about the first Age after the Apostles, see B. 4. Chap. 15. pag. 59. and in the Acts of the Martyrdom of Pionius the Martyr, who suffered in the Reign of Decius Augustus, it is so termed: about which time several heresies arose, and endeavoured by their traditions to subvert the true faith of Christ and the Doctrine of the Apostles. At that time, that the true Church might be distinguished from the adulterate Conventicles of Heretícks, this name Catholick was attributed to the congregation of the Orthodox persons. Vales.

[i] This place out of the 13. chap. of Ezek. vers. 3. μὴ καθόλου βλέπουσι, Hieronym. translates, non omnino videnti, see not at all: but our Authour Dionysius renders it as if it were τὴν καθόλου προνοίαν; accommodating the words of the Prophet, or rather of the Septuagint, to his own purpose. Vales.

* Robert Stephens reads [τῆς ἑαυτῆς ἐκκλησίας, from his own Church:] but in the Kings, the Maz. Fuk. and Savil M. SS. the reading is [τῆς ἑαυτῆς σωτηρίας, from his own salvation.] Vales.

[k] Christoph. thought these words [ἐπὶ δὲ τῇ βασιλείᾳ ἦν δὲ τὴν ἀξίαν ἐπιμανεὶς, he was most extraordinarily desirous of the Empire] were spoken concerning Valerian, when as 'tis plain they must be referred to Macrianus. For he could not possibly say of Valerian that he was unfit for the Empire which he coveted, for he was a most eminent man, the very chief of the City: and before he Reigned (as Hiſtorians averr) was judged worthy of the Empire by common conſent. This tranſlation and miſtake of Chriſtoph. has alſo brought Baronius into an errour. Valeſ.

VALERIAN. "Empire, but being unable to put on the imperial dignity, becauſe of his feebleneſs of body, "he made his two ſons Emperours, who were "heirs of their fathers iniquities. The prophecy "which God ſpake is moſt evidently accompliſhed in theſe two brothers: Viſiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me. "For he impoſed his own [1] evil luſts which he "could not injoy, upon the heads of his Children, "and imprinted on them his own wickedneſs and "hatred againſt God. Thus much Dionyſius writeth concerning Valerian.

[1] Ὧν ἠπύχει we have rendred (which he could not enjoy) And if that reading [ἠπύχει] be true, it muſt be ſo rendred: the Kings M. S. and Steph. Edit. read [ἠπύχει·] but the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. read ὧν ἠυξύχει, which he ſucceſsfully obtained; and in my opinion 'tis the better reading. For Macrianus did obtain the Empire, which he was ſo deſirous of, but by reaſon of his debility of body he was unable to carry the Inſignia of the Empire, but raiſed his two ſons to that dignity, wherefore upon the obtaining of all theſe his deſires, Dionyſius might well ſay of him ὅτι ἠυξύχησε πρὸς ἰδιῶν ἐπιθυμιῶν, that he was votorum compos, maſter of all his wiſhes. As for this feebleneſs of body (ἀναπήρῳ σώματι) which he attributeth to Macrianus, we find it mentioned in no Hiſtorians, except in Zonaras's Annals (who was the onely man that gave us a true relation of the Acts of Macrianus and his ſons) and he ſays Macrianus was lame. Valeſ.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning what then happened to Dionyſius, and to thoſe Chriſtians which were in Ægypt.

BUt concerning the Perſecution which raged exceedingly againſt him; what [ſufferings] alſo he and others ſuſtained upon account of the worſhip of the ſupream God, his own words will declare, which he wrote in anſwer to * Germanus a Biſhop of thoſe times, who endeavoured out of malice to revile him: thus he anſwers him. "[a] I run the hazard "of falling into great folly "and ſtupidity, being compelled of neceſſity to re"late the miraculous pro"vidence of God concer"ning us. But becauſe 'tis "ſaid, [b] It is good to keep "cloſe the ſecrets of a King, "but it is honourable to re"veale the workes of God: "therefore I will hand to hand engage in the "aſſault made againſt me by Germanus. I came "to Æmilianus not without company, for there "followed me Maximus my fellow Presbyter, "and Fauſtus, Euſebius, and Cæremon who were "Deacons. One of the brethren of Rome alſo "then preſent went in with us. Neither did "Æmilianus ſay to me at firſt, do not you hold "ſolemn aſſemblies: for this was needleſs for "him to have ſaid, and a recurſion from the laſt "to the firſt, or principal thing in hand: for it "was not his deſire that we ſhould not aſſemble "others, but his principal care was that we our "ſelves ſhould not be Chriſtians: And he com"manded me to leave off that way of worſhip, "for he thought that if I would change my mind, "others would follow my example: I replied not "impertinently but in ſhort, that [c] we ought to "obey God rather than man. But I openly pro"teſted that I worſhipped him who is the onely "true God, and adored no "other, and that I would "never change my mind nor "ever ceaſe being a Chri"ſtian. After theſe words "he bid us depart thence in"to a Village called Cephro "adjoyning to the wilder"neſs. But hear what words "paſſed on both ſides, as we "find them inſerted in the "[d] Publick Records [e], when "Dionyſius and Fauſtus and "Maximus and Marcellus "and Cæremon were brought "in, Æmilianus the Go"vernour ſaid: I have alſo "diſcourſed with you by "word of mouth concerning "the clemency which our "Lords the Emperours have "uſed towards you; for they "have given you power to "remain in ſafety if you will "but turn to that which is "agreeable to nature, and "adore the gods which are "protectours of their Em"pire, and forget thoſe "things which are repug"nant to nature. What ſay "you to theſe [Propoſals?] For I hope you "will not ſhew your ſelves ungrateful towards "their clemency, becauſe they incite you to better "things. Dionyſius replied, all men do not wor"ſhip the ſame gods, but every one worſhip thoſe "whom they think to be gods: but we pay re"verence and adoration to one onely God, the "creatour of all things, who gave the Empire into "the hands of the moſt ſacred and Auguſt Em"perours Valerian and Gallienus. And to him we "offer up our prayers inceſſantly for the perma"nency and ſtability of their Empire. Æmilianus "the Governour ſaid unto them, who hindereth "you but you may alſo worſhip him (if he be a "God) together with them who are by Nature "Gods: for you are commanded to worſhip the "Gods, and alſo thoſe Gods, whom all men own to "be ſuch. Dionyſius replied; we adore no other. "Then ſaid Æmilianus the Governour unto them: "I ſee you are altogether ungrateful and inſenſible "of the Emperours lenity towards you. Where"fore you ſhall not abide in this City, but ſhall be "ſent into the parts of Libya, to a place called "† Cephro; for this place "I have deſigned for you ac"cording to our Emperours "command; and it ſhall "in no wiſe be ſuffered that "either you, or any others, "keep your meetings, or have "recourſe to the places cal"led the [f] Cœmeteries; but if "it appears that any one of "you be not gone to the "place which I have com"manded you to go to, or "ſhall be found afterwards "in any aſſembly, he will bring imminent danger "upon himſelf, for a neceſſary obſervation "[thereof] ſhall not be wanting. Therefore "depart VALERIAN. [c] Theſe words occurr in Chap. 5. of the Acts of the Apoſtles, ver. 29. they are Saint Peter's anſwer to the Sanhedrim, when they laid to their charge the preaching the Goſpel: but how theſe words come in in this place I cannot tell, except we read with the Kings M. [e] This was the form of their publick Acts as Amm. Marc. informs us in his 22 book. Valeſ.

† Cephro was the moſt rude and barbarous tract of the Lybian deſart; and Coluthio (a place hereafter mentioned in this chapter, to which Dionyſius was in particular deſigned) was, 'tis like, the moſt uncomfortable part of that tract. See Nicephor. B. 6. chap. 10.

[f] Thoſe places which Euſebius in Greek here calls κοιμητήρια, the Latines call Areæ. Valeſ. They were the places where the Martyrs were uſually buried; upon which account the Chriſtians frequented them. See book 4. chap. 15. note (o.)

* The paſſage which follows, is an eminent fragment of the Epiſtle (or rather the book) which Dionyſius wrote againſt Germanus the Biſhop; and it is to be joyned to that other fragment of the ſame book, which you had in Chap. 40. of Book 6. Valeſ.

[a] This place of Dionyſius alludeth to that of Saint Paul in the 11th Chap. of the 2d Epiſt. to the Corinthians v. 16; where St Paul uſeth this ſame excuſe, being about to commend himſelf: upon which place ſee Chryſoſtom's Annotat. Valeſ.

[b] Theſe words we find in the 12th Chap. of Tobit ver. 7.

VALERIAN. "depart hence whither you are commanded: And "he compelled me, although I was sick, to depart, "and gave not one days respite. [g] How then "could I have any leisure to call or not to call a "meeting? After some passages he again saith; "But neither were we absent (by God's as-"sistance) from a corporal "congregation: For with "greater diligence I gathered "together those in the City, "as if I had been present with "them, being absent in body "(as I [h] said;) but present "in spirit: in Cephro also "there was a great congrega-"tion assembled with us, some "of whom were the bre-"thren who followed us out "of the City; others came "thither from the rest of "Ægypt: And there God "opened to us a door [to "preach his] Word: at "first indeed we were per-"secuted, and stoned: but "afterwards some of the "Heathens, and those not a few, forsook their "Idols, and were converted to God; for the "word, which they had not before received, was "then first sown amongst them by us; as if God "had sent us away to them for this end: After "we had here fulfilled the Ministry, he again "removed us to another place: For Æmilianus "resolved to convey us into places more uncom-"fortable (as he thought) and more like the "Lybian desart: And he gave command that we "should altogether repair to Mareotis, having "allotted particular villages throughout that Re-"gion for every of us. But he ordered us to "reside nere the high-road, that we might be the "first that should be apprehended. For this was "wholly his contrivance and provision, that when-"ever he had a mind to apprehend us, he might "have all of us easily taken without any trouble. "But when I was commanded to depart to Ce-"phro, although I knew not where the place lay, "(having scarce ever before heard the name of "it,) yet I went away willingly, and not at all "disturbed. But when they told me I was "to depart thence to the "[i] [parts] of Colluthio, they "who were present with me "can tell how I was then "disposed; for here I "will blame my self: At "first indeed I was grieved "and sorely vexed; for al-"though I had a better know-"ledge of, and was more ac-"quainted with those places, "yet they reported it was a "Countrey not inhabited by "brethren and good men, and exposed to the "disturbances of Travellers, and incursions of "Thieves. But I received comfort by the bre-"thren, when they suggested to me, that it lay "nearer to the City; and although Cephro had "brought us a great multitude of brethren out "of Ægypt, so that we could hold larger as-"semblies, yet there, the City lying nearer, we "should more frequently enjoy the company of "our truly beloved friends and acquaintance, "for they would flock thither, and reside with us. "And there would be [k] particular congregations, "as if it were in the more remote Suburbs. And "so it fell out to be. After some other discourse he thus again writeth concerning what happened unto him. "[But perhaps] Germanus * glori-"eth in his many Confessions; and he can enu-"merate a great many [af-"flictions] which have be-"fallen him. But how many "sentences of the Judges "may he reckon up which "were pronounced against us; "[how many] confiscations, "proscriptions, plundring of "goods, [l] deprivations of dig-"nities, contempts of world-"ly glory, despisings of the "praises of the Prefects and "[m] Senatours: what pati-"ent sufferance of publick "menaces, of exclamations a-"gainst us, and of perils, and "of persecutions, and of "wandring up and down in "Exile, and of anxieties, and "of all sort of tribulation: "what things happened to "me under Decius, and "[n] Sabinus, and what to this "present under [n] Æmilianus: "but where appeared Ger-"manus? what report is "there concerning him? but "I desist from this great "imprudence which I am "fallen into upon Germa-"nus's account. Wherefore "I willingly give those bre-"thren, who perfectly know "these matters, leave to "make a narration of every "thing which did befall us. The same Dionysius, in his Epistle to Domitius and Didymus, doth again in these words mention some things concerning this persecution; "It is superfluous to recite "to you, who knew them "not, the names of all our "[Martyrs,] which were "very many. But under-"stand thus much, that both "men and women; young "and old; young women "and antient women; Soul-"diers and Rusticks; per-"sons of all sorts, and all "Ages; some of them ha-"ving been victorious in the "combate by scourges and "fire; and others by the "Sword, received crowns "of [Martyrdom.] But a "long interval of time passed "away being insufficient to "make some appear accepta-"ble to the Lord: in like "manner as for me it hath "not seemed [sufficient to "make me acceptable] who "have continued even till this time: Wherefore [o] "God hath reserved me for a time which he "knows to be opportune, who saith; [o] In an ac-"ceptable VALERIAN. [k] These words, which we here translate particular Congregations, are in Greek κατὰ μέρος συναγωγάς. Those that dwelt in the remotest parts of the Suburbs, were not bound to come to the congregation of the great Church: but in that part of the Suburbs there were particular assemblies in a Church, or some other place fit for that purpose. Thus much we may gather by this passage of Dionysius. Moreover the Greeks did not call those places onely which joyned to the City πρόαστεια, but also the Villages which were a great way distant from the City. Canopus which was twelve miles from Alexandria, is called by Athanasius in his book which he presented to the Council of Chalcedon, πρόαστειον. Further, from this place we may gather, that in Dionysius's days there was but one Church in Alexandria whither all the Christians assembled themselves to pray: but afterwards, in the days of Athanasius, the number of the Churches being increased by the bounty of the Bishops of Alexandria, the Citizens of Alexandria had particular Congregations in divers Churches; Except in the solemn festivals of Easter and Whitsontide, when all the people assembled themselves in the great Church. Valesius.

[l] By these words, ἀξιωμάτων στερήσεις, deprivations of dignities; we may conjecture that Dionysius was descended of a good family; for dignitas is that which cometh by nobleness of birth. Thus we find, In Gest. Purgat. Cæciliani, that Victor being asked by Zenophilus the President, cujus conditionis esset, he answered, he was Professor litterarum Romanarum, and when he asked him cujus dignitatis esset; he answered he was sprung a Patre Decurione Constantinensium, avo milite, qui in Comitatu militaverat. Dionysius Alexandrinus, before he turned Christian, was by profession an Orator, or teacher of Rhetorick. Valesius.

[m] Augustus commanded the Alexandrians to govern their City without any Senatours, or Aldermen. But afterward Severus the Emperour granted the Alexandrians power of having a Senate, as we may read in book 51. of Dio. And in Athanasius's Epistle Ad Solitarios there is mention of the Senatours of Alexandria. Valesius.

[n] This Sabinus was Prefect of Ægypt under Decius the Emperour; of him Dionysius speaketh in his Epistle to Fabius, which Epistle is quoted in chap. 41. book 6. of this History: but Æmilianus, who is here mentioned as Governour, afterwards seised the Empire, as Pollio writeth in his 30 Tyrants. Valesius.

[o] These words occurr in Isa. c. 49. v. 8.

[g] Here Dionysius answers Germanus's cavil, who accused him, because he never called an Assembly of the Brethren before the Persecution began; which was a custome in those days, (vid.) That the Bishops, upon the Approach of a Persecution, should gather the people together, and exhort them to a constant Perseverance in Christianity; and Baptize infants, and Catechumens; least they should die unbaptized; and also distribute the Sacrament to believers. Valesius.

[h] Although we read here [ὡς εἶπον] and have so translated it; yet the Maz. and Med. M. SS. read [ὡς εἰπεῖν] [as one may say:] the Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. read ὡς εἶπεν ὁ Ἀπόστολος, as the Apostle said: 'Tis certain Dionys. here alludeth to that of the Apostle in the first to the Corinth. Chap. 5. ver. 3. Valesius.

[i] In the original the reading is [τὴν κολλυθίων] but we must necessarily understand μέρη [parts] and so we have translated it. This Colluthio was a part of the Mareotic prefecture in Ægypt; so called from them who were formerly possessours of it. Colutho is a common name amongst the Ægyptians, and hence came κολλύθιον; which in Niceph. we find written with a single (L.) There were several Ægyptians called by this name, Colutho. Valesius.

VALERIAN. "ceptable time have I heard thee, and in a day of "ſalvation have I helped thee. But becauſe you are "inquiſitive after our affaires, and deſirous to be "informed in what condition we live: you have "fully heard, how when I, Caius, Fauſtus, Peter, "and Paul were led away Priſoners by the "Centurion, and the [p] Magiſtrates [of Alexan-"dria] and the Guards and Officers that were "with them, [q] ſome of them of Mareotis came "upon them, and took us away by force, drag-"ging us by violence who were unwilling, and "would not follow them. But at this preſent, "I, and Caius, and Peter being alone, and depri-"ved of the reſt of the brethren, are ſhut up in "a deſert, and moſt uncomfortable place of Li-"bya, being three days journey diſtant from Para-"tonium. And a little after theſe words, he ſaith; "Some have hid themſelves ſecretly in the City "that they may viſit the brethren, As Maximus, "Dioſcorus, Demetrius and Lucius, who are "Presbyters. (For Fauſtinus and Aquila being "men more eminently known in the world, tra-"vel up and down Ægypt.) But the Deacons "that are ſurviving, beſides thoſe that died in "[r] the Plague, are theſe: Fauſtus, Euſebius, Chære-"mon. Euſebius, [I ſay] one whom God hath "impowered from the beginning, and furniſhed "with great vigour to fulfil the Office of Mini-"ſtration to the Confeſſours in Priſon, and to "perform the Funeral [r] Rites due to the bodies "of the perfected and bleſſed Martyrs, with great "hazard and danger. For to this very preſent "the Governour ceaſeth not moſt cruelly to ſlay "ſome who are brought before him, (as I be-"fore told you) to tear in pieces others with "tortures, and to make other-ſome to pine away "in Priſons, and bonds, giving a ſtrict charge "that none approach them, and making diligent "ſearch whither any one be ſeen to come neer "them. Notwithſtanding, God through the "chearfulneſs and fortitude of the brethren, doth "inceſſantly refreſh the afflicted. Theſe are Dio-"nyſius's words, and are contained in that Epiſtle.

We muſt further underſtand, that this Euſebius whom he before called a Deacon, was a [t] great while after conſtituted Biſhop of the Church of Laodicea in Syria. And Maximus, who he ſaid was then a Presbyter, ſucceeded Dionyſius himſelf in the Government of the brethren at Alexandria. Fauſtus alſo, (who together with Dionyſius was at that time famous for his being a Confeſſour) was reſerved even till the Perſecution in our days, and being very old, and full of years, he was perfected by Martyrdom, being beheaded even in our Age. But thus much concerning what happened to Dionyſius about that time.

VALERIAN.

[t] Theſe words ὁ μικρὸν ὕστερον ἐπισκοπήσας τῆς κατὰ Συρίαν παροικίας, are in the Med. Fuk. and Maz. M. SS. and not without reaſon; for it was a great while after that Euſebius was ordained Biſhop of Laodicea: for he ſucceeded Socrates, as Euſebius atteſts a little lower. Valeſ.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the Martyrs which ſuffered at Cæſarea in Paleſtine.

IN this Perſecution under Valerian, three men of Cæſarea in Paleſtine very eminent for their confeſſion of Chriſt, were crowned with divine Martyrdom, being made food for the wild beaſts. One of them was called Priſcus; the other Malchus; the name of the third was Alexander. They report that theſe men, living in the Countrey, ſhould blame themſelves firſt for being careleſs and ſlothful perſons, becauſe they were negligent of, and did not eagerly catch at the crown of Martyrdom, ſeeing that was a ſeaſonable time of diſtributing thoſe rewards of victory to them who had the leaſt ſpark of celeſtial love in them. Then, when they had conſulted about theſe things amongſt themſelves, they took a journey to Cæſarea, and went immediately to the place where the Judge was, and received the aforementioned ſentence of death. Beſides theſe, there was a woman of the ſame City, in the ſame Perſecution, who they report, ſtrove in the ſame combate: But 'tis famed that ſhe was one of Marcion's Sect.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the Peace under Gallienus.

[a] BUt not long after, Valerian being [b] captivated and enſlaved by the Barbarians, his ſon Reigned alone, who behaved himſelf more prudently in his Empire. He immediately putteth a ſtop to the Perſecution againſt us by his Edicts; and gave command that the Prelates of our Religion ſhould ſecurely, and with freedom execute their uſual Offices, by his Reſcript which runs thus: EMPEROUR CÆSAR PUBLIUS LICINIUS GALLIENUS, PIUS FELIX AUGUSTUS, To Dionyſius, Pinna, Demetrius, and the reſt of the Biſhops: We have commanded that the Indulgence of our Gracious Bounty be publiſhed through the whole World: That all ſhall quickly depart out of Religious places. And for this cauſe you are impowered to make [a] Rufinus here alters the courſe of the Chapters, and placeth theſe which we place here as the 13th and 14th after the 19 chapter immediately; but in his Index before his Hiſtory he keeps the ſame method as the Greek copies of Euſebius does: why he ſhould here pervert the order, I cannot tell; except it is, becauſe he thinks it is more convenient to ſubjoyn the ſufferings of Marinus, and Aſturius to the ſufferings of the Martyrs of Cæſarea. But he ought to obſerve that thoſe Martyrs of Cæſarea ſuffered in Valerian's Perſecution; but Marinus and Aſturius ſuffered in the Reign of Gallienus. This miſtake of Rufinus has brought ſeveral other Authours into the ſame Errour. Valeſ.

[b] Valerian was taken captive by the King of Perſia, in the year of Chriſt 259.

P Tranſlatours generally miſtake in rendring this word στρατηγοὶ in this place, by the Latine word duces, captaines: Chriſtoph. ſaw the abſurditie it led to by rendring it duces, and therefore he renders it dux: but neither does he by thus rendring it, avoid an abſurditie, for it was not the leaſt branch of the Captaines duty to lead Criminals into baniſhment, but that was rather the Centurions or the Guards duty. Wherefore this word στρατηγοὶ muſt here ſignifie ſome other Officer beſides a Captain, we will therefore render it the Duumviri, or as we call them, the Sheriffs, or Magiſtrates of Alexandria; which are in Greek often called στρατηγοὶ. Now it was the duty of theſe Magiſtrates to apprehend Criminals, commit them to priſon, examine them, &c. ſtill reſerving the power of judging to the Roman Preſident. Wherefore 'tis not here abſurd, but very reaſonable to ſay, theſe Duumviri aſſiſted the Governour in leading theſe men into baniſhment: the following words alſo στρατιῶται and ὑπηρέται confirm our opinion: for στρατιῶται are the Guards which belonged to the Prefect; ὑπηρέται are the Officers belonging to the Duumviri, or Sheriff. Athanaſ. in his Epiſtle ad Solitarios, calls this Magiſtrate, or Duumvir, στρατηγόν. Valeſ.

Q Theſe things happened in the firſt Perſecution under Decius, at that time when Dionyſius, by the ſentence of Sabinus the Governour, was led to Taposiris. See his own Epiſtle to Fabius in chap. 40. book 6. And whoſoever does compare that Epiſtle with this here, he will conclude them both written concerning the ſame thing. Wherefore, Euſebius miſtakes when he thinks that the ſubject of this Epiſtle here to Domitius is that thing which happened in Valerian's Reign: for none of theſe things which he here mentioneth, happened in Valerian's Reign, but in the Perſecution which begun a little before Decius's Reign, as Dionyſius himſelf ſaith in his Epiſt. againſt Germanus, which Euſebius quoteth in the 6th book. But in the Perſecution under Valerian, he had onely thoſe companions which he mentions in the beginning of this chapter. Valeſ.

R Rufinus inſtead of νόσῳ readeth νήσῳ, and accordingly he tranſlates the place, ſome who dyed in the Iſland: but Dionyſius means the Plague, which in Gallus and Voluſianus's time, ſpread it ſelf quite through the Roman Empire, as Euſebius and others Record. Valeſ.

S Chriſtoph. renders this word ἐνειλεῖσθαι, by a long Periphraſis thus, ad lintea, quibus corpora beatorum Martyrum jam vita defunctorum involverentur, conficienda; he all along having relation to the uſage in our days, for with us the dead are wrapped in linnen cloth, and ſo intered. But the Antients, I mean the Chriſtians, uſed to wrap the dead in moſt coſtly clothes, and ſo bury them: but for Chriſtophorſon's tranſlation, we have Athanaſius's authority, who ſaith, in his life of S. Anthony, that the Ægyptians uſed to wrap their dead bodies, eſpecially thoſe of the holy Martyrs in linnen, and did not interr them, but laid them upon beds and kept them within their own private houſes. Valeſ.

GALLIENUS.

make use of a Copy of our Rescript, that no body may molest you: And that which is Lawful for you to put in execution was Granted by Us long ago: And upon this account Aurelius Cyrenius, Our [c] High Steward shall keep the Copy of this Edict Granted by Us. For the more manifest understanding of these things, they were Translated by Us out of Latine into Greek, and here inserted. There is also extant another Rescript sent to other Bishops, in which he permitteth to them the Restauration of the places called [d] Cœmeteria.

[c] For an explication of this persons Office, see Valesius's notes, Ad Excerpta ex dione Cocceiano, pag. 112.

[d] They were the places where they buried their dead, and often assembled for their Religious solemnities, especially the memorials of the Martyrs; as has before been remark't.

CHAP. XIV.

What Bishops flourisht in those times.

AT this time [a] Xystus still continued to preside over the Church of Rome; but Demetrianus succeeded Fabius in the Bishoprick of Antioch; Firmilianus was Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia: Moreover, Gregorius, and his brother Athenodorus governed the Churches of Pontus; they were both Origen's Schollars: Theoctistus Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine being dead, Domnus succeeded in that Bishoprick: he living but a little while, Theotecnus, who lived till our times, was constituted his successour. And this person also was one of Origen's School. But Mazabanes of Jerusalem being dead, Hymenæus succeeded in that See, who also was very eminent in our days.

[a] Xystus was dead long before; for he died a famous Martyr in the Persecution under Valerian, when Tuscus and Bassus were Consuls, on the 8th of the Ides of August; as we may see in Cyprians Epistle. Vales.

CHAP. XV.

How Marinus was Martyred at Cæsarea.

A General peace being at this time restored to the Churches in Cæsarea of Palestine, Marinus, a man honoured with a [a] Military dignity, and eminent for descent and riches, was beheaded for his confession of Christ, upon this account. There is a certain dignity amongst the Romans termed the [b] Vine, which those that obtained, are said to be made Centurions; [c] this place being vacant, Marinus, whose course in order it was, was called to that promotion: when he was forthwith to have been invested in that dignity, there came another before the Tribunal, and accused him, saying, it was unlawful according to the old Laws, for him to hold any dignity amongst the Romans; for he was a Christian, and did not sacrifice to the Emperours; therefore the Office belonged to him. [d] Achæus, (for that was the name of the Judge) being enraged at this, first asked Marinus what Opinion he was of: then when he saw that he stedfastly confessed himself to be a Christian, he granted him three hours respit for deliberation. When he was gone out of the place of judicature Theotecnus the Bishop of that City coming to him, taketh him aside to discourse with him; and laying hold of his hand, leads him to the Church; wherein when he had placed him at the very Altar, he put his [e] Cloak a little aside, and shewed him the sword wherewith he was girded, and also brought the Book of the Sacred Gospels and placed it right against him, bidding him on his own accord to take which of those two best pleased him. When Marinus without any delay had put forth his right hand, and taken up the Sacred Book, Theotecnus said unto him, adhere therefore, adhere to God, and being impowered by him thou shalt obtain what thou hast chosen; go in peace. Immediately as he returned from the Church, the Cryer, who stood before the Tribunal, called him; for the time allotted him was now accomplished: When he was brought before the place of judicature, and had shewed a greater courage in the confession of the Faith then he did before, immediately he was hailed away to Execution, and was [f] Crowned with Martyrdom.

GALLIENUS.

[a] He means the Cohortalis Militia, as may be collected from what follows. For mention is made of Achæus the Judge, of the Forum, &c. Which could not be spoken of the Militia Castrensis. Had the Camp-milice been spoken of here, Marinus must have pleaded his cause before the Captain, or Deputy of Cæsar. The ordinary Judges had their Centurions and Cornicularii in their Court. Yea, almost all the names of the Officers under them were taken from the Camp-milice, as Asconius Pedianus has remark't. Vales.

[b] The phrase in the original is [Τὸ κλῆμα] which we have rendred [The Vine.] It was enacted by a Law amongst the Romans, that no Citizen should be beaten with rods, but with Vines: See Livy, in his 57 Book: upon this account the Souldiers were by the Centurions beaten with Vines; whence at last the Vine came to be the badge of the Centurions Office. Spartianus (in the life of Hadrian) uses it in this sense; and so does Plutarch in Galba.

[c] In the Maz. Fuk. and Med. M. SS. there is a stop here; but in the Kings M. S. there is none; which punctation in the three M. SS. first named, Salmasius (in his notes on Spartianus) defends against Casaubon, (in his notes on the same Authour,) who thought that the Vine was a badge which denoted those that were to be chosen Centurions, who should bear that Office, when there was a place vacated. And therefore Casaubon read this passage thus [There is a certain dignity amongst the Romans termed the Vine, which those that obtain are said to be made Centurions when there is a place vacant:] which reading agrees with the Kings M. S. But Salmasius makes a stop (as we do) at the word [Centurions,] which doubtless is the truest reading: See note (b) in this chapter. Vales.

[d] That was the Judges name; so a famous Captain was called, who heretofore rebelled against Antiochus, as Polybius relates. This Achæus was president of Palestine, and had his residence at Cæsarea, which was the chief City of that whole Province. Vales.

[e] We read τῆς χλαμύδος, not τῆς χλανίδος; which is a common, but an Erroneous reading. The Chlamys and the Balteus (i.e. the Cloak and the Belt) were military badges, as may be proved from innumerable places in Chrysostom, Libanius, and others. Vales.

[f] The term here is [τελειῶται] i. e. he was perfected by Martyrdom. For Martyrs were initiated by confession, and perfected by death; as Dionysius phrases it at the end of Chap. 11. in this book. Clemens Alexandrinus (in B. 4. Stromat. pag. 206.) gives another reason, why Martyrdom is called τελείωσις; ὅτι τέλειον ἔργον ἀγάπης ἐνεδείξατο, because it demonstrates the perfection of love. Vales.

CHAP. XVI.

A Relation concerning Astyrius.

ASTYRIUS also is much fam'd for his Religious boldness and freedom at that time: A man who was a Roman Senatour, a singular favourite of the Emperours: and both for his nobleness of Birth and Estate, known to all persons. He, being present at the death of the foresaid Martyr, took up the Corps, wrapped it in a white and precious garment, laid it upon his shoulders and carried it away; and when he had adorned it very richly, he deposited it in a decent Grave. This persons familiars, who lived till our days, relate infinite other things concerning him.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning the mighty Miracles of our Saviour at Paneas.

AMongst which they relate this Miracle. At Cæsarea-Philippi, (which the [a] Phænicians call Paneas) they report there are springs to be

[a] Those whom our Eusebius here calls φοίνικας, Phœnicians, are the Grecians which inhabited Phœnicia. For Paneas is a Greek name, the Syrians, or rather the Syro-Phœnicians, called this City Dan, as S. Jerom, affirms in his Questions on Genesis; his words are these; Dan Phœnices oppidum, quod nunc Paneas

Paneas dicitur. Dan autem unus è fontibus Jordanis. Nam & alter vocatur Jor, quod interpretatur ῥεῖθρον. Duobus ergo fontibus, qui haud procul à ſe diſtant, in unum rivulum ſæderatis, Jordanis deinceps appellatur. i. e. Dan is a Town of Phœnicia, which is now called Paneas. Alſo Dan is the name of one of the Spring-heads of Jordan. For the other is named Jor, the interpretation whereof is [a Stream.] Theſe two Fountains therefore, which are not far diſtant from each other, are united into one Rivulet, which is afterwards called Jordan. Valeſ.

GALLIENUS. ſeen at the foot of the Mountain called Panius, out of which the River Jordan hath its original. They ſay, that on a certain Feſtival they uſed to [b] caſt a ſacrifice into theſe Springs, and by the power of the Devil it would miraculouſly vaniſh out of ſight: And that this was a Miracle much talked of by them who had ſeen it. Aſtyrius therefore being upon a time preſent with thoſe that did this, and ſeeing many ſtruck with admiration at what was done, was ſorry for their errour. Then he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and beſought the ſupream God, by Jeſus Chriſt, that he would rebuke this Devil which ſeduced the people, and command him to ceaſe from deceiving of men. They report that when he had prayed thus the ſacrifice floated upon the Waters immediately. Thus periſhed their Miracle, and never afterwards was there any prodigie done neer that place.

[b] This cuſtom, φάγιον χαλασθαι of caſting the ſacrifice into the Springs, or Wells, which they worſhipped, was uſed by the Heathens. And hence it is that Publicola aſketh Auguſtine, in his 153. Epiſtle, whether it were lawful to drink of that Spring or Well, into which any part of a ſacrifice had been caſt. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVIII.

Concerning the Statue, which the Woman who had the Flux of blond, erected.

BUt ſince I have made mention of this City, I think it not at all unſutable to produce a ſtory, which is worthy to be related to poſterity. For they ſay that the woman, [a] who had the Iſſue of bloud, whom the ſacred Goſpels inform us to have been healed by our Saviour, was born in this City: and that her houſe may be ſeen there, and that the illuſtrious Monuments of our Saviour's beneficence ſhown towards her doe yet remain. For neer the gate of her houſe ('tis ſaid) ſtands upon a Pillar of ſtone, the Effigies of a woman in braſs, kneeling on her knees, and ſtretching forth her hands forward in the form of a ſuppliant. On the other ſide oppoſite to it ſtood another Image of a man made of the ſame mettal ſtanding upright, dreſſed decently in a * ſhort veſture, and ſtretching out his hand towards the woman. At whoſe feet upon the baſe of the Pillar 'tis ſaid there ſprings up a ſtrange kind of an herb, which grows up to the [b] skirt of his braſen doublet, and is a preſent remedy to remove all ſorts of diſeaſes: They ſay that this Statue repreſented our Saviour. This remained till our Age, and therefore we our ſelves went to the City to ſee it. Nor need it ſeem a wonder that the Ancient Gentiles, who received benefits from our Saviour, did theſe things; ſeeing that we have ſeen the pictures of his Apoſtles Peter and Paul, and of Chriſt himſelf, drawn in Colours, and preſerved till our days. It is probable enough that thoſe Ancients, according to the cuſtom of the Heathens, were wont [c] unadviſedly to honour all thoſe after this manner as Saviours, by whom they had been any ways benefited. GALLIENUS.

[a] This place of Euſebius, concerning the woman who had the Iſſue of bloud, is quoted in the ſeventh Synod, Action. 4. pag. 508. See alſo what Philoſtorgius ſaith in his ſeventh book, chap. 3. And what Nicephorus, who borroweth it from him. Valeſ.

* Διπλοΐδα; it ſometimes ſignifies a Military Cloak; this term occurs Pſal. 109. 29. where 'tis rendred a Mantle.

[b] Rufinus underſtands this place [μέχρι τῆς κρασπέδου ἀνίου] ſo, as if this herb had no healing vertue till it was grown up to the skirt of our Saviours veſture: but ſince Euſebius does not expreſſely determine it that way, every one may interpret the place as pleaſeth him beſt. I think Euſebius meaneth by the addition of theſe words that the herb grew up no higher then the skirt of our Saviour's doublet, as if it were in reverence to him. See Nicephor. B. 6. chap. 15. Valeſ.

[c] Rufinus tranſlateth this word ἀπαρεφυλάκτως, indifferenter, indifferently; but I rather think ἀπαρεφυλάκτως here ſignifieth inconſiderately, unadviſedly, contrary to the Doctrine of the Ancients, unwiſely. Moreover, Sr Henr. Savil in the margin of his M.S. upon theſe words ἐθνικὴ συνήθεια, the cuſtom of the Heathens, bids us take notice that this is here ſpoken concerning images. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning the Chair of James the Apoſtle.

THe Epiſcopal Chair of James the firſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who was conſecrated by our [a] Saviour himſelf, and the Apoſtles; (who in holy Writ is honoured with the title of the Brother of Chriſt;) being reſerved till this time, the Brethren who have ſucceeded in that Church do reverence it: Hence they plainly manifeſt to all what great veneration and reſpect, both the Antients, and alſo thoſe of our Age, have, and do pay to holy men for their love to God. But thus much concerning theſe things.

[a] This was an old tradition, that James the Apoſtle was Ordained Biſhop of Jeruſalem by Chriſt. Beſides Euſebius, Saint Chryſoſt. in his 38 Homil. upon the Epiſtle to the Corinthians, on theſe words, Deinde viſus eſt Jacobo, Then he was ſeen of James; expreſly affirmeth it: the ſame alſo Epiphanius, Niceph. Calliſt. and others do affirm. They all ſeem to borrow this opinion from the firſt book of Clemens's Recognitions: alſo, in the eighth book of his Conſtitutions, Chap. 35. we find him ſpeaking of James the Biſhop of Jeruſalem in theſe words, ὃν αὐτὸς τῷ χυρίῳ, καὶ ὑπὸ ἀποστόλων χειροτονηθείς, Ordained by our Saviour himſelf, and the Apoſtles. We muſt farther advertiſe the Reader that theſe words τῶ Ἀποστόλω the Apoſtle are wanting in the Kings Fuk. Maz. M. SS. and in Rufinus: but in our Maz. Med. Fuk. M. SS. in the Contents of this Chapter, we find this word ἀποστόλω the Apoſtle: although in the Index of the Chapters which is prefixed, we find it thus written, περὶ τῆς θρόνου Ἰακώβου τῆς ἐπισκόπου, concerning the Chair of James the Biſhop. Valeſ.

CHAP. XX.

Concerning Dionyſius's Paſchal Epiſtles, in which he preſcribeth a Canon concerning Eaſter.

MOreover, beſides thoſe his fore-mentioned Epiſtles, the ſame Dionyſius at the [a] ſame time wrote theſe ſtill extant, called [b] Paſchal Epiſtles: amongſt which he interweaves Panegyrick diſcourſes concerning the feaſt of Eaſter: one of theſe Epiſtles he Dedicateth to Flavius; another to Domitius and Didymus. In which he publiſheth a Canon of eight years, having proved that we ought to celebrate the feaſt of Eaſter, at no other time, but after the vernal Æquinox. He compoſed another Epiſtle beſides theſe, to his Fellow-Presbyters at Alexandria, and others to divers other perſons, and theſe he wrote whileſt the rage of the Perſecution ſtill continued.

[a] From this word τὸ αὐτὸ τῷ, at the ſame time, ſome would conclude that Dionyſius wrote theſe Epiſtles in the Perſecution, raiſed by Valerian: but that is falſe; for this Epiſtle to Domitius and Didymus, was written in the Reign of Decius the Emperour. Valeſ.

[b] Rufinus very well tranſlates this word ἑορτασικὰς, in this place, Paſchales, Paſchal Epiſtles. The Biſhops of Alexandria uſed to write theſe Paſchal Letters every year, and ſend them to the reſt of the Churches of Ægypt; that they might all agree in the time of the celebration of Eaſter. There are at this day extant Epiſtles of this ſort, written by Theophilus, Cyril, and others: what was the form of theſe Epiſtles we may underſtand from the 30 Paſchal Homilies of Cyril; firſt they diſcourſed ſome thing concerning Eaſter: in the end they declared the beginning of Lent, and the day of Eaſter, whence we may call them Homilies, as well as Epiſtles. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning what things happened at Alexandria.

DIonysius returned to Alexandria, Peace being as yet scarce throughly setled there. But when Sedition and War joyntly raged again there, so that he could not visit all the Brethren in the City, they being divided into the one or the other party of the faction: Again, even on Easter-day, as if he had been exil'd out of Alexandria, he converse with them by letters. And in his other Paschal Letter which a little after this he wrote to Hierax one of the Ægyptian Bishops, he mentioneth the Sedition then at Alexandria, in these words; "It is no wonder if it be difficult "for me to converse with men far remote even "by Letters, whenas it is rendred now no easie "matter for me to discourse with my self, and "to give advice to my own soul. For I am com-"pelled to send Letters even to my own bowels, "my Brethren, who live under the same roof, "have the same mind, and are members and inha-"bitants of the same Church; and it appears to "me a great difficulty, how I should convey my "Letters to them: For a man may with more "ease and less danger travel not onely beyond "the bounds of this Province, but even from East "to West, then out of Alexandria into Alexan- "dria. For the very mid"dle street of this [a] City is "more unfrequented and im"passible then that vast and
"invious wilderness which "Israel travelled through in "two Ages. [b] Those calm and "still Havens do represent
"the Sea through which the "Israelites had a spatious
"passage, it being divided,
"and made like a wall on
"both hands, [c] but the Æ-"gyptians were drowned in "the paths thereof. And "through the frequent slaugh-
"ters perpetrated therein,
"they were like a red Sea.
"The River which runneth by "the City seemed sometimes
"more dry and uncomfort"able then the thirsty wil"derness, through which,
"when the Israelites travel-
"led, they were so thirsty,
"that they murmured against
"Moses, until by the power "of God (who onely doth "marvellous things) water
"gushed out of a craggy
"Rock for them. At o"ther times it overflowed in "such abundance, that it laid
"all the Countrey round a"bout under water, the "Highways and the fields,
"and seemed to threaten
"a return of that deluge
"which was in the days of "Noah. It runneth by,
"being continually polluted
"with bloud, and murthered,
"and drowned bodies; like that River which
"by Moses, in the sight of Pharaoh, was turn"ed into bloud, and stank: And what other "water can purifie this water which purgeth
"all things it self? How can that vast and im"mense Ocean which is impassible by men,
"cleanse this bitter Sea? Or how can that "great River which springeth out of Eden,
"though it gather its four heads, into which it
"is divided, into that one of Geon, wash away
"this putrified gore? Or how can that * Aire
"be purified, which on every side is defiled with "most noisome exhalations? For such vapours
"arise from the Earth; such winds from the "Sea; such blasts from the Rivers; and such "mists from the Havens, that the very dews are "nothing else but the Gore of dead Carkasses
"putrified in all the subjacent Elements. After "all this they wonder, and seem to doubt whence
"these [d] continued Plagues; whence these noy-
"some diseases; these contagions of all kinds; and
"this various, and numerous destruction of men
"proceeds. They admire why this great City "contains not in it as many inhabitants, (should "they be numbred even from infants to the most "aged and decrepit) as it formerly maintained
"persons, who were [e] lively old men, as they "called them. But in those days there were so "many persons betwixt fourty and seventy years "old, that their number could not now be made "up, although all from fourteen to fourscore years
"of age were registred, and their names enrolled "in the Tables, that they might partake of the pub"lick distribution of Corn. And our youngest men "now look as if they were of the same age with our "old men formerly. And although they see man"kind so much diminished and consumed from off
"the earth, (their intire destruction being increased "and augmented incessantly) yet they tremble not.

GALLIENUS.

* The very situation of Alexandria did doubtless conduce much to the insalubrity of the place. For the river Nile, coming from the West, was conveyed into the City under ground by arches made under the houses. The manner how this was done, is set down by John Leo, in his description of Africa: his words are these; Cuique fere domui civitatis ingens cisterna concamerata, crassisque innitens fornicibus substructa est, in quas exundans Nilus per aquæductum in planitie magno artificio constructum extra Alexandriam deductus, sub ejus manibus demittitur, &c. This artificial conveyance of the River, though it were otherwise acceptable to the inhabitants, yet it could not be without some annoyance to the Air, the complexion whereof suffered much alteration by the noysome vapours which rose up out of the waters, which in tract of time putrified in their Cisterns. It is the collection of the foresaid Leo, in his following words, Cisternæ porrò temporis successu turbidæ ac cænosæ redditæ, plurimis æstivo tempore languoribus occasionem præbent, &c. The same Authour gives us another reason for the unwholsomness of that City; which was caused by certain little gardens planted near the City, the fruits whereof were so unwholsom, that the inhabitants were thereby made subject to very noxious feavers, and many other diseases. See John Leo's descript. Afric. pag. 675, and 676. Edit. Lugd. Batav. 1632.

[a] In the Kings M. S. we find, instead of τῆς πόλεως, this City, ἢ τῶν πόλεων these Cities; which reading is not to be rejected: for that great faction had so divided Alexandria that in a manner it became of one City two, as before he seemeth to intimate when he saith, that a man may with more ease travel from East to West, then out of Alexandria into Alexandria. This great Sedition, I think, happened, when Æmilianus possest himself of the Government of Alexandria. Vales.

[b] There are divers ways of translating this place according as we point it. Most Translatours have erred here, by an Erroneous conjunction of this sentence with what precedeth. But Dionysius's following words confirm our punctation and version: the sense of which is that the Havens of Alexandria, overflowing with the bloud of the slaughtered Citizens, did truly represent the red Sea. Wherefore it is not the Middle Street of the City which is compared to the red Sea (although some so interpret it) but the Ports or Havens are said to represent that. Vales.

[c] Betwixt these words where we use onely a middle distinction or comma, Robert Steph. uses a full period, contrary to the Authority of all the M. SS. we ought rather to follow the punctation of the M. SS. and joyn this passage with what precedeth: but here we meet with a Genitive case plural of the Article [ὧν,] which we translate in the singular number, and referr it to θαλάσσης the Sea, which is a singular put for the plural number. For the Sea was divided into two parts and opened a broad way for the Israelites; so that what was really but one Sea, seemed to be two; but if we translate it according to Stephanus's punctation, we can find no word to which this Genitive plural of the Article can reasonably be referred. Vales.

[d] Συνεχεῖς λοιμοὶ, continued plagues without intermission. The plague even from the times of Gallus and Volusianus, over-ran and destroyed almost all the Roman Empire. Eutropius saith that the Reign of Gallus and Volusianus was onely remarkable for the great plague which happened in their days. Aurelius Victor affirms that Gallus and Volusianus were beloved very much on this account, because they took care of every ones, even of the poorest man's funeral. The plague afterwards raged at Rome, and in the Roman Provinces, in the days of Gallienus, as Pollio in Gallienus's Life attests. Vales.

[e] Ὡμογέροντες; vivid, lively, lusty old men. So they were called at Alexandria, who were between fourty and seventy years old. Their names were registred in tables that they might partake of the publick distribution of the Corn, as Dionysius attests in his following words. Over these were the Archigerontes, of whom mention is made in the first Law of the Codex Theodosianus, de Alexandrinæ plebis primatibus. Hither may be referred that which Gregor. Naz. affirms, in his 21 Oration concerning S. Athanasius, to wit, that the Alexandrians were wont to be distributed into Sexes, Ages, and Trades, as often as, out of respect, they went forth to meet any person. Vales.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning the Plague which then raged.

AFterwards the Pestilence succeeding the War; when the Feast [of Easter] was at hand, Dionysius again writeth to the Brethren, GALLIENUS. deſcribing the miſeries of that calamity in theſe words: "[a] To ſome men this preſent may ſeem "not a time to celebrate a Feſtival; but neither "this which we obſerve, nor any other time (I "ſpeak not onely of the mournful, but alſo of "any of thoſe times which they account moſt "joyful) is a time of feſti- "vity to them. Now indeed "all places are full of mour- "ning; all perſons lament; "and the City rings on every "ſide with continual lamen- "tations for the multitudes "of them who are already "dead, and who are daily "dying: For as the Scri- "pture ſaith concerning the "firſt born of the Ægyp- "tians, ſo now a great cry is "heard: for there is no "houſe, in which there is "not one dead; (b and I "wiſh there were but one in "every houſe:) Indeed ma- "ny, and ſore afflictions have "befaln us before this cala- "mity. [c] Firſt of all they "expelled us out of the City. "And when we onely were "perſecuted and oppreſſed "by all men, yet neverthelefs "even then we kept the Feſti- "val days. And every place, "where every one of us par- "ticularly underwent affli- "ction; The Field; the "Deſert; the Ship; the "Inn; the Priſon, was a "place for holding our ſo- "lemn Aſſemblies: but the "perfected Martyrs, who "are ſatiated in heaven, kept "the moſt joyful feaſt of all. "After theſe [miſeries] "ſucceeded War, and Famine; "In which we were fellow- "ſufferers with the Heathens. "We alone ſuffered what- "ever they afflicted us with; "but what ever calamities "they brought upon them- "ſelves and ſuffered, we par- "ticipated of. And we were "again made joyful by the "Peace of Chriſt, which he "granted to us alone: But when both we and "they had enjoyed a very ſhort time of refreſh- "ment, this Plague immediately invaded us. A "thing moſt formidable to them, and more cala- "mitous than any accident whatſoever. And, as "one of their own writers ſaith, it was the onely "thing which ſurmounted all mens expectation "and fear. It was indeed no ſuch thing to us; "but rather an exerciſe, and tryal, nothing inferi- "our to our former ſufferings: for this Plague "did not ſpare us; but it raged grievouſly a- "mongſt the Heathens. After theſe words he con- tinues, ſaying; "Indeed many of our Brethren, "through their ſuperabundant love, and brotherly "kindneſs neglecting their own ſelves, and firmly "adhering to one another, without any thing of "caution viſiting them who were infected, care- "fully miniſtring to them, and healing them in "Chriſt, moſt willingly died with them; in- "fecting themſelves with other mens diſtempers, "attracting the diſeaſe from their neighbours "upon themſelves, and voluntarily [d] drawing the "infection out of them by tranſlating it into "themſelves. And many who had cured and "reſtored others to their former health, died "themſelves, having brought their death upon "themſelves; And being thus made the ranſom "and expiation for them all, they died, really ful- "filling that common ſaying, which always hi- "therto hath ſeemed to contain no more than an "officious [e] friendſhip. Thus therefore died the "beſt of our brethren; ſome of whom were "Prieſts, and others Deacons; alſo thoſe of the "Laity which were eminent died voluntarily: So "that this kind of death which was ſuffered upon "account of piety, and a ſtedfaſt faith, may be "eſteemed no leſs honourable then Martyrdom. "They took the dead bodies of the Saints up in "their open hands, and into their boſoms; they "cloſed their eyes, and ſhut their mouthes; car- "ried them upon their ſhoulders; and [f] buried "them: they ſtuck cloſe to them; embraced "them; waſhed them; and [g] adorned them cu- "rioufly in their cloathes: not long after they "had the like good offices performed to them- "ſelves: for thoſe who ſurvived did continually "tread in the ſteps of ſuch as went before them. "But the Gentiles practice was quite contrary "to this. They thruſt out of doors thoſe which "begun to be infected; they fled away from thoſe "who were moſt dear to them; they deſerted "them being half dead in the high-ways; and "caſt forth the dead bodies unburied; being ut- "terly averſe from a participation and ſociety "[with them] in death, which yet was in no "wiſe eaſie for them to avoid, though they uſed "all arts and devices to decline it. After this E- piſtle, when affaires in Alexandria were in a peaceable and quiet poſture, he again ſendeth ano- ther Paſchal Epiſtle to the Brethren throughout Ægypt, he alſo writ ſeveral others beſides this. There is alſo extant an Epiſtle of his concerning the Sabbath, and another concerning Exercitation. Again, in an Epiſtle to Hermammon, and the Bre- thren in Ægypt, he has a long diſcourſe concer- ning the improbity of Decius and his ſucceſſours, where he alſo makes mention of the peace in the Reign of Gallienus.

GALLIENUS.

[a] This Exordium of this Paſchal Epiſtle of Dionyſius's is really a moſt elegant one. Here he ſaith that this preſent time, when all things were in ſo lamentable a poſture, would ſeem to the unbelieving Heathens no fit time to keep a feaſt in: But neither this time, which (ſaith he) is really a time of Mourning, nor any other, though never ſo undiſturbed, never ſo merry, could poſſibly yield the Heathens any true joy. For the wicked and unbelievers can never keep a feaſt, although they daily ſacrifice, becauſe they cannot enjoy any true mirth: onely the pious and virtuous do truely keep a feaſt, becauſe they perform their duty, and offer prayers, and unbloudy ſacrifices to God. Origen, in his eighth book againſt Celſus, diſcourſes at large concerning this Opinion; which paſſages in him are borrowed from the Stoicks, and they give much light to the underſtanding of this place of Dionyſius. Valeſ.

[b] Here we read onely ὄφελόν γε, and I wiſh: but Turnebus in the margin of his book very well correcteth and pointeth it thus. Καὶ ὄφελόν γε εἷς; And I wiſh onely one had died in every houſe: the Kings M. S. reads thus καὶ ὄφελόν γε εἰς πολλὰ, &c. but Turnebus does very well amend this place of Dionyſius, by his foreſaid punctation of it. Valeſ.

[c] Dionyſius here makes a compendious repetition of all the ſufferings of the Chriſtians from the time he was firſt Ordained Biſhop of Alexandria: firſt he recounts the Perſecution and expulſion, which began in the laſt year of Philip the Emperour. Next the Civil War which immediately followed; concerning which Civil War, ſee Chap. 41. Book 6. of this Hiſtory. Then he ſaith, after a little ceſſation followed the Plague; which raged grievouſly in the times of Gallus and Voluſianus; but it began in Decius's Reign: for it is evident by Dionyſius's Epiſtle to Domitius and Didymus, that ſome Deacons died of this Plague in the Reign of Decius. See Chap. 11. Book 7. Valeſ.

[d] Ἀναμασσόμενοι τὰς ἀλγηδόνας ſome tranſlatours render mitigantes, eaſing, and leſſening their diſtempers: but I cannot approve of that verſion, for the verb ἀναμάσσω, or ἐκμάσσω ſignifies to ſqueeze out, or to wipe off. Dionyſius's meaning is this, that they who viſited the infected Chriſtians, did in a manner force the infection from them, and tranſlate it to, or take it upon themſelves. And that is the true notion of ἀπομάσσω to take upon himſelf, and as it were to ſuck out another's diſeaſe and infection. It is no more then what he ſaid in theſe words, τὴν νόσον ἑαυτοῖς ἕλκουσες, drawing the infection upon themſelves. Valeſ.

[e] This word φιλοφροσύνη we have here rendred friendſhip, yet the word primarily and properly ſignifies that which the Latines call comitas, that is, complaiſance, courteouſneſs, civility, affability: as for this term περίψημα, which we have tranſlated a Ranſom, we find it in the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinth. Chap. 4. v. 13. this word ſeems to have been uſed by the Alexandrians in their ſalutations: when they met together, and promiſed their ſincere love, willingneſs, and diligence in ſerving one another, they uſed to ſay ἐγὼ εἰμὶ περίψημα σοῦ, or elſe we may take the word in this ſence; as if the Heathens ſhould call the Chriſtians the very περίψημα πάντων the off-ſcouring, the filth, the very faces populi, and the purgamenta ſeculi; which interpretation is not to be rejected here. Valeſ.

[f] Chriſtoph. in his Latine Verſion, renders this word [διαπίπτοντες] decenter ornantes, dreſſing them up neatly: but he miſtakes; for Dionyſius ſpeaks of their dreſs afterwards in theſe words, περιστολαῖς κατακοσμοῦντες, decking them in their beſt cloaths: διαπίπτοντες, here we therefore render, componentes (that is) burying them, and ſo the word is uſed in profane as well as in ſacred Authours: Compoſtus pro ſepulto, in Virgil, and Horace. Valeſ.

[g] Περιστολαῖς καλλιστοῦσι, ſome render, linteo funebri involventes, ſhrowding them in a winding ſheet. But this is contrary to the cuſtom of buryings in thoſe days; for the Heathens uſed to dreſs the dead in their beſt cloaths and ſo interr them. And the Chriſtians uſed in like manner ſo to dreſs the Saints Corps. See Chap. 16. of this ſeventh book, concerning Aſturius. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIII.

Concerning the Reign of Gallienus.

NOthing hinders but we may hear his own words which run thus: "[a Macrianus] "therefore, having treacherously betrayed one of "the Emperours which preceded him, and made "War upon the other, was immediately extir- "pated, and together with his whole family became "extinct. Gallienus was now "proclaimed, and by com- "mon consent received Em- "perour: he was both an old "Emperour, and a new: for "he was before * them, and "also survived them: for ac- "cording to that which was "spoken by the Prophet E- "saias, † Behold the former "things are come to pass, and "new things shall now rise up. "For as a cloud rising up be- "fore the rays of the sun, "overshadoweth it for a "while, and appears to be "substituted into the place thereof: but when the "cloud has gone over it, or is dissolved; the sun, "which before was risen, seems then to arise "again: so Macrianus, who set himself before, "and [b] approacht the very Empire of Gallienus, "now is not, for he never was: but Gallienus as he "was Emperour before, so "he now continues to be. "And the Empire it self, "having deposited its old "Age as it were, and being "cleansed from the dregs "of its former improbity, "now flourisheth with grea- "ter vividness; is seen and "heard of at a larger distance, and spreads its fame "in all places. He afterwards declares the time when he wrote these things, in these words: "It "now again comes into my mind to contemplate "the years of our Emperour: For I see how "those most impious persons who had so great a "name, are in a short time become most obscure. "But our most Pious and Religious Emperour, "having passed his seventh, is now in the ninth "year of his Empire, in which we are about to "solemnize the Festivals.

[a] Though we find here barely, ἐκεῖνον μὲν ἔν, he therefore; yet we must understand Macrianus; for by his treachery it was that Valerian was delivered into the hands of the Persians. Other Historians assert that he was delivered to them by his own Captains; so Aurel. Vict. Syncel. and others. These words of Dionysius are to be joyned with those in Chap. 10. of this Book; for they are fragments of one and the same Epistle to Hermammon; we also find a piece of it in Chap. 1. of this seventh Book. Vales.

* He means Macrianus, and his two sons. See Chap. 1. of this Book; at the close of the Chapter.

† Esai. 42. 9.

[b] Dionysius here speaks of Macrianus's Empire, because he was owned, and received as Emperour by Ægypt, and the Eastern Provinces: Which his Coins declare, for on the fore-side there is this inscription, ΑΥΤ. Κ. Μ. ΦΟΥΛ. ΜΑΚΡΙΑΝΟΣ; And on the reverse this, ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΕΙΑ. Vales.

CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning Nepos, and his Schism.

BEsides, Dionysius wrote two Books concerning the promises. The occasion of his writing these Books was Nepos, an Ægyptian Bishop, who taught that the promises, which were made to the Saints in the sacred Scriptures, should be performed in the * Jewish sence, and affirmed that there was to come a thousand years state upon earth, which should be spent in bodily pleasures. Now he supposing he could confirm his own opinion out of John's Revelation, wrote a Book upon this Question, and intitled it, A Confutation of the Allegorical Expositors; which piece Dionysius confutes in his Books concerning the Promises. In the first Book of which he proposeth his own opinion concerning the Question. In the second he discourseth concerning the Revelation of John, where in the very beginning he makes mention of this Nepos, and writes thus concerning him: "But because they produce a "Book of Nepos's, on which they rely very much, "as if it did [a] infallibly de- "monstrate that the King- "dom of Christ should be "[set up] on earth: in- "deed for several other "things I commend and "love Nepos, for his faith, "his industry and study in "the Scriptures, and also for "the many [b] Psalms and "Hymns he composed, with "which many of the Bre- "thren are even at this time "much delighted. And I re- "verence the man for this "reason chiefly, because he "is [c] dead. But I judge "truth most to be beloved, "and to be the most precious "of all things. It is our "duty to praise, and freely "to commend what-ever is "truly said: but we are al- "so to examine and correct "what-ever unsound opinion "appears to have been com- "mitted to writing. Now "could he be present, and "discusse his opinion by "word of mouth, then a bare "discourse by Questions and "Answers, without any wri- "ting might suffice to con- "vince and reduce the ad- "verse party to an agree- "ment. But since there is "a Book published (and as "to some it seems) a most "perswasive one; since some Teachers look upon "the Law and the Prophets to be of no value; "neglect to follow the Gospels; have small "esteem for the Epistles of the Apostles; and "[d] promise great things concerning the Doctrine "of this Book, as containing some great and hid- "den Mystery; since they "will not suffer the more ig- "norant of our brethren to "think of any thing that is "sublime and great, neither "of the glorious and truly "divine advent of our Lord, "nor of our Resurrection "from the dead; our ga- "thering together to him, "and our being made like "him: [e] But perswade them "to think that men hope for "nothing in the Kingdom "of God, but abject and mortal things, such as "they now hope for. It is necessary we enter "into a dispute against our Brother Nepos, as if "he himself were present. After some words he continues, saying; "When I was in the Province "of the [f] Arsinoitæ (where, "as you know, this opinion "was long since propagated "so far, that there were "Schisms and revoltings of whole Churches "together;) having convened the Presbyters and "Teachers

GALLIENUS.

[a] We have here sufficient evidence that this Book concerning the Promises was written in answer to Nepos: I wonder that Hieronymus in his Preface before the eighteenth Book of his comments upon Esaias, should affirm that this Book was written against Irenæus Bishop of Lions. Indeed Irenæus was one of them who believed that Christ should come and Reign on the Earth a 1000 years, which opinion was grounded on Papias's Authority, as Hieronymus himself affirms, and also our Authour Eusebius in the end of the third Book. But as well from this place, as also from Hieronymus himself, in his Book De Script. Ecclesiastic. we may gather that this Book was not written against Irenæus, but against Nepos. Vales.

[b] Ψαλμῳδίας, we have here translated, the Composition of Psalms and Hymns; according to the custom of the Christians who used to compose Psalms and Hymns in honour of Christ, as Eusebius in the end of the fifth Book attesteth. We also find mention of these Hymns in the Epistle of the Council of Antioch against Paul of Samosata, and in the last Canon but one of the Council of Laodicea, where there is an express prohibition that no Psalms which in Greek are called ἰδιωτικοὶ, that is, composed by private or ignorant persons, should be sang in Churches. Vales.

[c] Pliny in his 28 Book Chap. 2. asketh, why we affirm, when we mention any dead persons, that we will not vex or disturb their memory. Vales.

[d] This word προεπαγγέλλω, signifies properly to promise a great while before any performance; it is a Metaphor taken from the Mysteries of the Grecians, who promised strange and great things to them who are initated, and tormented them with a long expectation; that by keeping their thoughts thus in suspence, they might beget in them an opinion, and a fear and reverence. Vales.

[e] The true reading of this place in the Greek, we owe to the Maz. M. S. according to which reading we have here translated it. Vales.

[f] This Province was so called from Arsinoë, who was Queen of it, before it was a Roman Province. Vales.

GALLIENUS. "Teachers of the Brethren in every particular "Vilage, (ſuch Brethren alſo as had a mind to "come being preſent,) I adviſed them that there "might be reſearches made into this Doctrine, "in the preſence of a publick Aſſembly. And "when they produced this Book as a defence, and "an impregnable bulwark, ſitting with them three "whole days together from morning till evening, "I endeavoured to diſcuſſe the contents thereof. "In all which time I did extraordinarily ad-"mire the conſtancy of the Brethren, their love "to truth, and the [e] great "quickneſs and readineſs of "their underſtanding, with ſo "much order, modeſty and "moderation did we pro-"poſe Queſtions, propound "doubts, and yield our aſ-"ſents. For we took ſpecial care never pertina-"ciouſly to defend our former opinions, when "once they were found to be erroneous: neither "did we ſhun the objections of others: But to "the utmoſt of our power, we endeavoured to "[h] keep cloſe to the points "of the preſent Queſtion, "and confirm them as well "as we could: Neither, if "we were convinc't, were we "aſhamed to be perſwaded "out of our opinion, and "conſent with others: But with a good con-"ſcience, unfeignedly, and with [i] hearts diſplai'd "to God, we received what-ever was grounded "upon the demonſtrations and declarations of "the ſacred Scripture. In the concluſion, the chief "maintainer and champion of this Doctrine, by "name Coracio, confeſſed, and made a proteſta-"tion to us in the Audience of all the Brethren "there Aſſembled, that he would no longer ad-"here to this opinion, nor diſpute concerning it, "nor mention it, nor preach it, ſo powerfully was "he convinc't by the Arguments which had been "brought againſt it. And the reſt of the Brethren, "which were preſent, rejoyced at this conference, "and at the [k] reconciliation and unanimity which "was amongſt all men.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning the Revelation of John.

HAving interpoſed ſome words, he afterwards ſays thus concerning the Revelation of John; "Indeed ſome of our Anceſtours diſowned, and "wholly rejected this Book; confuting every "Chapter, and demonſtrating it to be an un-"known and ſenſeleſs work; and that the Title is "forged; for they ſay it is not John's. Neither "is it a Revelation, becauſe it is covered over with "ſo thick and dark a vail of Ignorance. And "that not onely no Apoſtle, but alſo no holy or "Eccleſiaſtick perſon could have been the com-"piler of this work: but that it was * Cerinthus, "the founder of the Hereſie, called from him the "Cerinthian Hereſie, who was deſirous to have "a creditable name prefixt before his forgery: "for this, they ſay, was Cerinthus's Opinion and "Doctrine; that Chriſt's Kingdom ſhould be ter-"reſtrial: And whatſoever he, being a carnal "and voluptuous man moſt luſted after, in theſe "he dream'd the Kingdom of Chriſt conſiſted; "as in indulging the belly, and the parts beneath "the belly, I mean, in eating, drinking, and mar-"rying; and alſo in feſtivals, ſacrifices, and kil-"ling of victims, by which theſe might with "more ſpecious pretences be acquired. I dare "not indeed reject this Book, ſince many of the "Brethren have it in great eſteem. But this is "the Opinion I have of it, I think the ſenſe or "ſubject thereof ſurpaſſeth my apprehenſion, and "that there is a myſterious and admirable mea-"ning covertly contained in every part of it; for "though I do not underſtand it, yet I ſuppoſe "there is a more profound meaning comprehen-"ded in the words. I do not judge of, nor "fathom theſe things by the line of my own "reaſon; but attributing much more to faith, "I eſteem them more ſublime then to be com-"prehended by me. I do not condemn thoſe "things I could not underſtand, but I the rather "admire them becauſe I cannot ſee through "them. After theſe words, having carefully look't into the whole Book of the Revelation, and demonſtrated that it was impoſſible to be underſtood according to the obvious ſenſe of the words, he goes on, ſaying; "But having fini-"ſhed his Propheſie, (as I may call it,) the "Prophet pronounceth bleſſing upon all them "who keep it, and moreover on himſelf too; for "he ſaith: * Bleſſed is he that keepeth the words "of the Propheſie of this book: And I am John "which ſaw and heard theſe things. I do not "indeed deny that his name was John, and that this "was John's Book: [for I grant that it was "written by ſome holy and divinely inſpired "perſon:] But I cannot eaſily be brought to "give my conſent that this was John the Apoſtle, "the ſon of Zebedee, the brother of James, the "Author of the Goſpel according to John, and of "the Catholick Epiſtle. For I conjecture by the "Genius and Nature of them both, by the form "of the ſtile, and the method "and [a] diſpoſition (as they "call it) of the Book, that "it is not the ſame writer. "For the Evangeliſt does "no where inſert his name; "neither does he make him-"ſelf known either in his "Epiſtle, or Goſpel. Afterwards he thus proceeds again: "John no where "[ſpeaks] either as con-"cerning himſelf, or as con-"cerning another. But he "that wrote the Revelation "prefixeth his name at the very beginning: "[where he ſays,] * The Revelation of Jeſus Chriſt which he gave unto him to ſhew to his ſervants quickly, and he ſent and ſignified it by his Angel unto his ſervant John, who bare record of the word of God, and of the teſtimony [of Jeſus Chriſt, and] of all things which he ſaw. "Afterwards he writes an Epiſtle: † John unto the ſeven Churches in Aſia; Grace be unto you, and peace. "Now the Evangeliſt has not pre-"fixt his name, no not before his Catholick E-"piſtle: But, without any circumlocution, has "made his beginning from the Myſtery of the "Divine

[a] Διεξαγωγή, is a term proper to the Rhetoricians, as plainly appears by the following word λεξεως. I think that διεξαγωγὴ has the ſame import with diſpoſitio, or οἰκονομία; for διεξαγαγεῖν, in Suidas is the ſame as διοικεῖν, to diſpoſe, or handle. Or we may render it the form and manner of writing: for firſt he proves the Revelation not to be John's the Apoſtle, by the τὸ ἦθος, the Genius or Nature of the writer: Then by the ſtile and mode of writing, that is, by the Phraſe, and the ſentences. Valeſ.

"Revelation is altogether different from, and unlike "to these; it has no alliance to, nor (as I may so "say) familiarity with either of these: nor has the "Revelation so much as one syllable in it which "is common to these: Neither does the Epistle
"(for I omit the Gospel) make the least mention "of the Revelation; nor the Revelation of the "Epistle. And yet Paul in his Epistles mentions "something concerning his Revelations, which he "did not digest into a volume by themselves.
"Furthermore by the phrase, the difference be"twixt the Epistle and Gospel and the Revelation,
"may be easily conjectured: for those are not

[b] We ought to take special notice of this passage concerning the primitive Christians custom of calling their children, by the names of Peter and Paul, which they did both for the reverence and love they bare to those Saints, and also that their children might be beloved and no less dear in the sight of God then those Saints were. Chrysostom in his Oration concerning S[t] Meletius saith, that the Antiochians had such a reverence and esteem for him, that the parents called their children after his name, that they might have their houses in a manner adorned with his presence. The same father also in his 21 Homily upon Genesis, adviseth his Auditours that they should not carelesly call their children by their grandfathers or great Grandfathers, or some noble Heroes names, but that they should rather give them the names of some men who were famous for virtue and piety; that the children, by their example, might be excited to an imitation of them. Vales.

[c] This is Dionysius's second Argument, by which he proves that the Gospel and Revelation were not written by one and the same John, for he had urged his first Argument begun at note (a,) to this place: now here he begins a second, (viz.) to prove by the words and sentences, and by the placing of the words or method, that they were two distinct persons. For I render this word σύνλαξις, the placing or modelling of words, according to Cicero, though σύνλαξις in this place may as well comprehend the ordering and modelling of Sentences, as well as of words. But here we may take notice what an excellent Critick Dionysius Alexandrinus was. For it is the property of a Critick to judge of the writings of the Antients, and to discern what is true and genuine, and what spurious and supposititious. Vales.

" As touching this other John I doe not indeed " deny that he ſaw the Revelation, and that he " received the [gift of] knowledge and of pro- " pheſie. CHAP. XXVI.

THere are extant many more of Dionyſius's Epiſtles [a] beſides theſe. As for example, his Epiſtles to Ammon Biſhop of Berenice againſt Sabellius; and an Epiſtle to Teleſphorus; alſo one to Euphranor; and again another to Ammon, and Euporus. He alſo wrote [b] four more Books upon the ſame ſubject, and dedicated them to his nameſake Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome. There are alſo more of his Epiſtles beſides theſe extant amongſt us: and moreover ſome Books of his, which are ſomething verboſe and prolixe, and are written in an Epiſtolary form: As for example, his Books concerning [c] Nature, which are dedicated to Timotheus a child, concerning Temptations, which he dedicated to Euphranor: Beſides theſe Books, in his Epiſtle to Baſilides Biſhop of Pentapolis, he ſays he wrote a comment upon the beginning of Eccleſiaſtes. He has alſo left us ſeveral Epiſtles which he wrote to this [d] Baſilides. Thus many are Dionyſius's works. But now after an Hiſtorical relation of thoſe things, we will deliver to the knowledge of Poſterity an account of our own Age.

[a] Hence we may gather that the 2 books concerning the Promiſes, out of which Euſebius has the fragments afore quoted, were Epiſtles. We may alſo confirm this by a paſſage in Chap. 22. where Dionyſius uſes ὡς οἶδας which is an Epiſtolary phraſe. But becauſe theſe Epiſtles were ſomething prolix, they were therefore called books. Rufinus truly calls Dionyſius's Epiſtles concerning Baptiſm, Books, and the four Books againſt Sabellius here mentioned are nothing elſe but a longer ſort of Epiſtles, which Euſebius teſtifies: for he ſaith that all the reſt of Dionyſius's books were written in an Epiſtolary form and ſtyle. Valeſ.

[b] Dionyſius Alexand. in his Epiſtles againſt Sabellius ſeemed not to be Orthodox as touching the Divinity of Chriſt, and he was accuſed of it before Dionyſius Biſhop of Rome, by ſome of the Biſhops of Pentapolis, who went to Rome. Dionyſius Roman. called a Synod, heard the Accuſers, and having examined ſome ſelect Opinions in Dionyſ. Epiſtles, he wrote to Dionyſ. Alexand. deſiring him that he would more diſtinctly declare his faith and opinion concerning thoſe matters. Upon this account Dionyſ. Alexand. wrote four Epiſtles to Dionyſ. Roman. which he intituled περὶ ἐλέγχου καὶ ἀπολογίας (that is,) concerning the confutation of his Adverſaries, and concerning his own Apology or defence of himſelf. Valeſ.

[c] Euſebius, in his 14th Book De Præparat. produces an excellent piece of this Book De Naturâ. It was dedicated, Τιμοθέῳ τῷ παιδὶ; this word being dubiouſly taken to ſignifie either a ſon, or any other child or ſervant, 'tis ſome difficulty to determine who the perſon was, to whom it was dedicated, ſome ſay to his ſon: I have here rendred it to a child. For I cannot think that Dionyſ. was ever married. The like difficulty occurs in Book 6. Chap. 40. Valeſ.

[d] Of theſe many Epiſtles written by Dionyſius to this Baſilides, onely one is now extant, which Theodorus Balſamo has preſerved for us. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVII.

Concerning Paul of Samoſata, and the Hereſie founded by him at Antioch.

DIonyſius, nameſake to Dionyſius Biſhop of Alexandria, ſucceeds Xyſtus, after he had preſided over the Church of Rome [a] Eleven years. About the ſame time alſo died Demetrianus Biſhop of Antioch, whom Paul of Samoſata ſucceeded in his Biſhoprick. This Paul had an abject and low opinion of Chriſt, contrary to the Doctrine of the Church, as if he had been by nature no more then a meer man; Dionyſius Biſhop of Alexandria was intreated to come to the Synod: He having complained of his Age, and alſo of his infirmity of body deferred his coming; But he openly declared by letter what was his ſenſe and opinion concerning the matter in debate. But the reſt of the Paſtors of the Churches from all parts haſtned to Antioch, and were convened there as againſt the corrupter of Chriſt's flock.

[a] Here Euſebius is in a groſs miſtake, for Xyſtus was not Biſhop of Rome Eleven Years, but onely two Years and Eleven Months, as we may ſee in the book De Pontificibus Romanis, which Cuſpinianus firſt publiſhed, and that book is moſt exact in its account of the times of the Pope's from Calliſtus to Liberius: the ſame alſo ſays Xyſtus ſuffered Martyrdom on the eight of the Ides of Auguſt: but our Authour neither here, in his Hiſtory, nor in his Chronicle mentions any thing of Xyſtus's Martyrdom, which I really admire, and ſhould more admire, did not I certainly know that Euſebius is not over ſollicitous and curious in his Hiſtory concerning what things were done in the Weſtern parts. Moreover Euſebius in his Chronicle aſcribes Eight Years to Xyſtus, and he ſays that Dionyſius ſucceeded Xyſtus in the 12th Year of Gallienus, and that Maximus ſucceeded Dionyſ. Alexandrin. in the 11th year of the ſaid Gallienus the Emperour. Which is moſt abſurd, whenas 'tis evident that Dionyſ. Alexand. dedicated his four Books againſt Sabellius to Dionyſ. Roman. as our Authour tells us in Chap. 26. of this 7th Book. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Concerning the Eminent Biſhops of thoſe times.

THe moſt eminent of theſe aſſembled were Firmilianus Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia; Gregory and Athenodorus both brothers, Biſhops of the Churches of Pontus: Beſides theſe there were Helenus Biſhop of Tarſus, and [a] Nichomas Biſhop of Iconium: Alſo Hymenæus Biſhop of Jeruſalem, and Theotecnus Biſhop of Cæſarea upon the Confines of Jeruſalem: Beſides theſe, Maximus, who with great commendation governed the Brethren of Boſtra. And a great many more may be reckoned; who, together with Preſbyters and Deacons, were convened in the aforeſaid City at the time aforeſaid, and upon the ſame account. But theſe were the moſt eminent of them. All theſe therefore being aſſembled in the ſame place together, [b] divers times and often, diſputations and Queſtions were raiſed in every Synod. On the one ſide Paul of Samoſata endeavoured to conceale and hide his Heterodox Opinions; on the other, theſe perſons ſtriving with all diligence to denudate and make apparent his Hereſie and Blaſphemie againſt Chriſt. In the Council of Nice, Nicomas Biſhop of Boſtra is named the firſt of the Biſhops of the Province of Arabia: but the common M. SS. read Nicomachus, and ſo we find it in the M. S. of C. Fuſtellus, which is of no leſs antiquity then the other. Valeſ.

[a] This name Nichomas ſeems to be abbreviated, and ſhould rather be Nichomedes or Nichomachus. In the old M. S. in the Abbey of Corbie which contains a collection of the Canons amongſt the Biſhops which ſubſcribed to

There were ſeveral Synods called againſt this Paul of Samoſata; hence follows the word [πολλάκις] which we muſt in no wiſe ſuppoſe to be ſuperfluous here. Euſebius ſays, there were many Synods aſſembled at ſeveral times, and in every Synod there were many Seſſions or Actions. The firſt Synod againſt Paul was at Antioch in the twelfth year of Gallienus; of which Synod Firmilianus was Preſident: concerning which ſee Baronius, Anno Chriſti 265, and 266. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIX.

How Paul being confuted by Malchion a Presbyter, (who formerly had been one of the †Sophistæ*) was deposed.*

† See B. 4. Chap. 16. Note (s.)

AURELIANUS. IN this Emperours time was the last Synod convened, which consisted of a very great number of Bishops: The Authour of that Heresie at Antioch being now convicted, and by all manifestly condemn'd of false Doctrine, was excommunicated out of the Catholick Church, which is under heaven. But one [b] Malchion most especially confuted and convinced him being desirous to keep himself conceal'd: He was a most eloquent man, and Master of the Grecian Philosophy School at Antioch. And moreover for his surpassing sincerity in the faith of Christ, he was honoured with a Presbytership of the Church there. Now this man having undertaken to dispute against Paul, (the Notaries having written down all the passages of that disputation, which is at this day extant) was the onely person that was able to detect and convince that crafty and deceitfull fellow.

[a] Hence it may be gathered, that the Synod of Antioch was assembled in the beginning of Aurelianus's Reign. But I cannot assent to Baronius, who says this Synod was called in the second year of Aurelianus. The Council of Ephesus, in pag. 228. utterly destroys this Opinion of Baronius's: for it says that Paul of Samosata was excommunicated 160 years before that time; and if we reckon backwards we shall find, that the year of Claudius and Paternus's Consulship, that is, the year of Christ 270. is the 160 year backwards from the time that book was written, which was, Theodosius 13th, and Valentinianus 3d being Consuls. Moreover, if Baronius reckon these things done in the 2d year of Aurelianus, he must of necessity make Dionysius to continue Bishop of Rome till that year; but that is contrary to the Authority of the Lib. Pontifical. Farther, in the second year of Aurelianus his Reign, there was a War waged against Zenobia, when Antioch and other Cities were taken, so that 'tis impossible there should be a Synod of Bishops that year there. Vales.

[b] Leontius in his first book against Nestorius has a fragment of this disputation. In Theodoret, this Malchion is called Malachion; but falsly: this man gained such honour in this Confutation of Paul, that he was thought worthy to be Cannoniz'd in the Greek Menology at the 28 day of October. Vales.

CHAP. XXX.

Concerning the Epistle of the Bishops against Paul.

THe Prelates therefore, being assembled together, by common consent writ an Epistle to Dionysius Bishop of Rome, and Maximus Bishop of Alexandria: and then sent it over all the Provinces: both manifesting their diligence to all men; the perverse Heterodoxy of Paul, the Confutations and Disputes which were held against them; and also giving in a Narration of the whole Life and Morals of the man, whose words in which Epistle, that Posterity may remember them, it will be convenient here to relate.

THE EPISTLE.

To Dionysius and Maximus, and to all our fellow-Ministers over the whole world, Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons; and to the whole Catholick Church under heaven; Helenus, Hymenæus, Theophilus, Theotecnus, Maximus, Proclus, Nicomas, [a] Ælianus, Paul, Bolanus, Protogenes, Hierax, Eutychius, Theodorus, Malchion, and Lucius; And all the rest of the Bishops of the Neighbouring Cities and Provinces which are with us, the [b] Presbyters, and Deacons; 'tis writ and the Churches of God, To the beloved Brethren in the Lord, health. After some words interpos'd, they adde these following. We have written to, and intreated many of the Bishops far Remote; that they would come and assist in the Curing of this Pestiferous Doctrine: for we wrote to Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria, and to Firmilianus Bishop of Cappadocia, men of blessed Memory. The first of them wrote to Antioch, but did not so much as vouchsafe the Authour of the Heresie a salutation; [c] neither did he write to him by name, but to the whole Church: a Copy of which Letter we have here inserted. The other, Firmilianus, came twice, and condemned Paul's novelties, as we who were then present do attest, and many others do also know as well as we. But when he promised to recant, Firmilianus believing him, and hoping that the business might be composed [d] without any reproach to our Religion, deferred his sentence; being deceived by him who denyed his God and Lord, and who kept not the faith which he formerly professed. But Firmilianus was now about coming to Antioch: and he came as far as Tarsus; For he had had experience of his malicious wickedness who denyed his God. But in the interim of our assembling, and whilest we were sending for him, and expecting his coming, he died. After some other passages they describe his Morals, and what course of Life he lead, in these words: But since he turn'd to forged and spurious Opinions, departing from the [e] true Rule, it is not our concern to examine the Actions of one who is out of the Church: Neither how he, who was formerly poor, and indigent, (having had no Estate from his Parents, nor got any thing by any Trade or Profession) is now become incredibly rich, by his unlawful, and sacrilegious dealings, [f] by extortion, and vexatiousness used towards the Brethren, and by [g] *taking of Authority, as when a Souldier, or else by deceit and cunning, when under pretence of favouring, or succouring and helping a man we get something from him. And this latter is that which the Fathers of the Council of Antioch here mean: the Greeks call it σείειν; so here, σείειν τὸν ἀδελφὸν; to which the Latine word concussio, and concutere does exactly answer; in which sense they were used among the old Lawyers. We also find the word in the Gospel, where John gives this command to the Souldiers: (viz.) Μηδένα διασείσητε. Luke Chap. 3. 14. And amongst the Grecians, the antient use of the word σείειν is in the same sence as calumniari. So Aristophanes and Teleclides, use the word. Vales.

AURELIANUS

[a] In the Maz. Fuk. Med. and Sav. MSS. 'tis writ thus, ἀιλιανὸς Ælianus; but in some printed Editions, 'tis ἀμιλιανὸς Amilianus. Also Rufinus, and Niceph. call him Ælianus. Athanasius says there were 70 Fathers in this Synod, who devested Paul of Samosata. Vales.

[b] We ought to take notice of the inscription of this Epistle: for we find here not the names of Bishops onely, but also of Presbyters's, and Deacons, and of the Laity also. The same we may see in the Acts of the Council of Carthage, in which Cyprian was President, and in the Council of Eliberis. Vales.

[c] Hence we may gather the Epistle of Dionys. Alexand. to Paul of Samosata, which is inserted in the 11th Volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum, is suppositious, together with the 10 Propositions of Paul, and Dionysius's Answers to them. For the Fathers of the Council of Antioch do here affirm, that Dionys. did not write to Paul, but to the whole Church of Antioch. In that Epistle which goes under the name of Dionysius, we find that he wrote to Paul twice. But the stile of the Epistle and Answer is not at all like Dionysius's works. So that I am fully perswaded, although Baronius takes that work to be true and Genuine, it is false, and adulterate. Vales.

[d] The Greek words [ἄνευ πινὸς ὀφλῆ τὸν λόγον λοιδορίας] must be translated, sine ullâ Religionis nostræ contumeliâ, and we have rendred them in English accordingly: but Christoph. scorn'd to follow that excellent version of Rufinus which agrees with us. Vales.

[e] The Fathers called the Rule of faith τὸν κανόνα, the true rule. See the fourth book of our Authour Eusebius and Chap. 23, where we find the same use of κανὼν exactly with this here. Vales.

[f] Extortion is twofold; and is committed either by the terrour or Magistrate demands any thing; or else by deceit and cunning, when under pretence of favouring, or succouring and helping a man we get something from him. And this latter is that which the Fathers of the Council of Antioch here mean: the Greeks call it σείειν; so here, σείειν τὸν ἀδελφὸν; to which the Latine word concussio, and concutere does exactly answer; in which sense they were used among the old Lawyers. We also find the word in the Gospel, where John gives this command to the Souldiers: (viz.) Μηδένα διασείσητε. Luke Chap. 3. 14. And amongst the Grecians, the antient use of the word σείειν is in the same sence as calumniari. So Aristophanes and Teleclides, use the word. Vales.

[g] Καταβραβεύειν is by Langus very well translated præmia accipere, to take bribes: St Paul uses that term, Colos. 2. 18. Vales.

AURELIANUS

bribes from thoſe that were injured, promiſing to help them to their right, for a reward; but he deceiv'd them too, [h] getting money for doing nothing through their willingneſs, who were entangled in Suits, to give any thing for a delivery from thoſe troubles: He [i] ſuppoſed godlineſs to be gain. Neither need we declare how proud and inſolent he was, being inveſted with ſecular Dignities; and deſiring to be ſtiled a [k] Ducenarius, rather then a Biſhop: and how he walk't in ſtate through the * Forum, reading and dictating Letters as he walked in publick, with a numerous Guard about him, ſome going before and ſome following him: in ſo much that there was an ill opinion and an odium brought upon the faith through his pride and haughtineſs. Neither [does it concern us to examine] his vain glorious ambition in the Eccleſiaſtick conventions, which he greedily purſues, being deſirous of glory, and affected with an imaginary pomp: with ſuch devices as theſe terrifying the minds of the faithful and ignorant. Beſides, he erected for himſelf a [l] Tribunal, and a lofty throne, not like one of Chriſt's diſciples, but had a place called his [m] Secretum, like as the ſecular Magiſtrates have. He alſo uſed to clap his hand upon his thigh, and ſtamp't upon the Throne with his feet. And ſuch as did not commend him, and ſhake their [n] oraria, as they uſually did in the Theaters, and did not make loud exclamations, nor leapt up and down in the ſame manner as his favourites (which were a company of ſilly men and women that during their hearkning to him uſed ſuch indecencies) did; but were attentive to him with ſuch a ſeemly reverence and decencie as befits the houſe of God; thoſe perſons he rebuked and reproach't. In his publick diſcourſes he reflected upon thoſe Doctours of our Religion that were dead, with all imaginable ſcorn and petulancy; but he magnified himſelf not as became a Biſhop, but rather like a counterfeit, and an Impoſtour. He aboliſhed the Pſalms, which were uſually ſung in honour of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, as Novel, and the compoſures of modern men. On the great feaſt of Easter, he appointed women to ſing Pſalms in his commendation in the body of the Church, which whoſoever heard might juſtly tremble at: He alſo privately ſent the [o] Biſhops of the Neighbouring Villages and Towns, and the Preſbyters who were his flatterers to make diſcourſes to the people in commendation of him. For he will not joyn in a confeſſion with us, that the Son of God came down from heaven, that we may now premiſe ſome things of what we ſhall hereafter more at large declare in writing. Neither ſhall this be affirmed on our bare word, but it is evident in many places up and down his [p] Acts which we have ſent you: and moſt eſpecially there where he ſays that Jeſus Chriſt is of the * earth; But thoſe who chaunt out his praiſes, and ſing his Encomium's amongſt the people, do ſay, that this their impious maſter is an angel come down from heaven: nor does that haughty fellow prohibit theſe expreſſions, but is himſelf preſent when they are ſpoken. What need we here mention his and his Presbyters and Deacons [q] Subintroduced women (as the Antiochians term them?) in whom he conceals not onely this, but many other damnable crimes, (which he is conſcious of, and of which he has been convict they are guilty) that by this means he may keep them ſo obnoxious, as not to adventure, through a fear of their own guilt, to accuſe him for his impious words and practiſes. Moreover, he has enriched them. And this is the reaſon he is beloved and admired by them who covet ſuch things. But why do we write theſe things? We know (beloved) that it is the duty of a Biſhop, and of the whole Clergy, to be examples of good works to the people. Neither are we ignorant, that by introducing women into their ſociety, ſome have wholly fell away from goodneſs, and others have been ſuſpected. Although therefore it be granted he committed nothing that was unchaſt, yet the very ſuſpicion which ariſes from ſuch a thing, ought carefully to be avoided, leaſt it ſhould be offenſive to any one, and induce others to imitate it: for how can he reprove, or admoniſh another not to frequent the company of women, and to take heed leaſt he fall, (as it is written,) who has now indeed ſent away one, but keeps two that are young and beautiful with him? and where-ever he goes, he carries them along with him; and therefore indulges, and [r] ſtuffs himſelf with delicacies. Theſe are the reaſons that all people ſigh, and lament privately: but they ſo dread his Tyrany, and Authority, that they dare not accuſe him; now, (as we have before ſaid) any one would call a man, who profeſſes the Catholick Doctrine, and is reckoned of our Communion, to an account for theſe things. But from one, who has abjured the Myſtery [of our Religion,] and has boaſted in that curſed Hereſie of Artemas, (for why may we not manifeſt to you his father:) we judge it needleſs to require an account of theſe things. Afterwards in the cloſe of the Epiſtle they adjoyn theſe words. Having therefore excommunicated this contumacious Enemie of God; we were neceſſitated to ordain another Biſhop in his ſtead over the Catholick Church, (as we are perſwaded, not without the providence of God) [to wit,] Domnus (the ſon of Demetrianus of bleſſed Memory, who before him was the eminent Governour of that See) a man adorned with all accompliſhments requiſite to a Biſhop. Which we have therefore ſignified to you, that you may write

[h] Although μισθὸν be joyn'd with καρπόω in the Greek, and we have ſo tranſlated it: (viz.) getting money for doing nothing, making it to be referred to Paul; yet it ſhould rather be referred to the Litigants, or people in ſuit, who gave their money to Paul, for his help and favour in their cauſe, and ſo loſt it: he never helping them. Valeſ.

[i] This is a Scripture phraſe, taken out of 1 Timothy chap. 6. v. 6.

[k] Theſe Ducenarii were procuratours; called ducenarii, becauſe they were ſuch receivers, or Collectours of the Revenues, as had 200 ſeſterces paid them from the Emperour, as a yearly ſallary. See Dio, Lib. 53. p. 506. Valeſ.

* See Book 5. Chap. 1. note (c.)

[l] The Fathers do not here condemn Paul becauſe he had a throne; for that was cuſtomary amongſt Biſhops, even from the times of the Apoſtles, as we may ſee in Chap. 19. Book 7. concerning the throne of James the brother of the Lord. But for this they condemn him becauſe he erected a Tribunal for himſelf in the Church, and buil't a high throne, as Ruſinus well tranſlates the place, higher then it was before. Biſhops did ſit higher then the people; but they had not a Tribunal. Valeſ.

[m] This Secretum was onely proper to Magiſtrates, and the Judices Majores, or Judges of Life and Death. It was the inner part of the Court of Judgment, and was compaſſed about with Rails, and Curtains were drawn about it; in it the Judges ſate, when they heard the Tryals of Criminals. See my notes on Amm. Marcell. p. 87. Valeſ.

[n] Καλασείειν ταῖς ὀθόναις, ſignifies to ſhake a linnen cloth, or handkerchief in token of applauſe; as the Spectatours uſed to doe in the Theater. Vopiſcus ſays that Aurelianus was the firſt who gave theſe ὀθόνας, oraria, in Engliſh, handkerchiefs, to the people of Rome, that concutiendo, by ſhaking them, they might ſignifie their conſent in Elections. But Aurelianus borrowed this cuſtom from the Eaſtern People who long before his time uſed theſe Oraria after the ſame manner. Valeſ.

[o] Euſebius ſeems here to mean the Chorepiſcopi, which ſome term Vicarios Epiſcopi, & Vicarios Epiſcopos, i. e. Deputys of the Biſhop, and Vicar-Biſhops. They here make a diſtinction betwixt the Epiſcopi Civitatum, and Epiſcopi Pagorum. And theſe latter, the Fathers here ſay, ſang, or repeated theſe ſongs or Hymns in their Sermons, and congregations. See Damaſi Epiſt. concerning theſe.

[p] Ὑπομνήματα are here Geſta, or Acta, Publick Acts; ſuch are commonly Regiſtred; but ſome falſly tranſlate them Commentaries. Now the Acts of this Synod of Antioch were nothing but the Diſputation of Malchion againſt Paul of Samoſata; which were Regiſtred by the Notaries. Valeſ.

* See Joh. 8. 23.

[q] Theſe Subintroduced women were neither Wives, nor Concubines, but a third ſort of women; which the Presbyters, &c. kept, not to have children by, nor upon account of luſt, but as 'twas pretended out of a deſire of piety. See John Langus's notes on B. 6. Niceph. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Chap. 30. Theſe ſort of women, Valeſius ſays, were called Siſters; which he was informed of from the third Canon. Concil. Nicen. They were alſo termed Commanentes. See Jerom's Epiſtle to Euſtochius, where he inveys againſt theſe ſort of women.

to him, and receive from him [f] Communicatory Letters: but as for this [Paul] let him write to Artemas, if he pleases, and let the followers of Artemas, hold Communion with him.

[f] Τὰ κοινωνικὰ γράμματα. The Latines call them, Literas communicatorias, communicatory Letters; the use whereof is very ancient in the Church. They were also called Formatæ, as Augustine, in Epist. 163. attests. There were two sorts of these Letters. One sort was given to the Clergy and Laity that were going to travel, that they might be admitted to Communion by forrein Bishops. Another sort were those, which Bishops sent to other Bishops, and received from them mutually, to attest and declare their mutual Communion: concerning this latter sort the Synod speaks here. They were usually sent by the new Bishops a little after their Ordination. See August. 162 Epist. and Cyprians Epistle to Cornelius, pag. 92. Vales.

[t] And let these things be here by us inserted. * Paul therefore having been devested of his Bishoprick, and being also fallen from the orthodox Faith, Domnus (as is aforesaid) succeeded in the Government of the Church of Antioch; But [u] Paul being by no means willing to quit the Possession of the * Church; an address was made to Aurelianus the Emperour, who most justly determined concerning this business; giving command that the Pallace should be resigned to whom the Bishops of the Christian Religion in Italy and Rome should assign it by their Letters. Thus therefore the aforementioned Paul, was with the greatest disgrace thrust out of the Church by the secular power. Thus indeed was Aurelian affected towards us at that time; But in the following part of his Empire his mind towards us being altered, he was induced by the advice of some men to raise a Persecution against us. Much discourse there was every where concerning it: but the divine vengeance assaulted him, (being now ready, and as I may say, almost subscribing the Edicts against us,) [repressing] his design, and binding him (as it were) by the armes; making it evidently apparent to all men that the readiness of the Princes of this world [to persecute us] can never prevail against the Churches of Christ, unless the invincible hand of God in his divine and celestial judgment, permits it to be done for our chastisement and amendment, at those times in which he judgeth it most seasonable. Moreover, Probus succeeds Aurelian, having Reigned six years. And after he had held the Empire the like number of years, Carus together with his Sons, Carinus and Numerianus, succeed him. Again, these having not lived three full yeares, the Empire falls to Diocletian and those who were adopted with him. In whose times the Persecution against us was accomplished, and at the same time with it was the demolishing of the Churches: but a little before this, died Dionysius, after he had governed the See of Rome nine years, and Felix succeeded him.

[t] Baronius at the year of Christ 272. (in which year he has placed this Synod of Antioch,) accuses Eusebius of fraud, or rather of connivence; becaus he on set purpose (as he says) omitted that Creed which the Fathers made in this Council of Antioch, which utterly destroyed Arianism. But Baronius, as in other places, so here also, causelesly accuseth Eusebius. For that Creed which he there produceth out of the Acts of the Synod of Ephesus, was not the Creed which was composed by the Fathers of the Council of Antioch, but by them of the Nicene Council. For the more certain demonstration of this, See the 3d Tome of the Acts of the Council of Ephesus, pag. 378; where this Creed, which Baronius mentions as composed by the Fathers of this Council of Antioch, is expressly assign'd to the Fathers of the Council of Nice. Wherefore that Creed which Baronius, and Binius, following his example, have placed in the Acts of this Council of Antioch, must be razed out. There is also extant an Epistle of this 2d Synod of Antioch to Paul of Samosata in the 11th Tome of the Bibliotheca Patrum, which Epistle was written about the beginning of the Session of this 2d Synod, but Baronius ascribes that Epistle to the first Synod, which cannot possibly be, because of the title, and the persons mentioned in it, and other circumstances. Vales.

[u] After the sentence of being deposed was passed against Paul, he kept his Church for some years; and would not obey the decree of the Bishops; relying on the power of Zenobia an Eastern Queen. Theodoret says, in his 2d Book Haretic. Fabul. that Paul did flatter her, and used all means possible to get her favour. When Zenobia was conquered, the Christian Prelates petitioned Aurelianus, that this Paul, who had conspired with Zenobia against the Romans, might be removed from the See of Antioch, which was done in the third year of Aurelianus. Vales.

* Τὸ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ὄικω· the import of which words, being litterally rendred, is the house of the Church: perhaps they mean the Bishops Palace; a little after they call it τὸν ὄικον; which we have rendred the Palace. Valesius renders the first phrase Ecclesiæ Domus, and the second Domus.

CHAP. XXXI.

Concerning the heterodox and corrupt opinion of the Manichees which sprang up at this time.

DIOCLETIAN

AT the same time that mad-man, (truly called [a] Manes) who gave denomination to that furious Heresie, was armed with madness; Satan himself that Adversary of God, having produced him for the destruction of many men. This person was barbarous in his whole course of life, in his very discourse and manners, he was as to his disposition devilish and mad: he undertook what was agreeable hereto, and attempted to feign himself to be Christ. Sometimes he declared himself to be the * Paraclete, and the very holy Spirit, being also besides his madness puft up with pride: at other times, as if he were Christ, he elected twelve disciples to be Colleagues of his new-formed opinion: Moreover, when he had patched up a Collection of false and Atheistical opinions, gathered out of various Heresies which were long since extinct, he poured them, like some deadly poison, out of Persia into [b] our Countrey. Hence came that impious name of the [c] Manichees, which at this time abounds in many places; such therefore was the original of this [d] forged doctrine, which sprang up in the times before mentioned.

[a] Eusebius, as we here see, derives the name of this Heretick from the Greek word μανὴς, a madman: The Learned Bishop Pearson, on the Creed, supposes Manes to be a Title rather than a name, and to be derived from the Hebrew מנא, or מינא, signifying, an Heretick: see his reasons for this derivation, in his marginal notes at pag. 64. of his Exposition on the Creed; Edit. Lond. 1669.

* See the note on chap. 14. B 5.

[b] The phrase in the original is ἐπὶ τὴν ἡμῶν οἰκουμένην; which Valesius renders in Orbem Romanum, into the Roman Empire.

[c] Manes was not the first Authour of this Heresie, though his followers were from him called Manicheans. Indeed, Manes dissieminated this Heresie in the days of Aurelianus, or Probus the Emperour: but he had a predecessour, though not a master, called first Terebinthus, afterwards Buddas: which Buddas had a former master, by name Scythianus, who was the first Authour of this Heresie, and lived about the Apostolick times. See the pedegree of this Heresie drawn at large by Epiphanius, Advers. Manicheos; pag. 617, &c. Edit. Petav.

CHAP. XXXII.

Concerning those Ecclesiastick men who were famous even in our Age, and which of them lived till the demolishing of the Churches.

AT this time Eutychianus succeeded Felix, who had been Bishop of the Church of Rome five years. And [a] he, having not lived full ten months, leaves the dignity to Caius, who lived in our Age: when he had presided there about fifteen years, Marcellinus was ordained his successour; whom the Persecution overtook: At this time Timæus succeeded Domnus in the Government of the Church of Antioch: After him Cyril succeeded in our memory. In his time we knew one [b] Dorotheus, who then had the dignity of Presdent from the old book of the Popes; in which the years of all the Popes from Callistus are very well digested by the Consuls under whom they began their Presidencies, and under whom they died. Eusebius here takes away 8 years from Eutychianus and ascribeth them to Xystus. See Chap. 27. note (a.) Vales.

[a] This Eutychianus, late Bishop of Rome 8 years and 11 months as is evi-

[b] This Dorotheus Presbyter of Antioch, Baronius (in his notes on the Roman Martyrology) takes to be the same with that Dorotheus who was a Presbyter of Tyre: but this is a mistake in him; which error Blondellus undertakes to correct; but in the interim committeth one far worse. For he confounds this Dorotheus Presbyter of Antioch, with Dorotheus, Diocletian's Groom of the Chamber; whoſe Martyrdom our Authour in the 8 book giveth us an account of: I do not in the leaſt doubt but there were two of this name (viz.) Dorotheus's, one was Presbyter of Antioch, and the other was an Eunuch, Groom of the Chamber to Diocletian. And this may be proved by ſufficient arguments. (1.) This Dorotheus, the Presbyter, was not a Martyr; for we find no mention of him as ſuch in Euſebius, and certainly had he been ſo, Euſebius would not have omitted him amongſt the Eccleſiaſticks he reckons up Book 8. chap. 13. who ſuffered Martyrdom, ſeeing alſo he was his maſter. (2.) This Dorotheus the Presbyter was a man nobly deſcended, and he bore Office before he was a Presbyter; but the other Dorotheus was a man of a ſervile condition, an Eunuch, and Groom of the Chamber to Diocletian. Beſides, 'tis impoſſible that the ſame man ſhould be a Groom of the Chamber, and a Presbyter; for that was inconſiſtent with the Eccleſiaſtick Canon, and with reaſon; onely youths of great beauty were choſen to ſerve in the Emperours Bedchamber. Laſtly, we read in Euſebius, and others, that Dorotheus the Groom of the Chamber ſuffered Martyrdom while he had that Office. Hence aroſe this confuſion; both theſe Dorotheus's were Eunuchs, and both the Emperour's favourites. Valeſ.

DIOCLETIAN byter in the Church of Antioch, a very learned man: he was very ſtudious in the ſacred Scriptures, and uſed ſo great ſedulity in attaining the Hebrew tongue, that he could read the Scriptures in Hebrew with great skillfullneſs: he was a perſon that had been [c] excellently well educated, and was not unexperienced in the Grecian Literature: but he was by nature an Eunuch, having been ſo from his very birth. The Emperour for this reaſon, (it being for example a thing which was wonderful,) took him into his favour, and advanced him to the Office of overſeeing the Purple Dy-houſe at Tyre: we have heard this perſon expound the holy Scriptures in the Church indifferently well: But after Cyrillus, Tyrannus ſucceeded in the Biſhoprick of the Church of Antioch; in whoſe time the deſtroying of the Churches was very violent: After Socrates, Euſebius Governed the See of Laodicea, who was born at the City of Alexandria; the cauſe of his removal [out of his own Countrey] was the controverſie about Paul: Upon which account coming into Syria, he was detained from returning home by thoſe perſons who in that place diligently buſied themſelves about celeſtial matters; he was in our memory a moſt amiable ornament of Religion, as we may eaſily underſtand from the words of Dionyſius before quoted: [d] Anatolius was ordained his ſucceſſour, a good man (as the ſaying is) ſucceeding a good man. He alſo was an Alexandrian by birth; for eloquence, Grecian Literature and Philoſophy, he was acknowledged the chiefeſt of the moſt eminent men in our age; for he had arrived to a perfection in Arithmetick, Geometry, Aſtronomy, Logick, Phyſical Contemplations, and Rhetorick. Upon which account (as report ſays) he was intreated by the Citizens of Alexandria to ſet up a School there of the [e] Ariſtotelick Order [of Philoſophers:] They relate indeed many other famous acts of his in the Siege of the [f] Bruchium at Alexandria: for by an univerſal conſent he was dignified with the chiefeſt place of preheminence and authority amongſt the magiſtracy of that City: but for inſtance I will here mention onely this Act of his. There being (as they ſay) a great ſcarcity of Corn amongſt the beſieged, (in ſo much that the famine was more intolerable to them then the enemies without;) this afore-mentioned Anatolius being there, made this proviſion [for their relief:] the one [g] part of the City being confederates with the Roman Army, and upon that account not beſieged; Anatolius ſendeth to Euſebius (for as yet he was there, this happening before his removal into Syria,) who was amongſt them that were not beſieged, and had gotten great repute, and a famous name even with the Roman General, to inform him of [the number] of thoſe that died by the famine in the ſiege. Euſebius underſtanding this, petitioned the Roman General as for the higheſt favour, that ſafety might be granted to thoſe who would deſert the enemy: having obtained his requeſt, he made it known to Anatolius; who, having forthwith received the [General's] promiſe, called together the Senate of Alexandria, and at firſt entreated them all to enter into an amicable friendſhip with the Romans. But when he perceived them to be exaſperated at that his propoſal, but (ſays he) I ſuppoſe you would not contradict me in this, ſhould I counſel you to ſend out of the gates all perſons which are ſuperfluous, and of whom we have no uſe at all, to wit, old women, children, and old men, and let them go whither they will: for why ſhould we to no purpoſe retain them with us, who are even dying? Why do we deſtroy them with famine, who are diſabled and maimed in their bodies? We ought to feed onely men, and thoſe that are young and ſtrong, and to [h] diſtribute neceſſary corn to ſuch as are fit to defend the City: When by ſuch arguments as theſe he had prevailed with the Senate, riſing up he gave his vote firſt: that all thoſe who were not fit for ſervice of what Sex ſoever, whether men, or women, ſhould quit the City; for ſhould they continue with them, and being wholly uſeleſs tarry in the City, there could be no hopes of ſafety; but they would be deſtroyed by the famine. All the reſt of the Senate having approved of his propoſal, he ſaved almoſt all the beſieged. Firſt he provided that thoſe of our Religion, then that others of all Ages throughout the City, (not thoſe

[c] The reading in the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Sav. M.SS. is ἐλευθέρως, liberaliter educatus, he was very well educated. Valeſ.

[d] This is the ſame Anatolius (if I miſtake not) that Eunapius mentions in the Life of Iamblichus; where he ſays that Iamblichus was at firſt the Scholar of Anatolius, who at that time was eſteemed the beſt Philoſopher next to Prophyrius. This Anatolius, here ſpoken of by Euſebius, lived in the ſame times Prophyrius did, and according to Euſebius's Character, he was a man well verſed in all ſorts of learning. Valeſ.

[e] The phraſe, in the original is Ἀριστοτέλους διαδοχῆς, Ariſtotelicæ ſucceſſionis, of the Ariſtotelick Order. Anatolius being an exellent Philoſopher was requeſted by the Citizens of Alexandria to ſet up an Ariſtotelick School, in imitation of the Platonick School long ſince erected at Athens. The maſters of Plato's School were called διάδοχοι, and were promoted to that place by a publick decree. This School had great annual revenues, raiſed out of Eſtates, which learned men left as legacies to this School, which were hence called διαδοχαί. In imitation of this School at Athens, there was afterwards founded a Philoſophical School at Alexandria, of which that moſt excellent Philoſopher Hierocles was maſter. See Damaſcius, in vitâ Iſidor. pag. 1058, &c. Valeſ.

DIOCLETIAN

[f] This Siege of the Bruchium was in Aurelianus's time, as we find aſſerted in the end of B. 22. of Amm. Marcell. Euſebius in his Chronicle ſays it happened on the 2d year of Claudius: for which Scaliger reproves and corrects Euſebius, relying on the authority of Marcell. But I had rather follow our Authours opinion here. For that Euſebius mentioned in this chap. and Anatolius were ſtill at Alexandria, and could not poſſibly travel to Antioch till the ſiege was raiſed. But Euſebius, we ſee, went to the Synod of Antioch, which, as before we proved, was in the ſecond year of Claudius. And intending to return from Antioch, he was detained by the Laodiceans and made Biſhop of that place. But if we ſay that the Bruchium was not taken till Aurelianus's Reign; how could Euſebius, who was at the ſiege go towards that Synod, and be made Biſhop of Laodicea. Valeſ.

[g] Whileſt Claudius warred againſt the Barbarians, Zenobia ſent Zabda her Captain, who, by the aſſiſtance of Timogenes an Ægyptian ſeized upon Ægypt, and put a Garriſon into Alexandria: but Probus the Roman General, with ſome aſſiſtance of the Ægyptians, who did not affect the Syrians of Palmyra who kept the Garriſon, forced them out thence; as Pollia in the Life of Claudius, and Zoſimus record. And this, I think, was the time when the Bruchium was beſieged by the Romans. Valeſ. Martinius thinks that this Bruchium, here mentioned as a part of Alexandria, and in the Greek called πυρεχεῖον, was that which the Romans call the forum frumentarium, or Corn-market; it being derived from πυρὸς χέω, Annonæ præfectus; and that compounded of πυρὸς and ἔχω, tritici curam habeo, to have the charge of the wheat: See Martin. Lexicon. Philolog. in the word Bruchion.

[h] Chriſtoph. renders the word ταμιεύειν, here uſed, Congerere, to lay up Corn; but it muſt here be rendred quite contrary, to give out, or meaſure out corn ſparingly; which was cuſtomary in famines, and in ſieges. Valeſ.

DIOCLETIAN those onely to whom the Senate had given licence; but a great many others under pretence hereof) should make their escape secretly; who being disguised in womens habit, went in the night out of the gates by his procurement, and fled to the Roman Army; where Eusebius, receiving them all, like a Father and Physician, refreshed them, who had been afflicted with a [i] tedious siege, with all imaginable care, and methods of cure. The Church of Laodicea was honoured with two such Pastours as these by the divine providence, one succeeding the other, [for] after the war aforesaid was ended, they both removed from Alexandria into [Syria.] Indeed Anatolius did not write many books: but so many [works of his] came to our hands, that from them we may perceive both his eloquence and his great learning; especially from those [Canons] of his in which he gives us his opinion concerning Easter: Out of which it may be requisite to make mention of these words in this place.

[i] Hieronymus, in his Chronicle, says that this siege of the Bruchium lasted several years. Vales.

[k] Excerptions out of Anatolius's Canons concerning Easter.

[k] These words ought to be separated from the Text of Eusebius, as we have here done in the Translation. For they are a Title as it were, which noteth that the fragment following is out of another Authour. Vales.

[l] Ἔχεις πίνυν. These words being imperfect, and unintelligible; there must of necessity be something understood. Christoph. conjectures that τὸ πάσχα, Easter, is to be understood; but that is absurd, for the feast of Easter does never fall on the New-moon of the first moneth. I rather think we ought to read ἔχεις, you have, or ἔχε in the imperative, reckon the New-moon, &c. Vales.

"[l] You have therefore in the first year the "New-moon of the first moneth, (which is the "beginning of the circle of nineteen years;) ac- "cording to the Ægyptian account on the 26 day "of the moneth Phamenoth; but according to the "Macedonian computation of moneths, on the "22 day of the moneth "Dystrus; and as the Ro- "mans phrase it, before the "11th of the Calends of A- "pril: On the aforesaid 26 "day of the moneth Phame- "noth the Sun is found not "onely to have entered the "first segment [of the Zo- "diack,] but is then going "the fourth day in it: They usually call this seg- "ment, the first Dodecatemorion, the Æquinox, "the beginning of moneths, the head of the Cycle, "and the [m] original of the course of the Planets. "The segment next before this they commonly call "the end of the moneths, and the twelfth segment, "the last Dodecatemorion, and "the term of the circuit of "the Planets: Wherefore "we affirm that they who "place the first moneth in "this segment, and take the "14th day [n] from it to be "the feast of Easter, are, as "it happens, in no small "mistake. Neither is this "our opinion; but it was "known to the antient Jews "even before Christ's [com- "ing;] and it was also in "an especial manner obser- "ved by them; which may "be understood from the "words of Philo, Josephus, "and Musæus. And not from "the words of these persons "onely, but from them who "were antienter then they; "to wit, from the two [o] Aga- "thobulus's, who were sir- "named the Doctours, or Masters. But I fear he mistakes in affirming them to be antienter then Philo and Josephus. For Eusebius in his Chronicle says, that Agathobulus the Philosopher flourished in the times of Hadrianus. Vales.

[m] Ἄφεσις (the term which occurs here) does properly signifie Carceres, the place whence the horse-races were begun. Anatolius therefore calls the first Dodecatemorium, ἄφεσις, because from that, as it were from the original and fourse thereof the course of the Planets should begin. Vales. The translation of this Canon of Anatolius's will be scarce understood by the unlearned Reader, because so many terms of Art occur in it. The Learned Reader, that is desirous of farther satisfaction herein, may consult Petavius's notes on Epiphan. p. 188, &c. and Ægydius Bucherius, De Doctrinâ Temporum, pag. 440, Edit. Antverp. 1634.

[n] That is, from that segment: for although the reading in the Greek Text be ἀπ' αὐτὴν, yet it is to be corrected thus, ἀπ' αὐτοῦ; understand τμῆμα, segment: so Petavius corrected it in his notes upon Epiphanius pag. 190. Vales.

[o] Anatolius here affirms that there were two Agathobulus's, sirnamed the Doctours, or Masters.

"named the Masters: and also from the [p] famous "Aristobulus, who was one of the Seventy, that "at the request of Ptolomæus Philadelphus and his "father, translated the Sacred and divine Scriptures "of the Hebrews, and Dedicated his Expositions on "Moses's Law to the same Kings. These Authours "in their solutions of the "Questions upon Exodus, say "that all ought to sacrifice "the Passover together after "the vernal Æquinox, in "the middle of the first "moneth. Now this hap- "pens when the Sun goes "through the first part of "the Solar Circle, or (as "some of them terme it) "the Zodiack: but Aristo- "bulus addeth, that not onely "the Sun, but the Moon al- "so must of necessity pass "through the Æquinoctial "segment on the feast of "the Passover: for where- "as there are two Æqui- "noctial segments, the one "called the vernal; the other "the Autumnal; and they "diametrically opposite the "one to the other; and whereas the feast of the Pass- "over is granted to be on the 14 day at evening, "the Moon shall be diametrically opposite to the "Sun, as we may see it is in full Moons. Where- "fore the Sun will be in the vernal Æquinoctial "segment; and the Moon will necessarily be in "the Autumnal Æquinoctial segment. I know "they have said a great deal more; (part where- "of is probable, and part concluded from most "certain demonstrations;) by which they en- "deavour to make it evident, that the feast of the "Passover, and that of unleavened bread must al- "ways be celebrated after the Æquinox. But I "omit the requiring such abundance of demon- "strations from them, off whom the Veil of the "Mosaick Law is taken: and by whom (the face "being now uncovered) may be seen as in a "glass for the future, both Christ himself, "Christ's doctrines, and his sufferings. Now, that "the first moneth amongst the Hebrews does be- "gin about the Æquinox, the precepts in the "[q] Book of Enoch are suf- "ficient evidences. The same Anatolius has left us Institutions of * Arithmetick in ten entire books, as also several other evidences of his diligence about, and great experience in, the holy Scriptures; Theotecnus Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine first ordained him Bishop by imposition of hands, providing him to be his successour in his own Church. And indeed for some small time they both [r] presided over that Church together. But the Synod against Paul being convened at Antioch, they are now called.) These sort of Assistants were first instituted for the ease of Aged Bishops; but afterwards they grew customary; and were chosen not out of necessity, but ambition and pride: but the Fathers of the Council of Sardis put a stop hereto. Vales.

DIOCLETIAN [p] Rufinus renders Ἀριστοβούλου τοῦ καὶ πάνυ. Aristobulus of Paneas; but he is in a gross errour. I wonder that Scaliger, (in his Animadversions upon Eusebius, pag. 130.) should think, these words of Anatolius ought to be corrected according to Rufinus's translation of them. Bede also follows this corrupt Version of Rufinus, and takes Paniada to be the name of a Jewish writer. Scaliger in the place afore-quoted largely proves that what Anatolius says of Aristobulus (viz. he was one of the 72 Translatours) is false. This Aristobulus was also sirnamed the Master, or the Doctor; as we may see 2 Maccabees Chap. 1. because he was Tutour to King Ptolomy. For I cannot assent to Scaliger, who makes a distinction betwixt that Aristobulus mentioned in the History of the Maccabees, and Aristobulus the Peripatetick, who dedicated his Expositions upon Moses's Law to Ptolomy Philometor. Vales.

[q] This book of Enoch is quoted by Jude in his Canonical Epistle. It was an Apocryphal book, and not received amongst the Authentick Scriptures of the Jewes. But the Apostles, and the antient Fathers in imitation of them, have not been afraid to quote Apocryphal books which seemed to confirm the truth. Georgius Syncel. in his Chronicle, quotes an excellent fragment out of this book of Enoch's. Vales.

* Some Excerptions out of Anatolius's Arithmetick are yet extant. Vales.

[r] We have the like example in Chap. 11. book 6. Where Alexander ruled the Church of Jerusalem joyntly with Narcissus. These two are the most antient instances of Assistant Bishops (as [r] Euſebius relates the ſame thing concerning Euſebius Alexandrinus in the beginning of this chapter: (viz.) that he went to the Synod of Antioch, which was called upon Paul's account, and in his return was ſtopped by the Laodiceans, and made Biſhop of that place. Now again we find the ſame concerning Anatolius: which cannot poſſibly be defended, except we ſhould ſay that Euſebius died ſome few days after his Ordination: but in oppoſition to that we will produce Hieronymus's authority, who in the ſecond year of Aurelianus writes thus; Euſebius is now famous at Laodicea. Valeſ.

[r] he going through the City of Laodicea [towards that Synod] was there detained by the brethren, Euſebius being then dead: After the death of Anatolius, Stephen is ordained Biſhop of that Church, being the laſt before the Perſecution. He was indeed admired by many for his eloquence, Philoſophy, and his other Grecian learning: but he was not [s] ſo well affected towards the true faith [of Chriſt,] as the time of the following Perſecution afterwards demonſtrated; which manifeſtly declared him to be a diſſembler, fearful and cowardous, rather then a true Philoſopher: but after this the affairs of that Church did not forthwith run to decay; For Theodotus [u] Ordained Biſhop of that Church by God himſelf the preſerver of all things, immediately reſtored all things to their former ſplendour: He was a perſon who in deeds verified his own name, and made a true repreſentation of the Epiſcopal Office; he was of all men the moſt eminent for his skill in Phyſick and in curing of the body. And there was no man his equal for healing of ſouls; for humanity, ſincerity of mind, commiſeration, and diligence in helping thoſe who wanted his aſſiſtance: he was alſo incomparably well exerciſed in divine learning. Such a perſon was this Theodotus. Agapius ſucceedeth Theotecnus, who had governed the Biſhoprick of Cæſarea in Paleſtine with great care. Who, we know, was very laborious, and moſt ſincerely ſollicitous for the good of the people over whom he preſided; and with a liberal hand relieved all, moſt eſpecially the indigent: In this man's times we knew Pamphilus (a moſt † loquent man, and a true Philoſopher in the practiſes of his life) honoured with a Presbyterſhip of that Church. To declare what a perſon this man was, and whence deſcended, would be a copious ſubject. But all things relating to his life, the † School he founded; the conflicts which during the time of Perſecution he underwent in ſeveral confeſſions, and laſtly the crown of Martyrdom with which he was encircled, we have fully declared in a [x] peculiar work. Indeed this Pamphilus was the moſt admirable perſon of all that lived here. [y] Amongſt thoſe men who lived neareſt to our times, we knew theſe to be moſt eminent, Pierius one of the Presbyters of Alexandria; And [z] Meletius Biſhop of the Churches in Pontus: Pierius was egregiouſly eſteemed for his [voluntary] poverty, and his Philoſophick literature: he was alſo a man ſingularly exerciſed in Contemplations upon the Scriptures, expoſitions, and publick diſcourſes in the Church: and Meletius (whom the learned called the [a] Honey of Attica) was ſuch a man as one would deſcribe to be moſt accompliſhed with all ſorts of learning. The powerfulneſs of his eloquence cannot worthily be admired. But, ſhould any one ſay that he had this faculty by nature, [we anſwer,] who could excell him in his knowledge in many other Arts and Sciences, and in his various ſorts of literature? Certainly, ſhould any perſon have made tryal of him, he would have affirmed that he was a man moſt acute in all Sciences which have a dependence on reaſon; and alſo moſt eloquent: The virtue and piety of his life was alſo correſpondent to theſe his accompliſhments. In the time of the perſecution we knew this man, when he abſconded for the ſpace of ſeven years compleat in the regions of Paleſtine. After Hymenæus Biſhop of Jeruſalem, a little before mentioned, Zambdas entred upon the Government of that Church; who dying not long after, Hermon, the laſt of the Biſhops before the Perſecution in our Age, ſucceeded in the Apoſtolick Chair, [b] which is preſerved there even to this day. Theonas ſucceedeth Maximus in the Biſhoprick of Alexandria, who had been Biſhop there eighteen years, ſince Dionyſius's death. In his days Achillas, who at the ſame time with Pierius was honoured with a Preſbyterſhip, was very famous [at Alexandria] who was entruſted with the care of the * Catechetick School. He in his * Τῆς ἱερᾶς πίστεως τὸ διδασκαλεῖον; literally, the School of the divine faith. actions exhibited a moſt excellent example (inferiour to none) of a more ſublime Philoſophy, and a genuine pattern of an Evangelick converſe. After Theonas had born the Epiſcopal Office nineteen years, Peter ſucceeded in the Epiſcopate of Alexandria. He alſo was eſteemed a perſon very eminent in his function, which he bore twelve years compleat. Having preſided over the Church almoſt three of thoſe twelve years, before the Perſecution, he paſt the reſt of his time in a more ſtrict and [c] aſcetick courſe of life; but [z] This is the man, whom Athanaſius in his Speech againſt the Arrians calls Meletius the great, pag. 291. Where in his Catalogue of the Orthodox Biſhops, he reckons Meletius Biſhop of Pontus for one. Philoſtorgius in his firſt book calls him Biſhop of Sebaſtopolis in Pontus. He ſays he was at the Council of Nice with Baſilius Biſhop of Amaſia, and that he ſided with the Arrians: but Athanaſius in the place above quoted, proves that to be falſe. Valeſ.

[a] Therefore the name of Meletius is derived ἀπὸ τῆς μελίτος, from honey. Gregory Nazianz. in his Iambicks calls Meletius the Biſhop of Antioch, μέλιτος ἐπώνυμον. Valeſ.

[b] By theſe words [εἰσέτι νῦν ἐκεῖσε πεφυλαγμένον] he means that the throne of James the brother of the Lord, was preſerved at Jeruſalem till that time, as 'tis recorded Chap. 19. book 7. So alſo at Alexandria, the Chair, or Throne of Saint Mark the Evangeliſt who firſt founded the Church of Alexandria, was preſerved there for a long time. Valeſ.

† Ἧς σωεσήσαλο διαλειβῆς. Some tranſlate theſe words thus, concerning the School in which he was educated: but I underſtand them ſpoken of the School which Pamphilus founded at Cæſarea: concerning the Library which he erected at Cæſarea, ſee Hieronymus's Catalogue; where he ſpeaks concerning Matthew; ſee alſo his Epiſtle to Marcella. Valeſ.

[x] Chriſtoph. takes theſe words, ἐν ἰδίᾳ βιβλίῳ to ſignifie one book onely: But Euſebius wrote three books of the Life of Pamphilus. Which Hieronymus atteſteth in his book De Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis; and in his Apology againſt Ruſinus. Valeſ.

[y] Ἐν δὲ τοῖς μάλιστα καθ' ἡμᾶς, &c. (that is,) as we have tranſlated it, amongſt thoſe men who lived neareſt to our times, &c. Some will have μάλιστα to be referred to σωνιστάντες, moſt eminent men; but that I cannot approve of. Pierius, and Meletius, of whom Euſebius afterwards ſpeaks, lived even till Conſtantine's time; concerning Pierius, ſee Photius and Hieronymus. Ruſinus does not call him Pierius, but Hicrius. So does the old Roman Martyrology, at the fourth day of November. But this Martyrology, I think, is neither the old one, nor the Roman. For had it been the Roman Martyrology, we ſhould have had mention of none but Roman Martyrs. But in it we have a Catalogue of the Martyrs, of all Countreys. That I think (if any deſire to know which it is) is the old Roman Martyrology, which Bucherius publiſhed with the Canon of Victorius Aquitanus, although that looks more like a Calender, then a Martyrology. There is indeed none which is properly the Roman Martyrology: for that which Gregory the Great mentions in his Epiſtle to Eulogius, is St Hierom's Martyrology, which the Weſtern Church then uſed, as we ſhall hereafter at another place demonſtrate. Valeſ.

[c] There is nothing more frequent in Euſebius then the uſe of theſe words, ἄσκησις, and Φιλοσοφία; which terms the Chriſtians borrowed from the Philoſophers, as I noted Chap. 17. book 2. Note (a.) The Philoſophers called thoſe ἀσκήτας who profeſſed a ſtricter kind of life. Hence it is that that Artemidorus in his fourth book chap. 35. calls Alexander the Philosopher ἄνδρα ἀσκητικὸν. Ascetick Philosophy is opposed to Philosophy which consists in bare words. When the Christians first made use of this name Ascetæ, they bestowed it on the Clergy; A long time after that, the Monks laid claim to this name. But at the first it was used as was before shown: see Chap. 17. book 2. note (a.) which may be proved by the instance here of Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, and Pierius the Presbyter; both whom Eusebius in this Chapter calls Ascetas. Eusebius also Chap. 11. concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, calls Pamphilus the Presbyter, Asceta. Vales.

DIOCLETIAN continued to be apparently solicitous for the publick utility of the Churches. Upon which account being beheaded in the ninth year of the Persecution, he was adorned with a crown of Martyrdom. But having here terminated the History of the succession of Bishops from our Saviour's Nativity, to the demolishing of the Churches; which [History] comprehendeth the space of [d] three hundred and five years; in the subsequent [Books] we will record the conflicts of those, who in our Age couragiously fought for Religion, how many and how great they were, and leave them for the information of succeeding Ages.

DIOCLETIAN

[d] This place ought particularly to be taken notice of, in regard Eusebius here summeth up the time which he hath comprehended in his Ecclesiastick History. He saith that from our Saviour's Birth to the demolishing of the Churches, which was in the nineteenth year of Diocletian, there were 305 years. Also in Eusebius's Chronicle the 305 year of Christ is set opposite to the 19 year of Diocletian. But in Scaliger's Edition, the year in which the Persecution under Diocletian began, is reckoned the 304 year of Christ. Hence arises this difference; Scaliger in his Edition of Eusebius's Chronicle, reckons not that to be the first year of Christ in which he was born, but the year following. But Eusebius reckons that to be the first of Christ in which he was born, as I before noted Chap. 5. book 1. note (a.) For Eusebius places his birth on the 8th of the Ides of January. Indeed, in all the M.SS. of Eusebius's Chronicle (which have the years of Christ annext, particularly in that of Millaine, which is ancienter then any other) that is noted for the first year of Christ in which he was born in Bethleheth of Judea. The PREFACE.

HAving comprized the successions of the Apostles in Seven entire Books, in this Eighth we have thought it requisite to set forth the Affaires of our own Age, (which deserve no trivial description,) being a matter most necessary to be derived down to the knowledge of posterity. And our relation shall take its beginning from hence.

CHAP. I.

Concerning those things which preceded the Persecution in our days.

[a] In the most ancient Maz. M.S. and in the Editions of Rufinus, the first chap. is begun at these words, How great, &c. Vales.

[a] HOW great and what manner of glory and freedom the doctrine concerning the adoration of the supream God, declared unto mankind by Christ, was dignified with amongst all men, Græcians as well as Barbarians, before the persecution in our times; 'tis beyond our abilities deservedly to declare: but the favours of the Emperours towards those of our Religion may be an evidence hereof; whom they entrusted with the Governments of Provinces, freeing them from their fears of [b] sacrificing, out of the abundant kindness they reserved for our Religion. What need we mention those who were conversant in the Imperial palaces? Or the Emperours themselves? Who permitted their domesticks, together with their [c] wives, children and servants, freely and openly to make profession of their Religion by their words and practises, even before their own faces, and in a manner suffered them to boast of their fearlessness and freedom in professing their faith. Whom also they had an high esteem for, and accounted them more acceptable than the rest of their attendants. Such a one was that [d] Dorotheus, a person who of all men declar'd the heartiest affection too and fidelity in their service, upon which account he was more highly valued by them than the Magistrates and most honourable Governours of the Provinces: to whom we will adde the most renowned Gorgonius; and as many others as arrived to the same degree of honour with them upon account of the word of God. The same affection, observancy, and eminent favour you might see voutsafed to the Prelates of every Church, as well by all

[b] The Maz. and Med. M.SS. retain the true reading of this place; which is [περὶ τὸ θύειν, of sacrificing:] the same reading Gruter found in his copies. The Governours of Provinces were oblieged to sacrifice to the Gods, and to the Emperours, and to be present at sacrifices. Upon which account the Christians abstained from the Magistracy, and refused the Government of Provinces, offered them by the Emperours. Vales. The reading in Robert Stephens Edit. is [περὶ τὸ θεῖον.]

private perſons as Governours of Provinces. But now, how ſhould any one be able to deſcribe [e] thoſe numerous [f] congregations, their multitudes, who throughout every City flock't [to embrace the faith of Chriſt;] and thoſe famous aſſemblies [of the people] in the Churches? For which reaſon they were no longer contented with the old Edifices, but erected ſpatious Churches from the very foundations throughout all the Cities. Theſe [proſperous ſucceſſes,] increaſing in proceſs of time, and being daily augmented with a growth and greatneſs, no envy could put a ſtop to; neither was any evil ſpirit able to bewitch them, nor could the treacheries of men prohibit them, as long as the divine and celeſtial hand [of God] covered and guarded his people, continuing to be worthy of its [protection.] But, after the affairs of our age were through too much liberty changed into looſeneſs and ſloth; when ſome began to envy and revile others, and we were in a manner at wars amongſt our ſelves, [wounding] one another with words as it were with arms and ſpears; when Prelates daſhed againſt Prelates, and the people raiſed factions againſt the people; and when unſpeakable hypocriſie and diſſimulation had arrived to the height of miſchief, then did the divine vengeance, as it takes delight to do, gently begin to viſit us (the multitudes [of the faithful] as yet meeting in their aſſemblies) by degrees and with moderation; the perſecution being firſt begun with thoſe brethren who bore arms. But when we became inſenſible, and entertained not the leaſt thought of propitiating and appeaſing the Deity; but, like ſome Atheiſtical perſons, ſuppoſing our affairs to be managed regardleſly and without any inſpection, we added impieties to impieties: when they, who ſeemed our paſtours, rejecting the ſanctions of Religion, were inflamed with mutual contentions, ſtudying nothing elſe but the augmenting of ſtrifes, menaces, emulation, envy, and mutual hatred, and [g] greedily challenging to themſelves the preeminence, as if it were a dominion: then forthwith (according to the expreſſion uttered by Jeremiah) * the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger, and caſt down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Iſrael, and remembred not his footſtool in the day of his anger: The Lord hath drowned all the beauty of Iſrael, and thrown down all his ſtrong holds. And, as it is predicted in the Pſalms, † He hath made void the covenant of his ſervant, and profaned his ſanctity in the earth, to wit, by the deſtruction of the Churches. He hath broken down all his hedges, he hath made his ſtrong holds fear. All the multitudes of the people that paſs by the way ſpoil him; and further, he is a reproach to his neighbours. For he hath exalted the right hand of his enemies, and hath turned away the edge of his ſword, and hath not aſſiſted him in the war. But he hath put an end to his purification, and hath broken his throne by caſting it to the ground. The days of his life hath he ſhortned, and laſtly covered him with ignominy.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Ruine of the Churches.

ALL theſe [predictions] were [a] fully compleated in our times, when with our own eyes we ſaw both the houſes of prayer thrown down to the ground, even to their very foundations, and alſo the divine and ſacred Scriptures committed to the fire in the midſt of the Forum. [When we beheld] ſome paſtours of the Churches baſely hiding themſelves, ſome in one place, ſome in another; others of them ignominiouſly apprehended, and expoſed to the ſcorn of their enemies. When alſo, according to another prophetick expreſſion * contempt was poured upon Princes, and he cauſed them to wander in the wilderneſs where there was no way. But 'tis not our [deſign] to deſcribe thoſe ſad calamities which in concluſion befell them: for it is unfit for us to record their mutual diſſentions and folly before the perſecution. Wherefore we will relate no more concerning them, than whereby we may juſtifie the divine vengeance. We will not proceed therefore to mention thoſe who were [b] tryed by the perſecution, nor thoſe who wholly made ſhipwrack of their ſalvation, and were voluntarily precipitated into the gulfs of the deep: but we will in general inſert ſuch paſſages onely into this our Hiſtory, as may in the firſt place be profitable to our own ſelves, and in the next to poſterity. From hence then we will begin briefly to deſcribe the ſacred combats of thoſe who were Martyrs for the divine Religion. [c] It was the nineteenth

[a] In the Maz. M.S. the reading is δλ̃ον, omnino, wholly or fully. In the Kings M. S. and Robert Stephens's Edit. 'tis δλ̃η τῇ. The former is the better reading. At theſe words Chap. 2. begins in all our M. SS. and in Rufinus's old copy. Valeſ.

* Pſal. 107. 40. this quotation ſeems impertinent, Valeſ.

[b] Πεπειραμένων, tryed, experienced: for this term is uſed inſtead of πεπειρασμένων. St Paul uſes the word, Heb. 4. 15. where our tranſlation renders it tempted. 'Tis a metaphor taken from ſhips, ſet upon by Pirates at Sea; as the follwing words declare: theſe marine thieves are called Pirates ἀπὸ τῆς περιῤῥεῖν. Valeſ.

[c] So ſays Euſebius, in his Chronicon; and ſo alſo the Alexandrian Chronicle: with whom agrees Idatius (in faſtis) whoſe words are theſe; Diocletiano VIII. & Maximiano VII. his Coſſ. perſecutio Chriſtianorum: i. e. when Diocletian was the eighth time Conſul and Maximianus the ſeventh, the perſecution of the Chriſtians began. The ſame may be concluded from the Acts of Munatius Felix (in Geſt. apud Zenophilum Conſutarem Numidiæ.) According to Euſebius's account this was the 305 year from our Bleſſed Saviours nativity; but, according to the Dionyſian Æra, which we now make uſe of, it was the 303. But Baronius (in Annal.) and Petavius (in the ſecond part of his Rationar. Tempor.) affirms that the beginning of this perſecution muſt be placed on the 302 year of Chriſt; when Conſtantius IV. and Maximianus IV. Coſſ. Their opinion is grounded on one onely argument, to wit, the Acts of the Council of Cirta (a City in Numidia, afterwards called Conſtantina.) which Council Auguſtine (in Breviculo Collat.) affirms was convened the year after the perſecution began, and after the paſſion of the Martyrs. Now the Acts of that Council (which Auguſtine relates in the B. 3. againſt Creſconius) doe ſhew, that it was convened Diocletian VIII, and Maximianus VII, Coſſ. But this argument is eaſily anſwered. For there is a miſtake in thoſe Acts of the Council of Cirta; the true reading is, P. C. Diocletiani IX. and Maximiani VIII. This appears evidently ex Breviculo Collat Diei 3. cap. 17. where we meet with theſe words; Nam Geſta Martyrum quibus oſtendebatur tempus perſecutionis, Coſſ. geſta ſunt Diocletiano IX. & Maximiano VIII. pridie Idus Februarias: Geſta autem Epiſcopalia decreti Cirtenſis, poſt eorundem conſulatum, 3. Nonas Martias, &c. This paſſage cannot be ſuppoſed to be falſe. For Auguſtine adds there, that the Officers, being commanded by the Judge to ſee what diſtance of time there was between the paſſion of the Martyrs and the Council of Cirta, were deceived, and through their ignorance told him what was falſe. For whereas the Acts of the Martyrs were thus inſcribed [Diocletiano IX. and Maximiano VIII. pridie Idus Febr.] and the Acts of the Council of Cirta, thus [poſt conſulatum Diocletiani novies, & Maximiani octies, 3. Nonas Martias,] the Officers taking [poſt conſulatus] for [conſulatus] made anſwer, that there was onely one moneth between the Acts, both of the Martyrs, and of the Council. But there really was 13 moneths ſpace between them, as Auguſtinus truly affirms. ——There is another argument to evince, that the Council of Cirta was not convened in the eighth Conſulate of Diocletian.

Diocletian. For whereas that Council was assembled to Ordain a Bishop over the Church of Cirta, (as Augustinus affirms) I desire to know who was Ordained Bishop of that Church by those Bishops convened in that Council? Silvanus was not. For he in this very year was still Sub-deacon to Paul Bishop of Cirta, as 'tis apparent from the Acts of Munatius Felix. Answer perhaps will be made (as Baronius does) that Paul was made Bishop of Cirta. But this cannot be true, for the persecution began under Paul, as 'tis evident from the Acts, apud Zenophilum Consularem Numidiæ, which are related in Augustine's third book against Cresconius. See the place; and also Augustine's 165 Epistle. Thus much I have said (and could have said a great deal more) to evince that the Council of Cirta was convened 13 moneths after those Acts of the Martyrs of Africa; and therefore it could not be assembled in the eighth Consulate of Diocletian, and the seventh of Maximian; in which year the persecution began. Vales.

DIOCLETIAN year of Diocletians Empire, in the moneth [d] Dystrus, (which the Romans call March,) when (the festival of the salutiferous passion [e] approaching) the Imperial Edicts were proposed in all places, giving command that the Churches should be totally destroyed, and the Scriptures consumed by fire; and declaring that those who were elevated to any degree of honour should be rendred infamous; and [f] those that were private persons, if they persisted in a resolution of retaining the profession of Christianity, should be deprived of their liberty: such was the first Edict against us. But not long after, other Rescripts arrived; by which command was given, that all the Prelates of the Churches every where should first be put into bonds, and afterwards compelled to sacrifice by all ways imaginable.

[d] The Alexandrian Chronicle places the beginning of this persecution in the same moneth. But our Eusebius (in his B. concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, which is put as an Appendix to this 8th book of his Ecclesiastick History) says it began in the moneth Xanthicus, which the Romans call April. Vales.

[e] Theodoret (in book. 5. chap. 38. of his Ecclesiastick History) affirms, that the Edict for the demolishing of the Churches was proposed on the day of our Lords passion (i. e. Good-friday:) The Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle says it came forth on Easter-day; which was on the 25 of March: but Easter-day could not fall on the 25 of March in the 19 year of Diocletian, as Scaliger and Petavius have observed. Eusebius in his Chronicon, says it came forth in March, diebus paschæ. The Greek phrase here imports onely, that Easter was near at hand, when the Edicts were proposed: Εἰσελαυνούσης; Rufinus renders it, dies solennis paschæ imminebat, the solemn day of Easter was at hand. In the year of Christ 303 (according to the Dionysian Æra) Easter fell on the 18 day of April, amongst the Eastern Churches. Vales.

[f] Τὰς ἐν οἰκέσεως. Rufinus and Nicephorus supposed the servants of the Christians were hereby meant. But that cannot be the meaning of this place. For then the Imperial Edict would have been imperfect, providing onely for the apprehension of those who were honoured with any degree of preferment, and of servants, and leaving out the rusticks and ordinary sort of people. Besides, how can servants be said to be deprived of their liberty? Christophorson translates it privatos, private persons. I think he means the Actores and procuratores, who were servants to the richer sort of men. Zonaras expounds this place very well, thus, τοὺς δὲ τύχης ἰδιώτης Θ, persons of a private condition. Vales.

CHAP. III.

Concerning the various sorts of combats which [the Martyrs] underwent in the time of the Persecution.

FOrthwith therefore many Prelates of Churches, having endured most severe torments with great alacrity of mind, exhibited spectacles of most illustrious combats. Many others being prepossessed with a faintness of mind by reason of their fear, were immediately discouraged at the first attack made against them. Every one of the residue had their courses in various kinds of tortures. One was scourged all over his body with whips: another was rack't with tortures, and had his flesh scraped off with tormenting irons that were intolerable. Under which [torments] some made a lamentable conclusion of their lives; but others accomplished their combat after another manner. One, being forcibly thrust forward by others, and constrained to approach their impure and most nefarious sacrifices, was let goe as if he had sacrificed, although he really did not. Another (when he had neither approacht [the Altar,] nor toucht any thing that was execrable, yet because others said he had sacrificed) silently bore that calumny, and went his way. A third was taken up on their shoulders half dead, and cast forth as if he had been really so: a fourth lying upon the ground, was drawn a great way by the feet, and then accounted amongst them who had done sacrifice. One cried out, and with a loud voice attested, that he denyed to sacrifice: another exclaimed that he was a Christian, adorning himself with the confession of that salutary appellation. A third affirmed that he neither had, nor ever would sacrifice. But these being struck on the mouth by the Souldiers with their fists, (a great company of whom were placed there as a Guard) silenced, and [a] beaten on the face and cheeks, were by force thrust out. So highly did these enemies of piety every way esteem their being thought to have perfected what they desired! But these [proceedings] against the holy Martyrs did in no wise prove successful to them: whose [admirable courage] should we undertake accurately to set forth, what expressions would be sufficient to compose such a Narrative?

DIOCLETIAN

[a] I suppose he means the plumbatæ (i. e. instruments of torture made with lead) with which they beat the Martyrs on the face and cheeks. There is frequent mention of this sort of torture in the sufferings of the Martyrs. Our Authour had said before, that the Martyrs were beaten with the fists of the Souldiers. Here therefore he must mean these Plumbatæ: otherwise, what he says is a tautology. Vales.

CHAP. IV.

Concerning God's illustrious Martyrs; how they fill'd the world with their fame, having been adorned with divers crowns [of Martyrdom] for Religion.

FOr who should be able to make a relation of those infinite numbers [of Martyrs] who demonstrated an admirable alacrity of mind for the worship of the supream God; not onely from that time the persecution was raised against all the [Christians,] but long before, when the times were calm and serene? For some time since, when the [Devil,] [a] who hath received power over this world, was first rouzed as it were out of a profound sleep, and as yet made his attempts against the Churches in a secret and occult manner, after that interval which followed the persecution under Decius and Valerian: (for he would not set upon us closely and with an open War; but as yet made tryal onely of those who were engaged in the Milice; for he supposed the rest would easily be vanquished, could he first overcome them:) Then [I say] you might have seen very many of those who were Souldiers most willingly embracing a private life, rather than they would renounce the worship of the Creator of all things. For when the [Roman] [b] General (who he was it matters not) first set upon persecuting the Christian Souldiers, and began * to take a strict view of, and purge those that belonged to the army; permitting from that time begun by degrees.

[a] He means the Devil, who is said in the Gospel to be the Prince of this world. Vales.

[b] His name was Veturius; he was Magister Militum, the Master of the Camp, or Lieutenant-General of the Army: Concerning whom Eusebius in his Chronicon, at the 17 year of Diocletian says thus, Veturius Master of the Camp persecutes the Christian Souldiers; the persecution against us being Vales.

DIOCLETIAN them freely to chooſe, whether by obeying they would enjoy that degree of honour they were arrived to, or on the contrary be deprived of it, if they refuſed to comply with the [Emperours] commands: innumerable Souldiers of the Kingdom of Chriſt, without all delay or heſitancy, preferred their confeſſion of him, before the apparent glory and proſperity they were poſſeſt of. Some few of which (one or two) procured not onely the loſs of their preferment, but death alſo for their pious and reſolute ſtedfaſtneſs: * the framer of the conſpiracy [againſt our Religion] being at that time moderate, and preſumed to proceed to ſhed the bloud but of very few: the multitude of believers ('tis likely) terrified him, and made him afraid as yet to enter into an open War againſt them all. But when he prepared himſelf more manifeſtly for an engagement, it is impoſſible to relate how many and eminent Martyrs of Chriſt were viſible to the inhabitants of all Cities and Countries.

* He means the Devil, not the Roman General, as Chriſtophorſon ſuppoſed. Valeſ.

CHAP. V.

Concerning what was done at Nicomedia.

IMmediately therefore, upon the publiſhing of the Edict at Nicomedia againſt the Churches, [a] one who was no obſcure perſon, but eminently illuſtrious for fecular honour and eſteem, moved with a divine zeal, and incited by an ardent faith, took down [the Edict,] which was fixed up in the moſt open and publick place [of the City,] and [b] tore it, as being impious and moſt deteſtable: [which he did] whileſt two of the Emperours made their abode in that City; one of which was ſeniour to the reſt, and the other held the fourth place in the Empire. But this perſon, who was the firſt of the inhabitants of that City which appeared thus eminent and zealous, having ſuffered ſuch puniſhments, as were thought meet to be inflicted on him for ſuch a bold act, perſevered in an undiſturbedneſs and tranquility of mind to his very laſt gaſp.

[a] This perſon is called John in the Martyrology of Uſuardus, Ado, Notker, and in the old Roman Martyrology, at September 7. Valeſ.

[b] The Edicts and Reſcripts, of the Emperours were written in paper. Therefore Nilus, in his 264 Epiſtle, ſays it was barely called Charta; but after it had been ſubſcribed by the Emperour, it was called Sacra; which appears alſo from the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, and from Juſtinians Novells. Valeſ.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning thoſe who were converſant in the Imperial Palaces.

BUt that time produced theſe divine and glorious Martyrs, (which excelled all that ever were celebrated as admirable and famous for their courage, both among Grecians and Barbarians,) Dorotheus, and the other boys that were of the Bed-chamber to the Emperours. Who although they were accounted worthy of the higheſt ſtation of honour by their maſters, and were no leſs beloved by them than if they had been their own ſons; yet they ſuppoſed the reproaches and tortures for Religion, and thoſe various ſorts of deaths deviſed for them, to be really of greater value than the glory and pleaſure of this life. We will here relate what an exit one of them made, and leave the Readers to conjecture from him what befell the reſt. In the forementioned City, one of them was publickly brought forth before the foreſaid Emperours; and commanded to ſacrifice, which when he refuſed to do, DIOCLETIAN 'twas ordered he ſhould be ſtript and hoiſted up on high, and that his whole body ſhould be lacerated with ſtripes, until he ſhould yield, though againſt his will, to do what he was commanded: but when he continued immoveable after his ſuffering ſuch tortures as theſe, they mixed ſalt and vinegar together, and poured it (his bones being now laid bare) upon the putrified parts of his body. When he had undergone theſe tortures alſo, then fire and a gridiron was brought forth; and the remains of his body were laid on [and broiled,] like fleſh dreſſed to be eaten; not all at one time, but by little and little, that he might not end his life too ſoon: neither were thoſe perſons who laid him on the fire, permitted to leave him, till after ſo great [tortures,] he ſhould give his conſent to perform what he was commanded. But, having conſtantly perſevered in his reſolution, and gotten the victory, he expired under his very tortures. Such was the Martyrdom of one of thoſe boys who were of the Bed-chamber to the Emperours; being truly worthy of his name: for he was called [a] Peter. The [Martyrdom] of the reſt, although not at all inferiour to this, yet ſhall be omitted, leaſt our diſcourſe ſhould be too tedious. Thus much onely we will relate; that Dorotheus and Gorgonius (together with many others that were attendants at the Imperial palace) after various combats, having finiſhed their lives by being ſtrangled, obtained the rewards of a divine victory. At the ſame time Anthimus, the then Biſhop of the Church of Nicomedia, was beheaded for the teſtimony of Chriſt. With whom was joyned a great multitude of Martyrs. For in thoſe days, by what accident I know not, there happened a [b] fire in the Imperial palace at Nicomedia. Which being laid to our charge as the Authours thereof, by a report grounded on a falſe ſuſpicion; all ſorts of perſons that were the worſhippers of God in that [City] were deſtroyed by heaps, ſome with the ſword, and others by fire. At which time, report ſays, both men and women, excited by a divine and unſpeakable alacrity, leapt into the fiery pile. The executioners alſo, having bound another great company in Boats, caſt them into the abyſſes of the Sea. Moreover, the bodies of thoſe who were of the Bed-chamber to the Emperours, having been interred with decent funeral obſequies, they who were accounted their maſters, ſuppoſed it requiſite to dig up again, and caſt them into the Sea; leaſt ſome (as they thought) ſhould look upon them as Gods, and worſhip them [in after ages,] ſhould they be let alone to reſt in their graves. Such were the exploits performed at Nicomedia in the beginning of the perſecution. But not long after, when ſome attempted to poſſeſs themſelves of the Empire in the region called [c] Melitina, and others in [d] Syria:

[a] Concerning this Peter, Dorotheus, Gorgonius, and the others that were martyred, ſee the Acts of the ſuffering of Indes and Domna, at the 26. of December. Valeſ.

[b] There is an illuſtrious evidence of this fire, which happened at Nicomedia in the firſt year of the perſecution, in the 25 chap. of the Emperour Conſtantine's Oration, ad Cœtum Sanctorum. Valeſ.

[c] See B. 5. chap. 5. note (b.) concerning Melitina. There was a City, and a country called by this name in Armenia the leſs. But I never met with any thing concerning this tyrant, who ſeized the Empire in that region. Valeſ.

[d] He means Eugenius, who for ſome little time tyrannized in Syria. Libanius (in his Oration to Theodoſius, pag. 411; and in his Antioch. pag. 363.) tells the whole ſtory. Whereto may be annext a paſſage of the ſame Libanius's, out of his Oration to Theodoſius, concerning the Sedition at Antioch, pag. 399. There was a Tribune of Seleucia, by name, Eugenius, who had the command of 500 Souldiers. Theſe Souldiers were ordered to open the mouth and paſſage of the Haven.

Haven. When they had laboured day and night without any intermission; being much displeased at their task, they force their commander (Eugenius) to take the Empire upon him; threatning him with death unless he would give his assent. The Tribune being after this manner compelled, took the purple off the image of one of the gods, and was saluted Emperour. He goes forthwith to Antioch, (which then had no garrison in it) supposing that if he could possess himself of that City, it would much advance his designs: he makes himself master of that place about Sun-setting. But his Souldiers, agreeable to their usual irregularities, destroyed the Country as they marched, and stuft themselves with wine, and good cheer. Which being perceived by the Antiochians, they, despising the paucity and drunkenness of the Souldiers, killed them all with stones and weapons of all sorts, (the very women giving their assistance) and their Leader also, as he was going towards the palace: so that about the first watch none of them were left alive. But the Emperour, who ought to have expresst his thankfulness to the Antiochians, ordered the princes of the Antiochensian and Seleucensian Order should be slain, when as neither of them deserved any punishment. Amongst them the Grandfather of Libanius (a proper comely old man) was killed. All this I met with pag. 411 & 363. Moreover, Libanus (in Orat. ad Theodosium de seditione) tells us, the name of this Tribune of the Seleucensian Souldiers was Eugenius; and the name of the Emperour was Diocletian, whom he calls, by his true name, Diocles. Thus I have given you the name and History of the Tyrant; and the time when this Eugenius made his attempts on the Empire, Eusebius here declares, to wit, when Diocletian was the eighth, and Maximian the seventh time Coss. Vales.

DIOCLETIAN an Imperial Edict arrived, [commanding] that all the Governours of Churches every where should be bound and imprisoned. The sight of what was done after that, no expressions are sufficient to describe: when infinite multitudes were every where committed to custody; and the prisons in all places, which in former times had been provided for murderers and robbers of the dead, were then filled with Bishops, Priests, Deacons, Readers and Exorcists: insomuch that there was now no place left therein for those who had been condemned for their crimes. Again, when [c] another Edict followed the former, wherein it was commanded that those who were imprisoned, if they would offer sacrifice, should have their liberty to goe whither they pleased: but if they refused should be cruciated with a thousand tortures: the multitudes of martyrs in every Province cannot possibly be reckoned up, especially those [who suffered] in Africa, Mauritania, Thebais, and Egypt. Out of Egypt some went into other Citys, and Provinces, and were there adorned with glorious Martyrdoms.

[c] This was the third Edict of the Emperours against the Christians. By the first it was ordered the Churches should be ruined and the Scriptures burnt; and those who were honoured with any preferment (if they refused to sacrifice) should be deprived of their dignity; the meaner sort were to loose their liberty; see chap. 2. Another Edict soon followed this, that Bishops, Priests and Deacons should be imprisoned, and by all ways compelled to sacrifice. The third Edict comprehended all sorts of Christians, as well those of the Laity, as the Clergy; which Edict was proposed (says Eusebius in the chap. 3. of his book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine) in the second year of the persecution. But this seems rather to have been the fourth Edict: for the second and third concerned the Presbyters onely; by the second 'twas ordered they should be imprisoned, and by the third it was enjoyned, they should by tortures be compelled to sacrifice. Vales.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning those Egyptians [who suffered] in Phœnicia.

SOme of them, we knew, were famous [for their Martyrdoms] in Palestine; and others in Tyre a City of Phœnicia. Whom any one that had seen, could not but have been astonished at their innumerable stripes; at the courage and constancy of those truly [a] admirable champions of piety in suffering them; at their combat with wild beasts, accustomed to devour the bloud of mankind, which immediately followed their tortures with scourges; at their encounters in that combat with Leopards, *huge wild bears, fierce wild bores, and bulls, which were incited against them with fire and red hot iron; and lastly at the admirable patience of those couragious [Martyrs] in enduring [the Assaults] of each of those wild beasts. We our selves were present at the performance of these things, when we saw the divine power of our Saviour Jesus Christ (whom the Martyrs then bore witness of) present, and evidently manifesting it self to the Martyrs: [for] those ravenous beasts for a long time dared not to touch or approach the bodies of these [Martyrs] beloved by God. But they turned their fury upon others, to wit, those that were [b] infidells, who instigated and provoked them: but the sacred champions onely, who stood naked and by the motions of their hands irritated them against themselves, (for this they were enjoyned to do,) they did not so much as touch. Sometimes indeed they assailed them; but, as it were by some divine power, they were stopt, and retired back again: which hapning for a long time together, gave occasion of no small admiration to the spectatours; so that because the first beast performed not its assault, a second and a third was let loose upon one and the same Martyr: you would have admired the intrepid stedfastness of those sacred persons at the sight of all this, and that firm and immoveable fortitude of mind, which was in young and tender bodies: for you might have seen a youth, who had not yet compleated the twentieth year of his age, standing still without being bound; and (having stretcht forth his hands, in form of a Cross,) in an undisturbed and fearless temper of mind contending with the greatest earnestness in prayers to the divine Majesty, in no wise receding, or removing from the place he stood on; when the Bears and the Leopards, breathing forth rage and death, almost toucht his very flesh with their jaws. But their mouths were (after what manner I know not) bound fast as it were by a divine and unspeakable power, and they ran backward again. After such a manner as this did this person behave himself. Again, you might have seen others (for they were in all five in number) cast to an enrag'd Bull, who tore some of the Infidels that approacht him, tossing them into the air with his horns, and leaving them to be taken up half dead. But when he should have assailed the sacred Martyrs onely with rage and menaces, he could not approach them; but stamping on the ground with his feet, tossing his horns this way and that way, and breathing forth rage and menaces by reason of his being irritated with red hot irons, he was notwithstanding drawn backward by the assistance of divine providence. When therefore none of them was at all hurt by him, they let loose other wild beasts upon them. In fine, after these various and horrid assaults of the wild beasts;

[a] Τῶν ὡς ἀληθῶς θαυμαζέων, is the reading of the Maz. and Med. M. SS. accordingly we have rendered it of those truly admirable champions, &c. Those champions were termed paradoxi, who had gained many victories. See Peter Faber (in Agonistico) B. 3. pag. 603. Vales.

* Διαφόρων ἀγρίων; ferorum immanium; so Valesius renders it; and we have translated it huge, i. e. terrible, outragious wild bears.

[b] By [ἐξωθεν] the term which here occurs, Nicephorus (B. 7. chap. 7.) thought those were meant, who stood without the Arenæ of the Amphitheatre, and incited the wild-beasts by their clamours. But Rufinus supposed that the Arenarii were here spoken of, whose business it was to provoke the beasts: thus he renders the place, Verùm bestiæ illos ipsos qui ad instigandum mittuntur, incredibili velocitate discerpunt, But the beasts tare in pieces those with an incredible swiftness, who are sent in to provoke them. Christophorson thought that as well the Infidells, as those who stood without the arena were here meant. The same term occurs again in this chapter; we have rendred it in both places infidels. CHAP. VIII.

Concerning thoſe who [ſuffered] in Egypt.

SUch was the combat of thoſe Egyptians, who gloriouſly fought for Religion at Tyre: thoſe [Egyptians] alſo may be deſervedly accounted admirable, who ſuffered Martyrdom in their own country. Where infinite numbers of men (together with women and children) contemning this temporal life in reſpect of our Saviours doctrine, underwent various ſorts of death. Some of whom, after their fleſh had been torn off with torturing irons, after they had been rackt, moſt cruelly ſcourged, and [undergone] infinite other tortures, of different ſorts and horrible to be heard, were committed to the fire: others were drowned in the Sea. Otherſome cheartully offered their heads to be cut off by the Executioners: ſome died under their tortures: others were deſtroyed by famine. Again, others were crucified; ſome of them according to the uſual manner of crucifying malefactours, but others after a more cruel manner, being nailed to the Croſs with their heads downwards; and kept alive, until they died by famine on the very Croſſes.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning thoſe [who ſuffered] at Thebais.

BUT the pains and tortures, which the Martyrs underwent at Thebais, ſurmount all relation; who were torn all over their bodies, untill they expired, with [ſharp] ſhells inſtead of torturing irons. Women were tied by one of their feet, and drawn up on high into the air, with their heads downwards, by certain machines; and their bodies being naked and wholly uncovered, were made a moſt deteſtable, moſt cruel, and inhumane ſpectacle to all that lookt upon them. Again, others being bound to trees and boughs, were killed: For by certain engines they drew together the [two] ſtrongeſt boughs, and having faſtned the Martyrs legs to each of them, they ſuffered the boughs to return into their natural ſite, deſigning [thereby] to pull aſunder their members, againſt whom they had invented theſe [ways of death:] And all theſe things were performed, not for a few days, or during ſome ſhort time, but continued for the ſpace of whole years: ſometimes no more than ten, at other times above twenty in number, were deſtroyed: ſometimes not leſs then thirty; at others neer ſixty; and again, at another time, an hundred men, together with very ſmall children and women, were killed in one day, being condemned to various and interchangeable ſorts of puniſhments. We alſo our ſelves, being [a] converſant in thoſe places, ſaw very many [deſtroyed] together in one day; where-of ſome were beheaded; and others underwent the puniſhment of fire. Inſomuch that the Executioners ſword became blunt, and being rendred unfit for uſe, was broken; and the Executioners themſelves being tired, ſucceeded one another by turns. At which time alſo we beheld a moſt admirable ardour of mind, and a truly divine ſtrength and alacrity in thoſe who believed in the Chriſt of God. For no ſooner was ſentence pronounced againſt the firſt, but others ran haſtily from ſome other place before the Judges tribunal, and confeſt themſelves to be Chriſtians. They regarded not dangers, nor thoſe various ſorts of tortures; but with an undiſturbed fearleſneſs made a bold confeſſion of the worſhip of the ſupream God; and with joy, laughter and delight received their laſt ſentence of death; in ſuch ſort that they ſang, and to the very time of their expiration ſhouted forth hymns and thankſgivings in praiſe of God the maker of all things: ſuch admirable perſons were theſe. But theſe in a moſt eſpecial manner deſerved the greateſt admiration, who [although] eminent for riches, nobility, glory, eloquence and Philoſophy; yet preferred the true Religion, and the faith in our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt before all theſe. Of this ſort was Philoromus; a perſon that bore no ordinary office, was the Emperours [b] Rationaliſt at Alexandria; who together with his dignity and Roman honour, being attended with a guard of Souldiers, did daily exerciſe a judiciary power. Phileas alſo, Biſhop of the Church of the Thmuitæ; a perſon eminent for his diſcharge of the publick Offices and places of Magiſtracy in his own country; and famous for his Philoſophick ſtudies. Theſe two perſons (although they were intreated by very many of their relations and friends, and moreover by [c] perſonages of honour, yea notwithſtanding the [d] Judge himſelf beſought them to take pitty on themſelves, and have compaſſion on their wives and children, yet) could in no wiſe be induced by ſuch perſons as theſe, that (out of a deſire to preſerve their own lives) they ſhould contemn the laws [made] concerning the confeſſion and renunciation of our Saviour. But having ſtoutly bore up againſt all the menaces and contumelies of the Judge, with a manly and Philoſophick mind, or rather with a pious and religious heart, they were both beheaded.

[a] Hence it may be collected that Euſebius lived in Egypt; which is alſo atteſted by Theodorus Metochita, (in Collectan.) Where he ſays, that not onely the Egyptians but alſo all thoſe who lived in that country, uſed an intricate and obſcure ſtile in their writing. Amongſt which he reckons our Euſebius. Valeſ.

[c] The phraſe is [ἐπ' ἀξίας ἀρχόντων, i.e. the honourable Magiſtrates.] But [ἀρχόντων] ſhould be expunged: for, as I think, 'tis a Scholion added to explain what went before, οἱ ἐπ' ἀξίας does not ſignifie Magiſtrates, but perſonages of honour. Beſides, no body was ſtiled Ἄρχων, but the judge himſelf. Valeſ. See Valeſius's note on B. 14. of Amm. Marcellinus.

[d] In the Acts of the paſſion of Phileas this preſident is called Culcianus: he was Preſident of Thebais, ſays Epiphanius. Therefore Phileas ſuffered at Thebais, not at Alexandria, as ſome think. That which induced them to be of that mind, was a place in Euſebius's following chapter, where he quotes Phileas his Epiſtle, which he wrote to the Thmuitæ from Alexandria, a little before his ſuffering Martyrdom. But, being (as I ſaid) condemned by Culcianus Preſident of Thebais, 'tis manifeſt that he ſuffered there. Valeſ.

CHAP. X.

[a] The written informations of Phileas the Martyr concerning what was done at Alexandria.

[a] In the Med. and Maz. MSS. the title of this chap. is thus, [The written informations concerning what was done at Alexandria.] The title of the foregoing chapter is thus written [Phileas the Martyrs relation concerning thoſe who ſuffered at Thebais.] I doubt not but thoſe words [Phileas the Martyr] belong to the title of this chap. 10. For here Euſebius (out of Phileas's Epiſtle to the Thmuitæ) relates the Martyrdoms of the Alexandrians. Valeſ.

BUT becauſe we have ſaid that Phileas was a perſon worthy of great eſteem for his Grecian literature, let him be produced as a witneſs for DIOCLETIAN for himself; both to demonstrate what a person he was, and also to relate the Martyrdoms which in his time happened at Alexandria, which he will [declare] more accurately than we can, in these words:

[b] OUT OF PHILEAS'S EPISTLE TO THE THMUITÆ.

[b] These words should be Printed in Capital Letters. In the Kings M. S. they are disjoyned from the Text: In the Med. M.S. they are plac'd in the Margin: but in the Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. they are omitted. Vales.

"All these Examples, Prescripts, and good Documents being deposited for us in the divine "and sacred Scriptures, the blessed Martyrs, who "were conversant amongst us, without any delay "manifestly fixed the eye of their mind upon "the supream God, and willingly embracing "death upon account of piety, they steadfastly "adhered to their calling: for they found that "our Lord Jesus Christ had been incarnate for us, "that he might abolish all manner of sin, and "provide us with assistances for our entrance into "life eternal. For * he thought it not robbery to "be equal with God: but made himself of no repu-"tation, and took the form of a servant: And being "found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself unto "death, even the death of the Cross. Wherefore "the Martyrs (who were [c] full of Christ) zealously affecting the best gifts, "endured all manner of sorrow, and all sorts of tortures that could be invented, not onely once, but "some of them a second time also. And when "the Souldiers that were of the guard endeavoured with much earnestness [to strike a terrour] "into them, not onely by all manner of menaces "in words, but by deeds, they were in no wise "discouraged in mind, because * perfect love casteth "out fear. Whose fortitude and courage under "each torture what words would be sufficient to "relate? For, free leave being granted to all persons that would be injurious towards them, some "beat them with clubs, others with rods; others "some with scourges: again, some scourged them "with thongs of leather; others with ropes: "And the spectacle of these tortures was variously enterchanged, and full of malicious cruelty. For some [of the Martyrs] having their "hands bound behind them, were hung at an [d] Engin of wood, and every member of their bodies was distended by certain machines. After that, "the Tormentours, by command [of the Judge,] made use of [e] iron-nailes "to torture them with all over their bodies, which were applied not onely to their sides, as Murtherers are usually tormented, but also to their bellies, their legs, and to their cheeks. Others, being lifted up, were hung by one hand at a * Gallery, the stretching of whose joynts and members was a sharper pain to them than all sorts of tortures. Others were bound face to face to Pillars, their feet not touching the ground; that so their bonds being strained by the heaviness of their bodies, might with stretching be the closer drawn together: and this they endured not "ouly as long as the Governour talked with them, "and was at leisure to hear them; but almost a "whole day together: for when he went away "[to hear] others, he left [f] Officers, that were "impowred by him, to be watchfull over the former [Martyrs,] whether any one of them, "being overcome by the sharpness of his tortures, "would seem to abandon "his resolution. He also "commanded they should "be [g] strained with bonds "without any commiseration, and afterwards, when "they were dead, that they "should be thrown on the "ground, and drag'd up and down. For they "ought not [he said] to take the least care of "us; but that all persons should so think of, and "behave themselves towards us, as if we were "not men. This [h] second torture (after they "had beaten us with stripes) "our Adversaries invented. "There were some also, "who after they had been "scourged, lay in the "[i] stocks, both their feet being stretched to the fourth "hole; in so much that they were forced to lie "in the stocks with their bellies upwards, being "unable to stand because of their fresh wounds, "caused by the stripes, which they had all over "their bodies. Others threw themselves upon the "ground, where they lay by reason of the innumerable wounds made by their tortures; yielding a more miserable spectacle to those that "lookt on them, than in the very time of their "being tortured; and bearing in their bodies the "various and different sorts of tortures invented "for them. These things being thus performed, "some [of the Martyrs] expired under their "tortures, having made the adversary ashamed by "their persevering constancy. Others, being half "dead, were shut up in prison, where having "been sorely afflicted with the smart of their "wounds, they ended their lives not many days "after. The residue having been refreshed with "methods of cure, became more stout and confident by time, and their abode in prison. Therefore, when afterwards command was given, that "they should choose, whether by touching the "detestable sacrifices they would free themselves "from all molestation, and obtain from them an "execrable liberty; or whether, refusing to sacrifice, they would receive the sentence of death: "without any delay they chearfully proceeded "forth to death. For they well knew what was "before prescribed to us by the sacred Scriptures: "for * he (says the word of God) that sacri- * Exod. 22. 20.
"ficeth to other Gods, shall be utterly destroyed. And "again, † Thou shalt have no other Gods, but me. † Exod. 20. 3.
Such were the expressions of [Phileas] the Martyr, (a true Philosopher, and also a sincere lover of God,) which he sent to the Brethren of his Church, before his last sentence of condemnation, being yet in prison: whereby he informed them both in what condition he was in; and also exhorted them stifly to retain their piety in Christ after his death, which was now approaching. [k] But what need we spend many words in relating [c] Χειστοφόροι μάρτυρες, i. e. Martyrs full of Christ: So Ignatius Bishop of Antioch, was called Θεοφόρος, i. e. full of God. Vales.

[d] Περὶ τὸ ξύλον. I suppose he means the Eculeus; on which Offenders were hung, and had their sides torn with iron-nailes. Vales.

[e] Ἀμυσλήεια (the term here) seems to signifie some thing more than iron-nailes. For Hesychius interprets ἀμυσλήειον by ξίφος δίστομον, a two-edged sword. Note here the cruelty of the Judges; who were not contented with iron-nailes onely, but used knives also, or razours, with which they cut the sides of the Martyrs. Vales.

* Ἀπὸ τῆς στοᾶς, στοὰ signifies, a Porch, Gallery, or walking place under-propped with Pillars; in such Philosophers taught and disputed: the Stoicks had their name from hence: Ἀπὸ τῆς στοᾶς Φιλόσοφοι.

[f] He means the Apparitours or Officers, who were under the Præfectus Augustalis; concerning whom Phileas speaks in this Epistle, and calls him ἡγεμόνα, the Governour. The name of the Præfectus Augustalis at that time was Hierocles, as Epiphanius says, in Hæres. Melitian. Vales.

[g] The phrase in the original is τοῖς δεσμοῖς πεσιτένειν; which to me seems a new and uncouth expression. Vales.

[h] That is, the dragging of the bodies up and down: the first sort of torture was by stripes and scourges; the second was, that they were laid on the ground, drag'd about, and so drawn into prison. Vales.

[i] See B. 4. Chap. 16. note (c.)

[k] After these words Christophorson has inserted many Chapters, out of that Appendix which Robert Stephens has published at the latter end of this Eighth Book. But that Appendix is an entire Book, and separated from this work, to wit, the Ecclesiastick History; in which Eusebius describes the sufferings of the Palestine Martyrs, and especially the passion of his friend Pamphilus.

Pamphilus. Some ſtudious perſon added this book to the eighth book of the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, becauſe their Subjects were very like; whoſe Copy the Tranſcribers afterwards following, placed it in their Copies. In all the M. SS. which I could ever yet ſee, this book is extant after the end of B. 8. in ſuch manner as Robert Stephens publiſh't it. Chriſtophorſon therefore did ill, and contrary to the authority of all Copies, to put this book in here, as if it had been part of the Eighth book of the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. Muſculus was more prudent, who (following Stephens's Edition in his Verſion) tranſlated the eighth book as he found it in the Greek, and wholly omitted this Appendix: which neither Ruſinus, nor Nicephorus ſeem to have found in their Copies. Beſides, the Titles of the Chapters of Book 8. (which, as uſually, are prefixt before it) were ſufficient to have put Chriſtophorſon in mind, that this Appendix did in no wiſe belong to the Eighth Book. Valeſ.

Concerning what was done in Phrygia.

FOr at that time ſome armed Souldiers inveſted a whole City of Chriſtians, that was very populous, in [a] Phrygia, and, having ſet it on fire, burnt the men (together with the women and children) whilſt they called upon Chriſt the ſupream God. The reaſon hereof was this, the whole body of inhabitants of that City, the [b] Curator, the [c] Duumvir, together with all the reſt who were of the Magiſtracy, and all the common people, profeſſing themſelves to be Chriſtians, would in no wiſe obey thoſe that commanded them to ſacrifice to Idols. Another perſon alſo, by name [d] Adauctus, (a man deſcended from a noble family in Italy, that had obtained a Roman dignity, a perſon that had paſſed through all degrees of honour in the Palace of the Emperours, in ſo much that he had faithfully diſcharged the Office of [e] Receiver General, which amongſt them is called The [f] Maſter of the private Revenue, and that of Rationaliſt; beſides all this, he was famous for his virtuous performances in Religion, and for his confeſſions of the Chriſt of God,) was adorned with the crown of Martyrdom, having undergone the conflict upon account of Religion, whilſt he bore the Office of Rationaliſt.

[a] Lactantius tells the ſame ſtory, in his book 5. Inſtitut. Divinar. chap. 11. where he treats concerning the injuſtice of the Judges, or Rulers of Provinces, who puniſhed the Chriſtians: alii (ſays he) ad occidendum præcipites extiterunt, ſicut unus in Phrygia, qui univerſum populum cum ipſo pariter conventiculo concremavit; i. e. others were very haſty to murther [the Chriſtians] as was one in Phrygia, who burnt all the inhabitants, together with the place they dwelt in, at one and the ſame time. Valeſ.

[b] The Curator of the City was he, who lookt after the Treaſure, and what ever elſe in generall belonged to the revenue of the City; this is manifeſt from the Pandects of the Law; he is alſo called Logiſta (from the Greek word λογιστὴς, which is the term here in the original,) in Lege 3. Cod. de modo multandi. Hence [λογιστεύειν] was uſed to ſignifie the performance of the Curators Office, or place. See Valeſius's notes on Ammian. Marcellinus, pag. 36.

[c] Στεφανὸς, is the term in the original; which the Latines called Magiſtratus, or Duumvir; 'tis taken in this ſenſe throughout the whole title Cod. Theod. de Decurionibus: & in Optatus, Lib. 1. &c. in which places (and in many others) Magiſtratus and Duumvir are promiſcuouſly uſed. The chief Magiſtrate amongſt the Corinthians, Rhodians, Tarſenſes, Epheſians, and Philippians, was called στρατηγὸς; and alſo amongſt the Athenians the στεφανηφόροι got the Precedency and chief place, the name of ἄρχοντες being ſuppreſſed: See Cicero in Book 5. Epiſt. 11. ad Atticum. Laſtly in all Grecian Cities it was at length cuſtomary to call the chief Magiſtrates Strategi; as 'tis manifeſt from the old Coyns and marbles. See Valeſius's his notes on Amm. Marcellinus, B. 31. pag. 423, 424.

[d] In the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savill. M. SS. this perſon's name is Ἀδαυκτὸς, Adauctus: ſo Ruſinus and Cedrenus wrote his name alſo. This perſon is mentioned in the Greek Menæum, on the third of October. There was at the ſame time another Adauctus, who ſuffered Martyrdom at Rome, and is mentioned at the ſeventh of February Valeſ.

[e] He means the Procuratour, or Steward of the Revenue. Ruſinus renders this place thus; rationes ſummarum partium adminiſtrans; which is truly tranſlated. Valeſ.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning many other men and women, who ſuffered Martyrdom in a various and different manner.

WHat need is there now of mentioning the reſt by name, or of recounting the multitude of men, or delineating the various ſorts of tortures [endured by] the admirable Martyrs of Chriſt? Part whereof were beheaded, as it happened to thoſe in Arabia; and part were [killed] by having their legs broken, as it befell thoſe in Cappadocia. Some, being hung up on high by the feet with their heads downwards, (a [a] ſlow fire having been kindled under them,) were ſuffocated with the ſmoak that aſcended from the combuſtible matter ſet on fire, ſo it befell thoſe in Meſopotamia: others had their noſes, the tips of their ears, and their hands cut off, and the other members and parts of their bodies were mangled, as it happened at Alexandria. What need is there of renewing the remembrance of what was done at Antioch? where ſome were broyled on [b] Grid-irons ſet over the fire, not till they were killed, but that their puniſhment might be prolonged: others were more ready to thruſt their right hands into the fire, than to touch the impious ſacrifices. Whereof ſome, avoiding the being put to the teſt [whether they would ſacrifice,] before they would be apprehended and fall into the hands of thoſe that laid wait for them, threw themſelves headlong from the tops of high houſes, having accounted death to be a gain, becauſe of the malitiouſneſs of the impious. Alſo, a certain holy woman, (admirable for her virtuous ſoul, and [her comely] body, eminently famous, beyond all at Antioch, for riches, deſcent, and reputation,) had educated two daughters (virgins that were eminent for beauty, and in the flower of their age) in the precepts of Religion: when many, moved thereto by envy, uſed all manner of induſtry in inquiring out the place where they abſconded; and it being at length underſtood they lived in a forrein country, they were with much diligence ſummoned to Antioch: after the woman knew, that ſhe and her daughters were now incompaſſed with the Souldiers nets, perceiving her ſelf and daughters reduced to an inextricable ſtate of perill, ſhe exhorted the virgins, expreſly declaring to them the miſchiefs that would befall them from the Souldiers, and that of all evils, raviſhment was the moſt intollerable, the menaces whereof it was unlawfull for them to endure even to hear: Moreover, having ſaid, that to yield up their ſouls to the ſervice of devils, was worſe than all ſorts of death, and all manner of deſtruction; there was but one way (ſhe declared) to avoid all theſe evils, which was to flie to the Lord for refuge. Immediately after theſe words, having all agreed to embrace the ſame advice, they adorned their bodies

[a] Such a fire is that, which is made of ſtraw and ſmall ſprigs of trees. It is called a ſlow, or ſlack fire, to difference it from the ἄσβεστον πῦρ, the unquenchable fire, which we took notice of before. This fire was kindled at ſome diſtance, that ſo the Martyrs might be choakt with the ſmoak, rather than burnt. Pionius the Martyr ſeems to have been killed by ſuch a fire, as his Acts do atteſt. Seneca (in his third book De Irâ) ſeems to mention this ſort of puniſhment, in theſe words, Et circundati defixis corporibus ignes. Valeſ.

[b] Ruſinus tranſlates ἐσχάραις, which is the term here, grid-irons: So alſo the Old Gloſs renders this term. Valeſ.

DIOCLETIAN bodies with a decent dress: when they had gone [c] half their journey, having intreated their guard for a short recess out of the way, and that being granted them, they threw themselves into a River which ran hard by: thus these persons [drowned] themselves. At the same City of Antioch, another pair of virgins, in all points divine, and truly Sisters, eminent for descent, splendid as to estate, in the flower of their age, beautifull in body, chast of mind, pious in their conversations, admirable for their industry, (as if the earth were unable to bear so great [an ornament,]) were, by the command of the worshippers of Demons, cast into the Sea. These things were done amongst those [at Antioch.] But 'tis horrid to hear the relation of what others suffered in Pontus: some had sharp reeds thrust up the fingers of both their hands from the very tops of their nailes: others had melted l ad poured upon their backs, even whilst the melted metall boiled, which [ran down and] burnt the most [d] necessary parts of their bodies: again, others without any commiseration endured obscene tortures (which are unfit to be related) in their privy members, and bowels; which those * couragious and just judges invented with much earnestnes and labour, demonstrating thereby the acutenes of their wit, as if the very power and strength of wisdom [consisted in such cruell inventions:] and striving continually (as if it had been for rewards in a combat) to outdo one another in finding out new sorts of tortures. These calamities therefore were not ended, till such time as [the Judges,] despairing of making any further addition to these miseries, wearied with slaughters, filled and satiated with the effusion of bloud, betook themselves to the thoughts of clemency and humanity, that in future they might seem to invent no further cruelty against us. For it was unfit (they said) to pollute the Cities with the bloud of their inhabitants, and to defame the government of the Emperours (which was benign and gentle towards all persons) by so [e] superlative a cruelty: but that rather it was fit, that the humanity and beneficence of the Imperial authority should be extended to all persons, and that [the Christians] should not any longer be punished with death, in regard those of our Religion were exempted from such punishment by the indulgence of the Emperours. At that time therefore [f] command was given to pluck out the eyes [of the Christians] and that they should have one of their legs lamed. For such was their civility towards us, and this seemed to them the most gentle punishment [that could be inflicted] on us. In so much that, upon acount of this lenity used by these impious wretches [towards us,] it is impossible to give in any further account of the multitudes (which indeed are altogether innumerable) both of them who had their right eyes first thrust out with a sword, and after they had been thus prickt out, their [eye-holes] were seared with a red-hot iron; and also of those, who had their left legs (as far as the bending of their knees) made useless by being seared with hot irons: after which they were condemned to the brazen mines which were in the Province, not so much for the service they could do, as upon account of the affliction and misery they should [endure there.] Besides all these, there were many others, who were assaulted with several sorts of combats, which 'tis not possible to give a catalogue of; for their couragious exploits do surpass all relation. Therefore, the noble Martyrs of Christ, having obtained great renown over the whole world in these [g combats,] did both deservedly amaze every where the spectatours of their courage; and also exhibit in themselves manifest tokens of the truly divine and [h] inexplicable power of our Saviour. Indeed, the mention of every particular person of them by name, would be very tedious, if not a thing impossible.

[c] There may be a double meaning given of these words. For we may either understand that these women had gone one half of their journey; in which sense Nicephorus took the words: or that they stood on a bank which was in the middle of the highway. Concerning the Martyrdom of these sort of Christian women (who drowned themselves for the preservation of their Chastity and Religion,) see St August. De Civitat. Dei, book 1. chap. 26. There is extant an encomium of these women in the first Tome of Chrysostome, where the mother is called Domnina, and the daughters Bernice and Prosdoce. The Antiochians, celebrated their Martyrdom on the 20 day after the Feast of the holy Cross; the Greeks placed their Birth-day on Oct. 4. Vales.

[d] Τὰ ἀναισχύντα τοῦ σώματος; which Rufinus translates elegantly, usque ad loca pudenda quibus naturalis egestio procurari solet. The Grecians call [ἀναίσχυντον] that part of the body, which modesty forbids to be named. Vales.

* Ironically spoken.

[e] The Med. Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. read [πλὴν ἀνωτάτω,] superlative. Vales.

[f] Rufinus says an Edict of the Emperour was set forth, whereby such a sort of punishment was commanded thenceforth to be inflicted on the Christians: But I think this not to be true. For the Magistrates themselves, being overcome by the constancy of the Christians, at length betook themselves to this sort of punishment on their own accord. Vales.

[g] You must understand [ἀγῶσι, combats;] for he had spoken concerning these just before. Christophorson translated these words ill, thus [at this time;] and from them began a new Chapter. Vales.

[h] The term here is [ἀπορρήτου, secret.] It seems to be used for [ἀῤῥήτου, inexplicable;] in which sense Eusebius does frequently use it. But if any one will translate it [secret,] I shall not withstand it. Vales.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning those Prelates of the Church who demonstrated the sincerity of the Religion they asserted by [the effusion] of their own bloud.

NOw, of those Ecclesiastick Prelates, who suffered Martyrdom in the most eminent Cities, the first that must be commemorated in the monuments of the pious, may be Anthimus, a witnes of Christs kingdom, Bishop of Nicomedia, who was beheaded in that City. But, of the [a] Antiochian Martyrs [we will mention] Lucianus a Presbyter of that Church, a person most eminent [for sanctity] throughout his whole life: he at first made a declaration of the celestiall kingdom of Christ in words, and by an Apologetick oration, at Nicomedia, in the presence of the Emperour; and afterwards he [asserted it] in deeds and reall performances. But the most eminent Martyrs in Phœnice (which were most acceptable to God, and Pastours of Christ's flock) were Tyrannio Bishop of the Church at Tyre, and Zenobius a Presbyter at Sidon; also Silvanus Bishop of the Churches at Emisa. This [Prelate last named] being, together with some others, cast as food to the wild-beasts at the very City of Emesa, was received into the number of the Martyrs. Both the other rendred the doctrine of the divine faith famous at Antioch, by their most patient suffering [of tortures] untill their deaths; [Tyrannio] the Bishop was drowned in the depths of the Sea; and Zenobius (a most incomparable Physitian) died couragiously under the tortures, which were applied to his sides. Amongst the Martyrs of Palestine, Silvanus Bishop of the Churches at Gaza, [a] Instead of [ἥν δ' ἐπ' ἀντιοχείας, the martyrs at Antioch] in Nicephorus the reading is [ἥν δὲ ἀπ' ἀντιοχείας, the Martyrs of Antioch,] which doubtless is truest. For Lucianus suffered not at Antioch, but at Nicomedia, as Eusebius attests in this place; to whom agree Jerom [in Catalog.] Rufinus, and Nicephorus. The same is confirmed by Lucianus himself in the Epistle he wrote to the Antiochians, when he was (together with some other Martyrs) in prison at Nicomedia. The last words of this Epistle are extant in the Alexandrian Chronicle, at the first year of the persecution. Vales.

DIOCLETIAN was, together with nine and thirty others, beheaded at the mines of braſs, which are in Phæno. Alſo Peleus and Nilus, Ægyptian Biſhops, together with ſome others, were burnt to death at the ſame place. Amongſt which number we muſt in no wiſe omit the mention of Pamphilus the Presbyter, the moſt admirable perſon in our age, and the greateſt ornament of the Church at Cæſarea: whoſe fortitude and courageous exploits we [b] will declare at a fit and convenient opportunity. [Moreover,] of thoſe who were perfected by a glorious Martyrdom at Alexandria, throughout all Egypt, and Thebais, the firſt to be mentioned is Peter, Biſhop of Alexandria, a moſt divine teacher of the Chriſtian Religion; alſo, Fauſtus, [c] Dius, and Ammonius (perfect Martyrs of Chriſt) who were his Presbyters. Beſides, Phileas, Heſychius, Pachumius, and Theodorus, Biſhops of Churches in Egypt. Moreover, there were many other eminent [Martyrs] who have an honourable mention among the Churches that are in thoſe places and Countries. But our [deſign] is not to commit to writing the conflicts of all thoſe who ſuffered for the worſhip of God over the whole world, nor yet to give in an accurate relation of every accident that befell them; but of thoſe rather, who with their own eyes beheld what was done. Moreover, thoſe [conflicts] our ſelves were preſent at, we will commit to the knowledge of poſterity in [d] another work: But in this preſent book I will annex to what has been declared a revocation of what had been practiſed againſt us, and the accidents that happened from the very beginning of the perſecution, which will be moſt uſefull to the Readers. Therefore, before the war [was denounced] againſt us, (during the time that the Emperours were friendly and peaceable towards us,) [e] how great a felicity and plenty of all that is good the Roman Empire was dignified with, what words can be ſufficient to declare? At which time, thoſe, in whoſe hands the ſupream power was, having compleated the tenth and twentieth year of their Empire, lead their lives in a firm and continued peace, [ſpending the time] with feſtivities, publick ſhews, moſt ſplendid banquets, and delights. When their Empire was after this ſort enlarged without any manner of impediment, and daily augmented with an increaſe of greatneſs, on a ſudden they revoked the peace with us, and raiſed a perfidious war [againſt us.] The [f] ſecond year of this war was not compleated, when a new and unexpected accident ſubverted the ſtate of affairs almoſt throughout the whole [Roman] Empire. For, [g] He that had the precedency amongſt the foreſaid Emperours, (having been viſited by an unfortunate diſeaſe, which drave him into a diſordered and mad temper of mind,) betook himſelf to a private and Country life, together with that [Emperour] who was the next in dignity to him. Theſe affaires were no ſooner tranſacted after this manner, but the whole Roman Empire was [h] divided into two parts; which, as it has been reſome few moneths before he reſigned it, it muſt be ſaid he triumpht about January, in the year of Chriſt 304, and put off his purple on the Kalends of April of the ſame year; which time of his Reſignation, Idatius declares (in Faſtis.) Whence it follows, that he triumpht in winter time, and in the depth of winter travelled from Rome to Nicomedia; neither of which is probable. For neither did the Roman Emperours uſually triumph in winter; nor was Diocletian (by reaſon of his age and infirmity of body) able to endure the trouble of ſo tedious a journey. Beſides, in the nineteenth year of his Empire, in March and April, Diocletian was at Nicomedia; at which time the perſecution againſt the Chriſtians began, as our Euſebius atteſts in chap. 5. book 8. He was at Nicomedia alſo, when the Palace there was burnt; (as Conſtantine witneſſeth in his Oration ad ſanctorum cœtum, chap. 25.) which fire happened ſome moneths after the perſecution was began. Let us therefore ſuppoſe, that that happened in May, is it credible that Diocletian could goe from Nicomedia to Rome, triumph there, return from thence to Nicomedia, put off his purple there, and retire into Dalmatia to lead the reſt of his life in retirement there: is it (I ſay) credible he could do all this within ten moneths ſpace? Beſides, the diſeaſe, by which Diocletian was for ſome time put out of his wits, ſeized him firſt at Nicomedia, a little after he raiſed the perſecution, as Conſtantine relates. Wherefore, 'tis very improbable, that Diocletian, troubled with ſuch a diſtemper, undertook ſuch a long journey. Further, the Authour of the panegyrick ſpoken to Maximian and Conſtantine, does expreſly affirm, that Diocletian and Maximian triumphed at Rome ſome years before the twentieth of Diocletian's Empire; ſee his words. Scaliger therefore is much miſtaken, in ſaying Diocletian and Maximian triumphed in the twentieth year of Diocletian's Empire: Hieronymus, more truly, placed it on the eighteenth of Diocletian. In which year Idatius (in Faſtis) obſerves, that the Emperours gave command by their Edict that Corn ſhould be ſold cheap; which ſeems to have been ordered by them after the triumph, to pleaſe the people of Rome. But Cedrenus places this triumph on the ſeventeenth year of Diocletian. Valeſ.

[b] To wit, in the book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, which is placed after this eighth B. For in that Euſebius at large declares the Martyrdom of Pamphilus, as may there be ſeen. Moreover, from this place it appears, that that book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine was written by Euſebius after his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, and after his books concerning the life of Pamphilus the Martyr. Chriſtophorſon (who had inſerted that whole Appendix before this chapter) was forced to omit theſe words of Euſebius here, leaſt Euſebius ſhould ſeem to have forgot himſelf. I muſt indeed confeſs, that in the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. the reading is [ἀνεγεφάλαιῶ, we have declared;] but if that reading be true, Euſebius muſt mean his books concerning the life of Pamphilus the Martyr; which (as before we obſerved) he wrote before his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. Valeſ.

[c] In the Maz. & Med. M. SS. this perſon is called Dius; in Robert Stephens he is named Didius. Valeſ.

[d] He means doubtleſs his book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine. For no other book but that can be found, wherein Euſebius relates the conflicts of the Martyrs which he himſelf had ſeen. The opinion of Chriſtophorſon is from this paſſage further diſproved, who ſuppoſed the book Concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine was part of this eighth book: upon which account, after theſe words [in another work] he omitted ſome words, and inſerted others, againſt the authority of all Copies. Turnebus was ſenſible hereof, and therefore at the margin of his copy he put this Greek Scholion at theſe words, [Σημείωσον ὅτι παύτῳ ἔχεις πῶ γεγρῆν ἐυθὺς ὧ τῶτο τὸ βιβλίου, i. e. note, that you will meet with this writing immediately after this eighth book. Valeſ.

[e] How great the felicity of the Roman Empire was, in the reign of Diocletian and Maximian, Mamertinus atteſts in his Genethliacum, about the latter end. Neither did the Romans ever ſucceed more proſperouſly in their wars againſt the Barbarians, than at that time. The Barbarians were in every engagement ſlain, and the limits of the Roman Empire enlarged. If we read the Hiſtories of thoſe times, we ſhall find that the affairs of the Empire were never in a better poſture; when four Princes, to wit, two Auguſti, and as many Cæſar's, did each of them ſeverally repell the Barbarians. But although Diocletian and Maximian obtained ſo many victories over the enemies of the Roman Empire; yet they triumphed but once, a little before they reſigned the Empire. as Eutropius and Zonaras do atteſt. The words of Eutropius are theſe; uterque una die privato habitu imperii inſigne mutavit; Nicomediæ Diocletianus, Herculius Mediolani, poſt triumphum inclytum, quem Romæ ex numeroſis gentibus egerant, pompa ſerculorum illuſtri, &c. Hieronymus (in his Chronicon) has placed this triumph of Diocletian and Maximian on the eighteenth year of Diocletian. At which place Scaliger (in his Animadverſions) remarques, that Hieronymus has committed an Anachroniſm. For he ſays, this triumph was performed on the twentieth year of Diocletian, ſome months before he put off his purple. But Scaliger himſelf is miſtaken rather than Hieronymus. For if Diocletian triumphed in the twentieth year of his Empire, that is [f] Euſebius had better have ſaid, the firſt year was ſcarce compleated. For this Reſignation of the Empire, made by Diocletian and Maximian, happened about the beginning of the ſecond year of the perſecution, on the Kalends of April, in the year of Chriſt 304. the perſecution having been begun in the moneth of March of the foregoing year. Whenas therefore Euſebius ſays [the ſecond year of this war was not compleated,] his meaning muſt be this [it was the ſecond year current of the perſecution:] in this ſenſe that other place of Euſebius (which occurs in chap. 3. of his B. concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, about the end of the chapter,) is to be taken Valeſ.

[g] Chriſtophorſon tranſlates theſe words [πῶ πρωτοσάλη πρῶ εἰρημένων] thus, primus noſtrarum ærumnarum auctor, the firſt authour of our ſorrows; which verſion is not good: but he ſeems to have followed Nicephorus herein; who (in B. 7. chap. 16.) writes out this paſſage of Euſebius; and inſtead of his words here ſet down, uſes theſe [τῶ ἀρχηγῶ τῆς κακίας, the authour of our miſchief.] Valeſ.

[h] For Conſtantius and Galerius parted the Empire between themſelves: which was the firſt diviſion of the Empire, as Euſebius here aſſerts. For although there had been more than one Auguſtus at the ſame time, yet they governed the Roman Empire together, without making any diviſion of it; thus it was in the Reign of Marcus and Verus. Neither was there any diviſion made of the Empire in the reign of Diocletianus and Herculius Maximianus; when thoſe two Auguſti parted neither the provinces, nor the legions. See Eutropius, B. 10. Oroſius B. 7. Concerning this diviſion of the Empire (which Rome was much diſpleaſed at) Porphyrius (in his Panegyrick to Conſtantine, written by him in the 15th year of Conſtantine's reign,) ſpeaks theſe words,

Lacerata cruentis
Imperii pars feſſa poli, diviſa gemebat
Sceptra, & Auſoniæ marebat perdita jura. Valeſ.

corded, was an accident that never happened before. Within some small interval of time, the Emperour Constantius (a person of extraordinary mildness throughout his whole life, most favourable to his subjects, and one that had a singular affection for the divine doctrine [of our Religion,] ended his life according to the common sanction of nature, leaving his own Son Constantine Emperour and Augustus in his stead. And he was the [i] first that was deified amongst the [Romans,] being after his death vouchsafed all honours due to an Emperour. He was the mildest and most benigne of all the Emperours: and moreover, he onely person of those Princes in our days, that passed over the whole time of his government sutably to his Imperial Majesty: he behaved himself with the greatest graciousness and candour imaginable towards all persons, both in other matters; and also was in no wise a confederate in the war raised against us, but preserved those worshippers of God, that lived under his government, free from harm and injuries: and, having neither demolished the fabricks of the Churches, nor attempted any other new design against us, he obtained an [k] honourable and thrice-happy conclusion of his life: being the onely person [of all the four Emperours] that ended his life in his Imperial government fortunately and gloriously, [leaving] his own Son (a most prudent and pious Prince) his successour. Constantinus, Son to this man, being immediately from the very time [of his fathers death] proclaimed supream Emperour and Augustus by the Souldiers, (but long before that by the supream God) exhibited himself an emulatour of his fathers piety towards our Religion. Such a person was he: afterwards Licinius, by the common suffrage of the Emperours was declared Emperour and Augustus: at which Maximinus was sorely displeased, who untill that time had been honoured onely with the title of Cæsar [l] by all men. He therefore, being a person of a most tyrannical disposition, by violence possest himself of that dignity, and was by himself declared Augustus. About that time [Maximianus,] [m] whom we before manifested to have re-assumed the Empire after his resignation of it, being found to have contrived machinations in order to the death of Constantine, ended his life by a most infamous death: he being the [n] first, whose Monuments, Statues, and what ever else of that nature has been usually erected in honour of the Emperours, were abolished, upon account of his being a profane and most impious person.

[i] The meaning of his passage is not, that Constantius was the first Emperour that had the honour to be deified after his death: (for many Emperours, before Constantius, were by the Senate accounted amongst the number of the divi:) But that, of the four Emperours who governed the Empire together (to wit, Diocletianus, Maximianus, Constantius, and Galerius) Constantius was the first that obtained this honour; because he was the first of them four, that dyed. Vales.

[k] In the Kings M.S. the reading is [τέλον εὐδαίμονα, a fortunate end of his life:] but in the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. the words here are [τέλον ἐυδόκιμον καὶ τρισμακάριον, an honourable and thrice-happy conclusion of his life.] Vales.

[l] In the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. the reading is [μόνον Καίσαρα ὑπὸ πάντας εἰσέτι τότε χρηματίζοντα, honoured with the title of Cæsar onely, before (or, otherwise than) all the rest:] which reading is truer than [ὑπὸ πάντων, by all men.] For, four Augusti at that time governed the affairs of the Roman Empire; to wit, Galerius, Constantinus, Maxentius, and Licinius. But Maximinus was long before made Cæsar by Galerius, and continued in that dignity untill Galerius's death. Wherefore, 'tis most true (what Eusebius here saith) that Maximinus was much displeased, because, there being then so many Augusti, he alone had no other title than that of Cæsar, when as notwithstanding he had received that title of Cæsar, before the other three Princes now mentioned. Vales.

[m] These words [whom we before manifested to have re-assumed the Empire, after his resignation of it] are wanting in the Maz. and Fuk. M.SS. They are in the Kings M.S. And in the Med. M.S. they are written at the margin here, in the same hand in which that M.S. is written. Moreover, although Eusebius here says, he before related, that Maximianus Herculius re-assumed the Imperial dignity; yet hitherto I cannot find the place where Eusebius his said this. Vales.

[n] Πρώτος δὲ τούτων (the expression here) is to be understood in the same sense with that we explained a little before in this chapter, [πρῶτός τε ἐν θεοῖς, the first that was deified.] See note (i.) in this thirteenth chapter. Vales.

GALERIUS.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning the Morals of those that were the enemies of Religion.

Maxentius (Son to this *man,) who had possest himself of the government of Rome, at first hypocritically pretended [himself a professour of] our faith, that he might thereby please and flatter the people of Rome. Upon this account he commanded his subjects to forbear persecuting the Christians, making a shew of piety, and [being desirous] to seem benign, and much more mild than the former Governours. But in his practises he manifested himself not to be such a manner of person, as 'twas hoped he would have proved. But, having applied himself to [the commission of] all sorts of impious facts, he omitted no manner of action that was impure and libidinous. He committed adulteries and rapes of all sorts. He parted the husbands [by divorce] from their lawfull wives, whom (when he had by uncleanness abused) he most dishonourably sent back again to their husbands. Nor did he make it his business to be thus injurious towards obscure persons, and those of mean quality, but towards them especially, who were advanced to the highest place of honour in the Senate of Rome; insulting over the most eminent personages. All persons therefore, both the vulgar, and the Magistrates, as well the honourable, as the obscure, standing in great fear of him, were sorely afflicted with his intollerable tyranny. And although they were quiet, and patiently bore the austere servitude [they were oppresst with;] yet none could so avoid the bloudy cruelty of the Tyrant. For, one time, upon a very trivial pretence, he delivered the people of Rome to be slain by his [a] own guards. And so innumerable multitudes of the Roman people (not Scythians, nor Barbarians, but his own Citizens) were killed with spears and all sorts of weapons in the midst of the City. Moreover, 'tis impossible to enumerate how many slaughters were made of those that were Senatours, to the end their estates might be seized; infinite numbers of them being put to death at several times for various crimes framed [against them.] At length, as the complement of his impieties, the Tyrant proceeded to [exercise] the delusions of Magick Art: sometimes ripping up women great with child; other whiles searching into the bowells of new-born infants; he also killed Lyons, and [performed] some other horrible rites, to call forth the Dæmons, and repell the approaching war. For he most undoubtedly presumed, that by these performances he should obtain the victory. Whilst this person therefore tyrannized at Rome, 'tis impossible to relate what mischievous acts he perpetrated, and [how miserably] he enslaved his Subjects: insomuch that they were reduced to such extream penury and want of necessary sustenance, as ('tis recorded by those of our times)

* To Maximianus.

[a] Aurelius Victor (in the life of Maxentius) says the same; adeo sævus, uti prætorianis cædem vulgi quondam annuerit; he was so cruel, that one time he connived at his Guards for killing the common people. Constantine, having vanquished Maxentius, did quite put down the Prætorian Cohorts, (i. e. those Souldiers, whose office it was to guard the Emperours body,) upon pretence of this slaughter (here mentioned) they made among the common people; but in reality, that they should not attempt any alterations in the government, nor make Emperours, as they had done Maxentius, whom they proclaimed Augustus. Moreover, Zosimus tells the same story, (here mentioned by our Eusebius) but a little otherwise. For he relates, that when the temple of the God Genius at Rome was accidentally fired, and the people flockt together to quench the fire; a Souldier, who derided this God of the Gentiles, was killed by the common people; upon which there immediately happened so great an uproar amongst the Souldiers, that the whole City had been destroyed, had not Maxentius intervened. Vales.

GALERIUS. never happened at Rome, nor any where else. But Maximinus the Tyrant in the Eastern parts, having secretly made a league with Maxentius [the Tyrant] at Rome, as being his brother in wickedness, endeavoured to keep himself concealed for a long time. But being at last detected, he suffered condign punishment. It was wonderfull [to observe] how near a relation and brother-like affinity in wickedness this man expresst towards the Tyrant at Rome; or rather, how far he exceeded and surpassed him in the perpetration of nefarious facts. For Inchanters and Magicians were by him promoted to the chiefest places of honour: he was exceeding timorous and superstitious, and a mighty favourer of the impostures about Idols and Dæmons: without divinations and responses of Oracles he presumed not to move any thing a nails breadth (as the saying is.) Upon which account he imposed a more cruel and sharper persecution upon us, than the former Emperours had done; commanding that Temples [to the Gods] should be erected in every City, and that those places dedicated to their worship, which by length of time were decayed, should with all diligence be repaired. He [constituted] priests for the Idols in every place and City; and over them he appointed a [b] chief Priest of every Province, any one of those who had most worthily discharged all the publick Offices in the Court [or Senate] of the City; and appointed him a military guard [consisting of] a set number of troops. [In fine,] he freely bestowed the Governments of Provinces, and chiefest places of preheminence, on all those that were impudent Soothsayers, as being Religious persons, and most acceptable to the Gods. After this, he proceeded to vex and oppress, not one City onely, or Country, but all the Provinces in general that were under his government, with exactions of Gold, Silver, and vast sums of money, with most burthensome [c] imposts, and with various sorts of forfeitures succeeding one another. Moreover, depriving the rich of their estates laid up for them by their Ancestours, he bestowed a vast treasure and heaps of money on those about him that were his flatterers. Besides, he was given to ebriety and drunkenness in such an high degree, that in his cups he would rave, and be out of his wits; and in his drunkenness he would command such things to be done, as the next day when sober he would repent of. In sottishness and luxury no man was his equal, exhibiting himself the master of debauchery both to his Princes and to his [inferiour] Subjects. He permitted his Souldiers to live effeminate lives, in all manner of deliciousness and intemperance: but he perswaded his Presidents and chief Commanders (who in a manner were his Colleagues in his Tyranny,) to break forth into extortion and covetousness towards those under their jurisdiction. What need we relate those libidinous courses, in which this man indulged himself? or recount their multitudes, which he vitiated by adultery? For he passed through no City [in his journey,] without committing whoredome with women, and ravishing of virgins. Moreover, these [his practises] succeeded according to his desire against all persons, the Christians onely excepted; who, having contemned death, despised that his outragious Tyranny. [d] For the men (having endured the fire, the sword, the being * fastned [to wooden engines] with nails, the wild beast, the being drowned in the depths of the Sea, the cutting off their members, the searings with hot irons, the pricking and digging out of their eyes, and the being maimed all over their bodies; and, besides all this, famine, the mines, and bonds;) would rather demonstrate their patient sufferance under all [these tortures] for religion, than they would forsake the adoration of God, and worship Idols. Again, the women were not less corroborated by the doctrine of the divine word than the men: some of whom underwent the same combats with the men, and obtained rewards of their fortitude equal to them: others, haled away to be ravished, were more ready to part with their lives, than expose their bodies to be defiled. Indeed, one onely Christian woman, the most eminent and famous of the Alexandrian women, (when the others had been vitiated by the Tyrant,) vanquished the dissolute and incontinent mind of Maximinus by her most valiant courage of mind. She was a woman eminent for riches, descent, and learning; but she preferred chastity before all these. When [the Tyrant] had often solicited this woman [to commit adultery with him,] he was indeed unable to kill her (who was prepared to die,) because his lust was master of his cruelty: but he punished her with exile, and deprived her of her whole estate. Infinite other women, being unable to endure the hearing of the menaces of ravishment, which the Governours of Provinces threatned them with, underwent all sorts of tortures, torments, and capital punishments. But the most admirable person above all these was that woman at Rome, the most noble and truly chastest woman of all those, whom Maxentius (the Tyrant there, whose practises were like Maximinus's) attempted to vitiate. For, as soon as she understood that the Ministers, which the Tyrant made use of for the performance of such [villanies,] had assaulted her house, (now she also was a Christian,) and that her husband, who was Prefect of the City at Rome, had by reason of his fear permitted them to take her and carry her away with them: [e] having requested that a short [time] might be allowed her, as if she would have adorned her body, she went into her Chamber; and, being alone, [f] sheathed a sword in her own breast. Expiring immediately here-

[b] Ἐκλῆς ἐπαρχίας ἀρχιερέα; So our Author words it in the Greek. They were called Sacerdotes [i. e. chief Priests] by the Gentiles, who had the Temples of a whole Province under their care: but the Flamines [the Priests] were those, who in every Town and City took care of the performance of their Religious Rites. (See Valesius's notes on Amm. Marcellinus, Book 28. pag. 375. Moreover, Maximinus must not be supposed to have been the first that instituted these chief Priests of the Provinces: for there were such Priests long before his time. But Maximinus increased their honour, and allowed them a guard, i. e. Lictors and Apparitors. These chief Priests of the Provinces were made out of the body of the Curiales, (i. e. those that were of the Court, or Senate in every City; see Valesius's notes on Amm. Marcell. B. 28. p. 374.) who had before born all publick Offices, and discharged them worthily. This place [of high Priest of a Province] was accounted so honourable, that he that bore it took place of the Magistrates, or Duumviri. See the Gesta purgat. Cæciliani, B. 9. chap. 4. These high Priests had the power of entring into the secretum of the Judges, and of being assessours with them, as appears from the Acts of Theodorus the Martyr at November 9.

[c] Ἐπισκήψεσι. Musculus translates it Statutis, Laws: Christophorson, mandatis, commands: Valesius, indictionibus, imposts or taxes. Our Eusebius uses the same term at chap. 8. B. 10. Where, speaking of Licinius, he says, ἐπισκήψεις τε μυρίας καὶ ἀφ' ὧν ὑπουργεῖσθαι ἔθνων ἐπινόει, i. e. he invented several sorts of Taxes against his Subjects. See book 10. chap. 8. note (d.)

[d] See Eusebius's oration concerning the praises of Constantine, c. 7. where this passage is repeated almost in the same words. Vales.

* Πεσσηλώσεις is the term in the Greek: Valesius renders it Clavorum suffixiones the being fastned with nails; perhaps our Author means crucifixion.

[e] Ἐς βραχὺν ὑποπαρεσκευασθῆναι χρόνον is the expression in the Greek.

Some words seem to be wanting, which may be thus supplied [εἰς ἀπαχώρησιν χρόνον βραχὺν ὑποπαρεσκευασθῆναι χρόνῳ, having requested a short space of time for a recess.] Eusebius used the same phrase before, when he spake of the Antiochian woman, who with the two Virgins leapt into the River. Vales.

[f] At the margin of the Maz. and Savill M. SS. I found this Scholion written, for the explication of these words: [πῶς ἐν πολλοῖς ἕως ὑποδέχεται τὰς ἑαυτῶν διαχρυσαμπύκας; ἢ τοί γε ἡ τῆς ἐκκλησίας χεὶρ, ἀχὶ τὰς εἰς ἑαυτὰς τὰ ὅπλ' ἀμείλικτον ὑπεδέξαμπύκας ἐν μιᾷ ῥύσιν ἀναχάσεως.

And yet the Judgment of the Church is, not to record them amongst the number of the Martyrs, who have been their own executioners. For 'tis* [an argument] of fear, rather than courage, by death to prevent the dread of punishment. But [the Church looks upon those as Martyrs,] who suppose nothing to be dreadfull upon account of the confession of Christ; but with alacrity suffer all [tortures,] that a Tyrannick and deviliſh ſubtilty can produce [againſt them.] The Authour of this Scholion has made a true remark, to wit, that the Church approves not of ſelf-murder; when men, out of a fear of death, or through deſperation, lay violent hands on themſelves. But as often as they are driven to do that by the inſtinct of the divine ſpirit, which rarely happens; then the Church approves and admires that act: but propoſes it not for imitation. See what S^t Auguſtine thought concerning this matter, in his firſt Book. De civitate Dei, chap. 26. Valeſ.

GALERIUS. upon, ſhe left indeed her Corps to thoſe that came to conduct her [to the Tyrant;] but by this act of hers (which reſounds more than any voice) ſhe has manifeſted to all men that now are, and ſhall be in future ages, that the courage of the Chriſtians is the onely thing that is inexpugnable, and which cannot be extirpated by death. Such indeed and ſo great was the fertility of wickedneſs, produced at one and the ſame time; the authours of which were two Tyrants, who had divided the Eaſt and Weſt between themſelves. And now, what man is he, that, making his reſearches into the cauſe of theſe ſo great [calamities,] will be dubious in affirming the perſecution [raiſed againſt us] to have been [the originall of all theſe miſeries?] Eſpecially, [when he conſiders] that theſe mighty diſturbances [in the Empire] were not terminated, before the Chriſtians had the free and open profeſſion of their Religion reſtored to them.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning what happened to the Gentiles.

[a] The perſecution began in the year of Chriſt 303; when Dioclesian was in his 8th, an Maximian in his 7th, conſulate. It ended in the year of Chriſt 312; then, when Conſtantine, having conquered Maxentius, ſent letters to Maximinus Emperour of the East, to procure liberty for the Chriſtians; as our Euſebius relates in Book 9. Therefore the perſecution laſted ten years, as 'tis here affirmed. And ſo the years are noted in the M. S. copies of Euſebius's Chronicon, as Pontacus has obſerved. Epiphanius therefore is miſtaken; who (in his Book De ponder. & menſur.) ſays this perſecution laſted twelve years. See the following chapter, where our Authour relates, that the perſecution ceaſed on the tenth year. Valeſ.

INdeed, throughout the whole [a] ten years ſpace of the perſecution, there was no intermiſſion of mutual conſpiracies and inteſtine wars amongſt them: the Sea was impaſſible to thoſe that made voyages over it. Neither could any perſons arrive at any Haven whatſoever, but they muſt indure all ſorts of ſcourges, be tormented, have their ſides torn with nails, and be interrogated, by their undergoing all ſorts of tortures, whether they came from the Enemies Country: and at laſt they underwent the puniſhment of crucifixion, or were burnt to death. Furthermore, they provided ſhields, breaſt-plates, darts, ſpeares, and other ſuch like military inſtruments. Alſo, galleys, and weapons for a Sea-fight were every where prepared. Neither did any perſon expect any thing elſe but an incurſion of the enemy. After all theſe [calamities] followed a famine and a peſtilence; of which we will give a relation at an opportune place and time.

CHAP. XVI.

Concerning the change of affaires to a better poſture.

[a] At theſe words we began the 16th chapter, agreable to the Maz. and Fuk. M.SS. But in the Med. M.S. (which Rob. Stephens followed, in the diſtinction of the chapters) there is no new chapter began here. Valeſ.

[a] SUch were the preparations during the whole time of the perſecution; which by the grace of God wholly ceaſed in the tenth year; beginning to be ſomewhat remiſs, after the eighth year. For, after the divine and celeſtial grace demonſtrated [it ſelf] in a benigne and propitious inſpection over us, then the Governours in our times, even thoſe very Princes who had formerly waged wars againſt thoſe of our Religion, having moſt miraculouſly altered their minds, founded a retreat: and extinguiſhed the moſt ardent flame of the perſecution by Reſcripts favourable towards us, and by moſt mild Edicts. But, neither was any humane cauſe, nor (which ſome one might conjecture) was the clemency or humanity of the Emperours, the occaſion hereof; no, 'twas far from that. For, from the beginning of the perſecution unto that very time, they daily invented more, and more grievous cruelties againſt us, renewing the tortures [uſed] towards us by divers machines [made uſe of] ſucceſſively, and in a various manner. But the apparent inſpection of the divine providence it ſelf, which was now reconciled to its people, purſued the authour of theſe miſeries, and was angry at the [b] Ring-leader of the wickedneſs [committed] during the whole perſecution. For although theſe things ought to have come to paſs, agreeable to the judgment of the divine [will,] yet * Woe (ſays the Scripture) to that man by whom the offence cometh. Therefore, a puniſhment ſent from God ſeized him; which, having made its beginning at his very fleſh, proceeded even to his ſoul. For on a ſudden an impoſtume aroſe upon him [c] about the midſt of the privy parts of his body; after that, a [d] Fiſtula in ano; both theſe diſeaſes ſpread incurably and did eat into his inmoſt bowels. From them bred an unſpeakable multitude of worms, and a moſt noyſome ſtench proceeded therefrom; [for,] before this diſeaſe, the whole maſs of fleſh upon his body was (by reaſon of the abundance of food he devoured) grown to an immenſe fatneſs: which being then putrified, became an intollerable and moſt horrid ſpectacle to thoſe that approach't him. Wherefore ſome of his Phyſitians, being altogether unable to endure the exceeding noyſomeneſs of the ſtink [that came from him,] were killed: others of them, when they could adminiſter no remedy, (the whole fabrick of his body being ſwelled, and paſt all hopes of a recovery,) were cruelly ſlain.

GALERIUS.

[b] He means Maximianus Galerius, as 'tis apparent from the following words: for he was the Authour of the perſecution raiſed againſt the Chriſtians. Rufinus in the 15th chapter of this book ſpeaks thus concerning Galerius; Ille verò, qui ei ſecundus in honore, poſtmodum etiam in primis ſucceſſor fuit, qui & incentor ac ſignifer noſtræ perſecutionis extiterat, &c. i. e. But he, who was the next in honour to him, afterwards ſucceeded him in the firſt and chiefeſt place; who alſo was the incendiary and firſt beginner of our perſecution, &c. Cedrenus atteſts the ſame. Valeſ.

* Matth. 18. 7.

[c] Περὶ τὰ μέσα τῆς αἰδοίων· He means his genitals; which Victor (in his Epitome) does confirm: Galerius Maximianus (ſays he) conſumptis genitalibus defecit.

[d] The phraſe in the Greek is, ἕλκος ἐν βάθει συεγγωδές, which, being literally rendred, imports thus much, an ulcer in the fundament full of holes like a ſponge.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning the Retractation of the Emperours.

MOreover, whileſt he was ſtrugling with theſe many and great miſeries, he began to be ſenſible of the villanous acts he had performed towards the worſhippers of God: * having therefore ſeriouſly recollected himſelf, firſt he made his confeſſion to the ſupream God. Then, having called together the [a] chief Officers of his Palace, he ordered them without any delay to inhibite the persecution of the Christians, and by his decree and Imperial Edict commanded that their Churches should with all expedition be built, wherein they might perform their usual [solemnities,] and make supplications [to God] for the * Emperour. Therefore, what he had given order for in words being immediately followed by an actual performance, the Imperial Edicts were set forth in every City, containing a revocation of the [persecution] against us, according to this form following.

EMPEROUR CÆSAR GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS, INVICTUS, AUGUSTUS, PONTIFEX MAXIMUS, GERMANICUS MAXIMUS, ÆGYPTIACUS MAXIMUS, THEBAÏCUS MAXIMUS, SARMATICUS MAXIMUS the Fifth time; [b] PERSICUS MAXIMUS, CARPICUS MAXIMUS the Second time, ARMENICUS MAXIMUS the Sixth time, MEDICUS MAXIMUS, ADIABENICUS MAXIMUS, [c] TRIBUNE OF THE PEOPLE XX. [d] EMPEROUR XIX. CONSUL VIII. FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, PROCONSUL. And, EMPEROUR CÆSAR FLAVIUS VALERIUS CONSTANTINUS, PIUS, FELIX, INVICTUS, AUGUSTUS: PONTIFEX MAXIMUS, [e] TRIBUNE OF THE PEOPLE V. EMPEROUR V. CONSUL, FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, [f] PROCONSUL. And, EMPEROUR CÆSAR VALERIUS LICINIANUS, PIUS, FELIX, INVICTUS, AUGUSTUS; PONTIFEX MAXIMUS; TRIBUNE OF THE PEOPLE IV. EMPEROUR III. CONSUL, FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, PROCONSUL: To the Subjects of their own Provinces, Greeting.

Amongst other things which we have constituted for the profit and utility of the Republick, it was our desire in the first place, that all things should be redressed according to the ancient Laws, and publick Ordinances of the Romans. And we earnestly endeavoured to effect this, that the Christians, who had relinquished the Rites and Usages of their Parents, should be reduced to a good mind and intention. For, so great an [g] arrogancy and unadvisedness has (by a considerateness as it were) possest and invaded them, that they would not follow those sanctions of their Ancestours, which even their Parents 'tis likely had before Ratified: but according to their own arbitrement, and as each person had a desire, so they would make Laws, and observe them, and assemble various multitudes, of different factions and dissenting about their opinions. Therefore, when we had published such an Edict, as should [oblige] them to return to the Rites and Ordinances of their Ancestours; many of them having been exposed to imminent dangers, and many having been terrified [with the menaces of punishment,] underwent various sorts of death. But, when many persisted in this madness, and we perceived they did neither exhibite a due worship to the immortal Gods, nor yet to the God of the Christians; having a respect to our humanity and that continued usage by which we have been accustomed to bestow Pardon on all sorts of men: we have thought good that our indulgence should most readily be extended in this matter also; that the Christians should again be [tolerated,] and that they may [have licence] to rebuild the houses wherein they used to assemble themselves, that

GALERIUS.

[a] Τὴς ἀμφ' αὐτὸν, which words Rufinus renders very well, thus, Convocatis his qui in officio publico parebant; having called together those who served in any publick office. Eusebius usually means, by this phrase, the Grandees of the Palace, whom Amm. Marcellinus does commonly term, aulæ summates, & Imperatoris proximos, the chief Court-officers, and those nearest to the Emperour. Valesius.

[b] We find that the Persians were but once conquered by Galerius, which was in the year of Christ 297; as 'tis affirmed in Fastis Idatii, and in the Alexandrian Chronicle. The same is confirmed by Libanius, in his oration intitled βασιλικὸς; where he relates that the Persians, after that great defeat they received from the Romans under the conduct of Galerius spent fourty years in preparations to make amends for that overthrow; and that, a little before the death of Constantine the Great, they entred upon a war with the Romans. Indeed, from that year of Christ we mentioned (i. e. Anno 297) to the year wherein Constantine dyed, there are fourty years. Therefore, Eusebius's Chronicle must be corrected, in which this Persian victory is placed on the seventeenth year of Diocletian; whereas it should be placed on his thirteenth year; as it is in the Edition of Arnaldus Pontacus. Seeing therefore we can find no other victory that Maximianus obtained over the Persians, this place ought to be pointed (as it is in Nicephorus, and as we have done in our translation) after this manner: σαρματικὸς μέγιστος πεμπτάκις· περσῶν μέγιστος. Sarmaticus Maximus the Fifth time; Persicus Maximus. In Rufinus's old copy, there is at this place no distinction by points; but 'tis thus, Sarmaticus quinquies Persicus bis Carpicus Sexies Armenicus Medorum & Adiabenorum Victor.

[c] Rufinus renders this passage thus, Tribuniciæ potestatis vicies, having been Tribune of the people twenty times. This is the reading in the M. SS. From this place we may perceive, that Galerius was made Cæsar, and Colleague in the Tribunician power (or, Tribune of the people) at the same time; since in this Edict he accounts the years of his Tribunician power from that time when he was proclaimed Cæsar. Now, he was made Cæsar in the year of Christ 291, on the Calends of March. Moreover, he put forth this Edict in favour of the Christians, in the year of Christ 311, in his eighth Consulate, as the inscription of the Edict declares: whence it followes, that this Edict was written before the Calends of March. For from that time Galerius began his Tribunician Power. Valesius.

[d] Αὐτοκράτωρ ἐννεακαιδέκατον; i.e. Emperour the Nintteenth time: for that's the reading in the most ancient copy of Rufinus. Christophorson translated this term ill, thus, Dictator. He knew not what was the import of the word Imperator. Imperator signifies one thing in the titles of the Emperours, when 'tis put in the First place like a Pronoun; but it imports another thing, when 'tis subjoyned to the rest of the titles. For the word [Emperour] put in the Second place, denotes the victory of the Emperours, and shews how often they were stiled Emperours by the Army, after they had obtained a victory; so Dio informs us. Valesius.

[e] In all copies, there is an omission of the number of times that Constantine had born the office of Tribune of the people, when this Edict came forth. I have added the figure [V] which denotes the Fifth time of his bearing the Tribune-ship: which addition is grounded upon a most certain conjecture. Valesius.

[f] After this word [Proconsul,] (in the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil M. SS. and in Nicephorus) there are these following words [And, Emperour Cæsar Valerius Licinianus, Pius, Felix, Invictus, Augustus, Pontifex Maximus; Tribune of the people IV. Emperour III. Consul, Father of his Country, Proconsul: To the Subjects of their own Provinces Greeting.] Which passage, although it occurs not in Rufinus, yet is of good authority. And first, as to Licinius's Tribunician Power, the same must be thought of that which was of Galerius's, to wit, that it is to be begun from the time of his being made Cæsar. Now, Licinius was made Cæsar in the year of Christ 308, on the third of the Ides of November, as it appears in the Fasti of Idatius. Therefore, the fourth year of Licinius's Tribunician Power began in the year of Christ 311, on the third of the Ides of November. But this disagrees with what we noted before, when we treated concerning the Tribunician Power of Galerius. Wherefore one of these places must necessarily be false. For if it were then the fourth year of Licinius's Tribunician Power, it was the twenty first of Galerius's. On the contrary, if this were the twentieth year of Galerius's being Tribune of the people, it was but the third year of Licinius's bearing that dignity. As to the consulate of Licinius, there is mention thereof in the Fasti of Prosperus, Cassiodorus, and Victorius; where he is placed Consul with Maximianus Augustus Cos. VIII. In my notes on Amm. Marcellinus, I had remarked, that Licinius was made Augustus by Galerius, a little before Galerius's death; which I collected from hence, because in this Edict, we now speak of, Galerius had made no mention of Licinius's being his Colleague: but since in our M. SS. and in Nicephorus Licinius is stiled Augustus in this Edict of Galerius, that conjecture of ours is wholly destroyed. Valesius.

[g] In the Fuk. Savil, Maz. and Med M. SS. the reading is [πλεονεξία καὶ ἀγνοια καὶεπιλήψει, So great an arrogancy and unadvisedness — has possest and invaded them.] Valesius.

Πλεονεξία (which Valesius here renders arrogantia, arrogancy) is by Democrates (in his Τγωμ.) defined to be speaking all, and not enduring to hear any body else. Dr Hammond has given a large account of the significations of this word, in his note on Rom. i. v. 29.

GALERIUS. that so [in future they may be forced] to do nothing contrary to their discipline. In a particular Rescript we will signifie to our Judges what it shall behove them to observe. Wherefore, upon account of this our Indulgence they are obliged to supplicate their God for our safety, that of the Republick, and their own; that so both the Publick State of Affairs may in all respects be continued in an entire and safe posture, and they themselves live undisturbed in their own habitations. These words (which we have, according to our ability, translated out of the Roman into the Greek Language,) are thus; now therefore it is an opportune time to take a Prospect of what followed hereupon. GALERIUS.

DIOCLETIANUS.

IN SOME COPIES, THIS OCCURS AS A SUPPLEMENT TO THE EIGHTH BOOK.

BUT the * Authour of this Edict, after this Confession, was forthwith Released from his pains, and ended his Life. Report says, that this man was the first beginner of that Calamitous Persecution: for, long before the rest of the Emperours were instigated [to it,] he endeavoured by force to withdraw the Christians that bore Armes [from their Religion,] especially those that were his domesticks; some of whom he removed from their Military dignities, most dishonourably abused others; and moreover, punished othersome with death: and at length he moved his Colleagues in the Empire to a General Persecution against the Christians. The manner how these Emperours ended their Lives, we judge unfit to be buried in silence: of the [a] four therefore who had divided the Roman Empire between them, those [b] two, that had the precedency in Age and Honour, resigned their Empire, before two years were compleated after the beginning of the Persecution, as we have [c] before manifested. And, having spent the remaining part of their time in a private and retired condition, they concluded their lives after this manner: The [d] one, who in respect of his Age and Honour took place of all the rest, was consumed by a lasting and most painfull distemper of body: the [e] other, who was the next to him in honour, put an end to his life by hanging of himself; undergoing this [punishment,] which was agreeable to a certain Diabolical Prediction concerning him, upon account of those many villanies he had most audaciously perpetrated. Of the remaining two, the [f] last, (who, as we [g] have said, was the Authour of the whole Persecution,) underwent those [misories,] which we [h] have related before. But he who in dignity preceded this man, [I mean] that most favourable and mercifull Emperour Constantius, who during the whole time of his Government behaved himself in such sort as befitted an Emperour; who both in other matters represented himself to be most courteous and beneficent, and also was unconcerned in the persecution raised against us, who preserved the worshippers of God living under his Government from all manner of injuries and molestations, who neither demolished the edifices of the Churches, nor attempted any other new design against us: [this Emperour Constantius I say] obtained a [i] fortunate and truly thrice happy conclusion of his life: being the onely person that ended his life peaceably and gloriously during his swaying the Imperial Scepter, and left his own Son (in all respects a most sober and pious Prince,) his successour in the Empire. [k] He, being from the very beginning forthwith proclaimed supream Emperour and Augustus by the Souldiers, declared himself to be an emulatour of his Fathers reverend regard towards our Religion. Such was the conclusion of their lives which happened to the forementioned four Emperours, at different times. [l] Moreover, of them * he onely (whom we mentioned a little before) [m] made the foresaid confession, and (together with [n] those who were afterwards taken in to be Colleagues with him in the Empire) made it publickly known to all men by an Edict proposed in writing.

[b] We find that the Perſians were but once conquered by Galerius, which was in the year of Chriſt 297; as 'tis affirmed in Faſtis Idatii, and in the Alexandrian Chronicle. The ſame is confirmed by Libanius, in his oration intitled βασιλικὸς; where he relates that the Perſians, after that great defeat they received from the Romans under the conduct of Galerius ſpent fourty years in preparations to make amends for that overthrow; and that, a little before the death of Conſtantine the Great, they entred upon a war with the Romans. Indeed, from that year of Chriſt we mentioned (i. e. Anno 297) to the year wherein Conſtantine dyed, there are fourty years. Therefore, Euſebius's Chronicle muſt be corrected, in which this Perſian victory is placed on the ſeventeenth year of Diocletian; whereas it ſhould be placed on his thirteenth year; as it is in the Edition of Arnaldus Pontacus. Seeing therefore we can find no other victory that Maximianus obtained over the Perſians, this place ought to be pointed (as it is in Nicephorus, and as we have done in our tranſlation) after this manner: σαρματικὸς μέγιστος πεμπάκις· περσῶν μέγιστος. Sarmaticus Maximus the Fifth time; Perſicus Maximus. In Rufinus's old copy, there is at this place no diſtinction by points; but 'tis thus, Sarmaticus quinquies Perſicus bis Carpicus Sexies Armenicus Medorum & Adiabenorum Victor.

[c] Rufinus renders this paſſage thus, Tribuniciæ poteſtatis vicies, having been Tribune of the people twenty times. This is the reading in the M. SS. From this place we may perceive, that Galerius was made Cæſar, and Colleague in the Tribunician power (or, Tribune of the people) at the ſame time; ſince in this Edict he accounts the years of his Tribunician power from that time when he was proclaimed Cæſar. Now, he was made Cæſar in the year of Chriſt 291, on the Calends of March. Moreover, he put forth this Edict in favour of the Chriſtians, in the year of Chriſt 311, in his eighth Conſulate, as the inſcription of the Edict declares: whence it followes, that this Edict was written before the Calends of March. For from that time Galerius began his Tribunician Power. Valeſ.

[d] Αὐτοκράτωρ ἐννεακαιδέκατον; i.e. Emperour the Nineteenth time: for that's the reading in the moſt ancient copy of Rufinus. Chriſtophorſon tranſlated this term ill, thus, Dictator. He knew not what was the import of the word Imperator. Imperator ſignifies one thing in the titles of the Emperours, when 'tis put in the Firſt place like a Pronoun; but it imports another thing, when 'tis ſubjoyned to the reſt of the titles. For the word [Emperour] put in the Second place, denotes the victory of the Emperours, and ſhews how often they were ſtiled Emperours by the Army, after they had obtained a victory; ſo Dio informs us. Valeſ.

[e] In all copies, there is an omiſſion of the number of times that Conſtantine had born the office of Tribune of the people, when this Edict came forth. I have added the figure [V] which denotes the Fifth time of his bearing the Tribune-ſhip: which addition is grounded upon a moſt certain conjecture. Valeſ.

[f] After this word [Proconſul,] (in the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil M. SS. and in Nicephorus) there are theſe following words [And, Emperour Cæſar Valerius Licinianus, Pius, Felix, Inviſtus, Auguſtus, Pontifex Maximus; Tribune of the people IV. Emperour III. Conſul, Father of his Country, Proconſul: To the Subjects of their own Provinces Greeting.] Which paſſage, although it occurs not in Ruffinus, yet is of good authority. And firſt, as to Licinius's Tribunician Power, the ſame muſt be thought of that which was of Galerius's, to wit, that it is to be begun from the time of his being made Cæſar. Now, Licinius was made Cæſar in the year of Chriſt 308, on the third of the Ides of November, as it appears in the Faſti of Idatius. Therefore, the fourth year of Licinius's Tribunician Power began in the year of Chriſt 311, on the third of the Ides of November. But this diſagrees with what we noted before, when we treated concerning the Tribunician Power of Galerius. Wherefore one of theſe places muſt neceſſarily be falſe. For if it were then the fourth year of Licinius's Tribunician Power, it was the twenty firſt of Galerius's. On the contrary, if this were the twentieth year of Galerius's being Tribune of the people, it was but the third year of Licinius's bearing that dignity. As to the conſulate of Licinius, there is mention thereof in the Faſti of Proſperus, Caſſiodorus, and Victorius; where he is placed Conſul with Maximianus Auguſtus Coſ. VIII. In my notes on Amm. Marcellinus, I had remarked, that Licinius was made Auguſtus by Galerius, a little before Galerius's death; which I collected from hence, becauſe in this Edict, we now ſpeak of, Gallerius had made no mention of Licinius's being his Colleague: but ſince in our M. SS. and in Nicephorus Licinius is ſtiled Auguſtus in this Edict of Galerius, that conjecture of ours is wholly deſtroyed. Valeſ.

[g] In the Fuk. Savil, Maz. and Med M. SS. the reading is [πλεονεξία καὶ ἐχθρήκεια, καὶ ἄνοια καὶ ἐπιλήψει, So great an arrogancy and unadviſedneſs — has poſſeſt and invaded them.] Valeſ.

Πλεονεξία (which Valeſius here renders arrogantia, arrogancy) is by Democrates (in his Γνωμ.) defined to be ſpeaking all, and not enduring to hear any body elſe. Dr Hammond has given a large account of the ſignifications of this word, in his note on Rom. 1. v. 29.

GALERIUS. that so [in future they may be forced] to do nothing contrary to their discipline. In a particular Rescript we will signifie to our Judges what it shall behove them to observe. Wherefore, upon account of this our Indulgence they are obliged to supplicate their God for our safety, that of the Republick, and their own; that so both the Publick State of Affairs may in all respects be continued in an entire and safe posture, and they themselves live undisturbed in their own habitations. These words (which we have, according to our ability, translated out of the Roman into the Greek Language,) are thus; now therefore it is an opportune time to take a Prospect of what followed hereupon. DIOCLETIANUS.

IN SOME COPIES, THIS OCCURS AS A SUPPLEMENT TO THE EIGHTH BOOK.

BUT the * Authour of this Edict, after this Confession, was forthwith Released from his pains, and ended his Life. Report says, that this man was the first beginner of that Calamitous Persecution: for, long before the rest of the Emperours were instigated [to it,] he endeavoured by force to withdraw the Christians that bore Armes [from their Religion,] especially those that were his domesticks; some of whom he removed from their Military dignities, most dishonourably abused others; and moreover, punished othersome with death: and at length he moved his Colleagues in the Empire to a General Persecution against the Christians. The manner how these Emperours ended their Lives, we judge unfit to be buried in silence: of the [a] four therefore who had divided the Roman Empire between them, those [b] two, that had the precedency in Age and Honour, resigned their Empire, before two years were compleated after the beginning of the Persecution, as we have [c] before manifested. And, having spent the remaining part of their time in a private and retired condition, they concluded their lives after this manner: The [d] one, who in respect of his Age and Honour took place of all the rest, was consumed by a lasting and most painfull distemper of body: the [e] other, who was the next to him in honour, put an end to his life by hanging of himself; undergoing this [punishment,] which was agreeable to a certain Diabolical Prediction concerning him, upon account of those many villanies he had most audaciously perpetrated. Of the remaining two, the [f] last, (who, as we [g] have said, was the Authour of the whole Persecution,) underwent those [miseries,] which we [h] have related before. But he who in dignity preceded this man, [I mean] that most favourable and mercifull Emperour Constantius, who during the whole time of his Government behaved himself in such sort as befitted an Emperour; who both in other matters represented himself to be most courteous and beneficent, and also was unconcerned in the persecution raised against us, who preserved the worshippers of God living under his Government from all manner of injuries and molestations, who neither demolished the edifices of the Churches, nor attempted any other new design against us: [this Emperour Constantius I say] obtained a [i] fortunate and truly thrice happy conclusion of his life: being the onely person that ended his life peaceably and gloriously during his swaying the Imperial Scepter, and left his own Son (in all respects a most sober and pious Prince,) his successour in the Empire. [k] He, being from the very beginning forthwith proclaimed supream Emperour and Augustus by the Souldiers, declared himself to be an emulatour of his Fathers reverend regard towards our Religion. Such was the conclusion of their lives which happened to the forementioned four Emperours, at different times. [l] Moreover, of them * he onely (whom we mentioned a little before) [m] made the foresaid confession, and (together with [n] those who were afterwards taken in to be Colleagues with him in the Empire) made it publickly known to all men by an Edict proposed in writing.

Concerning the MARTYRS of PALESTINE.

[a] Before I had looſt into any of the M. SS. I thought theſe words were added by Rob. Stephens, who in ſome copies had found theſe two Supplements of the 8th Book. But when I had perceived that the ſame words occurred in all the M. SS. I was eaſily induced to believe, that all thoſe M. SS. were tranſcribed from one and the ſame Copy. Moreover, this 2d Supplement is nothing elſe but Euſebius's Book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine; which appears from the words at the end of this Supplement. For in the Maz. and Med. M.SS. theſe words occur there; Ἐυσεβίε τῦ Παμφίλε περὶ τῶν ἐν παλαισίνῃ μαρτυρησάντων τέλος· i. e. the End of Euſebius Pamphilus's [book] concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine. Valeſ.

IT was the Ninteenth year of Diocletians Empire, the moneth Xanthicus, which the Romans call April; (Flavianus being Governour of the Province of Paleſtine;) in which year, [to wit,] when the Feaſt of the Salutary Paſſion was near at hand, the Edicts on a ſudden were every where ſet forth, commanding the Churches to be pulled down to the ground, and the Scriptures to be conſumed with fire; and ordering, that ſuch as were promoted to honours ſhould be degraded, and that the ordinary ſort of people, if they perſiſted in a reſolution of retaining the profeſſion of Chriſtianity, ſhould be deprived of their liberty. Such was the vehemency of the firſt Edict againſt us. But not long after, other Reſcripts were brought, wherein order was given, that all Prelates of the Churches every where, ſhould firſt be put in bonds; and afterwards compelled by all ways imaginable to offer ſacrifice.

CHAP. I.

Concerning Procopius, Alphæus, and Zacchæus, Martyrs.

[a] The ſame Relation is in the Acts of the paſſion of Procopius the Martyr, which begin thus, The firſt of the Martyrs that appeared in Paleſtine was Procopius, &c. From whence 'tis evident, that thoſe Acts were tranſlated out of the Greek Copy of Euſebius into Latine. To make this more manifeſtly apparent, it will in no wiſe be unuſefull, to inſert here the entire Acts. For many things worth our knowledge are contained in them, which neither Baronius nor Molanus happened to have a ſight of. We have tranſcribed them from a moſt ancient M. S. belonging to the Muſciacenſian Monaſtery, which is now in the hands of that learned perſon Claudius Foly Canon of the Church at Paris. Their Contents are theſe;

[a] PRocopius therefore, the firſt of the Martyrs of Paleſtine, [b] before he had experienced a confinement in priſon, was [c] immediately upon his very firſt Arrival brought before the Preſidents Seat of Judicature: and being commanded to offer ſacrifice to thoſe [by the Gentiles] ſtiled Gods, he ſaid that he knew but one onely God, to whom ſacrifice was to be offered, according to that manner which he himſelf had appointed. But when he was bidden to ſacrifice to the four Emperours, having uttered a ſentence which was in no wiſe pleaſing to them (that which he ſaid, was theſe words of the Poet [Homer;] It is not good [to have] many Lords, let there be one Lord, one King) he was

The Paſſion of S. Procopius the Martyr, who ſuffered under Fabianus the Preſident, on the fourth of the Nones of Auguſt.

The firſt of the Martyrs that appeared in Paleſtine was Procopius: a perſon [full] of celeſtial grace, who before his Martyrdom ordered his life ſo, as that from his very childhood he applied his mind to chaſtity, and a virtuous converſe. He ſo macerated his body, that 'twas judged to be almoſt dead. But he comforted his mind with ſuch divine words, that he infuſed ſtrength and courage into his body, by this refection of his mind. Bread and water was his food and drink: he fed onely on theſe: which he would forſake for two, or three, ſometimes for ſeven days together, and then return to that his food again. Alſo, a meditation on divine expreſſions had bound up his mind ſo faſt, that he continued indefatigable in it night and day. He made himſelf an high example of courteſie and meekneſs, looking on himſelf to be inferiour to others, ſo great was his ſtudiouſneſs in divine matters: he had alſo attained to a competency in external accompliſhments. His original extract he had at Ælia [i.e. Jeruſalem;] but by converſe and habitation he was a Scythopolitan. He ſerved in three Offices in that Church; one was that of a Reader, another conſiſted in his interpretation of the Syrian Tongue; and the third was an impoſition of hands, to caſt out devils. And when he (together with his companions) was ſent from Scythopolis to Cæſarea, he was led from the very Gates to the Preſident; and before he had experienced the miſeries of impriſonment and bonds, he was upon his very firſt Arrival commanded by Flavianus the Preſident, to offer ſacrifice to the Gods. But with a loud voice he atteſted that there was not a multiplicity of Gods, but one Maker and Framer of all things. The Preſident, ſmitten with that expreſſion of his, and being wounded in his own conſcience, aſſented to what he ſaid. And, betaking himſelf to other arguments, [perſwaded him] to ſacrifice at leaſt but to the Emperours. But the holy Martyr of God, deſpiſing what he ſaid, repeated that paſſage of Homer—It is not good [to have] many Lords, let there be one Lord, one King. Which words being heard, it being ſuppoſed that he ſpoke ſomething that was of ill conſequence to the Emperours, by the Preſidents command he was led to execution; and being beheaded, had an entrance into a celeſtial life, or found a compendious way into heaven, on the ſeventh day of Deſius, that is, the moneth July, which amongſt the Romans is called the Nones of July, in the firſt year of the Perſecution againſt us. This was the firſt Martyrdom that was conſummated in Cæſarea, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt Reigning, to whom be honour and glory for ever and ever, Amen. Theſe Acts are alſo extant in two M. SS. belonging to the Library of Saint Germans. Valeſ.

[b] The foregoing Acts of the paſſion of Saint Procopius render this paſſage almoſt word for word, thus; Priuſquam carceris vel vinculorum experiretur anguſtias, before he had experienced the miſeries of impriſonment and bonds. By which words the cruelty of the Judge is ſignified. For the Roman Preſidents were wont firſt to impriſon thoſe offenders that were apprehended and brought before them, and to interrogate them afterwards at their leiſure. Valeſ.

[c] The foregoing Acts word this paſſage thus; in ipſo ingreſſu ſuo à Judice Flaviano ut Diis ſacrificaret impellitur; i. e. he was upon his very firſt arrival, commanded by Flavianus the Preſident, to offer ſacrifice to the Gods. Many things are here omitted in the Greek Text of Euſebius, which muſt be made perfect by thoſe Acts in Latine (the tranſlation whereof we have before inſerted.) For when Euſebius had here ſaid expreſly, that Procopius upon his firſt arrival was brought before the Judge, he adds nothing concerning the place from whence he came, where he was apprehended, or to what place he was brought: nothing of which ought to have been omitted. Beſides, Euſebius does accurately relate the deſcent and country of other Martyrs mentioned in this book; and if any of them had attained any degree of Eccleſiaſtick honour, he does uſually take notice of that alſo. But of this perſon (who was the chief, and Leader of all the Paleſtine Martyrs) we ſee no ſuch remarks made. This, 'tis probable, was not the fault of Enſebius, but of his Excribers. For, in the Latine Acts, which, as we before evidenced, were tranſlated out of Euſebius, all theſe circumſtances are manifeſtly declared. See the tranſlation of the Latine Acts, in note (a.) in this chapter. Valeſ.

DIOCLETIAN was forthwith beheaded, [d] on the eighth day of the moneth [e] Deſius, that is (as the Romans ſtile it) before the ſeventh of the Ides of June, on [d] The Latine Copies of theſe Acts doe vary a little here: in Claudius Foly's Copy (the tranſlation of which you have in note (a.) in this chapter,) the words are, Deſii Septima Fulii menſis, quæ nonas Fulias dicitur apud Latinos, i. e. on the ſeventh day of Deſius [that is the] moneth Fuly, which amongſt the Romans is called the Nones of Fuly: in the two M. S. Copies belonging to the Library of S. Germans, the reading is thus, Dies erat Septima Fulii menſis, quæ 7. Idus Fulii dicitur apud Latinos, i. e. it was the ſeventh day of the Month Fuly, which amongſt the Romans is called the ſeventh of the Ides of Fuly. In the greek Text of our Euſebius here, the words are theſe, ἑβδόμῃ μηνὸς Δύσιος, ᾗπερ ἑπτὰ εἰδῶν ἰανίων λέγουσιν Ἀκόλουθοι Ῥωμαίοις, on the eighth day of the moneth Deſius, that is (as the Romans ſtile it) before the ſeventh of the Ides of June. By theſe words in the Latine Copies of the M. SS. in Saint Germans Library, the title before Claudius Foly's Copy of theſe Acts is to be amended, where'tis ſaid Procopius ſuffered on the fourth of the Nones of Auguſt. Notwithſtanding, in all the Martyrologies, the Martyrdom of Procopius is ſet on the eighth of the Ides of Fuly. The Greeks alſo celebrate the memory of the great Martyr Procopius on the ſame day, as may be ſeen in their Menæum. But that Procopius is a different perſon from ours, although he was born at Jeruſalem, and ſuffered at the ſame time almoſt, and in the ſame City, that our Procopius did. For our Procopius was a Reader, and an-Exorciſt, as Euſebius atteſts. But the other was a Captain of Egypt. The firſt Procopius was a Chriſtian from his Childhood, the ſecond was at firſt a worſhipper of Dæmons. Our Procopius was beheaded, having ſuffered no tortures, and ſo obtained the Crown of Martyrdom by a moſt compendious and eaſie kind of death. The other Procopius ſuffered a tedious and moſt cruel Martyrdom, having undergone moſt horrid tortures under two Preſidents of Paleſtine, Fuſtus and Flavianus. Upon which account he is reckoned by the Greeks amongſt the Μεγαλομάρτυρες, Great Martyrs: See book 6. chap. 32. note (b.) Laſtly, our Procopius was taken at Scythopolis, brought to Cæſarea in Paleſtine, and there beheaded. The other was apprehended in Egypt, and Martyred in Cæſarea a City of Phœnicia (which was alſo called Pancas) if we may believe Simeon Metaphraſtes. Valeſ.

[e] It is, I perceive, taken for granted amongſt all men, that the months of the Syro-Macedonians were wholly the ſame with the Julian months, from that time when Julius Cæſar publiſht his year. For Scaliger and our Petavius do in many places affirm this; and the only difference (as they ſay) was, that the Syro-Macedonians began their year from October. But, there are many things which make me diſſent from their opinion. For firſt, Bede (in his Ephemeris, and in his book De ratione Temporum) ſays, that the months of the Greeks began from Apellæus, which anſwers to December. But Marcus (in his Life of Porphyrius Biſhop of Gaza) atteſts, that thoſe of Gaza began their year from the month Dius. For theſe are his words at pag. 1090. Primo menſe qui ab eis vocatur Dios, deinde etiam ſecundo, qui dicitur Apellæos; i. e. in the firſt month which they call Dius, then alſo in the ſecond which is termed Apellæus. The Emperour Julianus (in Antiochico) confirms this, where he expreſly ſays that Lous was the tenth month amongſt the Syrians. Now, if they began their year from October, then Lous (which anſwers to Auguſt) would not have been the tenth, but the eleventh month. The ſame is manifeſted by Julianus (in Miſopogone, pag. 70.) in theſe words, ἡ πύρων ἥκει νεωλκία, καὶ ὁ Καῖσαρ αὖθις εἰς φιλίου Διὸς· εἶτα ἡ πάγκοινος ἑορτὴ, καὶ ὁ Καῖσαρ εἰς τὸ τῆς πόλεως ἔρχεται τέμενος· ὀπίσω δὲ πάλιν ἀπιὼν πάλιν εἰς φιλίου τὰς εὐχὰς ἀναλαμβάνει καὶ τὰ πάλαια· i. e. The Calends of the Syrians were come, and Cæſar goes to the Temple of Jupiter Philius again. Then came the Calends of January (For, in my notes on book 23. of Ammian. Marcellinus, pag. 252, I have ſhown that the πάγκοινος ἑορτὴ was the ſame with the Calends of January.) and Cæſar goes to the Temple of the God Genius. (Concerning the Temple of this God Genius at Antioch, See Evagrius's Hiſt. book 1. chap. 16.) Then paſſing by the ominous day, he renews his vows in the Temple of Jupiter Philius according to the cuſtome of his Anceſtours. Seeing therefore Julianus atteſts, that the New Moon of the Syrians year did a little precede the Calends of January; it is manifeſt that the beginning of the Roman and Syrian year was not the ſame. But, it may be plainly collected from the ſame place of Julian, that Dius was the firſt month of the year amongſt the Antiochians: For Julian ſays, that on the Calends of the firſt month of the Syrians, he went to the Temple of Jupiter, to ſacrifice, becauſe their firſt month was ſacred to Jupiter, and received its name from him. For it was called Dius ἀπὸ τοῦ Διὸς, from Jupiter: and the firſt month was rightly called after his name, who was thought to be the principal cauſe, and origine of all things. Now, if October were the firſt month of the Syrian year, that paſſage in Julian would have been impertinent. For, when the Antiochians would deride Julian, for his aſſiduity in worſhiping the Gods, they produce this example thereof [The Calends of the Syrians were come, and Cæſar goes to the Temple of Jupiter Philius again: then came the Calends of January, and Cæſar goes to the Temple of the God Genius.] There muſt therefore neceſſarily be ſome little ſpace of time between the Calends of the Syrians, and the Romans, that ſo Julian might deſervedly be derided by the Antiochians for his too frequent offering of ſacrifice. It is therefore neceſſary, that either Apellæus muſt have been the firſt month amongſt the Syrians, (which is Bede's opinion,) or elſe Dius. Thus far concerning the beginning of the Syro-Macedonian year; which we have demonſtrated to be different from the beginning of the Julian year. We will now inquire into the Syro-Macedonian months, and ſee whether they began and ended at the ſame time that the Roman months did. Indeed, this place in Euſebius does plainly ſhew, that the beginning of the months amongſt the Syrians and Romans was not the ſame: for it makes the eighth day of the month Deſius to be the ſame with the ſeventh of the month June. Therefore the Syrian month Deſius began one day before the Roman month June. Moreover, Marcus (in the life of Porphyrius) affirms, that the months of the inhabitants of Gaza preceded the Roman months five days. His words are theſe, Fluit autem Dominus, &c. Our Lord ſent a continued rain from the eighth day of the month Audynæus to the tenth. Now Audynæus amongſt the Romans is January. For their months precede the Roman months five days. But on the eleventh day we celebrated the Feaſt of the Epiphany, praiſing God. From which words 'tis apparent, that the beginning of the months amongſt thoſe of Gaza was almoſt the ſame with the beginning of them amongſt the Egyptians. Further, Epiphanius (in his book De Ponderib. chap. 20.) makes the ſixteenth day of May the ſame with the twenty third of the Grecian month Artemiſius. The form of the months amongſt the Tyrians was different from this; they made uſe of the Macedonian account of the months. For, in the Acts at Tyre (which are related in the ninth Action of the Council of Chalcedon) the tenth day of the month Peritius is confounded with the twenty fifth of February: and in the fifth Action Concil. Conſtantinop. ſub. Menâ, the twenty eighth day of the Tyrian month Lous is ſaid to have been the ſixteenth day of the Roman month September. From all this it may be concluded, that the account of the whole year, and of the months, was not of one and the ſame form amongſt the Syrians. For thoſe of Gaza computed them after one way, thoſe of Tyre after another, and thoſe of Cæſarea after a third manner. But, I am fully perſwaded, that the Cæſareans uſed months, wholly compoſed according to the Julian form. For, in all places of this book of Euſebius's, concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, wherever mention is made of the Macedonian months amongſt the Cæſarians, (the mention whereof does frequently occur in it;) the days of thoſe months do always agree with the days of the Roman months; excepting this only place in this firſt Chapter. Therefore, I think, that the reading in the Text of Euſebius here ſhould be thus, ἑβδόμῃ μηνὸς ἑβδόμῃ, on the ſeventh day of the month Deſius. Valeſ.

the [f] fourth day of the week. This was the DIOCLETIAN * firſt Martyrdom that was conſummated at Cæſarea in Paleſtine: but after him, very many Prelates of Churches in that Province, having at the ſame City chearfully undergone moſt grievous tortures, exhibited to the Spectatours a relation of illuſtrious Combats. But others, diſ-ſpirited by reaſon of their fear, were immediately diſcouraged at the very firſt attaque made againſt them. Every one of the reſt underwent various and interchangeable ſorts of tortures: one was ſcourged with innumerable ſtripes, another was racked, had the fleſh of his ſides ſcraped off with iron nails, and was loaded with an inſupportable burthen of [f] Ἡμέρᾳ τετράδι σαββάτων; that is, on the fourth feria, or, (to render it word for word) on the fourth day of the Sabbath, or, of the week. For the ancient Chriſtians having received a ſet account of the ſeven days of the week from the Jews, named them as they did. Therefore they called them the firſt of the Sabbath, the ſecond of the Sabbath, &c. See Tertullian in his Book De jejuniis. Sometimes they called them feriæ: Feria is the ſame with Sabbath. Therefore, as the Jews termed the week-days the firſt, the ſecond, the third of the Sabbath; and ſo on to the Seventh-day, which they called the Sabbath: ſo the antient Chriſtians termed them the firſt, ſecond, and third feria, &c. making an alteration only in this, that they did not keep the Sabbath-day holy, as did the Jews; but obſerved their Sabbath on the firſt day of the Sabbath, which they alſo called Sunday, or The Lord's Day. So Iſidorus in his Book, De Natura Rerum, Chap. 3. Bede (in his Book De Ratione Temporum) ſays the week-days were called feriæ, becauſe the Clergy-men, by the decree of Pope Sylveſter, were ordered to keep every day holy. But this opinion cannot be true; for the days of the week were called feriæ long before Pope Sylveſter's time, as Tertullian informs us. Moreover, not only the Chriſtians, but the Gentiles alſo received the computation of the week from the Jews, as Joſephus informs us, in the cloſe of his ſecond book againſt Apion. But the Gentiles called the days of the week by the names of the ſeven Planets; which names continue ſtill in uſe amongſt moſt Nations, being as it were certain reliques of the ancient errour of the Gentiles. See Tertullian in his Book Ad Nationes. Valeſ. The Eccleſiaſtical year of old began at Eaſter, the firſt week whereof was all Holyday, the days being diſtinguiſhed by prima, ſecunda, tertia, &c. added unto feria. From thence the days of any other week began to be called feria prima, ſecunda, &c. See Mr Jo. Gregory of Oxford, in his Tract De Æris & Epochis, Chap. 5. The original of the names, which we in England give to the days of the week, may be ſeen in Verſtegan's Antiquities, pag. 68, &c. Edit. Antwerp. 1605.

* Πρῶτον σημεῖον, we render primum Martyrium, the firſt Martyrdom: ſo the Latine Acts render it; whence it appears, the Tranſlator thereof did read μαρτύριον. Valeſ.

bonds,

DIOCLETIAN bonds, by reason of which some happened to have [the sinews] of their hands weakened and made feeble. Nevertheless they all endured whatever befell them agreeable to the secret judgment of God. For one being taken by the hand by some others, who led him to the Altar and thrust the impure and detestable sacrifice into his right hand, was dismissed, as if he had sacrificed. Another, who had not in any wise touched [the sacrifice,] yet when others affirmed that he had sacrificed, went silently away. A third, taken up half dead, was cast forth as if he had been so really, and being loosed from his bonds, was computed amongst their number who had offered sacrifice. A fourth, crying out, and making protestation that he would not perform what he was enjoyned by them to do, was stricken on the mouth, and being silenced by a great company of persons purposely appointed upon that account, was forcibly thrust out, although he had not sacrificed. * So highly did they every way esteem their being thought to have perfected what they desired! Of all these therefore, who were so numerous, onely Alphæus and [g] Zacchæus obtained the crown of holy Martyrdom. Who, after they were scourged, and had had their flesh scraped off with torturing irons, when they had endured most grievous bonds and cruciating pains therein, after various other tortures they were put into the stocks, where for four and twenty hours space their feet were distended to the fourth hole, and having confest that there was but one only God, and one King Jesus Christ, as if they had uttered something that was blasphemous and impious, they underwent the same sort of punishment with the first Martyr [Procopius,] and were beheaded on the seventeenth day of the month Dius, which day amongst the Romans is before the fifteenth of the Calends of December.

* See B. 8. Chap. 3.

g He was a Deacon of the Church of Gadara; Concerning whom we have this passage in the Menologie at the 18th of November: The commemoration of the holy Martyrs Michæus, Zacchæus and Zacchæus was led before the tribunal, having an heavy iron-chain about his neck. Valesi.

CHAP. II.

Concerning Romanus the Martyr.

[1] The Greeks, in their Menæum, make mention of two Romanus's, both Martyrs; the one, they say, was condemned by Asclepiades the Præfect at Antioch, in the Reign of Galerius: the other was a Deacon of Cæsarea (concerning whom Eusebius here speaks) who, as they affirm, suffered under Diocletian. But, in as much as they confess, that both of them suffered on one and the same day, (for they affirm that both of them had their tongues cut out, that they both spoke after they were cut out, and that both of them were afterwards strangled in prison,) 'tis plain, that the Greeks mistake in their making of them two distinct Martyrs. I wonder that this opinion of theirs should please Baronius in his notes on the Martyrologie. If there were two Martyrs called by the same name, to wit, Romanus, and if they both suffered Martyrdom on the same day at Antioch, why does Eusebius mention but one here? It will perhaps be answered, that Eusebius was resolved to speak of the Martyrs of Palestine onely in this book, and therefore that he onely mentioned Romanus the Deacon, because he was a Palestinian. But Eusebius has made mention of this Martyr in another place, to wit, in his second Book concerning the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ, where he acknowledges but one Romanus who was Martyred at Antioch. Valesi.

MOreover, what was done about [a] Romanus on the very same day at Antioch, does worthily deserve to be commemorated: for he, being born in Palestine, was a [b] Deacon and [b] Amongst the Primitive Christians, especially in the smaller Towns, because the Clergy were few in number, one and the same Clergy-man performed two or three Offices. Hence 'tis, that in the Acts of Procopius the Martyr, (which we related before) Procopius is said to have born three Offices at the same time in the Church of Scythopolis, to wit, the Office of a Reader, of an Interpreter, and of an Exorcist. After the same manner therefore Romanus was both a Deacon, and also an Exorcist in the Church of Cæsarea. See Vetus Author Quæstion. Vetr. & Novi Testament, ch. 101. Valesi.

[c] Exorcist in the Church of Cæsarea: coming to Antioch at that very time when the Churches were demolished; and having seen many [d] men, women, and children flocking in crouds to the Temples of the Idolls, and offering sacrifice, he judged the sight thereof to be a thing intollerable, and being incited by a zeal for the divine worship, he drew near; and crying out with a loud voice, [began] to rebuke them. Being forthwith apprehended upon account of this his boldness, he demonstrated himself (if ever any other person did) to be a most couragious witness of the Truth. For, when the Judge had condemned him to be burnt to death, having gladly received his sentence of condemnation with a cheerfull countenance and a mind most couragiously disposed, he was led to execution. Then, being bound to the stake, and the combustible matter being laid together, whilst the officers, that were about to kindle the fire, waited for the determination of the [e] Emperour who was then present, he cryed out, where is the fire [provided] for me? When he had said this, he was by command brought before the Emperour, in order to his being punished with a new sort of punishment, [to wit,] the cutting out of his tongue. Having most couragiously endured this punishment, he gave a real demonstration to all men, that the divine power is always present with those who undergo any sort of torture whatsoever for Religion, which does mitigate their pains, and corroborate them with an alacrity of mind. This couragious person therefore being sensible of the newness of his punishment, was in no wise terrified, but willingly put forth his tongue, and with a most ready alacrity produced it to those who cut it out. After which punishment he was put into bonds, and being for a long time afflicted in prison, in conclusion (when the [f] twentieth year

c There was in former times a twofold use of the Exorcists in the Church. For their business was to cleanse both those possessed with devils, and also the Catechumens; who were exorcized more than once. For after every examination in their Catechism, they were brought to the Exorcist ungirt and with their Shoes off, that they might be purged by him. See Cyril. Hierosolymit. in prolog. catecheses ad Illuminandos; and Chrysostom, in his first Homily ad Illuminandos, in his first Tome. Valesi.

[d] Many of these persons had renounced Christ, as Eusebius declares in his second Sermon concerning the Resurrection; where he speaks of the tortures inflicted on Romanus, which he mentions not here. Valesi.

[e] I suppose he means Galerius Cæsar: for Diocletian made his abode then at Nicomedia. The Cæsars, like Apparitours and Officers, went all over the bounds of their own district. Indeed, in that year when the persecution begun, Diocletian lived (together with Galerius) at Nicomedia, in April, as Eusebius attests in his eighth book. Also, a little after the persecution began, when the Imperial Palace at Nicomedia was burnt by Lightning, Diocletian was at that City, as Constantine informs us in his Oration Ad Cœtum Sanctorum. Wherefore he could not be at Antioch, when Romanus was condemned to be burnt; which happened about the beginning of the Persecution. For Romanus was strangled on the 15th of the Calends of December, after he had lain in prison some months, as Eusebius here attests. Valesi.

[f] This place is in an especial manner to be taken notice of, because it most evidently declares the year wherein Diocletian's Persecution began. For Eusebius says, that in the first year of the Persecution the Emperours Vicennalia (i. e. the Festivals for his having arrived to the twentieth year of his Reign) were kept; which can only fall on that year, wherein Diocletian was the eighth time Consul, and Maximian the seventh. For, in this year (which was the year of Christ 303.) Diocletian's twentieth year was begun at the fifteenth of the Calends of October; that being the first of Diocletian's Reign, Carinus II. and Numerianus Coss. in the year of Christ 284; as 'tis set forth in the Alexandrian Chronicle. But, there arises no small difficulty from what Eusebius here says, to wit, that Romanus suffered Martyrdom on the 17th day of November, when Diocletians Vicennalia were kept. Whence it seemes to follow, that the first day of Diocletian's Reign must have been in the month of November, and not in September, as the Alexandrian Chronicle attests. Wherefore, 'tis necessary, that either in our Eusebius, or else in the Alexandrian Chronicle, the name of the month should be mistaken. Unless we say, that Diocletians Vicennalia were kept at Antioch not on the same day which was the first of his Empire, but a little later. Eusebius indeed says (in his Chronicon) that Constantines Vicennalia were kept at Nicomedia, and in the following year celebrated at Rome.

of the Emperours Reign was come, wherein, [g] according to the uſual indulgence, liberty was publickly proclaimed to all perſons in all places that were in bonds,) he onely, lying in the ſtocks, and having both his feet diſtended to the diſtance of five holes, was ſtrangled, and (according to his deſire) was adorned with [the Crown of] Martyrdom. This perſon being a Paleſtinian, although he ſuffered [Martyrdom] without the limits of his own Country, yet deſerves to be reckoned amongſt the Martyrs of Paleſtine. Theſe things were after this manner performed in the firſt year of the Perſecution, when it raged againſt the Prelates onely of the Church.

g It was uſual amongſt the Romans, that, on the fifth and tenth years of their Emperours Reigns, offenders who were guilty of leſs notorious crimes ſhould be diſcharged from their impriſonment; the Emperours Edict being ſet forth for that purpoſe, which they called an Indulgence. See the God. Theodoſ. tit. de indulgentiis criminum. Valeſ.

CHAP. III.

Concerning Timotheus, Agapius, Thecla, and eight other Martyrs.

AFterwards, in the ſecond year, when the rage of the Perſecution againſt us was become more violent and ſharp, Urbanus being at that time Governour of the Province, the Imperial Edicts having been then firſt brought, wherein it was by a general command ordered, that all perſons in all places and Cities whatſoever ſhould publickly offer ſacrifice and incenſe to the Idols; Timotheus underwent innumerable tortures at Gaza, a City of Paleſtine: after all which he was conſumed by a remiſs and ſlow fire, and having exhibited a moſt genuine proof of his ſincere piety towards God, by a patient ſufferance under all his torments, he obtained the Crown belonging to the ſacred and victorious Champions of Religion. Agapius alſo, and that Thecla [a] who lived in our times, having (together with the foreſaid Timotheus) given a demonſtration of their moſt undaunted courage and ſtedfaſtneſs of mind, were condemned to be devoured by wild beaſts. Who is he that would not have wondred at the ſight of what followed hereupon, or that would not have been aſtoniſhed at the hearing a relation thereof? For, when the Heathens celebrated their publick Feſtivals, and [exhibited] their uſual ſhews; there was a great report, that [b] together with thoſe others whom they had a mighty eſteem for, the [Chriſtians] alſo, lately condemned, were to be expoſed to a combat with the wild beaſts [in the Amphitheatre.] This report therefore being increaſed and ſpread every where, ſix youths, whereof one was born in Pontus, by name Timolaus, another born at Tripolis a City of Phœnicia whoſe name was Dionyſius, the third was Sub-deacon of the Dioſpolitane Church, his name Romulus; beſides the two Egyptians, [c] Pauſis and Alexander; and another Alexander, name-ſake to the former, born at Gaza: [theſe ſix young men, I ſay,] having firſt bound their hands together, that they might thereby manifeſt their great readineſs and alacrity to [undergo] Martyrdom, ran in great haſt to Urbanus, as he was going to the Amphitheatre, and confeſt themſelves to be Chriſtians: and, by their being prepared to [endure] all ſorts of tortures, they demonſtrated, that thoſe who make their boaſt in the worſhip of the ſupream God, can in no wiſe be terrified at the furious aſſaults of the wild beaſts. The Preſident himſelf, and thoſe who ſtood round him, having been forthwith ſtruck with no ſmall amazement, [theſe Confeſſours] were [ordered to be] ſhut up in priſon. Not many days after two others being added to their number, (one whereof, by name Agapius, having before them undergone horrid and various ſorts of tortures, had formerly [been ſignallized] for ſeveral confeſſions: the other miniſtred bodily neceſſaries to them, his name Dionyſius) all theſe, being now made up eight in number, were beheaded on one and the ſame day at Cæſarea, [to wit] on the twenty fourth day of the month Dyſtrus, which precedes the ninth of the Calends of April. At the ſame time happened a change of the Emperours, he that had the precedency of all the reſt and the next to him in place, [having left off their Imperial attire] put themſelves into a private habit: and the affairs of the Empire began to be in an ill poſture. The Roman Empire being ſoon after divided, there brake out an implacable war between [the Romans] themſelves: neither could the diviſions, and (which were the conſequences thereof) the tumults be made up and appeaſed, before the Chriſtians throughout the whole Roman Empire had a peace ratified and firmed to them. For, as ſoon as that peace (like light after a cloudy and moſt darkſome night,) darted forth its rays upon all men, the publick affairs of the Roman Empire were again reſtored to their priſtine ſtability, amity, and peaceableneſs; all perſons recovering that mutual friendlineſs which had been derived down to them from their Anceſtours. But we will give an exacter account of theſe matters at a more opportune place and time. Now we are to proſecute the ſubſequent ſeries of our narration.

[a] Theſe words [ἢ καθ' ἡμᾶς, who lived in our times] are, not without reaſon, added by Euſebius. For by them it was his intent to manifeſt, that this Thecla ſhould be diſtinguiſhed from the other Thecla who was companion to St Paul the Apoſtle. In the Menæum, at the 19th of Auguſt, this Thecla is called, ἡ Βυζῖτις, Byzitis; the meaning whereof I know not. For this Thecla here ſpoken of was a Paleſtinian, not born at Bizua a City of Thrace. Yet, it may be, this Thecla was a Thracian: for neither were all thoſe, whoſe Martyrdoms Euſebius here relates, Paleſtinians; nor does he in this book, treat of the Martyrs of Paleſtine, but of thoſe who ſuffered Martyrdom in Paleſtine. Valeſ.

[b] The reading here is, μετ' ἄλλως αὐτοῖς καθαιρουμένων; our rendition whereof is, together with thoſe others whom they had a great eſteem for. Chriſtophorſon read μετ' ἄλλων, but took it in the neuter gender; for thus he has rendred it; inter alia quæ magnopere ipſis in optatis erant ad contemplandum, amongſt other things, which they had a great deſire to be ſpectatours of. I ſuppoſe it to be ſpoken in the maſculine gender; and that he means thoſe more eminent Beſtiarii, who amongſt the Grecians were termed θηριόβολοι, i. e. the ſtouteſt and ſtrongeſt ſort of men, who let themſelves out to combat with the wild beaſts before the people in the Amphitheatre. Such a one was he, whom the people in the Amphitheatre at Conſtantinople called for, in theſe words, δεῦν ἕνα θηρῶν θηριόβολον μάχεσθαι; which words Caſſiodorus (Hiſtor. Tripart. Lib. 2.) thus renders, crudeli beſtiæ artifex parabolus componatur. Valeſ.

[c] In the Maz. and Med. M.SS. his name is Paeſis. In the Greek Menology, (which Caniſius publiſhed) at the 15th of March, inſtead of Paeſis, he is called Publius. Valeſ.

CHAP. IV.

Concerning Apphianus the Martyr.

MAXIMINUS.

MAximinus Cæſar, [a] from the very time of his coming to the Empire, (as if he would demonſtrate to all men the tokens of his innate hatred againſt God, and of his own impiety,) attempted a more violent perſecution againſt thoſe of our Religion, than the preceding Emperours

[a] Chriſtophorſon has rendred this place thus; he tranſlates it, Maximinus Cæſar, who by his own power and ſtrength had poſſeſt himſelf of the Empire: as if αὐτόθεν, which is the Greek term here, ſignified by his own power and ſtrength. Indeed, Maximinus proclaimed himſelf Auguſtus, as our Euſebius relates in Chap. 13. Book 8. But he was made Cæſar by Galerius Maximianus. Moreover, Euſebius ſpeaks here of Maximinus, whilſt he was only Cæſar, and of the time when he had that title firſt conferred on him, to wit, in the ſecond year current of the perſecution, immediately after the reſignation of Diocletianus, and Herculius. The import therefore of Euſebius's words words is this, that Maximinus, as soon as he was made Cæsar, shewed a proof of his impiety, by a most cruel persecution of the Christians. Wherefore [αὐτόθεν] must be rendred [from the very time.] Now, Maximinus was made Cæsar in the year of Christ 304, on the Calends of April, as Idatius (in fastis) declares: which agrees very well with the account here given by our Eusebius. For he relates that Maximinus (after the Resignation of Diocletian) was created Cæsar in the second year of the persecution; immediately after which promotion (that he might shew his power) he renewed the persecution against the Christians. But this must not be understood of that very year, wherein Maximinus was made Cæsar: for during that year (affairs being then in confusion, and Galerius scarce well setled in the Empire) Maximinus was quiet. Therefore Eusebius mentions no Martyrdoms in Palestine during that year. But in the year following, which was the third of the persecution, Maximinus set forth his Edicts against the Christians, and renewed the persecution, as Eusebius expressly relates in this chapter. Vales.

MAXIMINUS [had done.] When therefore no small inquietude was impendent on all persons, and they were dispersed some in one place some in another, every one making it his chief business to avoid the danger, and all the Provinces were involved in a most terrible commotion, what expressions can be sufficient for us deservedly to set forth, the divine love, and the bold and free confession of God, made by that blessed and truly innocent Lamb, Apphianus the Martyr, who exhibited an admirable example of piety towards the only God, in the sight of all the inhabitants of Cæsarea, [b] before the Gates of that City, when he had not fully completed the twentieth year of his age? Indeed, whilst he resided at Berytus, where he had formerly spent much time upon account of [furnishing himself with] [c] secular literature, (for he had his descent from very rich parents:) 'tis wonderfull to relate how, during his continuance in that City, he subdued youthfull lusts: and having in no wise been debauch't in his moralls, either by the vigour and youthfulness of his body, or the society of his young companions, he became a lover of temperance; leading an orderly, chast, and Religious life, according to the [d] prescripts of Christianity, and framing his converse [agreeable thereto.] If it be [supposed] convenient that we should mention his Country, and commend it, because it produced so couragious a champion of piety; we will most readily do it. If any one therefore knows [e] Pagas, a City of no mean note in Lycia; there this young man was born. After his return from his studies at Berytus, (his father being promoted to the chiefest place of honour in his own Country,) he was unable to endure the converse of his father, and those that were his relations, because they refused to live according to the sanctions of Religion: but having been inspired as it were by a divine spirit, and (by reason of his innate desire after Philosophy, or rather after the divine and true wisedom) making small account of the reputed glory of this life, and contemning the delights of the body, he secretly withdrew himself from his relations: and being not at all sollicitous about a daily provision for his subsistance, because of his hope and faith in God, he was led by the hand [as it were] to the City of Cæsarea, by the divine spirit, where a crown of Martyrdom for Religion awaited him. Being [f] conversant there with us, having in a short time made a great proficiency by reading the sacred Scriptures, and furnished himself with courage of mind by congruous exercises of a strict and severe abstinence; at length he made such a glorious conclusion of his life, as whoever saw could not but be astonished thereat; and he that shall hear the bare relation of it, cannot but deservedly admire his confidence, his fearlesness, his continued earnestness and constancy of mind, and above all the boldness of his attempt, which [g] contains most evident signs of a zeal for Religion, and of a spirit more than humane. For when Maximinus renewed the insolencies practised towards us, in the third year of our persecution [under Diocletian,] and when the Tyrants Edicts were first sent abroad over all the Provinces, [ordering] the Governours to make it their chief care and business, that all the inhabitants in every City should publickly offer sacrifice; and when the Criers had made proclamation over all the City Cæsarea, that the men, together with the women and children, should by the Governours order go to the Temples of the Idols; and moreover when the Tribunes of the Souldiers had summoned every particular person by name out of a written roll; (all the [Christians] every where being put into confusion by this unspeakable storm of afflictions) this foresaid person, (having communicated to no body what he was about to do, it being unknown to us who lived in the same house with him, and even to the whole military guard that stood round the Governour,) fearlesly approach't Urbanus, as he was offering sacrifice; and, having with an intrepid mind catch't hold on his right hand, stopt him immediately from sacrificing. Then, with a divine gravity and confidence of mind he prudently advised and exhorted him to desist from that erroneous way [of worship.] For 'tis absurd [said he] to relinquish [the worship] of the one and only true God, and offer sacrifice to Idols and Dæmons. This the young man attempted, induced thereto ('tis very probable) by a divine power, which openly proclaimed [b] It is sufficiently apparent that the Greek Text is here corrupted; ἧς πρὸ πύλων being put instead of πρὸ ἧς πυλῶν; wherefore we have rendred it before the gates, &c. Eusebius confirms this correction hereafter in this chapter, where he says, that the dead body of Apphianus, which had been cast into the Sea, swam to the Cæsarian shore, hard by the gates of the City. Vales.

[c] He means the Civill Law, and the Latine tongue, the knowledge whereof was necessary for those that bore Offices in the Magistracy. At Berytus there was a School for Civil Law, as many have taken notice from Gregory Thaumaturgus, Eunapius, Nonnus, and others. Hence 'tis, that Eusebius adds the term κοσμικῆς, that is, secular, or mundane literature. Gregorius Nazianzenus (in carm. Nicobuli ad filium) calls Berytus Φοινίκης κλυτὸν ἄστυ, νόμων ἕδος αὐσονίων, A famous City of Phœnicia, the seat of the Ausonian Laws. In the Menologics of the Greeks, at the second of April, Amphianus, with his brother Ædesius, is mentioned to have been instructed in the Christian Religion by Pamphilus the Martyr, at Berytus. Vales.

[d] Κατὰ τὸν εὐθύνοντα χειστιανισμῷ λόγον; which we have rendred, according to the prescripts of Christianity: εὐθύνοντα seems to be put for πρέποντα, congruous or συμφέροντα, agreeable: which way of expression is frequently used by Eusebius. Vales.

[e] In the Med. M. S. this City is called Arpagas; in the Maz. M.S. Arapagas; in the Fuk. M.S. Harpagas; but in the margin notice is given that it should be ἅραγας, with an asperate. I never met with any thing concerning Aragas, a City of Lycia; Araxa, a City of Lycia is mentioned by Ptolemæus and Stephanus. And, in the Constantinopolitan Council, amongst the Bishops of the Province of Lycia, who subscribed to that Synod, the last that is recounted is Theanthinus Araxenus: also in the Synod of Chalcedon there is mention of Leontius Bishop of the Araxi. In the Menæum of the Greeks, Amphianus is said to have been born in Lydia. Vales.

[f] Symeon Metaphrastes; who professes he transcribed the Martyrdom of Apphianus (or, as he calls him, Amphianus) out of Eusebius, has altered this passage, thus, And having been conversant with us in divine studies, and instructed in the sacred Scriptures by the great Martyr Pamphilus, he obtained no mean habit of virtue; by which he opened a passage for himself, whereby he procured the crown of Martyrdom. But Eusebius attests here, that Apphianus was not instructed in the sacred Scriptures by Pamphilus the Martyr, but by himself: which, as I judge, is the truest account. For our Eusebius was a person much learneder than Pamphilus. But the Menæa of the Greeks, and the Menology set forth by Canisius, agree with Symeon Metaphrastes: excepting only in this, which Metaphrastes relates, that Apphianus (after he was returned from his studies at Berytus,) when he came to Cæsarea, was there instructed by Pamphilus. But in the Menæa, and in the Menology, Apphianus (with his brother Ædesius) is said to have been instructed by Pamphilus at Berytus; no mention being made of Eusebius. So carefull were the latter Grecians, that the blessed Martyr should not be said to have been instructed by Eusebius Pamphilus, who, as they perswaded themselves, was an Heretick. Vales.

[g] The reading I judge, should be [παρέχον τὰ τεκμήρια,] which contains most evident signs: for it referrs to the foregoing word [ἐγχείρημα, attempt.] Vales.

claimed as it were by this fact, that the Chriſtians (to wit, thoſe who are truly ſuch) are ſo far from being withdrawn from the worſhip of the ſupream God, which they have once imbibed, that they are not only above menaces and (which are the conſequences thereof) tortures, but alſo become more confident and fearleſs in their confeſſions, with a couragious and intrepid voice freely ſet forth the truth, and (if it were poſſible) perſwade their perſecutours to relinquiſh their ignorance, and acknowledge him who is the only true God. After this, the young man, of whom we ſpeak, was immediately (as it was likely [to happen]) torn by the Preſidents guards, in ſuch ſort as if they had been ſavage beaſts, becauſe of the audacious fact he had committed; and having moſt couragiouſly indured an infinite number of ſtripes all over his body, was forthwith committed to priſon. Where after he had lain a night and a day with both his feet diſtended in the ſtocks, on the day following he was brought before the Judge. Then being compelled to offer ſacrifice, he demonſtrated an invincible conſtancy of mind in undergoing all ſorts of pains and horrid tortures; his ſides being not once, nor twice, but many times furrowed to his very bones and entrails: and he received ſo many blows in his face and neck, that they who before had been very well acquainted with him, did not now know him, becauſe his face was ſo much ſwell'd. But, when he yielded not at [the ſuffering of] ſo many and great tortures, the tormentours by the [Preſidents] order wrap't up his feet in flax wetted in oyl, and kindled a fire under them. The pains which the bleſſed [Martyr] was put to thereby, are in my judgment inexpreſſible. For the fire, having conſumed his fleſh, penetrated to his very bones: in ſo much that the whole moyſture of his body being melted like wax, was diſtilled, and deſcended by drops. But being not overcome even by theſe tortures, (although the adverſaries were vanquiſhed, and in a manner wearied out, becauſe of his miraculous fortitude,) he was again put into bonds. On the third day after he was brought before the Judge, and having profeſſed [that he continued in] the ſame reſolution of mind, although he was already half dead, yet he was drowned in the depths of the Sea. What happened immediately hereupon, if we relate it, will, by thoſe who ſaw it not, be diſbelieved as incredible. But although we know aſſuredly this will ſo fall out, yet we can in no wiſe forbear to deliver a full narration hereof to poſterity, becauſe all the inhabitants of Ceſarea in a manner were witneſſes of what came to paſs. Indeed there was no perſon [of Ceſarea,] of what age ſoever, that was not preſent at this ſtupendious ſpectacle. After therefore they had caſt this truly ſacred and thrice bleſſed perſon into the moſt unfathomable abyſſes (as they ſuppoſed) which were in the midſt of the Sea, on a ſudden there happened an unuſual noiſe and ſhaking, which made the Sea and [h] Air about the earth tremble in ſuch a manner, that the very Earth and City were ſhaken by that motion. And at that very moment wherein this wonderfull and ſudden Earth-quake happened, the dead body of the divine Martyr was caſt up by the Sea (as being unable to containe it) before the gates of the City. Such was the Exit, which the admirable Apphianus made, on Friday the ſecond day of the month Xanthicus, which is before the fourth of the Nones of April.

[h] Τὸ πεδίον ἄπαν is the phraſe in the original; Metaphraſtes thought the ſhore was meant by theſe words; and therefore renders it circumſtans littus. But the Greeks by this expreſſion do uſually mean the Air that ſurrounds the Earth. Valeſ.

CHAP. V.

Concerning Ulpianus and Ædeſius Martyrs.

AT the ſame time, and almoſt on the ſame days, a young man in the City of Tyre, by name Ulpianus, after he had been cruelly ſcourged and endured moſt grievous ſtripes, * was ſown up in the raw hide of an Oxe, together with a Dog and a venemous Serpent, and caſt into the Sea: [a] Wherefore we thought it agreeable to make mention of this perſon at [this place wherein we have related] the Martyrdom of Apphianus. Some ſmall time after this, Ædeſius, brother (not only in reſpect of God, but by a bodily affinity alſo,) by the [b] fathers ſide to Apphianus, after [he had made] very many confeſſions, and for a long time had been cruciated in bonds; after he had been condemned to the mines in Paleſtine by the Preſidents Sentence; and after he had, under all theſe [tortures,] led a life continually like a Philoſopher, in a Philoſophick habit; (for he had acquired far more learning than his brother, in that he had applied his mind wholly to Philoſophick literature.) at length, when, at the City of Alexandria, he ſaw the Judge (who was then examining the Chriſtians) moſt extravagantly inſulting over, and enraged againſt them; one while putting various and moſt reproachful abuſes upon grave men; at another, delivering women moſt eminent for their chaſtity, and [c] Virgins that had devoted themſelves to God, to Panders, that they might be defiled with all ſorts of obſcenity: he attempted the ſame fact that his brother had done. For, becauſe what was thus performed ſeemed to him intolerable, with a valiant boldneſs he approach't the [d] Judge, and having by his words and deeds ſurrounded him with ſhame

* This was the puniſhment, which the Romans inflicted on Parricides. In Seneca's age (ſee his 5th Book, Controver. 4. at the latter end) only Serpents were put into the leathern ſack (which they termed culeus) with the Malefactor; afterwards they ſowed up an Ape and a Cock with him, and at laſt a Dog. The offender was firſt whip't with rods till the bloud came, then ſown up after this manner. See Cæl. Rhod. B. 11. Chap. 21. The Grecians had a way of putting Criminals to death, by drowning them in the Sea, which they termed καταπονησμὸν; but they made uſe of a leaden veſſell only, into which they put the Malefactor; as appears from Athenæus, B. 14; his words are theſe, Πάβχλος δὲ ὁ τῆς πολεμαίς γραμματεὺς ἐν κάννῳ τῇ νήσῳ, λαβὼν αὐτὸν, καὶ εἰς μολυβδίνην καρδίαν ἐμβαλὼν, καὶ ἀναγαγὼν εἰς τὸ πέλαγος κατεπόντισε, Patroclus therefore, Ptolemie's Governour in the Iſle Caunus, took him, and put him into a Leaden veſſell, and carried him to the Sea, and drowned him. Neither was this accounted amongſt the heavieſt ſorts of puniſhment by the Grecians, as appears from Polybius, B. 2.

[a] Διὸ μοι δοκεῖ ἐν τῇς, &c. that is, Although Ulpianus ſuffered not in Paleſtine, but in Phœnicia, yet becauſe he ſuffered Martyrdom at the ſame time, and died by the ſame ſort of puniſhment that Apphianus had inflicted on him, we judged it not unfit to make mention of him here. It is therefore apparent from theſe words, that Euſebius in this book deſigned to give an account of the Martyrs of the Province of Paleſtine only. Valeſ.

[b] In the Greek Menæum, at the ſecond day of April, Ædeſius is ſtiled Apphianus's brother by the mothers ſide. Valeſ.

[c] In the Med. Fuk. and Maz. M. SS. the term is αὐτοπαρθένους, one entire word; which, in my judgment is the better reading. Euſebius does uſually call thoſe Chriſtian Virgins by this name, who ſpontaneouſly had devoted their virginity to God. Such perſons the Latines called devotæ. For ſo Auſonius and others term them. Valeſ.

[d] The explication of this place is to be had from the Menæum of the Greeks; where Ædeſius is ſaid to have ſtruck Hierocles Prefect of Egypt (in the interim of his raging againſt the Chriſtians) with his fiſt. The words there are theſe; Ὁ δὲ αἰδέσιος, ἐν ἀλεξανδρείᾳ τῇ καθ' αἴγυπτον. τῆς τὸ χαλκᾶ μᾶλλοις παλαιπορέμβρο, ἐπειδὴ τὸν ἄρχοντα ἐφορᾶτο πυρούμενον τοὺ χριστιανὺς ἐδεδάλο, ἐωυτὸ ἀφειδήσας, αὐτοχείρως τὸν ἄρχοντα ἔπυξεν; i. e. But Ædeſius, who was [condemned] to work in the mines of Braſs, having ſeen (at Alexandria in Egypt) Hierocles the Preſident puniſhing the Chriſtians, he accounted him a deſpicable perſon, and ſtruck the Preſident with own hand. Wherefore, in this place of Euſebius, the term ἀπιμία denotes the blows given to the Preſident; and αἰσχύνη imports the reproachful language which Ædeſius gave him. Both which are intimated by Euſebius in theſe words, λόγοις τε καὶ ἔργοις, by his words and deeds. Epiphanius and Lactantius mention this Hierocles, Prefect of Egypt, who was famous for the great ſlaughter he made amongſt the Chriſtians. This was the Hierocles, againſt whom our Euſebius wrote a book. Valeſ.

MAXIMINUS and ignominy, and after that, most couragiously endured various sorts of tortures, he was thrown into the Sea, and ended his life after the same manner that his brother did. These things happened thus to Ædesius, although (as I said before) some small time after.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Martyr Agapius.

MOreover, in the fourth year of the Persecution against us, on the twentieth day of the month Dius, (which is before the twelfth of the Calends of December,) being Friday, such [a Martyrdom] was performed in the same City of Cæsarea, as worthily deserves to be recorded in writing, Maximinus the Tyrant being himself present, and exhibiting publick shews to the people because of his Birth-day. Whereas it was an ancient custom, that (if at any time) in the presence of the Emperours, splendid shews and such as were more pleasing to the mind should be exhibited to the spectatours, (new and strange spectacles, such as were different from the usuall sights [being at such a time procured, which consisted] partly of beasts brought out of India, Æthiopia, or some other place; and partly of men, who, having before accustomed themselves to certain [a] Artificial exercises of their bodies, entertained the spectatours with sights that created in them a wonderfull delight and pleasure;) then also, because the Emperour himself [was at the charge of] exhibiting those shews, something that was magnificent, and more wonderfull than usual, must necessarily be made use of in those sights. What therefore was this? A Martyr of our Religion was brought forth, to combat for the only true worship of God. His name was Agapius, the [b] Second of that name: the first (as we manifested a little before) was, together with Thecla, condemned to be devoured by the wild-beasts. He therefore (having before that time been [c] thrice [brought] out of Prison, [wherein he had been confined now three years,] and often times [d] led in pomp about the Stadium with those that were Malefactours; the Judge, after various menaces, putting him off to other combats, either out of compassion to him, or because he had hopes that he would alter his resolution,) was then produced, (the Emperour himself being there present,) being reserved as it were on set purpose for that opportunity, that that saying of our Saviour's (which by his divine knowledge he foretold his disciples) might be accomplished in him, that they should be brought before Kings for their testimony of him. He is therefore brought into the midst of the Stadium, together with a certain criminal; who was said to be guilty of murthering his master. After this, he who had killed his master, being exposed to the wild-beasts, obtained mercy and compassion [from the Emperour,] almost after the same manner that Barabbas did in our Saviour's time. At this, the whole Amphitheatre resounded with Shouts and Acclamations of joy, because the Emperour had out of his compassion saved a bloudy murtherer, and vouchsafed him honour and liberty. But this champion of Religion is first called for by the Tyrant; after which, having, with the promise of liberty, desired him to renounce the profession [of Christianity,] he professed with a loud voice; that (not for any crime but) upon account of the worship of the framer of all things, with alacrity and pleasure, he would couragiously undergoe what [punishments] soever should be inflicted on him. And, having said thus, he annexed deeds to his words, ran to meet a Bear which was let loose against him, and most willingly offered himself to be devoured by that beast. After the beast had torn him, having some breath left in him, he was carried back to Prison; where, after he had lived one day, on that following, stones were hanged at his feet, and he was drowned in the midst of the Sea. Such was the Martyrdom of Agapius.

[a] He means the Pantomimi, Mimicks that used antick, filthy, and obscene gestures; the Pegmatarii, those that managed the Machines and Images in their Plaies; the Contigeri, Pole-carriers; and Funambuli, Rope-dancers; and such other Artists, which were made use of by those that were at the charge to exhibit shews to the people. See Claudianus in his book, De Consulatu Theodori. Valesius.

[b] At first I thought the reading here should be δευτέρῳ ἔτει, in the second year: for so Eusebius had said above in Chap. 3. But the vulgar reading [to wit ὁ δεύτερος, the second of that name) is best, for he is called Agapius the Second, to distinguish him from the former Agapius, who had suffered two years before; concerning whom Eusebius speaks in the said third Chapter. Valesius.

[c] This place is corrupted, and imperfect. Christophorson reads [δεσμωτηρίου ἐξαχθείς, brought out of Prison,] which reading is not amiss. But I think there is a whole line omitted here; which I thus make up δεσμωτηρίου [ἐξαχθείς, ἐν ᾧ κατείχετο ἤδη τὸ τέταρτον,] [Brought] out of Prison [wherein he had been confined now three years.] Agapius was cast into Prison at the beginning of the second year of the Persecution. Therefore, this was the third year of his confinement. Valesius.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the Virgin Theodosia, and concerning Domninus, and Auxentius, Martyrs.

MOreover, the fifth year of the persecution being now current, on the second day of the month Xanthicus, which is before the fourth of the Nones of April, [a] on the very Lords day, the day of our Saviour's Resurrection, and also at Cæsarea, a Virgin born at Tyre, one that was a believer and a most modest maid, not eighteen years old compleat, approach't some prisoners, (who were Confessours of the Kingdom of Christ, and sate before the [b] Prætorium,) both to salute them amicably, and also (as 'tis probable) to request them that they would be mindfull of her when they came to the Lord. Having done this, as if she had committed some nefarious and impious fact, the Souldiers lay hold of her, and carry her before the President. He, in regard he was a furious person and one of a most cruel temper of mind, [ordered] that she should be cruciated with sharp and most horrid tortures, and that her sides and breasts [should be furrowed] to her very bones; [after this] breath being still left in her, having with a pleasant and chearfull countenance undergone all these tortures, by the Presidents command she was drowned in the Sea. After he had done with her, he went upon [the examination of] the other Confessours, all whom he condemned to the Brazen Mines at Phenos in Palestine. Furthermore, on the fifth day of the month Dius, that is (according to the Roman account) on the Nones of November, in the same City, to wit, Cæsarea, the said President condemned Silvanus (who then was a Presbyter and a Confessor, but some small time after was [a] In the M. S. Acts of the passion of Theodosia, she is said to have suffered not on Easter-day, but only, on a Sunday. Valesius.

[b] ἐπὶ τῷ δικαστηρίῳ; so the Greek words it. Christophorson renders it, ante tribunal considentibus, sate before the tribunal: which version I do not approve of. I have rendred it, before the Prætorium; i. e. before the palace of the President. For those prisoners stood before his Palace, waiting, until the President (before whom they were to be brought) came forth to the tribunal. This rendition is confirmed by the following words. Valesius.

MAXIMINUS. was honoured with a Biſhoprick, and happened to finiſh his life by Martyrdom) and ſome others that were his companions (after they had given demonſtration of a moſt reſolute courage and conſtancy in behalf of Religion) to labour in the ſame mines of Braſs; having firſt given order, that the flexures of their * feet ſhould be ſeared with a red hot iron, and ſo rendred infirm and uſeleſs. At the ſame time that this ſentence was pronounced againſt them, he condemned Domninus (a man very famous for innumerable other confeſſions, who for his ſingular freedom [in ſpeaking] was much taken notice of by all perſons throughout Paleſtine) to be burnt alive. After he [had been thus puniſhed,] the ſame Judge, (a crafty inventour of miſchief, and one that ſtudied new devices and deſignes [to extirpate] the doctrine of Chriſt,) found out ſuch ſorts of puniſhments for the worſhippers of God, as were never heard of before. He condemned three [and compelled them] to [c] fight with one another in ſuch a ſort as the Champions uſually did: Auxentius, a venerable and holy old man, was by him condemned to be devoured by the wild beaſts. Again, he [gave order] that ſome, who were arrived to the compleat age and ſtature of men, ſhould be cut and made Eunuchs, and then condemned them to the ſame Mines. He ſhut up others in Priſon, after they had undergone the ſharpeſt tortures. Amongſt which number was Pamphilus, my deareſt companion, a perſon that was the moſt eminent of all the Martyrs in our age for his ſingular virtue and piety: Urbanus firſt made tryall of his skill in Rhetorick and Philoſophick literature, after that he compelled him to offer ſacrifice; which when the Martyr refuſed to do, and [Urbanus] perceived that he deſpiſed his menaces, he was exceedingly exaſperated, and gave order that he ſhould be tormented with the acuteſt ſorts of torture. Moreover, this moſt enraged * man, (being in a manner ſatiated with the fleſh of the Martyrs ſides, which he [had cauſed to be torn off] with torturing irons, whereof he made a continued and reiterated uſe, pertinaciouſly deſiring thereby to get the victory [over the Martyr] having after all theſe tortures, procured nothing but ſhame and ignominy for himſelf,) at length ordered him to be caſt into Priſon amongſt the other Confeſſours therein confined. But, what ſort of puniſhment this perſon (who after ſo fierce a manner inſulted over the Martyrs of Chriſt,) was to expect, would be inflicted on him at the divine Tribunal, for his cruelty towards the Saints, is eaſily known from thoſe beginnings [thereof which he underwent] in this life. Immediately after thoſe audacious cruelties which he had practiſed towards Pamphilus, the divine vengeance forthwith ſeized him, whilſt he was as yet poſſeſt of the Government. Which on a ſudden, in one nights ſpace, ſtript him (who but the day before ſate as Judge upon a lofty Tribunal, was attended with a Military Guard, governed the whole Province of Paleſtine; who alſo was companion to the Tyrant himſelf, for he was his chief favourite, and did uſually eat at the ſame table with him) of all theſe great places and preferments, and reduced him to a diſconſolate and helpleſs condition; clouded him with ignominy and ſhame in the ſight of thoſe very perſons, who had formerly admired him as their Governour; propoſed him to the whole Nation, over which he had been Ruler, as a miſerable and diſ-ſpirited wretch, pouring forth effeminate intreaties and ſupplications; and laſtly, conſtituted Maximinus himſelf (of whoſe favour he had in former times bragged and boaſted, having been dearly beloved by him by reaſon of the cruelties he practiſed towards us Chriſtians) his inexorable and moſt ſevere Judge in the very City of Cæſarea. For, after many reproaches, which he ſuffered upon account of thoſe crimes, of which he was convict, the Emperour himſelf pronounc't ſentence of death againſt him. But thus much we have ſaid by the by. There may happen a ſeaſonable opportunity, wherein we ſhall be more at leiſure to relate the exits and calamitous deaths, by which thoſe impious wretches, (eſpecially Maximinus and thoſe about him who were his adviſers,) that were the greateſt ſtickler's in the Perſecution againſt us, finiſhed their lives. MAXIMINUS.

* Τῶν ποδῶν τὰς ἀξυλας, flexures of their feet; that's the import of the Greek: Valeſius renders it, pedum juncturæ, the joynts of their feet.

[c] See the following chapter; from whence we are informed, that thoſe who were condemned to ſuch combats, were delivered to the Procurators of Cæſar, who cauſed them to practiſe and exerciſe daily, that ſo at laſt they might be fit to engage in a combat. Valeſ.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning other Confeſſours, and concerning the Martyrdom of Valentina and Paul.

WHen the ſtorm [of perſecution] had now without any intermiſſion raged againſt us untill the ſixth year, [there was] a very great number that were Confeſſours of the divine Religion, who [a] heretofore had lived in Thebaïs, at Porphyrites, a place that had its appellation from the name of the Marble dug out there: of which [company] an hundred men, (wanting three,) together with their wives and very ſmall children, were ſent to the Preſident of Paleſtine. Concerning all which perſons, after they had made their confeſſion of God [the Framer] of all things, and of Chriſt, Firmilianus the Preſident (who was ſent thither as ſucceſſour to Urbanus,) gave order, agreeable to the Emperours command, that they ſhould have thoſe very ſinews of their left legs, by which they bent their knees, ſeared in two with red-hot-irons; and that their right eyes, together with the membranes and balls thereof, ſhould be firſt cut out with ſwords, and after that [their eye-holes] ſeared even to the very bottome with red-hot-irons. After which, he ordered they ſhould be ſent to work in the Mines that were in the Province, that they might be worn out there with labours and miſeries. Nor did we behold theſe perſons only undergoing ſuch puniſhments, but thoſe Paleſtinians alſo; (who, as we manifeſted a little before, were condemned to practiſe the Champions exerciſes, in order to their being made fit to engage in the Gladiatours Combats;) becauſe they would not endure, either to receive thoſe Proviſions which were allowed them out of the Imperial treaſury, or to practiſe ſuch exerciſes as were neceſſary to render them accompliſh't Combatants. For which reaſon they were brought not only before the [b] Procuratours, but Maximinus himſelf: and, having given a demonſtration of their

[b] He means, as I judge, the Procuratours of the company of the Gladiatours, and of the morning Exerciſes; of whom there is frequent mention in the old Inſcriptions. For the Gladiatours, that were maintained by ſtipends paid out of the Imperial Exchequer, were committed to their care, and they gave them their allowances out of the Treaſury. Valeſ.

MAXIMINUS. invincible constancy in the confession [of Christ,] and of their couragiousness in enduring famine and scourges, they suffered the same punishments with the forementioned persons; some other Confessours in the City of Cæsarea being added to their number. Soon after these, others were taken at the City Gaza, [c] who were Assembled to hear the sacred Scriptures read, some of whom suffered the same tortures in their feet and eyes with the forementioned persons; but others of them under-went more acute and horrid torments in the sides of their bodies. One of which number, as to her Sex a woman, but a person of a masculine and couragious temper of mind, unable to endure the menaces of ravishment; having uttered some expressions against the Tyrant, (because he committed the Government [of Provinces] to such cruel Judges,) was first scourged: then, being hung up a great heighth on [an Engin of] wood, she was tortured in the sides of her body. But when the officers, appointed for that purpose, did, by the Judges order, apply their tortures to her with a most continued and exquisite vehemency, another woman, who (like the former) had taken upon her the vow of virginity, (as to the composure of her body she was indeed no very taking object, and her aspect was despicable, but she was endowed with a couragious temper of mind, and was corroborated with a valour above her Sex, and far excelled those Championesses amongst the Grecians so much famed for their freedom in speaking;) being unable to endure the sight of those merciless, cruel, and inhumane practises, cried out with a loud voice to the Judge, out of the midst of the crowd, How long will you thus unmercifully torture my Sister? The Judge, highly exasperated by that expression, forthwith gave command the woman should be laid hold on. She was then haled forth before him: and * having assumed to herself our Saviours venerable appellation, first she was sollicited by kind words to offer sacrifice: which when she refused to do, they drew her by force before the Altar: But she, behaving her self like her self, retained her former alacrity of mind, with an intrepid and undaunted foot trampled upon the Altar, and overturned that, together with [d] what lay upon it. Upon which account the Judge, enraged like a Savage beast, first gave order, that she should suffer more and greater tortures in her sides, than any one had before undergone: [for] he seemed in a manner desirous to gorge himself with her raw flesh. But when his rage was satiated, he ordered they should both (namely this last with her whom she called sister) be fastned together, and condemned them to be burnt to death; the [e] former of these persons, 'tis said, was born in the Country of the Gazites: you must understand that the other, well known to most men by the name of Valentina, had her original extract at Cæsarea. But with what expressions can I deservedly set forth that Martyrdom (which followed immediately hereupon,) wherewith the thrice-blessed Paul was adorned? This person, having had sentence of death pronounced against him at that very interim these Virgins were condemned, when he was to be put to death, entreated the Executioner (who stood ready to cut off his head) to allow him a short space of time. Having obtained his request, with a clear and audible voice he first prayed for all those who were professours of the Christian Religion, beseeching God, that he would be reconciled to them, and quickly bestow on them liberty and security: then he supplicated for the Jews access to God by [the faith of] Christ: after this, he proceeded in an orderly method, putting up the same petitions even for the Samaritans; and besought God for the Heathens, that they, now entangled in errour and an ignorance of God, might arrive to an acknowledgment of him, and undertake the [profession of] the true Religion; neither did he [in his petitions] omit to mention the promiscuous crowd that surrounded him. After all these (O the great and ineffable patience and mildness of his mind!) he besought the supream God for the very Judge by whom he had been condemned to die, for the Emperours, and also for the Executioner (who stood ready to strike off his head,) both in the hearing of him himself, and of all those also that were present, beseeching [God] that the sin they committed [by taking away his life] might not be imputed to them. Having with a loud voice made these petitions, and melted almost all that were present into compassion and tears, because he was unjustly put to death, [f] nevertheless he made himself ready, and, yielding his naked neck to be cut asunder by the sword, he was crowned with divine Martyrdom, on the twenty fifth day of the month Panemus, that is, before the eighth of the Calends of August. Such was the exit of these [Martyrs.] Not long after, an hundred and thirty Champions, of the same country, to wit, Egypt, admirable for their confession of Christ, having by Maximinus's order undergone the same calamitous [tortures] in their eyes and feet with those formerly mentioned who suffered in Egypt, were condemned and sent away, part of them to the forementioned Mines in Palestine, and part to those in the Province of Cilicia.

MAXIMINUS.

[c] Christophorson supposed these persons to be Priests and Deacons, who had convened the people to hear the sacred Scriptures read: which at that time they were compelled to do in private houses. For, their Churches and Oratories being then demolished, the Christians had only private-houses to Assemble themselves in. Vales.

* That is, having acknowledged her self to be a Christian.

[d] He means the Frankincense, &c. Vales.

[e] This Virgins name is wanting here: But we will supply this defect, from the Grecian Menology; where this passage occurs, at the 15th of July: on the same day, the Holy Martyrs, Valentina and Thea, which were Egyptians, being brought to the City Dio Cæsarea before Firmilianus the Judge, made confession of Christs Name, who is our God; after which, their left feet being burnt, and their right eyes pulled out, they were killed with a sword, and their bodies burnt. But this account disagrees with our Eusebius's relation here. For he says, the one was born at Gaza, the other at Cæsarea: and he makes no mention of the burning of their feet, or of the pulling out their right eyes. Vales.

[f] In the Fuk. & Savil M. SS. instead of [ὅμως αὐτὸς ἑαυτὸν ἐχειρίσατο, nevertheless he made himself ready] the reading is [ὃ νόμος, &c. as the usual manner was, &c.] which reading, in my judgment, is not to be despised. Mention is made of this Paul's Martyrdom, in the Menology, at the fifteenth of July. Vales.

That the Persecution was afresh renewed: and concerning Antoninus, Zebina, Germanus, and other Martyrs.

NOw, after such Valiant Exploits as these, performed by Christ's noble Martyrs; when the flame of Persecution was somewhat abated, and, as it were, extinguished by their sacred bloud; when those in Thebais (condemned for [their confession of] Christ to labour in the Mines there,) were permitted to enjoy rest and liberty; and when we hoped to see some few calme and serene days: then did *He (who had gotten the power of persecuting) reassume his rage against the Christians, upon what account or by what impulse, I know not. For, on a sudden, Maximinus's Edicts against us were sent to all places throughout every Province:

MAXIMINUS.

Province: and the Preſidents and [a] Prefect of the Prætorium by injunctions, Letters, and Publick Orders excited the * Curators in every City, the Magiſtrates, and [b] Tabularii to put in Execution the Imperial Edict, [c] which contained an Order, that the decayed Idol-Temples ſhould with all diligence be repaired; that all perſons, men, women, ſervants and young children ſhould be compelled to do ſacrifice, and by all means imaginable forced to eat part of the fleſh which had been offered; that the proviſions expoſed to ſale in the Markets ſhould be defiled with ſuch things as had been ſacrificed; and that ſome ſhould be ordered to ſit and watch before the [Publick] Baths, to the end they might pollute ſuch as came to cleanſe themſelves therein, with the execrable ſacrifices. Whilſt theſe things were after this manner put in execution, the anxieties of the Chriſtians, as it was likely, were renewed and increaſed: yea, the Gentiles that were unbelievers [look't upon] what was done to be intollerable, and condemned theſe barbarities, as abſurd and too outragious: for, even to them ſuch actions ſeemed abominable and odious. When [therefore] ſuch a fierce ſtorm [of perſecution] was impendent on all perſons every where, the divine power of our Saviour did again infuſe ſo great a courage and confidence into his Champions, that, when no body induced or urged them to it, they contemned theſe high menaces of their Adverſaries. Wherefore, three believers with a joynt conſent ruſh in upon the Preſident then offering ſacrifice to Idols, and call out to him to deſiſt from his errour: for there is [ſaid they] no other God, but He that is the Framer and Maker of all things. Being hereupon ask't who they were, they boldly profeſt themſelves to be Chriſtians: at which Firmilianus was highly exaſperated, and paſſed ſentence of death upon them, [d] without inflicting on them any previous tortures. One of theſe was a Presbyter, by name [e] Antoninus; the name of the ſecond was Zebinas, by Country an Eleutheropolitane; the third was called Germanus. On the thirteenth day of the month Dius, that is, on the Ides of November, all this was done to theſe perſons. On the ſame day they had a fellow-traveller added to their number, a woman of Scythopolis, by name [f] Ennathas, who was adorned with the [g] Badge of Virginity. She had not indeed done what the former [three] did, but was carried by force and ſet before the Judge. Therefore, after ſhe had been ſcourged and moſt groſly abuſed; (all which injurious uſages were audaciouſly perpetrated, without any order from the ſuperiour Magiſtracy, by one of the Tribunes in the neighbourhood, called Maxys, a man worſe than his name, one indeed that was ſtout and of an undaunted courage, but as to his Morals, in all reſpects very impious, of a cruel diſpoſition, and odious to all his acquaintance. This fellow ſtript the bleſſed virgin ſtark naked, (in ſuch a manner that ſhe was covered only from her loyns down to her feet, but the reſt of her body was bare;) led her round the City Cæſarea, and look't upon it as a piece of gallantry to drag her through all the Market-places in the City, and ſcourge her) after [I ſay] ſhe had endured ſo many ſtripes, having given a demonſtration of her moſt undaunted courage and conſtancy of mind before the Preſidents Tribunal, the Judge commanded ſhe ſhould be burnt alive. This * Man improved his inhumanity and rage, ſhown towards Gods worſhippers, to the heighth, and tranſgreſt even the Laws of Nature; for he was not aſhamed of denying burial to the dead bodies of thoſe ſacred perſons. Upon which account he gave order, that the dead bodies (which were expoſed in the open Air, to be devoured by wild-beaſts,) ſhould be carefully guarded night and day: and you might have ſeen for many days together no ſmall number of men, buſily obeying this beaſtly and barbarous order: ſome of whom (as if this had been a matter of high concern and moment) watched on a Tower, that the dead might not be ſtolen away. Alſo, the wild-beaſts, dogs, and fowls that preyed on fleſh, ſcattered here and there pieces of mens bodies: and the whole City was ſtrewed all over with mens bowels and bones. So that, nothing did ever ſeem more cruel and horrid, even to thoſe who before had been our enemies; all perſons bewailing not ſo much their calamitous condition towards whom theſe things were done, as the abuſe that was put upon themſelves, and on mankind in general. For, even to the very gates [of the City] ſuch a ſpectacle was propoſed to publick view, as ſurpaſſed all the bounds of expreſſion, and exceeded any the moſt tragical relation; [to wit] the fleſh of mens bodies, which were devoured not in one place, but lay ſcattered every where. Yea, ſome affirmed they ſaw limbs of men, whole bodies, and pieces of bowels even within the City. After theſe [horrid butcheries] had been practiſed for many days together, there happened this miracle. The weather was fair, the air clear, and the whole face of heaven moſt ſerene and bright; when, on a ſudden, from all the columns, which under-prop't the publick Galleries throughout the City, there fell many drops, in the form of tears: and the Market-places and ſtreets, (no moiſture having faln from the Air,) were wet and beſprinkled with water which came from an unknown place. In ſo much that a report was immediately ſpread amongſt

* The Preſident.

[a] I judge, he means the Præfect of the Prætorium: for at that time they took care of Military matters. Indeed, Euſebius's following words are a ſufficient evidence, that the Præfect of the Prætorium is meant here: for he ſpeaks of the injunctions, and publick orders given to the Curators, Magiſtrates, and Tabularii of every City: which Orders were iſſued out by the Præfect of the Prætorium only; as might be made appear from ſeveral places. See Book 9. Chap. 1. & 9. where Euſebius ſpeaks of Sabinus Præfect of the Prætorium to Maximin.

* See Book. Chap. 11. note (b.)

[b] Theſe Officers had in their cuſtody the publick Tables, or Rolls of the Cities, and look't after the accounts of the Tribute. They were firſt called Numerarii: afterwards Valens made a Law, that they ſhould be called Tabularii. See Valeſius's notes on Amm. Marcell. Book. 28. pag. 348.

[c] Inſtead of [ἀπόταγμα κελεύοντες,] as it is in Robert Stephens's Copy; in the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savill: M. SS. the reading is [κελεῦον ὡς ἦν, which contained an Order that, &c.] which is the better reading: for Euſebius here relates the Contents of Maximin's Edict. Valeſ.

[d] Euſebius notes this, as a thing new, and unuſual; not that he deſigned to praiſe Firmilianus the Preſidents clemency, becauſe he did not torture the Martyrs; but he would hereby ſhew the precipitancy and rage of the man; in regard he commanded, the Martyrs (who had provoked and confuted him) ſhould be immediately led away to be put to death, without ſuffering any tortures before their execution; as the common uſage was. For the Roman Judges did uſually torture the Chriſtian Martyrs before they diſpatch't them, to the end thoſe valiant Champions might not finiſh their lives by too eaſie a death. Nor was this uſually done to the Martyrs only; but generally as often as any hainous offenders were brought to examination, they were firſt tortured. And although the guilty perſon confes't the fact, yet did not the Judge preſently order him to be releas't from his tortures; but continued to inquire out the conſequences: for example, how often he had done the fact, with what weapons, and in what places: then he queſtioned him about his companions and accomplices. See Tertullian, in his book Ad Nationes; and in his Apologetick, chap. 2. Valeſ.

[e] In the Greeks Menology, this man is called Antonius, where (beſides Zebinas and Germanus) there is a fourth companion of theirs named, to wit, Nicephorus. For the 12th day of November this paſſage occurs: the birth-day of the holy Martyrs Antonius and his fellows, who were [put to death] in the times of Maximinus. Antonius was an old man; Nicephorus, Zebinas, and Germanus were in the flower of their age. They were taken at Cæſarea and after they had boldly confeſſed Chriſt, were ſlain. Here you ſee, the Authour of the Menology has rendred πρεσβύτερον an old man, not a Presbyter. Valeſ.

[f] In the Greek Menology ſhe is called Manatho. Valeſ.

[g] Euſebius means a little Mitre of purple-coloured-wool; which was the badge of profeſs't Virginity, as Optatus informs us, in his ſixth book. Valeſ.

amongst all people, that the earth, unable to bear the horrid impieties then committed, did shed tears in an inexplicable manner; and that the stones and senseless matter wept at what was done, to reprove the barbarous and unmercifull dispositions of men. This thing will, I doubt not, be lookt upon as fabulous and a ridiculous story by succeeding generations: but they did not account it such, who had the certainty thereof confirmed to them by the authority of those times in which it happened.

CHAP. X.

Concerning Peter the Ascetа, Asclepius the Marcionite, and other Martyrs.

ON the fourteenth day of the following month, called Apellæus, which is before the nineteenth of the Calends of January, some other Egyptians, (going to minister to the Confessours in Cilicia) were apprehended by those persons, that were set at the gates [of the City] to examine such as passed by: part of whom received the same sentence with those they were going to minister to, having their eyes and feet rendred useless. But three of them were put into bonds at the City Ascalon, where after they had given an admirable demonstration of their courage, they finished their lives by a different sort of Martyrdom. One of them, by name Ares, was burnt to death: the other two, whose names were [a] Probus and Elias, were beheaded. On the eleventh day of the month Audynæus, which is before the third of the Ides of January, [b] Peter the Ascetа, called also Apselamus, (who came from Aneas a village that lies near to Eleutheropolis,) being refined by fire like the purest gold, exhibited an illustrious proof of his faith in God's Christ, at the City Cesarea. For when the Judge and those about him intreated him earnestly to be compassionate towards himself, and take pity upon his own youthfullness and vigour; he contemned [their exhortations,] and preferred his confidence in the supream God before all things, yea even life it selfe. Together with this person [suffered] one Asclepius, (reported to have been a Bishop of the Sect of the Marcionites, out of a zeal to piety, (as he thought,) but such an one as was not according to knowledge,) and finished his life in the same fiery pile. These things were performed after this manner.

[a] In the Greek this mans name is Promus: but, I suppose, it should be Probus. For I never met with such a proper name as Promus. This mistake arose from hence; in ancient M. SS. Beta is usually written like My. In the Fuk. and Savil M. SS. 'tis Probus. Vales.

[b] Mention is made of this person in the Greek Menea, at the 14th of October; although Eusebius says he suffered on the 3d of the Ides of January. In the Meneum he is called Auselamus: But, in the Menology Anselamus is, by a mistake, put for Auselamus, or Abselamus: the import of the passage there is this: On the same day is the commemoration of the holy Martyr Petrus Anselamus of Eleutheropolis, who being in the flower of his age, and of a vigorous mind, behaved himself most admirably in the conflicts he underwent for Religion; and, having despised earthly things, was by fire offered up as a victim well pleasing to God, in the sixth year of Diocletian's and Maximian's Empire. In which passage, this is observable, that the sixth year of Diocletian's Empire is put for the sixth year of the persecution. Vales.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning Pamphilus, and twelve other Martyrs.

[a] Symeon Metaphrastes has transcribed this whole relation of the Martyrdom of Pamphilus and his companions, out of our Eusebius; adding some things, and altering others, as he usually does. But he seems to have been furnished with more perfect copies of Eusebius, than those we now have which will manifestly appear to the Reader; who may meet with Metaphrastes's account hereof in that Latine version of him, which Lipomanus and Surius put forth; Tome the third, at the first of June; pag. 139. Edit. Venet. Anno. 1581. Vales.

[a] THE time now calls upon me to Record that great and famous spectacle, which they [exhibited] who were perfected by Martyrdom together with Pamphilus, [a person] whose name and memory I have a great honour and high esteem for. They were in all twelve, being vouchsafed a [b] Prophetick, or rather Apostolick, grace, and equall to them in number, Pamphilus was their Principal, the only person amongst them that was adorned with the honour of a Presbytership in the Church at Cesarea: [c] A man eminent for all manner of virtue, even throughout his whole life; [whether we consider] his renunciation and contempt of the world; or the liberal contributions [he made] of his goods to those that were necessitous; or his disregard of worldly preferments and expectations; or lastly, his Philosophick, severe, and Ascetick course of life. But, he was most especially eminent, even beyond all men in our times, for his earnest and unwearied studies in the sacred Scriptures, for his indefatigable assiduity about those things he proposed to himself to do, and for the good offices he did to his relations and all other persons that made their addresses to him. This persons other virtues and egregious performances, which require a larger relation, we have already comprized in three books, being a peculiar work which we wrote concerning his Life. If therefore any are desirous of knowing these things more fully, we remit them thither; at present [d] let us prosecute our subsequent narration concerning the Martyrs. The second person, after Pamphilus, that entred the combat, was Valens, a [e] Deacon of Ælia, honourable for his holy gray hairs, and as to his aspect a venerable old man; better skilled in the sacred Scriptures than any of the rest. For he had imprinted them in his memory so perfectly, [f] that no difference could be discerned between his reading out of a book, and repeating by heart, whole pages of any part of Sacred Writ. The third person, famous amongst them, was Paul, born at the City Jamnia, a man very fervent and zealous in acting, and filled with a warmth and ardour of spirit: before his Martyrdom, he had been engaged in the combat of confession, having endured the searing [of his flesh] with red hot irons. After these persons had spent two years time in prison, the arrival of some other Egyptian brethren was the occasion of their Martyrdom, who

[b] He means the Minor Prophets, who were twelve in number: this passage is more clearly expresst in Metaphrastes, thus: It is worth our while to admire the number of the men, which represents a certain Prophetick and Apostolick grace. For, it happened that they were in all twelve; of the same number with the Patriarchs, Prophets and Apostles, as we are informed. Vales.

[c] This passage also is more perfect in Metaphrastes, after this manner: He was Pamphilus, a man truly pious, loving and friendly towards all men, really demonstrating the truth of his name; [the import of Pamphilus, is, friend to all men:] the ornament of the Church at Cæsarea, &c. See Lipomanus and Surius's version of Metaphrastes, at the fore-cited place. Vales.

[d] In the Maz. Med. and Fuk. M. SS. 'tis [ἐρχώμεθα, let us prosecute] in the Imperative mood. Moreover, hence we may make this manifest collection, to wit, that this Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine was Eusebius's own work, written by him after his Books concerning Pamphilus's Life, and after his Ecclesiastick History. Vales.

[e] There may be a double meaning given of these words. For the import of them may be, either that Ælia was Valens's country, or that he was a Deacon of the Church of Ælia. Symeon Metaphrastes followed this latter sence, as appears from his words. The like ambiguity I took notice of before, book 5. chap. 1. note (o) where we spoke concerning Sanctus a Deacon of Vienna. Vales.

[f] 'Tis easily discernable, that the Greek Text is here corrupted; I suppose it may be thus amended; ὡς μὴ ἐνδεῖν τῆς ἀπὸ γραμμάτων ἐκλεύξεως, τὸ ἧς πόθεν ἂν λάβοι γραφῆς διασαφῶν αὐτὸν ἀπομνημονεύσαι δεξόδως· which reading we have followed in our version; and it agrees with Symeon Metaphrastes's interpretation, as 'tis evident from Gentianus Hervetus's translation in Lipomanus's Edition at the month of February; see note (a) in this chapter. But Hervetus has rendred ἀπομνημονεῦσαι, to get by heart; whereas that term signifies, to recite by heart, as we observed before. Vales.

MAXIMINUS. alſo ſuffered with them. Theſe Egyptians had accompanied the Confeſſours ſent into Cilicia, to the Mines there. As they were returning to their own country, at the entrance of the gates of Cæſarea they were examined (in the ſame manner with thoſe before mentioned) by the guard (men of a barbarous diſpoſition) who they were, and whence they came; and, having concealed nothing of the truth, as if they had been Malefactours taken in the very act, they were put into bonds. They were five in number; and when they were brought before the Tyrant, and had ſpoken boldly and freely in his preſence, they were forthwith committed to priſon. The next day (which was the 19th of the month Peritius, according to the Roman account before the 14th of the Calends of March,) order was given, that they, together with Pamphilus and his forementioned companions, ſhould be brought before the Judge. In the firſt place, he made tryal of the Egyptians invincible conſtancy, by all ſorts of torments, and various and new invented engines [of torture.] When [g] he had made uſe of theſe cruelties towards the chief of theſe perſons, firſt he asked him who he was. After he had heard him give himſelf the name of ſome Prophet inſtead of his proper name; (for they made it their buſineſs to call themſelves by names different from thoſe given them by their Parents, which were perhaps the names of Idols; therefore you might have heard them name themſelves Elias, Jeremiah, Iſaiah, Samuel, or Daniel, repreſenting not only by their actions, but by their proper names alſo, the true and genuine Iſrael [h] of God, which [conſiſts] of thoſe that are [i] inwardly Jews.) After [I ſay] Firmilianus had heard the Martyr give himſelf ſuch a name, being wholly unacquainted with the powerfull import thereof, in the ſecond place he enquired, what Countryman he was: the Martyr expreſſed himſelf in this his ſecond reply agreeable to his former anſwer, and ſaid, Jeruſalem was his Country; meaning that Jeruſalem, of which Paul ſpeaks--* But Jeruſalem which is above, is free, which is the mother of us all: and [in another place,] † Ye are come to mount Sion, and unto the City of the living God, the heavenly Jeruſalem: the Martyr meant this [Jeruſalem.] But the Judge, having his mind depreſſed with low and terrene thoughts, was extraordinarily inquiſitive what City this was, and in what Country it lay. Then he applied tortures, that he might [force him thereby to] confeſs the truth. But he, having both his hands wreſted behind his back, and his feet broken with certain new Engines [of torture,] ſtifly affirmed, that he ſpoke true. Again, being after this often asked, what City that he ſpoke of was, and where it lay, he replied, that that was their Country only, who were Gods worſhippers. For none but they ſhould enter it; and it was ſcituate Eaſtward, and towards the riſing Sun. After this manner did the Martyr Philoſophize again, agreeable to his own ſentiments, wholly diſregarding thoſe that on all ſides were tormenting of him: but, as if he had had neither fleſh nor body, ſeemed to be altogether inſenſible of his tortures. But the Judge, doubtful and perplexed in his mind, was in a great rage, ſuppoſing that the Chriſtians were about erecting a City that would be an enemy, and in an hoſtile manner oppoſe the Romans. Upon which account he was very diligent in his enquiries about it, and in ſearching out that country in the Eaſt ſpoken of [by the Martyr.] But when he perceived that the young man (after he had torn him with innumerable ſtripes, and inflicted on him tortures of all ſorts,) was immutable and firmly perſiſted in what he had ſaid before, he paſſed ſentence of death upon him. Thus were the tragick [cruelties,] uſed towards this Martyr, concluded: and when he had practiſed the like Preface of tortures upon the reſt, he deſtroyed them by the ſame ſort of death. Being then wearied out, and perceiving that he did in vain inflict tortures upon theſe men, [k] when his deſires were ſatiated, he paſſed to Pamphilus and his companions. And [although] he had by experience found, that in defence of their faith they had before demonſtrated an alacrity of mind not to be vanquiſhed by tortures; [yet] he again asked them, whether they would now be obedient to the Imperial commands; and when he could get nothing out of any one of them, beſides that laſt confeſſion which is made in Martyrdom, he condemned them to undergo the ſame puniſhment with the forementioned Martyrs. Theſe things being finiſhed, a youth, [l] one that belonged to Pamphilus's family, (in regard he had been educated under the genuine diſcipline and converſe of ſo eminent a perſon;) as ſoon as he underſtood that ſentence [was pronounc't] againſt his maſter, called aloud out of the midſt of the crowd, and requeſted that their dead-bodies might be interred. But [the Judge, (who deſerves not to be called a man] but a wild beaſt, or any creature elſe [that can be thought] more fierce than a wild beaſt) ſhewed no compaſſion towards his youthful years; and, having found, upon his bare asking the young man that he confeſſed himſelf a Chriſtian; ſwelled with rage, as if he had been wounded by ſome dart, ordered the torturers to make uſe of their utmoſt force againſt him. But after he ſaw, that he refuſed to be obedient to his commands in offering ſacrifice, he ordered that his fleſh (as if it had not been the body of a man, but either ſtones, or wood, or ſome ſuch ſenſeleſs thing) ſhould without any intermiſſion be torn even to his very bones and inmoſt receſſes of his bowells. Which being performed for a long time together, the Judge perceived his attempts were vain; [for although] his body was mangled all over with the tortures, [yet] he

MAXIMINUS.

[g] Ἐγγυμνάσας (the term here uſed) ſeems to be taken paſſively, for ἐγγυμναθεὶς. For Euſebius's meaning is, that Firmilianus the Judge was well verſed in paſſing ſuch ſentences, and in extracting examinations by tortures. But, becauſe the ſame term is taken in an active ſenſe hereafter in this chapter, it ought alſo to be taken ſo here. By the term [ἄθλα] Euſebius means, the ſcourges and tortures. Valeſ.

[h] Theſe words [τῷ Θεῷ, of God] are wanting in the Med. M. S. Euſebius's meaning is, that thoſe Ægyptians who gave themſelves the names of Iſraelites, or Jews, did both by their actions and names repreſent the true and genuine Iſrael, and thoſe Jews, who were inwardly ſuch. Valeſ.

[i] Euſebius alludes to that paſſage in St Paul, (Rom. 2. 28, 29.) where the Apoſtle makes two ſorts of Jews: ſome that were Jews ἐν φανερῷ, outwardly; others that were ſuch ἐν κρυπτῷ, inwardly: the former, as he affirms, are not truly Jews, becauſe they obſerved the bodily ceremonies only of the Law: the latter are really Jews; whoſe Circumciſion is that of the heart, in the Spirit, and not in the Letter. See Origen, Chap. 1. Philocal. Valeſ.

* Galat. 4. 26. † Heb. 12. 22.

[k] Euſebius ſeems to mean Firmilianus's deſire of knowing from the Egyptian Martyrs, where that Jeruſalem was, which they called their Country. Whence we may make this remark by the by, that 'tis ſufficiently evident, (as we obſerved before, Book 4. Chap. 6. note e.) there was no City upon earth at that time called Jeruſalem. Otherwiſe Firmilianus Preſident of Paleſtine, would never have been ſo earneſt in his enquiries of the Martyrs, where Jeruſalem was ſcituated. But, the Greek term [ἐπιθυμία] cannot, I think, be taken in that ſenſe I have mentioned. Indeed, this place is obſcure, and (if I miſtake not) faulty. Therefore Symeon Metaphraſtes, when he tranſcribed this paſſage from Euſebius, on ſet purpoſe omitted theſe words. Valeſ.

[l] At this place Symeon Metaphraſtes adds ſome words, which deſerve to be ſet down here. Nondum autem dictum, &c. [The Judge] had ſcarce made an end of ſpeaking, when a young man, belonging to Pamphilus's family, called out at ſome diſtance; and, coming out of the midſt of the crowd into the preſence of thoſe who ſate round in the place of Judicature, requeſted that their bodies might be interred. This was the B. Porphyrius, one of Pamphilus's own breeding, not full eighteen years old, [a youth] well ſkilled in the Art of writing; but one that concealed theſe praiſes by his modeſt behaviour, in regard he had been educated under ſo eminent a perſon. Valeſ.

MAXIMINUS. he continued silent, and was as insensible of pain, as if he had in a manner been lifeless. [Nevertheless] the Judge, still persevering in his merciless and inhumane cruelty, immediately condemned him to be burnt (in the same habit he was in) by [m] a slow fire. And thus this person (although he was the last that entred the combat, yet) prevented his master after the flesh, in that he obtained his departure out of this life before him; those, who were busied about [vanquishing] the former Martyrs, hitherto making some delays. You might therefore have seen Prophyrius [for that was his name,] in quality like a valorous champion who had been conquerour in all manner of exercises belonging to the Sacred games, proceeding forth to his death after he had suffered so great tortures, with a body covered all over with dust, but with a chearful countenance, and a mind full of joy and confidence: he was most truly filled with the divine spirit; and, being clad in a * Philosophick habit, (having only a garment wrapt about him, in fashion like unto a [n] cloak,) with a calm and sedate mind he gave commands to those of his acquaintance, and dispatcht whatever he had a mind to do; retaining the serenity of his countenance, even when he was at the very stake. Moreover, when the pile, which lay at a sufficient distance, was kindled round about him, with his mouth he attracted the flame on every side of him: and after this one expression, which he uttered when the flame began to touch him, [to wit,] invoaking Jesus the Son of God to be his helper, he most couragiously continued silent even to the very last gasp. Such was Porphyrius's combat: whose consummation Seleucus a Confessour that had formerly been a Souldier, having related to Pamphilus; as being the conveyer of such a message, he was immediately vouchsafed to be joyned in the same lot with the Martyrs. For he had no sooner related Porphyrius's death, and saluted one of the Martyrs with a kiss, but some of the Souldiers seize him, and carry him before the President. Who, as if he resolved to hasten Seleucus, that he might be Prophyrius's companion in his journey to heaven, forthwith ordered he should undergo a capital punishment. This [Seleucus] was born in Cappadocia, but had attained no mean degree of honour amongst the choisest young men that belonged to the Roman Milice. For he far excelled his fellow Souldiers in the [o] fitness of his age for Military services, in strength and stature of body, and in valour: in so much that, his aspect was much discourst of amongst all men, and the shape of his whole body greatly admired, upon account both of his stature and comelines. About the beginning of the persecution, he was eminently famous for his enduring stripes in the combat of confession: but after he had left off his Military course of life, he became a zealous emulatour of those that were [p] Ascetæ in their studies and exercises of piety; and, like a father, and a patron, demonstrated himself to be an Overseer as it were, and an helper of desolate orphans and widows that were destitute of assistance, and of those that were reduced to poverty and sickness. Wherefore, by God (who is more delighted with such [performances] as these, than with the smoak and bloud of sacrifices) he was deservedly accounted worthy of that admirable and high calling, [to wit] Martyrdom. This was the tenth Champion, who, after the others before mentioned, ended his life on the very same day; whereon (as it is probable) the great gate of heaven was opened by the Martyrdom of Pamphilus, (suitable to the worth of that person,) which gave both him, and his companions, an easie entrance into the Celestial Kingdom. Also, Theodulus (a venerable and pious old man, belonging to the Presidents own family, for whom Firmilianus had a greater esteem than for all his other domesticks; partly upon account of his age, having seen his children to the third generation; and partly in respect of the singular affection and conscionable fidelity, which he had continually retained towards him;) having followed Seleucus's steps, and performed the same things that he did, was brought before his master, against whom he was more exasperated than against any of the former [Martyrs;] and being forthwith put upon a Cross, he underwent the same sort of Martyrdom our Saviour suffered. Moreover, one being yet wanting, who might render the number of the foresaid Martyrs compleatly twelve, Julianus intervened to make up their number. At that very interim he was coming from a remote Country, and had not entred the City; but, being informed [of the slaughter] of the Martyrs, ran immediately (in the same habit he had on) out of the road, to see that spectacle. When he saw the dead bodies of those holy persons lying upon the ground, being filled with an extraordinary joy, he embraced every one of them, and kissed them all. Whilst he was doing this, the [Souldiers] that were the instruments to commit those murders, apprehend him, and bring him to Firmilianus. He, doing herein what was agreeable to his [usual cruelty,] ordered that this person also should be consumed by a slow fire. Thus was Julianus also accounted worthy [to receive] the crown of Martyrdom, leaping for joy, and being exceeding glad; and with a loud voice giving great thanks to the Lord, who had vouchsafed him so great an honour. This Julianus was by country a Cappadocian; as to his morals, he was eminently pious and circumspect, and famous for his most genuine and sincere faith: he was very active and diligent in all things, being inspired by the holy Ghost. Such was the file [of Martyrs,] who were vouchsafed to arrive at Martyrdom in company with Pamphilus. The holy, and truly sacred bodies of these persons were, by the impious Presidents order, watched for the space of four days, and as many nights, and exposed to be devoured by MAXIMINUS. [p] Christophorson judged amiss, in that he supposed by the term [ἀσκητὰς] Monks were meant. For, at that time there were no Monks; or, if there were any they differed much from the Ascetæ. For Monks (as their name, Monachi, denotes) affected solitude: but the Ascetæ did converse publickly in the Cities. Whosoever therefore lived a more strict and severe course of life according to the precepts of the Gospel, and left all they had, upon God's account, were termed Ascetæ: thus one Peter is called Asceta, and a Virgin is termed Ascetria, before in this book of Eusebius: should any one term these Monks, doubtless he would be much mistaken. St Jerom says expressly, that there was no Monk in Palestine before Hilarion. But Peter, the Asceta, lived in Palestine long before Hilarion's time. Vales.

[m] Instead of [μακρῷ πυρὶ, a fire at a distance] Christophorson seemes to have read [μαλθακῷ πυρὶ, a slow, or remiss fire: see his translation. Hervetus also has rendred it thus, pronuntiat sententiam ut tradatur molli & lento igni, he pronounc't sentence upon him, that he should be set into [and consumed by] a soft and gentle fire. The same is confirmed by Eusebius's following words: for he says, that Porphyrius was fastned to a stake, and that the pile, which lay round him, but at some distance, was kindled; that so the Martyr might be consumed by a slack fire. We read of the same sort of punishment in the passion of Pionius, and of other Martyrs. Eusebius uses [μακρὸν πῦρ] in the same sense hereafter, where he mentions Julianus. Further, we must take notice that both Porphyrius and Julianus were Catechumens; as Metaphrastes informs us. Vales.

* See B. 6. Chap. 19. note (p.)

[n] This garment is in the Greek termed Ἐξωμὶς; see its description in A. Gellius, Book 7. Chap. 12.

[o] Ἡλικία is the term in the original; it peculiarly imports that age, which is fit for warfare; which Livy stiles Militarem ætatem, the Military age; beginning from the seventeenth year of a mans age, says Plutarch (in Graccho.)

MAXIMINUS. by beaſts that prey on fleſh. But when (as it miraculouſly happened) no wild beaſt, or fowl, or dog approached them [during that time,] at laſt (divine providence ſo ordering the matter,) they were taken away whole and untorn; and, having been allowed ſuch funeral rites as befitted them, received the uſual interment. Whilſt the diſcourſe concerning the [Preſidents] furious rage againſt theſe perſons was yet rife in all mens mouthes, Adrianus and Eubulus (arriving, from that Country called Manganæa, at Cæſarea, to give a viſit to the reſt of the Confeſſours,) were examined alſo at the gate of the City, for what reaſon they came thither. And, having confeſſed the truth, they were brought before Firmilianus: he (as he had uſually done before) was in no wiſe dilatory in his proceedings towards them alſo; but, after he had furrowed their ſides with many tortures, condemned them to be devoured by wild-beaſts. Therefore, after two days ſpace, on the fifth of the month Dyſtrus, (that is, before the third of the Nones of March,) the day whereon the nativity of the [q] publick Genius (as the Heathens account it) is celebrated at Cæſarea, Adrianus was caſt to a Lion; after which a ſword was thruſt through his body, and ſo he ended his life. On the next day after ſave one, that is, on the very Nones of March, which is the ſeventh of the month Dyſtrus, Eubulus (after the Judge had entreated him with much earneſtneſs, that by offering ſacrifice he would procure for himſelf that which they account liberty,) preferring a glorious death for his Religion before this tranſitory life, (when he had been expoſed to the wild beaſts, and been made a ſacrifice after the ſame manner with the former Martyr,) was the laſt that cloſed up the Combats of the Martyrs at Cæſarea. Moreover, it will be worthy our recording here, how divine providence ſoon after puniſhed theſe impious Preſidents, together with the Tyrants themſelves. For Firmilianus, who had been ſo reproachfully outragious againſt Chriſt's Martyrs, having with ſome others been adjudged to undergo a capital puniſhment, was beheaded. And theſe were the Martyrdoms, accompliſhed at Cæſarea, during the whole time of the perſecution.

[q] In times paſt all Cities had their Genius's, in honour of which Temples were erected, which they called τυχεῖα. Marcus (in the life of Porphyrius) mentions the Tycheum of Gaza: and there was a Tycheum at Alexandria, mentioned in Cod. Theod. and in Libanius's deſcriptions lately publiſhed by the Learned Leo Allatius. Alſo the Temple of the Genius at Antiochia is mentioned by Julian in Miſopog. which paſſage we cited before. The Genius of Cæſarea in Cappadocia had its Temple; concerning which ſee Gregor. Naz. in his firſt Invective againſt Julian, pag. 91. and in his 19th Oration pag. 309. The Genius was a tutelar God, that (as the Heathens thought) had undertaken the particular protection of any City, or Town. Valeſ.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the Prelates of the Churches.

But, what happened to be done in relation to the Prelates of Churches, [a] during this interval of time, and afterwards; how, inſtead of being continued Paſtours of Chriſt's rational flock, which they had not rightly and duly governed, divine juſtice, judging them as it were fit for ſuch Offices, condemned them to be imployed in looking after [b] Camels, a brutiſh ſort of creatures, whoſe bodies are naturally crooked and miſ-ſhapen; and how it adjudged them to be keepers of the Emperours horſes; alſo, what and how great injuries, diſhonours, and tortures they ſuffered from ſuch as during thoſe times were the Emperours Procuratours, and Governours of Provinces, upon account of the ſacred veſſels and treaſures belonging to the Church; moreover, the ambitious deſires of many, the inconſiderate and illegal ordinations, and the ſchiſmes amongſt the [c] Confeſſours themſelves; beſides, what thoſe modern raiſers of diſturbances with much earneſtneſs attempted againſt the remaines of the Church, introducing innovations ſucceſſively one after another, being without intermiſſion authours of evils even in the midſt of the calamities cauſed by the perſecution, and heaping miſchiefs upon miſchiefs: all this [I ſay] I think fit to omit, a relation hereof being in my judgment inconvenient, and which (as I ſaid in the [d] beginning of this book) I do altogether diſlike, and am reſolved to avoid Suppoſing it therefore to be moſt accommodate for an hiſtory concerning the admirable Martyrs, to ſpeak, write, and inſtill into the ears of believers what ever is of importance to, and commendable in, our Religion, and thoſe paſſages which are virtuous and praiſeworthy, I thought good to adorn the cloſe of this book with [a relation of] that peace, which afterwards appeared to us from heaven.

[a] These words are very obſcure. Chriſtophorſon thought they were to be underſtood concerning the time of the perſecution; I am not of his mind. For Euſebius ſpeaks concerning what happened, when the fury of the perſecution was in ſome meaſure abated. Therefore [ὀπὶ τύλοις] ſignifies poſtea, afterwards; according to Euſebius's uſual way of expreſſing himſelf, both in other places, and alſo hereafter in this chapter. The following words [χρὶ τὸν ἐν μέσῳ χρόνον] denote the whole interval of time from the beginning of the perſecution to its ſeventh year, as Euſebius informs us in the following chapter. Valeſ.

MAXIMINUS. [b] It was a ſort of puniſhment amongſt the Romans, that free-men (i.e. thoſe that were free of Rome) ſhould be condemned to look after the Emperours horſes and camels, and to ſuch like offices. This employment was called Camelaſia, and it is reckoned amongſt the perſonall offices, in the Pandects (Tit. de muner. & Honor.) Although in that place of the Pandects, the Emperours Camels are not ſpoken of, but thoſe Camels are meant belonging to every City, which were uſed to fetch wood and other burthens; as appears from the 18th Law, in the ſaid Title. But Euſebius does here ſpeak of the Emperours Horſes and Camels, to the feeding whereof ſome Biſhops were condemned. Now, there is a great difference between theſe two Offices. For the former was a civil Office, to which the Decurions of the white Order were promoted, as 'tis ſaid in the fore-quoted Law. But the latter was a penal ſervitude, to which criminals were condemned, as may be collected from Euſebius's words here. Moreover, theſe Camelarii (keepers of Camels) were under his care and diſpoſe, that was the Comes rei privatæ, (i. e. the Treaſurer of the Privy purſe to the Emperour; ſee Valeſ. notes on Amm. Marcell. Book 22. pag. 207.) under whom were the Maſters of the flocks, and of the ſtables; as appears from the Notitia Imperii Romani. See the Acts of Marcellus the Pope. Valeſ.

[c] He means the Schiſm between Meletius Lycopolitanus and Peter Biſhop of Alexandria; concerning which ſee Athanaſius and Epiphanius. He means alſo Donatus's Schiſme in Africa, againſt Cæcilianus the Biſhop. Valeſ.

[d] The place Euſebius here ſpeaks of is not to be found in this book. Whence 'tis apparent, that this book, concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, is imperfect. Any body may perceive that the beginning of it is wanting. But this defect may be made up from chap. 2. book 8. of the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, where Euſebius ſays that, which he mentions here, as ſpoken of before by himſelf. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning Silvanus, John, and thirty nine other Martyrs.

The ſeventh year of the perſecution againſt us was now compleated; and our affairs, (having by little and little obtained ſome thing of a tendency towards a quiet poſture by an abatement of their heats who had been our malicious detractours,) proceeded on to the eighth year, when no ſmall number of Confeſſours were gathered together about the Braſs mines in Paleſtine, and enjoyed their liberty to ſuch a degree, that they erected buildings to make Churches of: [But] the Governour of the Province (a cruel and wicked perſon, as he manifeſted himſelf to be, upon account of what he did againſt the Martyrs) making a journey thither, and being informed of their

MAXIMINUS. their way of living in that place, acquainted the Emperour therewith, writing what he judged futable to calumniate them. Afterwards, the Governour of the Mines came thither, and (as if he had had an Imperial order so to do,) having separated that company of Confessours, allotted Cyprus to be the place of habitation for some of them, and Libanus for others. He dispersed others of them in several places throughout Palestine, and gave order they should all be wearied out with various sorts of laborious employments. Then he pick't out four, which seemed to be the most eminent persons amongst them, and sent them to the commander in chief of the Military forces in those parts. Two of these were Ægyptian Bishops, by name Peleus and Nilus; the third was a [a] Presbyter; and the fourth was Patermuthius, a person signally renowned amonst all men upon account of his sedulity in doing all men good offices. This Commander, having asked these men to renounce their Religion, and not obtaining his request, ordered they should be burnt to death. Again, there were others at the same place, (who were allotted a particular country to inhabit in by themselves,) to wit, such of the Confessours, as either by reason of their age, or the mangling of their members, or because of other bodily infirmities, were freed from doing service in those laborious employments. The principal among these was Silvanus, [b] a Bishop born at Gaza, a person that demonstrated himself to be a truly religious and most genuine example of the Christian profession. This man, after he had been signally eminent in all sorts of conflicts [undergone upon account] of confession, from the very first day (as I may say) of the persecution, and during the whole time it lasted, was reserved for this opportunity, that he might in the last place seal up (as it were) all the Combats [of the Martyrs] in Palestine. Many Egyptians were with him; amongst whom there was one * John, who for strength of memory far surpassed all men of our age. This man had been deprived of his eye-sight before. Nevertheless, in the conflicts of confession (wherein he got great renown) when one of his feet (after the same manner that others were served) was rendred useless by being seared with red hot irons, his eyes also (although he could not then see) were burnt out with searing irons: to such an height of cruelty and inhumanity had the merciless and incompassionate Executioners then arrived in their carriage [towards the Christians!] 'Tis needless to extol this man for his morals, and the Philosophick life he lead, especially since he was not so admirable upon that account, as for his strength of memory; [for] he had whole books of the sacred Scriptures written (not on tables of stone, as the divine Apostle says, nor on parchments, or paper, which are devoured by moths and time, but) on the fleshly tables of his heart, that is on his bright soul, [which were legible] to the most clear eye of his mind. In so much that, when ever he pleased, he could produce out of his mouth, as it were out of a treasury of Learning, sometimes the books of the Law and those of the Prophets, another while the Historical parts of Scripture, and again at other times the Evangelick and Apostolick writings. I was, I confess, amazed, when I first saw this man standing in the midst of a numerous Ecclesiastick congregation, and repeating some parts of the divine Scripture. For as long as I could only hear his voice, I supposed him to have read what is usually rehearsed in such assemblies. But when I approached very neer, and saw plainly what was done, to wit, all the rest [in the assembly] standing round and having their eye-sight clear and perfect, and him making use of the eyes of his understanding only, in reality delivering oracles like some Prophet, and far surpassing those that were sound and healthy in body; I could not forbear praising and glorifying of God. And I thought that I really beheld a firm and most evident instance to perswade me to believe, that he is to be accounted truly a man, (not who appears so to be by the external shape of his body, but) who is such in respect of his mind and understanding. For although this person had a mangled and deformed body, yet he demonstrated the strength of his internal faculties to be great and most powerful. Moreover, God himself vouchsafed to allot these forementioned persons (who, living in a place apart by themselves, spent their time according to the usual manner in prayers, fastings, and in the performance of other severe exercises of Religion,) a blessed and salutary death; reaching out to them his propitious right hand. But * that malicious enemy of all goodness, unable to endure them any longer, in regard they were carefully armed against him with their continual prayers to God, resolved to have them killed and removed from off the earth, as being troublesome to him. Which God permitted him to attempt and perform; both that he should not be hindred from doing mischief, agreeable to his own mind and purpose; and that they might at length receive the rewards of their various combats. Thus therefore nine and thirty persons were beheaded on one and the same day, by an order from the most impious Maximin. These were the Martyrdomes perpetrated in Palestine during the space of ten years, and such was the persecution in our days; which, having been began from those times wherein the Churches were demolished, was much increased in the times succeeding by the Governours insolencies. Amidst which, their various and different combats who were Religious Champions, made an innumerable company of Martyrs throughout every Province; to wit, in Libya, and throughout all Egypt, Syria, and all those Provinces, which reach from the East round to the Country of Illyricum. For those regions scituate beyond these now mentioned, that is, all Italy, Sicily, France, and those which lie towards the Sun-setting, Spain, Mauritania, and Africa, having not indured the rage of the persecution full out the space of the two first years, were vouchsafed a sudden visitation from God, and [obtained] peace: divine Providence taking compassion on the simplicity and faith of those men. Further, an accident (a parallel to which the Records from the very first beginning of the Roman Empire cannot shew) happened now first in these our days, contrary to all

MAXIMINUS.

[a] His name was Helias; who, together with Patermuthius, was burnt to death; as 'tis recorded in the Greek Menæa, at the 17th of September. Photius mentions Patermuthius, in his Biblioth. chap. 118; where he speaks of the Books written by Pamphilus the Martyr, during his imprisonment, in defence of Origen. Valef.

[b] By these words Eusebius seems to declare, that this Silvanus was not Bishop of Gaza: for Eusebius only says that Silvanus was born at Gaza, and made Bishop over those Christians that wrought in the Mines in Palestine. The Greeks (in their Menæa, at the 14th of October) seem to have taken these words of Eusebius in this sense. For they say that Silvanus was Presbyter of the Church at Gaza; and, after he had suffered most accute tortures at Cæsarea, was condemned to the Mines, where the Office of a Bishop was conferred on him by the Christians. So the Menæa. But Eusebius (in book 8. chap. 13.) does expressly call him Bishop of Gaza. Valef.

* This John is mentioned in the Menæum, at the twentieth of September. Valef.

* The Devil.

MAXIMINUS. all expectation. For, during the perſecution in our times, the Empire was divided into two parts. Thoſe brethren which were inhabitants of the one part, that juſt now mentioned, enjoyed peace: but ſuch as dwelt in the other part of the Empire, endured innumerable conflicts [renewed againſt them] ſucceſſively. But when divine grace gave ſome indications of its candid and compaſſionate viſitation of us, then thoſe very Governours of ours (who before had been raiſers of the wars waged againſt us in our days,) having moſt miraculouſly altered their minds, ſounded a retreat; extinguiſhing the flame of perſecution kindled againſt us, by Reſcripts publiſhed in favour to us, and by mild Edicts. [c] 'Tis requiſite, that we Record their retractation, to wit, the Retractation, of the Emperours or Galerius Maximianus's Edict, ordering a ſtop to be put to the perſecution. But this defect may be eaſily made up from the laſt chapter of the eighth Book of the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. Valeſ. MAXIMINUS.

CHAP. I.

Concerning the counterfeited Ceſſation [of the Perſecution.]

THIS Revocation contained in the Imperial Edict [a] mentioned before, was publiſhed in all parts of Aſia, and [b] throughout the Adjacent Provinces. After which publications thus made; Maximin, the Eaſtern Tyrant, (a perſon as impious as ever breathed, and a moſt deadly enemy to the worſhip of the ſupream God;) being in no wiſe pleaſed with theſe Reſcripts, inſtead of the forementioned Edict, iſſues out a verbal Order only to thoſe Governours within his Juriſdiction, that they ſhould ſtop the perſecution againſt us. For, in regard he durſt not in any wiſe oppoſe the Decree of his ſuperiours, * having conceal'd the forementioned Edict, and taken ſuch care, as that it ſhould not be publickly propoſed in the Provinces under his Juriſdiction; he gives order by word of mouth only to thoſe Governours under him, that they ſhould put a ſtop to the perſecution againſt us; of which Order they inform one another by Letters. For Sabinus, who was then honoured with the Prefecture of the Prætorium (the chiefeſt Office [c] among them) in a Latine Epiſtle to the Governours of the Provinces declared the [d] Emperour's pleaſure; [c] Inſtead of [παρ' αὐτοῖς, with them] the reading in Nicephorus is [παρ' αὐτῷ, with him,] ſhewing, that Sabinus was Prefect of the Prætorium to Maximin. But our Copies do all agree in the former reading, that is [with them,] in the plural number; which is the trueſt. For, although Sabinus bore the Prefecture of the Prætorium (which we may call the Office of Lord-chief-juſtice, or of Lieutenant General under the Emperour, to govern Provinces in Civil Cauſes; See Pancirol. in Notitiam Imper. Orient. c. 5.) under Maximinus Cæſar in the Eaſt; yet becauſe he was made Præfect by Galerius, therefore he is ſtiled the Præfect of the Emperours, meaning Galerius and Maximinus. For the Cæſars had not the power of creating Præfects; but they were made by the Auguſti, as may be ſhown from many places in Amm. Marcellinus. Hence 'tis, that Sabinus in his Edict (which Euſebius does here inſert) always ſpeaks of the Emperours in the plural number, to let the Governours of particular Provinces underſtand, that that was the command of the Emperours, to wit, Galerius, Conſtantinus, Licinius, and Maximinus. Alſo, by theſe words [παρ' αὐτοῖς] may be meant the Governours of thoſe Provinces which were under Maximin's juriſdiction: for Euſebius ſpeaks of them in the foregoing ſentence. Indeed, this expoſition ſeems moſt natural to me; but then we muſt render [παρ' αὐτοῖς not with, but amongſt them; which rendition the Greek will bear. Valeſ.

[a] Πεσταλθεὶς (the term here uſed) muſt be taken for προσκεκλεθεὶς, as is frequent in our Author. We have this revocation of the Emperour's Decree in the 8th. book of this Hiſtory, at the latter end. Valeſ.

[b] By theſe words [τὰς ἀμφὶ τὰν τὴν ἑσπερίδας] Chriſtoph. underſtands all the Provinces of Aſia; but Rufinus thinks Pontus, Bithynia, Galatia and the reſt of the Provinces bordering on every ſide are meant, which were under the Emperour Galerius's Government: excepting only the Eaſtern Provinces, over which Maximinus Cæſar was Ruler. Valeſ.

* Ἐν ᾠδείῳ θεὶς, we have tranſlated having conceal'd: the Phraſe is borrowed from the Attick Lawyers; ᾠδεῖον with them ſignifies that Court where matters of ſmall importance were adjuſted, to wit, not exceeding one drachm. The Judges of this Court were the Undecemviri; This Court ſtood in an obſcure place of the City, and hence ἐν ᾠδείῳ is in Demoſthenes, and here alſo in our Authour, us'd metaphorically, for privily.

[d] Rufinus tranſlates this place thus; Sed, Sabinus, &c. But Sabinus, who at that time was chief of the Provinces; and inſerted the forementioned Imperial Edict, thereby manifeſting to all men that which Maximin had attempted to conceal. But Rufinus has not expreſſed Euſebius's meaning in this rendition of his words. For Sabinus did not ſet Galerius the Emperour's decree before his own order, as it was uſual for the Prefects of the Prætorium to do; in regard Maximin had made it his buſineſs, that that Imperial conſtitution ſhould be concealed from thoſe Provinces under his Government. For he was highly diſpleaſed at Galerius's Reſcript; both in regard the Chriſtians (whom he had hitherto moſt barbarouſly perſecuted,) were delivered from his butcheries; and alſo becauſe his name was not prefix't before the foreſaid decree. For, after Galerius's and Conſtantine's name, Licinius's was ſet before the Reſcript: but Maximin's name, (he being as yet but Cæſar only) was not there. Therefore, partly for ſhame, partly out of indignation, Maximin ſuppreſſed that Edict. But Sabinus

(in this Epiſtle of his to the Preſidents of the provinces) makes very little mention of this Conſtitution, becauſe he would not diſpleaſe Maximin. Further, by the word [Emperour] Chriſtophorſon thought Maximin was meant. But I like Rufinus's Verſion better, who ſuppoſed Galerius to be underſtood thereby; and beſides, Euſebius uſually calls Maximin by the name of Tyrant, not Cæſar. Valeſ.

MAXIMINUS the contents of which Letter we have thus tranſlated:

The Majeſty of our moſt ſacred Lords the Emperours, by their earneſt and moſt devout care, have long ſince determined to render the minds of all men conformable to the true and holy Rule of living; that by this means they who ſeem to have embraced uſages different from thoſe of the Romanes, might be induced to exhibite due worſhip to the immortal Gods. But the obſtinate and moſt untractable perverſeneſs of ſome mens minds was arrived at ſuch an height, that neither could the juſtice of the [Imperial] *Decree prevaile with them to recede from their own reſolutions, nor the imminent puniſhment annexed ſtrike any terrour into them. Since therefore it might have happened, that upon this account many would have precipitated themſelves into danger; the ſacred Majeſty of our Lords the moſt puiſſant Emperours, (according to their innate clemency) judging it diſagreeable to their own moſt ſacred Intent, that upon this occaſion men ſhould be ſurrounded with ſuch great danger; enjoyned our * devotedneſs to write to your Prudence: that if evidence be brought againſt any* Chriſtian for his following that way of worſhip obſerved amongſt thoſe of his own Religion, you ſhould ſecure him and ſet him free from all danger and moleſtation, and that you ſhould condemn none to be puniſhed upon account of this pretence. For ſince it has been manifeſtly evidenced that during ſo long a tract of time they could by no means be perſwaded to deſiſt from their perverſe ſtubborneſs; your Prudence therefore is enjoyned to write to the Curators, to the Magiſtrates, and to the Preſidents of the Villages [belonging to] every City, that they may underſtand, that for the future they are not to take any further care concerning [e] this affair.

* I ſuppoſe, theſe are the terms of honour, which theſe great Officers had given to them in all addreſſes; and which they themſelves alſo made uſe of, when they mentioned themſelves in any Letters they wrote to others: the words in the Greek are θεοσέβειαν, which Valeſius renders devotio; and ἀγχίνοια, by him tranſlated Solertia.

[e] I doubt not but inſtead of [τῷ γεγραμμένῳ, this decree] it ought to be [τῷ πεφιστημένῳ, this affair.] which amendment Nicephorus confirms B. 7. Chap. 24. who has expreſt this place thus, that they ſhould not trouble themſelves any further about the Chriſtians. Valeſ.

Hereupon, all the Governours of Provinces, ſuppoſing that the Letter written to them [by Sabinus] contained [Maximin's] true and genuine meaning, did by their Letters communicate the Emperour's pleaſure to the Curators, Magiſtrates, and Preſidents of the Villages. Nor did they urge theſe things to them by Letters only, but much more by ſuch deeds, as that the Princes command might thereby be put in execution; bringing forth, and ſetting at liberty thoſe priſoners which they had in hold for Confeſſion of the faith of God; and alſo releaſing them who had been adjudged to the puniſhment of working in the Mines. For they ſuppoſed that this would in reallity be wellpleaſing to the *Emperour, but herein they were miſtaken. Theſe things being thus finiſhed, on a ſudden (like ſome bright ſhining light which darts forth its rays after a thick darkſome night,) you might have ſeen Churches gathered together throughout every City; full aſſemblies; and the uſual [f] ſolemn ſervices performed at theſe meetings. All the Infidels were not a little aſtoniſhed at theſe things, wondring at ſo great and unexpected an alteration of affairs, and crying out, that the God of the Chriſtians was the great and only true God. Alſo, thoſe of our Religion, who had faithfully and manfully ſtrove in the Combat of Perſecution, obtained great confidence and freedom amongſt all men. But as many as through weakneſs of faith had made ſhipwrack of their ſouls, with much earneſtneſs ran to ſeek for a remedie; begging and praying for an aſſiſting right hand from them that were ſtrong, and ſupplicating God to be merciful to them. Moreover, ſoon after this, the Noble Champions of Religion, releaſed from their ſervitude in labouring in the Mines, returned to their own Countries; and being glad and jocund, travelling through the Cities, were filled with an inexpreſſible joy, and a confidence unutterable. Thus did numerous companies of perſons that were Chriſtians perform their journies, lauding God with Hymns and Pſalmes in the midſt of the High-ways and Market-places. And you might now have ſeen thoſe, (who but lately had been in bonds, groaning under moſt ſevere puniſhments, and driven from their own Countries) with joyful and pleaſant countenances poſſeſſing their own habitations again: in ſo much that they, who formerly [threatned to] murther and deſtroy us, when they ſaw this miracle which did ſo far ſurpaſs all mens expectation, rejoyced with us at what had happened.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the change of affairs which did afterwards enſue.

BUT the Tyrant (who as we ſaid before, Ruled in the Eaſtern parts) no longer able to endure theſe things, (he being a profeſſed Enemy to goodneſs, and one who laid wait to inſnare all good men) ſuffered not this ſtate of affaires to continue [a] the ſpace of ſix months complete. But, inventing all the ways imaginable to ſubvert the Peace, firſt he attempted (upon ſome pretence or other) to hinder us from aſſembling in the * Cœmiteria. Afterwards [b] he ſends an Embaſie to himſelf againſt us, having ſollicited the Antiochians, by the means of ſome impious perſons, that they ſhould petition to obtain this from him (under the notion of the greateſt favour,) to wit, that he would impower them to ſuffer no Chriſtians to dwell amongſt them: he alſo excited the Inhabitants of other Cities to do the like. The chief of all theſe was one Theotecnus, an Antiochian; a turbulent perſon, an impoſtor, and a wicked man, (whoſe nature was not anſwerable to his † name;) he was at that time [c] Curator of Antioch.

[a] Maximinus Galerius did not live long after he had made that Decree for the Peace and Liberty of the Chriſtians, but within a few months after, dyed of a wound which had feſtered. See the Appendix to the eighth book of this Hiſtory. When Maximinus Cæſar heard of his death, he renewed the Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, and proclaimed himſelf Auguſtus; whereas he was only Cæſar before, and was compelled to obey the commands of Galerius Auguſtus. Valeſ.

* See Book 7. Chap. 11. note (f.)

[b] What is meant by this elegant paſſage [αὐτὸς ἑαυτῷ καθ' ἡμῶν πρεσβεύσεται] neither Chriſtoph. nor Muſculus underſtood: the meaning of it is this: Maximin ſent underhand ſome cunning men to ſollicit the Antiochians, to ſend Embaſſadours to his Court, to requeſt of him, that they might have liberty to drive out all Chriſtians from amongſt them. Hence Maximin who did underhand procure this Embaſſy, may well be ſaid to have ſent this Embaſſy to himſelf, and he himſelf to have been the Embaſſadour, this tranſpoſition of words is frequent and familiar in Euſebius. Valeſ.

† The import of Theotecnus in the Greek, is, the Son of God.

CHAP. III.

Concerning an Image newly made at Antioch.

WHen this [Theotecnus] therefore had several ways made his attacks against us, and had taken all imaginable care to hunt those of our Religion out of their Coverts, (as if they had been Thieves and Malefactours,) and had invented all the ways and methods of calumniating and accusing us, and had been the occasion of putting many men to death: at last he erects an Image of [a] Jupiter Philius, and [b] consecrates it with Magick charmes. And, having invented and instituted, in honour of it, impure ceremonies, execrable initiations, and most detestable expiations; he gave the Emperour himself a demonstration of the imposture of his Oracles, by which he effected what he had undertaken. Moreover, this man to please the Emperour by his flattery, stirreth up the Dæmon against the Christians; feigning that God commanded, that the Christians (as being his enemies) should be banished the City, and all the Countries adjoyning to the City.

[a] This Temple of Jupiter Philius at Antioch is mentioned by Julianus, in Misopogone, and by Libanius (if I mistake not) in Antiochico. Vales.

[b] The Ceremonies of the Gentiles, used in the erection and consecration of Images to their Gods, were various. For Jupiter Ctesius was consecrated with one sort of Rites, Herceus with another, and Philius with a third sort. Jupiter Ctesius, whose Image they kept in their store-houses, was consecrated with a little tub. Anticlides (in Ἐξηγητικῷ, that is, in his B. De Ritubus Sacris, apud Athenæum B. 11. Cap. 6.) relates the Ceremonies of Consecration. Jupiter Herceus was consecrated with Pots: See Aristophanes in Danaidibus. After the same manner were those Images Consecrated, which they erected to Mercury, and other Gods: and this they termed, χύτρους ἱδρύειν, to Consecrate with Pots. In these Pots they boyled all sorts of pulse, of which they offered sacrifice to those Gods they Consecrated, in memory of the food eaten in Old times, and of the frugality of the Ancients. But when they designed to be at greater cost in treating their God, then they killed a sacrifice at the erection of his Image; which they termed ἱδρύειν ἱερείῳ, to Consecrate with a slain sacrifice. See Aristophanes (in Irene) and his Scholiast, pag. 693. See Suidas also, in the word χαλκεῦν. Besides these Ceremonies, they used sometimes Magical Consecrations; So Theotecnus did here, in the Dedication of an Image to Jupiter Philius. Vales.

CHAP. IV.

Concerning the Decrees [of the Cities] against the Christians.

WHen Theotecnus, (the first person that acted against us) had had this desired success, all the other Magistrates, inhabiting the Cities under Maximin's Jurisdiction, hastned to establish the same Decree; also, the Governours of Provinces, perceiving that this was acceptable to the Emperour, prompted those that lived within their district, to do the same thing: Moreover, when the Tyrant had by his Rescript most willingly assented to their Ordinances, the flame of Persecution was again kindled afresh against us. At length, Priests of the Images were constituted in every City; and moreover, such men as had been most eminent in State employments and had acquitted themselves honourably in the publick Offices they had born, were by [a] Maximin himself created chief Priests. These men were very diligent and earnest about the worship of their Gods. For, (that I may speak briefly) the great superstition of this Emperor had such an influence as well upon the Governours, as the private persons within the limits of his Government, that it induced them all to act any thing against us in compliance to him: and they thought, that to murther us, and to invent some new mischievous stratagems against us, was the most grateful acknowledgement they could pay for the favours they expected to receive from him.

[a] By ἀρχιερεῖς are meant Sacerdotes Provinciarum. Concerning whom see B. 8. chap. 14. note (b.) A Sacerdos Provinciæ was created by the votes of the Decuriones, i. e. the Senators, or Aldermen of the City. Now those men especially were advanced to this dignity, who had with honour acquitted themselves in the discharge of all Offices belonging to the Court; as we may see in Cod. Theod. Tit. De Decurionibus. Eusebius here takes notice of it as a thing new and unusual, that Maximinus himself should elect the Sacerdotes Provinciæ. Vales.

CHAP. V.

Concerning the forged Acts

HAving therefore forged some [a] Acts of Pilate concerning our Saviour, which were stuffed with all manner of Blasphemie against Christ; by [Maximin] the Emperour's order they send them throughout all his Dominions; commanding by their Letters that these Records should be posted up in all places, both in the Country and in the Cities; and that such as were School-masters should give them to their Scholars in stead of their lessons, and make them study them, that so they might have them imprinted on their memories. Whilst these things were done after this manner, the chief Commander in the Army at Damascus a City of Phoenicia (whom the Romans call a Captain) having haled some infamous women out of the Market-place, compelled them by threatning them with tortures, to [b] testifie by subscribing the said publick Records, that they were formerly Christians; and that they were conscious to their profane practices; and that in their very Churches they performed obscene and lascivious actions; and what ever else he would have them say that might bring a scandal upon our Religion. The testimonies of these women he inserted into the said Acts, and sent them to the Emperour. By whose order these very Records were published in every City, and in all other places.

[a] Concerning the falseness of these Acts, see what Eusebius has remarkt B. 1. chap. 9. These Acts are mentioned in Act. Præsidial. Tarachi, probi, & Andronici, cap. 9. where Maximus the President says these words, Wretch, knowest thou not, that that Christ, whom thou callest upon, was a man committed to custody by Pontius Pilate, and punished by him; the Acts of whose passion are extant? Moreover, these Acta Præsidialia Tarachi, &c. were performed when Diocletian was Consul the fourth time, and Maximian the third, as the inscription of the first interrogatory sheweth. Whence 'tis plain, that these Acts of Pilate were forged long before the persecution; the contrary to which Eusebius affirms in this place. But, that I may freely speak my sense, the inscription of these Acta præsidialia is in my judgment false; and it should be corrected thus, when Diocletian was Consul the ninth time, and Maximian the eighth: For (1) there is, in those Acts, mention of the Imperial command, whereby 'twas ordered that all men should sacrifice to the Gods. Now this command was issued out on the nineteenth year of Diocletian's Empire. (2) In the ninth chapter these words occur. The President said, you curse the Princes, who have secured a lasting and continued Peace. Andronicus said, I have cursed the Plague, and the bloud thirsty, which destroy the world. That expression [concerning the securing a lasting and continued Peace] cannot agree with the fourth Consulate of Diocletian; for at that time the Barbarians attacked the Roman Empire on every side. Besides, I can't see how Diocletian and Maximian can be termed, Blood thirsty, till after the 19th year of Diocletian, when the Persecution began. Lastly, which is another argument, Eusebius affirms, that these Acts of Pilate were forged in the time of this persecution. Vales.

[b] Rufinus has rendred the Greek phrase here (which is λέγειν ἐγγράφως) thus, alia profiteri, to attest the truth of the said Acts by signing of them: for an evidence may be given both by word of mouth, and in writing also. Vales.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning them that suffered Martyrdom in those Times.

BUt not long after, this Captain was his own Executioner, suffering a condign punishment for his malicious wickedness. And now baniſhments and moſt horrid Perſecutions were a freſh raiſed againſt us; the Preſidents in every Province renewing their cruel inſurrections againſt us: in ſo much that ſome of the moſt eminent aſſerters of the divine faith were apprehended, and without any commiſeration had the ſentence of death pronounc't againſt them. Three of them having profeſſed themſelves Chriſtians, were caſt to the wild beaſts and devoured by them at Emeſa, a City of Phœnicia: amongſt them there was a Biſhop, one [a] Silvanus, a very old man, who had born that Office forty years compleat. At the ſame time alſo, [b] Peter, that moſt eminent Prelate of the Alexandrian Church, (the chiefeſt ornament and glory of the Biſhops, both for his virtuous life, and his ſtudy and knowledge in the ſacred Scriptures) being apprehended for no crime at all, was beheaded (contrary to every bodies expectation) by Maximins order on a ſudden, and without any ſpecious pretence. Likewiſe many other Ægyptian Biſhops ſuffered the ſame death that he did. [c] Lucianus alſo, Presbyter of the Church at Antioch, a very pious man, much famed for his continency, and his knowledge in the ſacred Scriptures, was brought to the City of Nicomedia, [d] where the Emperour then kept his Court; and after he had made his Apology, in defence of that Doctrine which he aſſerted, before the Preſident he was committed to priſon and murthered. In fine, Maximin, that profeſſed Enemy of all virtue, did in a ſhort time load us with ſuch burthens of afflictions, that this latter ſtorm of Perſecution raiſed by him ſeemed to us far more grievous then the former.

MAXIMINUS.

[a] This Silvanus is a different perſon from that Silvanus which Euſebius mentions in his book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, chap. the laſt. For this was Biſhop of Emeſa; the other was Biſhop of Gaza. The firſt was beheaded in the Mines at Paleſtine with 39 other Martyrs; in the eighth year of the Perſecution. But this Silvanus was caſt to the wild beaſts at Emeſa on the ninth year of the Perſecution. Concerning this man's Martyrdom Euſebius has ſaid ſomething before, in his eighth book, although not in its proper place; ſee B. 8. Chap. 13. Valeſ.

[b] Euſebius mentioned this man's Martyrdom before in the eighth book chap. 13. but not in its proper place. For the eighth book does not go beyond the eighth year of the Perſecution. But Peter Biſhop of Alexandria was Martyr'd in the ninth year of the Perſecution (which Euſebius expreſly affirmeth in the end of the ſeventh book) upon the ſeventh of the Calends of December, as we read in the Excerpta Chronologica publiſhed by Scaliger. Uſuardus ſays the ſame; and ſo does Ado, and the old Roman Martyrology. The Greeks celebrate his birth day on the 24th of November. The Acts of his Paſſion are extant in a M.S. in Greek, which the Reverend Father Franciſcus Combefiſius has, and will ſhortly publiſh, with many other things. Valeſ.

[c] Euſebius has mentioned this man's Martyrdom at book 8 chap. 13. though not in its due place. But here he remarks the time more diſtinctly, wherein Peter and Lucianus ſuffered; to wit, under Maximin; not in the Reign of Galerius Maximianus as Baronius would have us believe, at the year of Chriſt 311. cap. 3. Alſo, Baronius is miſtaken in placing the Martyrdom of Peter Biſhop of Alexandria on the year of Chriſt 310. for he ſuffered in the year of our Lord 311, on the ninth year current of the Perſecution. Baronius's errour aroſe from his beginning the Perſecution a year too ſoon; which miſtake we have ſufficiently confuted before, at book 8. chap. 2. note (c.) Moreover, in regard Lucianus's Martyrdom happened under Maximin, the Martyrdom of Anthimus Biſhop of Nicomedia ſhould, in my judgment, be placed under Maximin alſo. Indeed, Anthimus ſuffered a little before Lucianus, as Lucianus informs us in his Epiſtle to the Antiochians, which I made mention of in Book 8. chap. 13. note (a.) we may alſo make the ſame concluſion from the Acts of Lucianus the Martyr; where, inſtead of Maximinus, we read Maximianus, which is a common errour in the Greeks. Valeſ.

[d] When Galerius was dead, Maximinus took poſſeſſion of Aſia and Bithynia; which Provinces (together with Illyricum, and Thracia) were governed by Galerius. For Galerius kept theſe Provinces for himſelf, as Eutropius informs us; the ſame is aſſerted by the old Author of the Excerptions, which I publiſhed at the end of my Amm. Marcelinus. Maximinus therefore made his abode at Nicomedia, which was the chief City of Bithynia; where the Emperours had a pallace ever ſince Diocletians time. Further, the following words do evidently manifeſt, that by the term [Emperour] Maximinus muſt be meant. Wherefore I wonder at Baronius, for aſſerting that Lucianus ſuffered under Galerius, not under Maximin; when as Euſebius, contemporary with Lucianus, affirms he was killed by Maximin. Valeſ.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the Edict againſt us, which was [ingraven on Brazen plates and] hung up on the Pillars.

MOreover, in the midſt of every City ([a] which was never ſeen before) the Decrees of Cities, and alſo the Imperial Edicts againſt us were ingraven on Brazen plates and propoſed to open view. And the boyes in the Schooles had nothing in their mouths * all day long but Jeſus and Pilate, and the Acts which were forged to diſgrace us. I judge it pertinent to inſert here this very Reſcript of Maximin's, which was ingraven on plates of Braſs: both that the proud and arrogant inſolency of this mans hatred towards God may be manifeſted: and ſo that it may hence be made apparent, that divine juſtice (which hates the impious, and keeps a continual watch againſt them) did within a very ſhort time purſue and overtake him: by which Divine juſtice he was inforced to alter his ſentiments ſoon after concerning us, and to confirm them by his Edicts in writing. But theſe are the Contents of his Reſcript.

[a] Any man may juſtly wonder why Euſebius ſhould affirm here, that this was never ſeen before. Were the Decrees of the Cities, or the Edicts of the Emperours, never publiſhed before now? This cannot be denyed: nor is it denyed by our Euſebius. But that which he aſſerts to have never been ſeen before, is, the ingraving of theſe Edicts upon plates of Braſs. For (as we obſerved before, Book 8. chap. 5. note b.) the Imperial Edicts were written on paper. Valeſ.

* Καθ' ἡμέραν, all day long; ſo Rufinus and Langus render it: Chriſtopherſon and Muſculus tranſlate it, quotidie, daily. Valeſ.

A COPY OF THE TRANSLATION OF MAXIMIN'S RESCRIPT IN ANSWER TO THE DECREES OF THE CITIES AGAINST US, TRANSCRIBED FROM A BRAZEN PLATE AT TYRE.

Now at length the infirm Confidence of mans mind, having ſhaken off and diſperſed the cloud and miſt of errour (which heretofore inveſted the ſenſes of men, not ſo much wicked as wretched, being involved in the fatal night of ignorance,) may diſcern, that it is undoubtedly governed and ſtrengthened by the indulgent providence of the immortal Gods. It is incredible to expreſs how grateful, how pleaſing and acceptable a thing it was to us, that you gave ſuch a proof of your Pious reſolution towards the Gods. Indeed, before this time no perſon was inſenſible of the obſervancy and religious worſhip you ſhewed towards the immortal Gods; [b] for your faith is made known to them not in bare and empty words, but by uninterrupted and miraculous eminent Acts, upon which account your City may deſervedly be ſtiled the Seat and Manſion of the immortal Gods. For it is manifeſtly evident by many inſtances, that She flouriſheth by the [c] Arrival and preſence of the celeſtial Deities in Her: But lo! Now your City (careleſs of all its own particular concerns, and having no regard to the Petitions, which in times paſt it did uſually make [to us] for the welfare of its affairs,) when it was ſenſible that the Promoters of that accurſed vanity

[b] Chriſtoph. and Muſculus thought that this clauſe ought to be referred to Deos (the Gods:) but we make it to be referred to the Tyrians themſelves. Maximin does attempt to blacken the faith of the Chriſtians by theſe words; he calls it, κενῶν ἐπαγγελιῶν πίστις, a faith of bare words: as if the Chriſtian faith had nothing in it but words, and were void of all reality. Valeſ.

[c] The antients believed, that on ſet days the Gods deſcended into thoſe Cities for which they had a kindneſs: hence it is that the inhabitants of Delos and Miletum ſolemnized the coming of Apollo: and the Argivi, the advent of Diana. This coming of the Gods we find mentioned up and down in the Poets, as in Virgil. Hence it is, that upon old Coins and in the Calendar, we find written Adventus Impp. Valeſ.

MAXIMINUS.

vanity did begin to creep again, and [perceived] that (like fire which is carelessely left and raked up,) it brake forth into violent flames, the brands thereof being rekindled, immediately without the least delay made its addresse to our piety, as to the Metropolis of all Religion, petitioning for a redress and an assistance. 'Tis evident that the Gods have instilled into your minds this wholesome advice upon account of your constant and faithful perseverance in your Religion. For the most High and Mighty Jupiter, (who presides over your most famous City, and preserveth your Country Gods, your wives and children, your families and houses from all manner of destruction and ruine) hath breathed into your minds this salutary resolution; whence he hath evidenced and plainly demonstrated, what an excellent, noble, and comfortable thing it is, to adore him, and to approach the sacred Ceremonies of the immortal Gods with a due observancy and veneration. For what man can there be found so foolish and so void of all reason, who perceives not that it comes to pass by the favourable care of the Gods towards us, that neither the Earth does deny to restore the seeds committed to it, frustrating the hopes of the husbandmen with vain expectations, or that the aspect of impious War is not [d] immoveably fixed on the earth; or that mens bodies are not hurried away to the grave being tainted by an infection in the temperature of the Air: or that the Sea, tossed with the blasts of tempestuous winds does not swell and overflow: or that storms breaking forth on a sudden and unexpectedly do not raise a destructive tempest: or lastly, that the Earth (the nurse and mother of all things,) shaken by an horrid trembling arising from its own internal caverns, [e] does not raise vast hills out of its own bowels; or that the mountains which lie upon it are not swallowed up by its unexpected scissures and rents. There is no man but knowes that all these calamities, (yea far more horrid than these) have happened heretofore. And all these evills fell upon us, because of that pernitious errour and most vain folly of those wicked men, at such time as it abounded in their souls, and burthened the whole earth almost with shame and confusion: After the interposition of some words, he continues. Let men now look into the open fields and see the flourishing corn, waving its weighty ears; let them view the Medows gloriously bedecked with flowers and grass caused by the seasonable springing showers: Let them consider the constitution of the aire how temperate and calm it is again become. In future let all men rejoyce for that by your Piety, by your sacrifices and Religious worship, the fury of that most Potent and strong God Mars is appeased; and for this reason, let them securely solace themselves in the quiet enjoyment of a most prosperous and serene Peace. And, as many as have deserted that blind errour, and wholly relinquished those impertinent wandrings, by returning to a right and sound temper of mind, let them rejoyce the more upon that account; in regard, (being delivered as it were from a storm unforeseen, and from a fatal disease,) they shall in future reap the sweet enjoyments of an happy life. But if any shall willfully persist in that their execrable vanity and errour, let them be banished and driven far from your City and its vicinage (according to your request:) that by this means your City, being (agreeable to your commendable diligence in this affair) freed from all pollution and impiety, may wholly devote it self (according to its natural inclination) to attend upon the sacrifices and worship of the immortal Gods with all due veneration. Now, that you may be sensible how acceptable your address in this case was to us, and how ready and forward our mind is voluntarily to comply with and reward good desires even without any decrees, or supplication; we permit your devotedness to ask the greatest favour you have a mind to, upon account of this your Religious attempt. And now therefore make it your business to ask this and have it granted. For you shall obtain it without any delay. And this great boon granted to your City shall endure throughout all ages, both as a testimony of your most Religious Piety towards the immortal Gods; and shall also be an evidence to your children and descendants, that for this your good course and resolution of life you have received due rewards from our Gracious Goodness.

MAXIMINUS.

This Rescript against us was fixed up on the Pillars throughout every Province, and did utterly exclude us from all hopes of safety, as far as it lay in humane power to do. In so much that (according to that divine oracle) * Even the elect themselves, were it possible, would have been offended at these things. But now, when all expectation [of assistance from above] was amongst most of us in a manner expired and extinct; while they, who were commissioned to publish the aforesaid Edict against us, were in some Countries yet on their journey; God the Protector of his own Church, (repressing the outragious insolence of the Tyrant against us, by stopping his mouth as it were;) did on a sudden demonstrate his celestial assistance in defence of us.

* He alludes to Matth. 24. 24.

[d] Πεῤῥυν σκεῖσθαι. He aludes to that Aspect of the Planets called σκεῖσιν; which term is used concerning the Planets, when they seem to move neither backward, nor forward in their Epicycles; but are stationary. Vales.

[e] In the Greek Text the term is [χασμοδυομένην, parts [not] in sunder] but it should be [ἀναδυομένην, does [not] raise vast hills out of its own bowells.] For two sorts of Earthquakes (contrary to each other) are here spoken of by Maximin; to wit, (1) βεβιασμένας; which (as Amm. Marcellinus describes them book 17. pag. 98. Edit. Paris. 1636) humum molestius suscitantes sursum propellunt immanissimas moles, raise the ground after an horrid manner, and drive forth vast quantities of earth: (2) χασμαίας, which (according to Amm. Marcellin. description, loc. citat.) grandiori motu patefactis subito voratrinis, terrarum partes absorbent, having on a sudden made vast scissures in the ground by a most violent motion, swallow up parts of the earth. See Valesius's notes on these words of Amm. Marcellinus; pag. 142. Maximin means here that earthquake which afflicted the City of Tyre, in that year before Diocletian's Persecution, as our Eusebius relates in his Chronicon. Vales.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning what afterward hapned, in the time of the Wars, of the Famine, and of the Pestilence.

* FOR Showers and Rains which would then have been seasonable (it being Winter) withheld their wonted streams from the Earth: upon which hapned a Famine not so much as thought of or expected, which was followed by a Pestilence. There raged also another violent disease, (it was an Ulcer, which was properly call'd a Carbuncle, upon account of its violent burning.) This Ulcer spread it self over all the parts of the body, and was very fatal and dangerous to them that were afflicted with it. And because its chief seat was for the most part longest about the eyes, it blinded a great many men, women, and children. Besides all these Calamities, the Tyrant did now ingage in a War against the Armenians, who had been old friends and Allies of the Romans. This * person hated by God, endeavoured to compell these men (who were also Christians, very studious and industrious about the service of God,) to sacrifice to Idols and Damons, and so rendred them foes inſtead of being friends, and bitter enemies inſtead of confederates. All theſe calamities therefore, hapning on a ſudden at one and the ſame time, did curb and confute the arrogant boaſting of the inſolent Tyrant againſt God; who had impudently bragg'd that in regard of his care in worſhipping Idols, and perſecuting us, neither War nor Famine, nor Peſtilence, had happened in his Reign. Therefore all theſe Calamities coming to paſs together, and at the ſame inſtant were as Prologues and forerunners of his imminent ruine. Both he and his Armies ſuffered much in the expedition againſt the Armenians: And the reſidue, who inhabited the Cities under his Government, were miſerably oppreſſed with the Plague and Famine: ſo that one meaſure of wheat was ſold for two thouſand five hundred * Attick drachms. Innumerable were they that died in the Cities, but more in the Countries and Villages; ſo that now the † Cenſor's Tables which were formerly filled with the names of Countrey men, wanted but little of one continued blot; allmoſt all perſons being deſtroyed either by the want of ſuſtenance, or the Peſtilential diſeaſe: ſome did not refuſe to ſell to the wealthier ſort, even thoſe things which were moſt dear to them, for a little morſel of food. Others ſelling their eſtates by parcels, were reduced to the greateſt want and extremity. Other-ſome chewed in pieces little handfulls of graſs which they had plucked up, and making no diſtinction, but eating poiſonous herbs together therewith, which corrupted the healthful conſtitution of their bodies, they periſhed. Alſo in every City divers women of good families, being reduced through want to ſhameleſs neceſſity, came forth to begg in the Market-place: their modeſt countenances and neatneſs of dreſs were an evidence of their gentile education: ſome were pined away and dryed up like the Ghoſts of perſons departed, ſo that they went reeling and tottering this way and that way, and being not able to ſtand, fell down in the midſt of the ſtreets, and lying ſtretched out upon the ground with their faces downward, they craved that even the leaſt morſel of bread might be given them: and at their very laſt gaſp cried out, that they were hungry; being only ſtrong enough to utter this moſt doleful expreſſion. But others that ſeemed to be rich, aſtoniſhed at the multitude of beggars, when they had given away a great deal, afterwards became uncompaſſionate and inexorable, expecting that they themſelves ſhould erelong ſuffer the ſame extremities with thoſe that now begged of them. So that now, the dead carkaſſes which lay in the midſt of the Market-places and by ſtreets naked and unburied for many days, were a moſt lamentable ſpectacle to the beholders. Moreover, ſome were devoured by doggs, upon which account thoſe that ſurvived, betook themſelves to killing of doggs; being afraid leaſt they ſhould run mad, and devour them who were yet alive. Neither did the Plague more leiſurely deſtroy whole houſeholds and families; but more eſpecially thoſe whom the Famine could not diſpatch, becauſe they were furniſhed with great ſtore of proviſion. Therefore the rich Preſidents of Provinces, the Prefects, and a great many that were of the Magiſtracy, (as if the Famine had purpoſely reſerved them to be devoured by the Peſtilential diſtemper) ſuffered an accute and ſudden death. All places, by-lanes, the Markets, and ſtreets, were full of lamentations. There was nothing to be ſeen but mournful ſongs at burials, [a] together with their uſuall pipes and other funeral-muſick. Thus death fighting with the two forementioned weapons, to wit, the Peſtilence, and the Famine, did in a ſhort time deſtroy whole families; In ſo much that you might have ſeen two or three dead bodies carried out of the ſame houſe together to the [b] grave. Such were the rewards of Maximin's arrogance, and of the Decrees which the Cities iſſued out againſt us. During theſe ſad times all the Heathens had evident demonſtrations of the care and piety of the Chriſtians exhibited towards all men: for only they (amidſt ſo many and great calamities on all ſides) in reality declared their true compaſſion, and good nature: ſome of them imployed themſelves, every day in taking care of and in burying the dead (for vaſt numbers died whoſe funerals no body took care of.) Others gathered together into one body all thoſe in the City who lay under the preſſures of the Famine, and diſtributed bread to them all. So that, when the fame of this action was divulged amongſt all men; they all glorified the God of the Chriſtians, and did acknowledge them to be pious, and the only true worſhippers of God, being convinced ſufficiently by their works. Affaires being in this poſture, God the great and celeſtial defender of the Chriſtians, (having by the aforeſaid calamities manifeſted his wrath and indignation againſt all men, becauſe of their barbarous cruelties ſhown towards us,) did again reſtore to us the gracious and glorious ſplendour of his Providence; darting forth upon us (involved in the thickeſt darkneſs) the moſt miraculous light of his peace: and made it apparent to all men, that God himſelf was always the Overſeer and inſpectour of our affaires; who does ſometimes indeed chaſtiſe and correct his people with the ſcourges of affliction: but after ſufficient chaſtiſement, he does again ſhew himſelf gracious and merciful to thoſe that confide in him.

* The most ancient Maz. M. S. begins the chap. 8. at these words; to which agrees the Fuk. M. S. and Rufinus. Vales.

MAXIMINUS.

[a] It was cuſtomary amongſt the Heathens to attend their dead to the grave with muſick upon pipes, and ſinging of mournful ſongs: in this Ceremony were imployed certain old Women, called præficæ and ſtiticines; ſee our notes upon the 14th book of Amm. Marcell. Wherefore Chriſtoph. miſtakes who inſtead of [ὑπὲρ τῶν σωμάτων αὐλῶν, &c.] reads [ἀντὶ τῶν, &c.] as if this were the ſence; there was nothing now to be ſeen, but mournful cryes, inſtead of their pipes, &c. thus he erroneouſly tranſlates the place. But all our M. SS. and Nicepho. keep to the common reading. Valeſ.

[b] By what is here related concerning the burial of the dead, we may gather that the cuſtom of burning dead bodies was at that time wholly diſuſed amongſt the Romans. But, when this cuſtom was firſt aboliſh'd 'tis difficult to determine. The Romans ſeem to have taken up this cuſtom of burying in graves from the Jews, and Chriſtians: concerning which we have a place very obſervable in Macrobius: for (ſays he in his Saturnal. B. 7. Cap. 7.) although in our days the cuſtom of burning the dead is antiquated and diſannulled: yet Hiſtory teacheth us that in thoſe days, when they burned the dead, they pay'd great reſpect and honour to them. Valeſ.

[a] In all our M. SS. the Titles of the Chapters are tranſpos'd; that which ought to be the Title of the tenth Chapter is given to the ninth, and on the contrary that which ought to be prefixt to the ninth is ſet before the tenth. This miſtake we had corrected in our tranſlation, but becauſe we would do nothing without the Authority of the M. SS. we did therefore chooſe rather to follow the miſtake, reſting ſatisfied in having advertiſed the Reader of the miſtake. Valeſ.

follows this clause [λιμένις τε τῶ μὴ αὐτὸν σώσασθαι καὶ ἐυσεβείᾳ τεθαρρηκότι, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸν παμβασιλέως Θεὸν τε καὶ ὅλων καὶ σωτῆρος δύο θεοφιλῶν καὶ δύο διατεθεσπίσθαι τυραννίδων ἀναγορευμένων, &c. And Licinius (who was next to him in Authority, both honoured for their wisedom and piety;) two most pious [Emperours] having been encouraged by God the Supream King and Saviour of all men against two most impious Tyrants, &c.] which we have here inserted, judging it to be genuine and penned by Eusebius himself, as 'tis apparent from what follows. For in the end of the period Licinius is mentioned as well as Constantine: whence 'tis plain, that Eusebius had spoken of both of them at the beginning of the period. But the Transcriber designedly expunged Licinius's name here, upon account of the impieties he committed afterwards. The Fuk. and Savill M. SS. does also agree with the Maz. and Med. M. SS. in inserting this clause here. Valef.

a lawful War, (God assisting them;) Maxentius was most miraculously vanquished at Rome by Constantine; and Maximin the Eastern Tyrant, not long surviving Maxentius, dyed a most ignominious death, being conquered by Licinius, who had not yet done any extravagant action. Moreover, Constantine the former of these two (who was the chiefest person, both in respect of honour, place, and degree in the Empire) took compassion upon those who were oppressed with Tyranny at Rome; and having by prayers humbly called upon the God of Heaven, and his Word Jesus Christ the Saviour of all men, to be his helper, he marcheth with his whole Army in vindication of the antient Liberties of the Romans. Now Maxentius, confiding more in his Magick devices, than in the love and favour of his Subjects, durst not so much as stir out of the City gates; but with an innumerable host of Souldiers, and with Ambushes, he fortified all Places, Towns, and Cities whatsoever about Rome, and within the compass of all Italy, which were under the pressures of his Tyranny: the Emperour [Constantine] depended upon divine assistance, and having attacked the Tyrant's first, second, and third Battalion, and with ease routed them all, he made himself a passage through the greatest part of Italy, and was now come up to the very gates of Rome. But least he should be constrained to assault all the Romans for the Tyrant's sake only, God himself drew the Tyrant (as it were with cords) a great way out of the Gates: and did effectually confirm the truth of the miracles he wrought in times past against the wicked (recorded in the everlasting monuments of the sacred Scriptures, which though they are accounted fabulous by some and not credited, are nevertheless believed by the faithful) to all in general, Believers as well as Infidels, who saw this miracle we are about to relate. For as God in the days of Moses and the old Religious Nation of the Hebrews, overwhelmed the Chariots and forces of Pharaoh in the Sea; and drowned his [c] chosen Captaines in the Red Sea, and covered them with the waves: after the very same manner Maxentius with the Souldiers and guards that were about him were cast into the deep like a stone; at such time as he fled before the divine power, which did always assist Constantine's Armes, and designed to pass a River that was in the way before him: over which he laid a very artificial bridge made of Boats joyned together, and so became instrumental to his own destruction. Upon which account these words may be pertinently spoken concerning him;

[c] These words occur at Exod. 15. 4. The phrase in the Hebrew is מִבְחַר שָׁלִשָׁיו, which the Septuagint translation renders ἐπιλέκτους ἀναβάτας τεσσάρας; our English translation, his chosen Captains. Expositours differ in their explications of these words. Valesius thinks the Vulgar translation is truest; 'tis there rendred ternos ex curribus pugnantes, that is, The Three fighting out of the Chariots. The true import of the Hebrew is, The valiantest, or (as the Caldee renders) the fairest, Captaines; called The Three or Third, from their being the third sort of Governours in the Kingdom of Egypt. See Ainsworth. Exod. 14. 7. and 15. 4.

* He hath graven and digged up a pit, and is fallen himself into the destruction that he hath made. His travel shall come upon his own head, and his wickedness shall fall on his own pate. The joynings therefore of the bridge laid over the River being after this manner separated, the passage began to sink; and the Boats together with the men in them descended on a sudden to the bottom of the River. Thus, this most impious Tyrant in the first place, and after him his Guards (according to what was foretold in the sacred Sctiptures) sunk down like lead into the deep waters. So that [Constantine's Souldiers] who at that time by divine assistance obtained the victory, in such sort as the Israelites heretofore did who were lead by Moses that eminent servant of the Lord, [d] ought in all reason to have sung and repeated the same expressions (though not in words exactly the same, yet in reality) that they heretofore did against that impious Tyrant [Pharaoh,] after this manner: * Let us sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and the rider hath he thrown into the Sea. The Lord is my helper and defender, [e] he is become my salvation, And again: who is like unto thee, O Lord, amongst the Gods: who is like unto thee? Glorious art thou amongst the Saints, wonderful in glory, working miracles. When Constantine had in reality sung these Hymns, and Songs like unto, and of the same sort with, these, in praise of Almighty God Governour of all things, and Authour of victory, he entred Rome with all triumphant Pomp and Splendour: and immediately the whole Senate, [f] those that were of the Equestrian Order, and all the people of Rome, together with their wives and children, received him (with a joy in their countenances which proceeded from their very hearts) as a Redeemer, a Saviour, a publick Father, and Benefactour, and with acclamations, and a gladness insatiable. But he, possessing a piety towards God that was naturally implanted on him, was not in the least elevated in mind at these popular acclamations, nor puffed up with these commendations, but being sufficiently sensible of the divine assistance in this his enterprise, he presently gave command, that the Trophy of our Saviour's passion should be put [g] into the hand of a Statue erected to him. And when they had erected his Statue in the most publick place of all Rome, holding in its right hand the salutary sign of the Cross, he commanded an inscription to be

The Greeks call them διατιμότατοι whom the Latines call [Perfectissimi, most Perfect] This Title Perfectissimi was appropiated to them of the Ordinis Equestris, or Roman Knights; as Clarissimi was a title peculiar to them of the Senatorian Order. The Emperour's Prefects and Treasurers, who were always Knights, had the title of Perfectissimi given them. This dignity or title in antient inscriptions is signified by these Characters P. CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

Engraven upon the basis of it in Latine, containing these very words:

BY THIS SAVING SIGN WHICH IS THE COGNIZANCE OF TRUE VALOUR, I HAVE DELIVERED AND FREED YOUR CITY FROM THE SLAVISH YOAK OF THE TYRANT, AND HAVE SET AT LIBERTY THE SENATE AND PEOPLE OF ROME, AND RESTORED THEM TO THEIR ANTIENT SPLENDOUR AND DIGNITY.

After this, Constantine the Emperour and Licinius his Collegue, (who was not then faln into that extravagant madness which afterwards depraved his intellectuals) having both together worshipped and reconciled themselves to God the author of all the good which had hapned to them, did with an unanimous accord and consent enact a most compleat and full Law in behalf of the Christians. And they sent a relation of the miracles which God had done for them, and an account of their victory over the Tyrant, together with this their law, to Maximin who as yet was Emperour in the Eastern parts, and pretended friendship towards them. But he, like a Tyrant, was discontented and dejected at this news: yet being afterwards unwilling to seem to yield to others, and also out of fear to them who had confirmed the Edict, daring not [h] to suppress and conceal it, he directs this his first Rescript in behalf of the Christians, to his Ministers, as it were of his own accord and by his own authority, though he was forced to it; Wherein with much artifice he feigneth concerning himself such things as were never done by him.

[h] Παρεκτὸς τοῦ κελεῦσαι (though otherwise rendred by some translatours) signifies the same as ἐν ἀδιάστῳ δείσῃ, a phrase before used in the first chapter of this ninth book. The import of it is seponere, occultare; to conceal, or suppress the Edict, as Maximin did before in the first Chapter of this ninth book, when Galerius's Rescript was sent him. But when Constantine and Licinius, after the overthrow of Maxentius, sent their Decree to him in favour of the Christians; he durst not conceal it metu superiorum, fearing them, as being his superiours. Vales.

A Copy of the Translation of Maximin the Tyrant's Rescript.

[i] JOVIUS MAXIMINUS AUGUSTUS, to SABINUS. I suppose it well known to your Gravity, and to all men, that our Lords and Fathers Diocletian and Maximian (when they perceived that almost all men, deserting the Religious worship of the Gods, joyned and applied themselves to the Sect of the Christians,) did rightly and duly decree, that all those persons who had Apostatized from the worship and service of their Gods, should be re-called to the worship of the Gods by a publick punishment and chastisement. But when with an happy Omen I first came into these [k] Eastern Provinces, and found that very many men (who might be serviceable to the Republick) were exil'd and confin'd by the Judges, for the reason aforesaid, to certain places appointed them; I gave a charge to all the Judges, that none of them should for the future treat the Subjects of their Provinces so barbarously; but that they should rather regain them to the service of the Gods by courteous perswasives and kind exhortations. During the time therefore that our Commands were, according to our Injunction, strictly observed, it happened that there was not one in all our Eastern Provinces either confin'd, or injured: but, in regard no trouble or disquietude happened to them, they were the rather reduc'd to the worship of the Gods. After this, in [l] the last year, when I successfully made a journey to Nicomedia, and there abode, the Citizens of that City came to me with the Images of their Gods, begging of me with much earnestness that those sort of men might by no means be permitted to inhabite amongst them. But in regard I understood that a great many men of that Religion liv'd in those parts, I gave them this answer: that I was very well pleased with, and thankful to them for, their address, but did not perceive that that was the desire of all men in general. If therefore, any do persist in the [Christians] superstition, every one of them may have his free liberty; to choose what pleases him; and if they will embrace the service of the Gods, they also may do that. I thought it requisite to return a kind reply to the Nicomedians, as well as to the other Cities, who with much importunity had presented me with the same Petition, to wit, that no Christian might dwell in their Cities; [m] for so the preceding Emperours (as I observed) had always done; and it now so pleased the Gods, (by whom all men are preserved, and the publick state of affairs continued in a sedate posture,) that I should grant that earnest address of theirs which they presented me with concerning the divine worship of their Gods. Wherefore although I have very frequently before this time, as well by Rescripts as [n] Commands, ordered your devotedness, that the Presidents of Provinces should not be rigid or severe in their proceedings against those within their districts, who are studious about the observation of the Rites and usages of the Christian Religion; but that they patiently tollerate and with moderation comply with them: of the chief of their charges given them (to wit,) that they should be careful of their health. The Civilians speak much concerning these mandata Principum. Vales.

[i] Diocletian was the first that assumed to himself this firname, Jovius; as his Collegue Maximian did that of Herculius. Afterwards when Constantius and Galerius were created Cæsar's, Galerius, by marrying Diocletian's daughter, and living with him in the East, came to be called Cæsar Jovius; and Constantius, by marrying Herculius's daughter in law; and living with him in the Western parts, was called Cæsar Herculius. Afterwards when Galerius died, Maximin, who was by him created Cæsar, assumed to himself the firname of Jovius; which Eusebius here takes notice of. See the Chronicon Alexandrian. Vales.

[k] Under the name of the East, Egypt also is contained. For the Government hereof was committed to Maximinus Cæsar. For Maximinus (after he was made Cæsar by Galerius) received the jurisdiction over all those Provinces, which Diocletian had reserved to himself. And hence it came to pass, that Egypt was reckoned amongst the Eastern Provinces a long while after. So Amm. Marcellinus (B. 14. where he recounts the Provinces of the East,) reckons Egypt and Mesopotamia amongst them. Further, Egypt was originally under the Comes of the East, as we are informed from an antient inscription; the Contents whereof are these; M. MAECIO MEMMIO FURIO BALBURIO CÆCILIANO PLACIDO C.V. CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

[m] This place is very intricate and obscure: and first, there is a difficulty in these words [ὅτι δὴ καὶ τοῦτο] which some translated propterea quòd, because, but the adverb [ὅτι δὴ] may be rendred ita, so, and then this is the meaning of the place. (viz.) I return'd a kind reply to the Nicomedians, which the Emperours my predecessours always were careful to do. The next difficulty is in these words [ἤρεσεν ἂν, it therefore pleased the Gods, &c.] But we rather read ἤρεσε νῦν, and it now so pleased the Gods, &c. By this means [νῦν] is fitly oppos'd to the preceding words [ἀρχαῖοι αὐτοκράτορες, the antient Emperours, &c.] according to this emendation we have translated the place. Vales.

[n] Maximin does here make a distinction betwixt γράμματα and ἐντολαὶ, Letters and Commands. Letters or Rescripts were sent by the Emperours to the Magistrates or Presidents into their Provinces when they were absent from Court: Mandata or Commands were given them by the Emperour when they were with him, before they went to their Provinces, all which commands were bound up in a short Libel. And this was one yet, least they should suffer any affronts or molestations, from the [o] Beneficiarii, or any others, I thought it agreeable and opportune to remind your Gravity by these Letters, that you should rather win the Subjects of our Provinces to embrace the worship of the Gods, by flatterings and exhortations. Wherfore if any shall voluntarily take upon him to embrace and acknowledge the worship of the Gods, it is convenient that you should receive and treat such persons with the greatest kindness imaginable. But if any chuse to adhere to their own Religion, you are to permit them to take their Liberty. It is therefore required, that your devotedness observe what you are hereby injoyned; and that no person be impowered to injure, or exercise violence towards any of the Subjects of our Provinces: since it is rather convenient (as we said before) to re-call our Subjects to the worship of the Gods by fair words and kind exhortations. Moreover, that this Injunction of Ours may come to the knowledge of all our Subjects, let it be your care to [p] publish this Our Order by an Edict proposed by you.

[o] Those Souldiers were called Βενεφικιάριοι, or Beneficiarii, that were promoted by the favour of the Tribune; they were priviledged from several Duties and Military hardships (as says Vergetius.) Vales.

[p] It was usual that the Præfects of the Prætorium should, immediately upon Receipt of the Emperour's Law, publish it to the Subjects by their Edict. Sometimes they did promulge the Emperours Law before their own Edict; sometimes they Proclaimed their own Edict, and only mentioned in it the Emperour's Law. Thus did Sabinus, in the next chapter of this ninth book. But Rufinus says that he Proclaimed the Emperour's Law before his own Edict. True it is, we must confess, that the Emperours Laws were published before the Edicts of the Presidents most commonly. Of this we have a notable instance in the Conference at Carthage, where after the Reading of the Emperour's Letter to Marcellinus the Tribune and the Notarius, Marcellinus's Edict was read. We must suppose the same thing concerning the Emperour's Rescripts: which were always placed before the Edicts of the Magistrates. So did Himerius Rationalist of Egypt, in his Epistle to the Governour of Marcotis; which Athanasius has related in his Apology. Vales.

When Maximin had issued out this Precept (being necessitated to it, and having not done it of his own accord) for all this he was not lookt upon by all men to mean unfeignedly, or worthy to be confided in, because formerly (after the like Indulgence) he had demonstrated himself to be of a mutable and perfidious disposition. None therefore of our Religion durst either [q] meet together in their Ecclesiastick assemblies, or shew themselves in publick; for the Rescript did not in expres words allow of this; it only contained an order that we should be preserved secure from violence and abuses: but it permitted us not either to celebrate our assemblies, or to build Churches, or to perform any of those solemnities usual with us: although Constantine and Licinius, the Patrons of Peace and Piety, [r] had by their Letters acquainted him, that they had both permitted us to doe these things, and also had granted the same to all under their Government by their Rescripts and Decrees. But the most impious Tyrant was resolv'd not to yield thus, till such time as, having been prosecuted by divine justice, he was at length forced to it, whether he would or no.

[q] By σύνοδον συνχεῖν us'd in this place, we must not understand a Council of Bishops, but an Ecclesiastick Congregation, for σύνοδος is sometimes us'd in that sence, and Niceph. in this place uses [συνάγειν i. e. to meet together in their assemblies] instead of σύνοδον συνχεῖν. which word I greatly approve of as explaining the place. Vales.

[r] These words [ἀυτῷ τε ἐπιτρέπειν ἐπεκάλεσαντο] Musculus and Christoph. render thus; Maximino, ut ista concederet, scripserant, they had written to Maximin that he should grant it. But I think Eusebius's meaning was otherwise, (to wit,) Constantine and Licinius wrote to Maximin that they had given free liberty to the Christians to exercise their Religion, to celebrate their assemblies, and to build Churches, &c. For it seems unlikely and some thing arrogant, that Constantine and Licinius should command Maximin, their Collegue, to grant these Priviledges to the Christians. Vales.

CHAP. X.

Concerning the Victory [obtained] by the Pious Emperours.

THis was the reason which [a] did press him on every hand. When he was no longer able to support the weight of the Government, which was unworthily confer'd upon him, but through want of a moderate prudence of mind, such as is required in a Prince, did insolently and undecently manage publick concerns; and moreover, was vainly puffed up with haughtiness of spirit, even against his Collegues in the Empire, who were far his superiours in Birth, Education, desert, prudence, and (which is the chiefest accomplishment of all) in humility and piety towards the only true God. Through confidence and insolency he arrived to such a degree of audaciousness, as to [b] challenge the Precedency, and placed his name first in all Titles and Honours. Then [c] his madness breaking forth into utter desparation, having violated the league which he had made with Licinius, he raised a bloudy and implacable War. Afterwards in a short time he * put all things into confusion; and every City into a strange consternation; and having gathered together all his forces being a very great Army, he marched forth to fight against Licinius; being extraordinarily puffed up in mind with a confidence of the assistance of Dæmons which he supposed to be Gods, and with his innumerable Army of men. But when he came to engage in a Battel, he was destitute of divine care and protection; and the victory was by the one, only and supream God given to Licinius. First of all his [d] Foot forces were routed, in which he did most confide; then his Guards deserted him, revolting to Licinius the Conquerour, and he forthwith, unhappy wretch, threw off his Royal Robes, (which did not become him,) and timerously, ignobly and unmanfully shrowded himself amongst the crowd [of common Souldiers.] Afterwards he fled; and (being very sollicitous about making provision for his own safety) hid himself in the fields and villages, hardly escaping the Enemies hands; by which he did truely verifie those firm, unerring, and divine Oracles which say; There is no king that can be saved by the multitude Psal. 33. 16.

[a] I wonder Translatours did not understand the force of this word [ἐπιφέρεσθαι, i. e. to surround] when as the Common Lexicons do sufficiently explain it: Moreover, the old Maz. M. S. does here begin this chapter, and I am not a little glad that my conjecture is confirm'd by its authority. For before I had procured that M. S. I begun this tenth chapter at the next period, The King's and Fuk. M. SS. do agree with the Maz. Vales.

[b] By these words [πρῶτον ἑαυτὸν ἐν τοῖς πᾶσι ἀναγορεύειν] is meant, to place his name first in all Titles of Laws and Decrees. Also, in all inscriptions on publick works, Statues and Images, Maximin plac'd his name before his Collegues, Constantine and Licinius: although they were Augusti before him. But Maximin challenged the first place, because he was created Cæsar before them. Vales.

[c] Niceph. changes these words [ἐπῆρεν εἰς ὑπόνοιαν τὰ τῆς μανίας] thus [ἐπῆρεν εἰς τὸ μανίαν τὰ τῆς ὑπονοίας, extending his pride to utter madness] which rendition is not amiss. For ὑπόνοια is, in Chrysostome, taken for pride in many places. Vales.

* In all our M. SS. 'tis χυχήσας; and we translate accordingly the term. Vales.

[d] By [ὁπλιτικὸν] the term here us'd, Eusebius means Maximin's Foot forces. Of all Historians only Zosimus mentions any thing of this Battel between Maximin and Licinius in Illyricum; in his second book: he says, that Licinius at first suffered some loss; but afterwards, renewing the fight, he put Maximin to flight, who fled towards the East, thinking to raise a new Army. This relation does well agree with this of Eusebius here, for he says that Maximin having lost his Army fled into his part of the Empire, that is, into the East. This Battel therefore was fought in Europe; in the year of Christ 313. Constantine and Licinius being the third time Consuls; as Sigonius well observes, in his third book De Occidentali Imperio. Vales.

of an hoſt, neither is any mighty man delivered by his great ſtrength. A horſe is counted but a vain thing to ſave a man, neither ſhall he deliver any man by his great ſtrength. Behold the eyes of the Lord are upon them that fear him, upon them that put their truſt in his mercy; to deliver their ſouls from death. Thus therefore did the Tyrant return with diſgrace into his own Provinces; and firſt of all in a mad paſſion he deſtroyed many Prieſts and Prophets belonging to thoſe Gods he had formerly admir'd, (by whoſe Oracles he had been excited to engage himſelf in this War) as Cheats, Impoſtor's, and alſo, betrayers of his own ſafety. Then, when he had given thanks and praiſe to the God of the Chriſtians, and had enacted a full, perfect and moſt compleat Law for their Liberty, he was forthwith ſtruck with a mortal diſtemper, and (without the leaſt delay allowed him) finiſhed his life. * A Copy of the Tyrants Decree in behalf of the Chriſtians, tranſlated out of Latine into Greek.

EMPEROUR CÆSAR CAÏUS VALERIUS MAXIMINUS GERMANICUS, SARMATICUS, PIUS, FELIX, INVICTUS AUGUSTUS. We are confident no man can be ignorant, but that every one does know and is fully ſatisfied (if he does recollect himſelf and reflect upon what is done,) that at all times and by all means We do conſult the utility of the Subjects of our Provinces, and do willingly grant them ſuch things as may prove moſt advantagious to them in general, all that may be moſt conduſive to their common good and profit, whatever is agreeable to the advantage of the publick, and is moſt grateful to the minds of every one of them in particular. At ſuch time therefore as it came to Our knowledge, that (upon occaſion of a Law made by Our Parents, their moſt ſacred [Majeſties] Diocletian and Maximian, whereby it was Decreed that the Aſſemblies of the Chriſtians ſhould be utterly aboliſhed) many Extortions and Rapines were committed by the * Beneficiarii, and that theſe abuſes of our Subjects, (whoſe peace and quiet is our chiefeſt care) increaſed exceedingly, their eſtates being [upon this pretence] waſted: by Our [e] Letters written the laſt year to Our Preſidents of every Province, we Decreed: that if any one had a deſire to follow that Sect, or adhere to the Preſcripts of that Religion, he might without impediment perſiſt in his reſolution, and not be hindred or prohibited by any man: and that every one ſhould freely do what pleas'd him beſt without the leaſt fear or ſuſpition. But it could not now eſcape our knowledge that ſome of Our Judges did [f] miſapprehend Our Commands, and cauſed Our Subjects to diſtruſt and doubt of our Decrees, and made them more ſlow and fearful in their acceſſes to thoſe Religious performances which they approved of as beſt: Now therefore that all jealouſies, ambiguities, and fears may for the future be removed, we have Decreed that this Our Edict be publiſhed; whereby all men may know, that they who deſire to follow this Sect and Religion, are allowed by this Our Gracious Indulgence to apply themſelves to that Religion which they have uſually followed, in ſuch a manner as is acceptable, and pleaſing to every one of them. We do alſo permit them to rebuild their Oratories. Moreover, that this Our Indulgence may appear the larger and more comprehenſive, it has pleaſed us to make this Sanction; that if any houſes or eſtates (which formerly belonged to and were in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians) are by the Decree of Our Parents devolved to the Right of the Exchequer, or are ſeized upon by any City, or ſould, or [g] beſtowed upon any one as a gratuity: We have Decreed that they ſhall all be reſtored to the antient tenure and poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians; that ſo all men may hereby be ſenſible of our Piety and providence in this concern.

* See the foregoing chapter. note (c.)

[e] He means his Reſcript to Sabinus Preſect of the Pretorium; which Euſebius has inſerted at the foregoing Chap. B. 9.

Maximin ſays 'twas written in the year paſt, or the laſt year, i. e. in the year of Chriſt 312. Conſtantine and Licinius being both then in their ſecond Conſulate. Whence it follows that this laſt Edict of Maximin was written in the year of Chriſt 313; Conſtantine and Licinius being the third time Conſuls. Further, theſe are the principal differences between the Emperours Reſcripts and Edicts. (1.) Their Reſcripts had their names annext to whom they were ſent; the Edicts ſpoke to all men in general. (2.) The Edicts were publickly propoſed; the Reſcripts were given to thoſe to whom they were ſent; as may be ſeen from Geſt. Purgat. Cecilian. p. 28 nor was it uſual to publiſh them, unleſs this word was expreſly added in the end of the Reſcript, proponatur, Let it be publiſhed. Laſtly, in their Reſcripts the name of the Emperour was prefixt only with ſome few of his Titles: but in their Edicts, none of their Titles were omitted, but all were carefully and proudly mentioned. Valeſ.

[f] This word [παρεννοέομαι] is by Langus rendered malè accepiſſe, miſapprehended, miſinterpreted: which Verſion I approve of: for παρεννοεῖος, in its genuin ſenſe ſignifies malè interpretari. But Muſculus (and Chriſtoph. in imitation of him) tranſlates it, negligere to neglect, pro nihilo habere, not to value: which is not ſo well. The Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. read [παρ' ἐδὲν ἐπέθεντο diſregarded] which words ſeem to have been written in the margin as a Scholion at firſt; but afterward crept into the Text. Valeſ.

[g] That is by the Emperours, who us'd to give thoſe Eſtates which fell to the Exchequer to thoſe that begged them. See the Code, in the Title De petitionibus. Valeſ.

These are the expreſſions of the Tyrant, which came from him not a full year after thoſe Edicts he had publiſhed againſt the Chriſtians [engraven on plates of Braſs and] fix't up on the Pillars. And now he, who but a little before looked upon us as impious, Atheiſtical Perſons, and the very peſt of mankind, (in ſo much that we were not permitted to dwell in any City, Countrey, or even in the deſerts,) this very perſon [I ſay] made and publiſhed Laws and Decrees in favour of the Chriſtians. And they, who but lately were deſtroyed by fire and ſword, and were devoured and torn by beaſts and birds in the very preſence of this Tyrant; they, who underwent all ſorts of puniſhments, tortures and death, in a moſt miſerable manner, like Atheiſts and irreligious perſons, even theſe men are now acknowledged by this very Tyrant to profeſs Religion, and are permitted to rebuild their Oratories; nay further, the Tyrant himſelf does acknowledge and atteſt that they ought to be partakers of ſome Rights and Priviledges. Moreover, when he made this publick acknowledgment, (as if he had hereby obtained ſome favour) for this very reaſon, his ſufferings were leſs calamitous than he deſerved they ſhould be, [for] being ſmitten by God with a ſudden ſtroak, he died in the ſecond Engagement [that happened in] that War. But he ended his life not like thoſe Martial Generals, who (after they had often demeaned themſelves gallantly in the field in defence of their honour and their friends) happened couragiouſly to undergo a glorious death. But he (like an impious perſon, and a Rebel againſt his Creatour,) whilſt his Army ſtood in the field drawn up in Battalia, ſtaying at home and hiding himſelf, ſuffered a condign puniſhment, being ſmitten by God with a ſudden blow over his body. For, being tortured with grievous and moſt acute paines, he fell upon his face on the ground, and was deſtroyed by want want of food, all his flesh being melted away by an invisible fire sent upon him from heaven. In so much that, when his flesh was wholly wasted away, the entire shape and figure of his former beauty quite disappeared; his parched bones (which lookt like a skeleton that had been long dried) being all that was left of him. So that those about him judged his body to be nothing else but the grave of his soul buried in a body already dead and wholly putrified. And when the violent heat of his distemper scorched him with a greater vehemency even to the very marrow of his bones, [h] his eyes leaped out of his head, and, having deserted their proper station, left him blind. After all this he yet drew his breath, and having given thanks, and made his Confession to the Lord, he called for Death. At last, acknowledging these his sufferings due for his contempt and presumption against Christ, he gave up the Ghost.

[h] Chrysostome attests the same, in his Oration concerning Saint Babylas against the Gentiles; in these words, Ὡς τῶ μὲν τὰς κόρας ἔπι ζῶντ& αὐτομάτως ἐκπηδῆσαι ἀφ' ὀφθαλμῶν, μαξιμῖνον δεῖν· τὸν δὲ μανέντα. The eye-balls of one of them leapt out of his eye holes of their own accord, while he was yet alive; this was Maximin: The other ran mad. Diocletian was the Emperour that was distracted; which is attested by Eusebius, and by Constantine. We have also an account of Maximins blindness, in Epiphanius's piece De Ponderib. Vales.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning the final Destruction of the Enemies of Religion.

Maximin therefore being thus taken out of the world, (who was the only Enemy of Religion that hitherto surviv'd, and declared himself the worst of them all;) the Churches by the grace of God Almighty were rebuilt and raised from the very foundation, and the Gospel of Christ darting forth its beams of light to the great glory of the all-ruling Deity, enjoyed greater liberty than it formerly had. But the wicked, and the Enemies of Religion were clouded with the highest disgrace and greatest shame immaginable. For first of all Maximin himself was proclaimed by the Emperours a [a] publick Enemy, and was termed in the publick Edicts which were fixed upon Pillars, a most impious, detestable Tyrant, superlatively odious to God. Also the Pictures which were placed in every City in honour of him and his children, were some of them broke in pieces and thrown down from on high to the very ground; and others were defaced, having their visages blackned with dark colours. In like manner, all the Statues which had been erected in honour of him were also thrown down, broken in pieces, and exposed as subjects of derision and scorn to all those that would abuse and insult over them. After this the other Enemies of Religion were divested of all their dignities. Moreover, all Maximin's party, more especially those whom he had preferred to places of the greatest power in the Provinces within his Empire (who to flatter him had been insolently abusive towards our Religion) were put to death. One of this number was [b] Picentius; a person that was a great favourite of his, highly esteemed by him, and his dearest intimado: whom he created Consul a second and a third time, and also made him [c] Prefect and Rationalist. Another was one [d] Culcianus, who had born all Offices of dignity in the Magistracy and in the Government of Provinces; he also was famous for his innumerable Massacres of the Christians in Ægypt. There were a great many more beside these, by whose endeavours most especially the barbarous Tyranny of Maximin was maintained and extended. Further, Divine vengeance required justice to be executed upon [e] Theotecnus, being in no wise forgetful of his practises against the Christians. For he was look't upon as a deserving and successful person upon account of his consecration of the Image at Antioch, and besides, the Emperour Maximin conferred on him the Presidency of a Province. But when Licinius came to Antioch, and was resolved to make inquisition for the Impostours, [amongst others] he tortured the Priests and Prophets of the New contrived Image, enquiring of them how they palliated and put a mask upon their Imposture: when they could no longer conceal the truth, being by their tortures compelled [to disclose it] they declared, that the imposture of the whole Mystery was compos'd by the cunning of Theotecnus:

[a] Though in the common Editions the term here is [πολεμιώτα]& yet we read πολέμι&. For Eusebius here means, that Maximin was proclaimed a Common Enemy. This was done very solemnly, by the Decree of the Senate, as the Compilers of the Historia Augusta inform us in many places, and especially where they treat of Maximin. Vales.

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

[b] Him, whom the Greeks name πάν& we have termed Picentius: that there was a Sycophant of this name in the time of Constantine, Zosimus attesteth in the end of his second book. Certain we are that those persons whom the Greeks call ποινὰ the Latines term Ficentes.

[c] He seems to mean the Prefect of the Prætorium. For the term [ἔπαρχ&] is never used but to denote either the Prefect of the Prætorium, or the Prefect of the City. Besides, whenas Eusebius affirms that Picentius was advanced to great honour and made Consul twice by Maximin, it would be absurd for him to say, that he was made Rationalist by him, that being a place of small honour in respect of the Prefecture of the Prætorium. But, there are these arguments to confute this opinion: (1.) by these words [ἀφ' καθόλ λόγων] Eusebius does always mean the Rationalist, as we have frequently observed before. (2.) Sabinus was Prefect of the Prætorium to Maximin (as we noted before) in the year of Christ, 311, and 312. Neither (3.) is the dignity of the Rationalists Office to be lookt upon as mean and low. For even Macrianus (he that seized on the Empire in the times of Gallienus) bore that Office: and Eusebius himself (book 8. chap. 9.) calls it ἀρχὴν ὐ πῶ τυχοῦ, no mean Office; speaking of Philoromus the Martyr. But that which Eusebius says, to wit, that Picentius was made Consul thrice by Maximin, is very intricate and difficult to be made out. We have observed before, that after Galerius's death, Maximin took upon himself the Title of Augustus, in the year of Christ 311. Therefore, before this time, when he was Cæsar only, he could not make Picentius Consul. For the Augusti only had a right of creating the Consuls. Therefore, after Galerius's death, Maximin declared himself and Picentius Consuls in that very year. On the year following Maximin and Picentius bore their second Consulate in the East, when Constantine and Licinius were the second time Consuls in the West. But in Italy and Africa Maxentius was the fourth time Consul alone. Then, on the year after, which was the 313 year of Christ, the same Maximin and Picentius were Consuls the third time in the East, as is evidently collected from this famous passage in Eusebius. For 'tis improbable that Maximin should give a third Consulate to another, and not declare himself Consul once. Indeed, in the Alexandrian Chronicle, Galerius Maximinus is put Consul with Maximianus being in his eighth Consulate, which is the year of Christ 311. Although in that Chronicle he is called Galerius Maximus. We therefore are the first that have taken notice, that Maximin bore three Consulates. Whence it may be gathered that Maximin was Augustus about two years, having before been Cæsar seven years, and that he lived till the 313 year of Christ, which we have also demonstrated from his Rescripts. Wherefore I wonder how so notorious a mistake should creep into Eusebius's Chronicon, as to place Maximin's death before Maxentius's: It seems to have been committed by Saint Jerome; for he added many things of his own to Eusebius's Chronicon. Vales.

[d] He was President of Thebais, as Epiphanius attests in his 68 Heres. which is the Heresie of the Meletiani, where he is called [κυλιανὸς, Culcianus;] but it should be Culcianus as 'tis evident from this place in Eusebius. Yet Rufinus translates it Quintianus: in Nicephorus 'tis Lucianus; both names are false. For this President was called Culcianus, as (besides Eusebius) the Acts of Phileas the Martyr's passion do affirm. Vales.

[e] Eusebius speaks of this Theotecnus before, in this ninth book. Cedrenus asserts that this Theotecnus perswaded Galerius Maximianus to raise a persecution against the Christians. But he is mistaken, in that he takes Galerius Maximianus for Galerius Maximinus, which is a common errour amongst the modern Greek Authours. Vales.

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS. when therefore Licinius had inflicted condign puniſhment on them all; he gave order that Theotecnus himſelf ſhould firſt be executed, and afterwards the reſt of his Aſſociates that were conſcious to, and accomplices in the Cheat, having firſt ſuffered innumerable tortures. To all theſe were added Maximin's Sons, whom he had now made Colleagues with himſelf in the Empire, and partakers of the Pictures, and Inſcriptions dedicated to his honour. In fine, all the Tyrants relations, (who but juſt before had made their proud boaſts, and inſolently exerciſed authority over all men,) moſt ignominiouſly underwent the ſame ſufferings with thoſe perſons forementioned, for they received not inſtruction, nor did they know, or underſtand this ſeaſonable admonition uttered in the holy Scriptures; O put not your truſt in Princes, nor in the children of men, for there is no health in them. The breath of man ſhall go forth, and he ſhall return again to his earth: in that day ſhall all their thoughts periſh. Thus therefore the impious being like filth wiped away [from off the earth,] the Empire, which by right belonged only to Conſtantine and Licinius continued firm, and unobnoxious to Envy. Theſe perſons (after they had firſt of all cleanſed the world from all impiety) being ſenſible of thoſe great benefits they had received from God, did ſufficiently demonſtrate their love of vertue and of the Deity, their piety, and gratitude towards God, by the Laws they made in favour of the Chriſtians.

THE TENTH BOOK OF THE Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory OF EUSEBIUS PAMPHILUS.

CHAP. I.

Concerning the Peace, which was procured by God for us.

THerefore, glory be to God the Almighty and ſupream King, for all things: and manifold thanks to the Saviour and Redeemer of our ſouls, Jeſus Chriſt, through whom we pray that we may have always preſerved to us a firm and inviolable peace, both from outward troubles, and alſo from all internal moleſtations of mind. Having (by the aſſiſtance of your prayers) added this tenth book of our Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory to thoſe foregoing books at this place finiſhed, we have dedicated it to you (moſt ſacred [a] Paulinus!)

[a] He means Paulinus Biſhop of Tyre, to whom our Euſebius dedicated his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. For by his perſwaſion he undertook this work, as he does here plainly intimate. Euſebius deſignedly omitted the dedication of his books to Paulinus at the beginning of this his work, (which is uſually done,) upon account of Paulinus's modeſty (if I miſtake not:) but was contented to make an honourable mention of him at the end of his Hiſtory. For he ſuppoſed it ſignified not much, whether he dedicated his books to him at the beginning, or at the end of them. Euſebius dedicated to the ſame Paulinus two books περὶ τοπικῶν ὀνομάτων, concerning the names of places: the former of theſe (which contained the diviſion of the 12 Tribes, the deſcription of the City Jeruſalem, and the Hebrew appellations of extraneous nations) is now loſt. But the latter (which treats of the Hebrew names of places) was above twenty years ſince put forth in Greek by the Reverend Father Bonfrerius, to which there is prefixt an Epiſtle to Paulinus. Wherein Euſebius atteſts, that by Paulinus's perſwaſion he attempted that work; and he gives him this title [ἱερὲ Θεοῦ ἄνθρωπε παυλῖνε, O Paulinus, thou ſacred man of God!] Paulinus therefore was our Euſebius's ἐφορμώτης, Inſtigator to compile his books, as Ambroſius heretofore was Origen's.—Further, this Paulinus was at firſt a Presbyter of Antioch. Afterwards, being preferred to the Biſhoprick of Tyre, he was much commended for his Preſidency over that Church. And at length when Euſtathius was diveſted of the See of Antioch, he was by the Antiochians preferred to the Government of their Church: ſo Euſebius informs us, in his book againſt Marcellus, chap. 4. in theſe words, ἐπὶ δὲ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἄνθρωπον, &c. Afterwards he inveighs againſt the man of God Paulinus, a moſt bleſſed perſon; who was adorned with the dignity of a Presbyter at Antioch: and was ſo famous for his Government of the Tyrian Church, that the Antiochians challenged him as their own proper goods. Philoſtorgius (book 3. chap. 15.) ſays expreſly, that Paulinus ſucceeded Euſtathius in the See of Antioch, and that ſix months after his tranſlation he died.—Paulinus therefore died in the year of Chriſt 328, after he had born the Epiſcopate of Antioch ſix months. Wherefore Gothofredus is much miſtaken, who (in his notes on Philoſtorgius) ſuppoſes Paulinus to have died in the year of Chriſt 324; and blames Philoſtorgius for being inconſtant to himſelf. But Philoſtorgius agrees very well with himſelf; which Gothofredus does not, in aſſerting that Paulinus Biſhop of Tyre died on the year of Chriſt 324. undoubtedly Paulinus Biſhop of Tyre was preſent at the Nicene Council, and ſurvived that Synod ſometime; as Theodoret informs us book 1. chap. 6. and Sozomen book 2. chap. 18.—Baronius indeed ſays that Paulinus died in the year 324, and that Euſtathius ſucceeded him. But Baronius affirms not, that that Paulinus, whom he makes Euſtathius's predeceſſour, was Biſhop of Tyre. Valeſ.

hereby publiſhing you to be the ſeal and cloſure as it were of this our whole work. Nor will it be incongruous (as we ſuppoſe) to place here * in its due order, a compleat Panegyrick concerning the Re-edification of the Churches: obeying herein the holy Spirit, which exhorteth us in theſe words:

* The phraſe in the original is [ἐν ἀριθμῷ τελείῳ] which Valeſius, Chriſtophorſon, and Grynaus render in perfecto numero; and we, in its due order.

O ſing unto the Lord a new ſong; for he hath done marvellous things. With his own right hand, and with his holy arme hath he gotten himſelf the victory. The Lord hath declared his ſalvation: his righteouſneſs hath he openly ſhewed in the ſight of the Heathen. Therefore, ſince the Scripture injoyneth us [to begin] a new ſong, let us agreeable thereto ſing together; becauſe, after ſuch terrible, black, and horrid ſpectacles and relations; we are now vouchſafed to ſee ſuch happy days, and to celebrate ſuch Feſtivals, as many of our Anceſtours, who were truly juſt and Gods Martyrs, deſired to ſee upon earth, but have not ſeen them; and to hear, but have not heard them. But theſe perſons, haſtning away with all poſſible ſpeed, obtained far more excellent things, being taken up into Heaven, and into the Paradiſe of divine joy and delight: And we, confeſſing theſe preſent enjoyments to be greater than our deſerts, ſtand amazed at the bounty of the Donour of ſuch munificence: We alſo juſtly admire and adore him with the utmoſt vigour of our ſouls, atteſting the truth of his Predictions by his Prophets contain'd in the Scriptures, in which 'tis ſaid: O come hither, and behold the works of the Lord, what miracles he hath done upon the earth; He maketh warrs to ceaſe in all the world. He ſhall break the bow, and knap in ſunder the ſpear, and burn the ſhields with fire. Let us therefore rejoyce Pſal. 98. 1, 2, 3. Pſal. 46. 8, 9.

at the perfect and effectual completion of theſe things in our days, and with gladneſs proſecute the ſeries of our narration. After the ſame manner therefore that we have related, did the whole race of thoſe enemies of God vaniſh, and was ſuddenly taken away out of mens ſight; ſo that that divine Oracle was again compleated, which ſays; * I have ſeen the wicked exalted, and lifted up like the Cedars of Libanus, I went by, and lo, he was not: I ſought his place but it could not be found. Now therefore a bright and glorious day, no cloud overſhadowing it, doth enlighten, with raies of heavenly light, the Churches of Chriſt over all the earth. Neither were there any of thoſe that were ſtrangers to the community of us Chriſtians, and to our Religion, [b] but (although they did not enjoy them in the ſame degree that we did, yet at leaſt in ſome meaſure) might together with us partake of the ſtreams and effluxes of thoſe good things, which had been procured us from God.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Re-edification of the Churches.

ALL mankind was now free from the ſlavery and oppreſſion of Tyrants; and being releaſed from their former miſeries, (although ſeveral ways, yet) all acknowledged as well as they could, that it was the only true God, who was the Defender of the pious. But more eſpecially amongſt us (all whoſe hopes were fixed ſolely upon God's Chriſt) there was an inexpreſſible joy, and a kind of celeſtial gladneſs; when we ſaw all places, which through the irreligion of the Tyrants were a little while ago totally deſtroyed, reſtored to life as it were, and recovered from a tedious and fatal ruine; and [when we beheld] the Temples erected again from the ground to a vaſt height, and in ſplendour far excelling thoſe which had formerly been deſtroyed. Moreover, the Emperours themſelves, in whoſe hands the ſupream power was, by their continual enacting of Laws in favour of the Chriſtians, did enlarge, augment, and confirm the magnificence of the Divine bounty towards us. There were Reſcripts alſo frequently ſent from the Emperour particularly to the Biſhops, their honours were increaſed, and ſums of money were beſtowed on them. The Contents of which Reſcripts (being tranſlated out of Latine into Greek,) it may not be impertinent to record in this book (as in a ſacred Table) at a proper and fit place, that they may be had in continual remembrance by all ſucceeding generations.

CHAP. III.

Concerning the Conſecrations of Churches every where [ſolemniz'd.]

AFter thoſe things, a ſpectacle earneſtly prayed for, and much deſired by us all, appeared; [to wit,] the Solemnization of the Feſtivals of Dedication [of Churches] throughout every City, and the Conſecrations of the new builded Oratories; the frequent aſſemblies of Biſhops, the concourſe of Strangers from Countries far remote, the mutual love and benevolence of the people; the union of the members of Chriſts body joyned together in an intire harmony and conſent: therefore, (agreeable to that * Prophetick prediction, which has myſtically foreſignified what is to come,) bone was joyned to bone, and joynt to joynt; and what ever elſe that Divine Prophecy has ænigmatically but truly declared. There was one and the ſame power of the holy Ghoſt which paſſed through all the members: one ſoul in all: the ſame alacrity of faith: one common concent in chaunting forth the [a] praiſes of God. Indeed, the Ceremonies of the Prelates were moſt intire, the Presbyters performances of Service exact, the Rites of the Church, decent and majeſtick; [b] on the one hand was a place for the ſingers of Pſalms, and for the reſt of the Auditors of the expreſſions ſent from God: on the other was a place for thoſe who performed the divine and myſtical Services: there were alſo [delivered] the [c] myſtical Symbols of our Saviour's Paſſion. And now people of all Ages, and Sexes, men and women, with the utmoſt vigour of their minds, with joyful hearts and ſouls, by prayers and thankſgiving, worſhiped God the author of all good. All the Prelates then preſent made publick Orations, every one (as well as he was able,) endeavouring to ſet forth the praiſes of thoſe aſſembled.

[b] Rufinus's Verſion of this place may ſerve inſtead of a comment; he tranſlates it thus; Jam verò ingens in Sacerdotiis & miniſteriis, atque in omnibus quæ ad religionis obſervantiam pertinent, gratia reſulgebat. Adſtabant hic pſallentium chori, juvenes & virgines, ſenes cum junioribus laudabant nomen domini. Hic myſtica miniſteria ordinatis & diſpoſitis vicibus agebantur; And now an exceeding great glory and beauty appeared in the performances of the Presbyters, and in the Eccleſiaſtick Services, and in all things belonging to the obſervances of Religion. In one place, the company of thoſe that ſung Pſalms, youths and virgins, old men and young, praiſed the name of the Lord. In another, the myſticall ſervices were performed by ſet courſes orderly appointed. The terms [ὧδε μὲν] therefore denote the people of the congregation, who ſang Pſalms in the Church, and hearkned to the ſacred Leſſons: which is confirmed by theſe words [φωνῶν ἀκροάσεσι, auditours of the expreſſions] which can be underſtood of the Laicks only. The words [ἄλλοθι δὲ] point out to us the Presbyters, who performed the myſtical ceremonies. Valeſ.

[c] By theſe [ἀπόῤῥητα σύμβολα σωτηρίου πάθους, the myſtical Symbols of our Saviour's paſſion] is meant Baptiſm; which is a ſign of our Saviour's ſuffering. For, by Baptiſm we die, and are buried with Chriſt, and we riſe again through the ſame Chriſt by faith. See Coloſ. 2. 12. Valeſ.

CHAP. IV.

A Panegyrick concerning the ſplendid poſture of our Affaires.

AND a certain perſon, that had been indifferently well educated and was deſerving, having made this Oration, came forth into the preſence of a great many Biſhops, (that were then preſent as at an Eccleſiaſtick aſſembly) who gave him Audience quietly and decently; then turning himſelf towards one who was the eminenteſt of them all, (a Biſhop acceptable to God, by whoſe care the Church of Tyre, the ſtatelieſt Fabrick amongſt all the Churches within the Country of Phœnicia, was gloriouſly erected,) he ſpake thus.

A Pane-

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

A Panegyrick upon the building of the Churches, spoken to Paulinus Bishop of Tyre.

You the Friends and Priests of God, who are wrapt in the sacred long Vesture, Crowned with the celestial diadem of glory, anointed with the holy Unction, and clothed in the Sacerdotal Robe of the holy Spirit: and You, the Grace and Ornament of this New-erected and sacred Temple of God, You who are adorned by God with a prudence befitting an hoary head, but have exhibited many glorious evidences of a vigorous and Juvenile Vertue; You to whom God, (who comprehendeth the whole world,) [a] hath granted the special prerogative of building and renewing this terrestrial Temple for Christ his only begotten and his first born word, and for his holy and sacred Spouse: [You] whom one may term either a new Beseleel, the Architect of the holy Tabernacle; or another Salomon, King of a new, and far more excellent Jerusalem; or a second Zorobabel, in regard You have added a far greater splendour to the Temple of God, than it had before. Also, You, the Sheep of Christ's sacred flock; the Seat and Mansion of good Doctrines; the School of modesty; and the Reverend and [b] Religious Auditory of piety! We (who have long since heard, by reading the holy Scriptures, the Miraculous works of God, and the loving kindness of the Lord [declared] by his wonders towards mankind,) may now sing Hymns and Psalms to God, being instructed to say, * O God, we have heard with our ears; our fathers have told us the work which thou didst in their days, in the times of old. But now, having not barely by hearing and reports only, perceived the exalted Arm, and celestial right hand of our all good and supream God and King; but in reality and (as we may say) with these very eyes seen the truth and verity of those things which were heretofore recorded; we may sing a second triumphant Hymn, and breake forth into these expres words, saying, Like as we have heard, so have we seen, in the city of the Lord of hosts; in the city of our God. But in what City, except in this new built, and framed by God? * Which is the Church of the living God, the Pillar and ground of the truth. Concerning which another divine Oracle speaketh thus: † Very excellent things are spoken of thee thou city of God. In which Church since God the giver of all good, by the Grace of his only begotten Son hath convened us, let every one here assembled cry out with a loud voice as it were, and say; * I was glad when they said unto me, we will go into the house of the Lord. And again: † Lord I have loved the beauty of thine house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth. And not only every particular person, but let us all together rejoyce and shout forth praises with one spirit, and one mind, saying, * Great is the Lord and highly to be praised, in the city of our God, even upon his holy hill. For he is truly great, and his house is great, lofty and spacious, and more beautiful than the sons of men. Great is the Lord who only doth marvellous things. Great is he who doth magnificent things, and such as are past finding out, glorious and stupendious, of which there is no number. Great is he who altereth times and seasons; who deposeth and constituteth Kings: who raiseth up the poor from the earth, and exalteth the beggar from the dunghil: He hath thrust down the mighty from their seats, and hath exalted the humble from the earth. He hath filled the hungry with good things, and hath broken in pieces the armes of the proud. Not only amongst the Faithful, but amongst the Infidels also he hath confirmed the authority of those relations heretofore recorded of him of old. 'Tis he who worketh miracles: 'tis he that doth great things: 'tis he who is Lord of all: he, who is the framer of the whole world: he, who is Almighty: All-good: he that is the one and only God. In obedience to whom let us sing a new song; to him, who only doth wonderful things; for his mercy endureth for ever. Who smote great Kings and slew mighty Kings; for his mercy endureth for ever. For the Lord remembred us when we were in a low condition, and hath redeemed us from our Enemies. And let us never cease thus to praise God the Father of all. Also him, who is the [c] second Author of all good to us; who is our Master in instructing us in the knowledge of God, the Teacher of true piety, the destroyer of the wicked, the slayer of Tyrants, the reformer of our lives; Jesus our Saviour, when we were in despair, him let us extol, having his name always in our mouth. For he alone, who is the only and Best Son of the Best and greatest Father, in complyance with his Father's love to mankind, most willingly cloathed himself with our nature who were buried in Corruption; and like a careful Physician ([d] who for the healths sake of his Patients looks into the wounds, lightly stroketh the sores, and from other mens calamities attracteth grievances upon himself;) he himself hath by himself saved us (who were not only diseased and oppressed with foul ulcers and wounds already putrified; but also lay amongst the dead) from the very Jaws of death. For there was no other in heaven that had so much power, as inoffensively to minister health to so many; it was he only therefore who after he had touched our burdensome corruption, he alone, who after he had endur'd our labours, he alone who, after he had taken upon himself the punishment of our impieties; raised us (when we were not only half dead, but lay altogether impure and stincking in the Graves and Sepulchers) and both in times past and now

[a] These words [χάριν ἐξαίρετον δεδώρηται] which we render [to whom God hath given this special and particular privilege] Christoph. understands as if this were the sense of them. (viz.) That this Church, which was founded by Paulinus, was a special ornament or honour to Christ, and his Church: but Musculus follows the same sense that I do. Vales.

[b] In the Greek Text, the term is [θεοσεβὲς] which we have translated Religious; but doubtless Eusebius wrote [θεοπρεπὲς, majestick] for it would be a simple way of expressing ones self thus, θεοσεβείας θεοσεβὲς ἀκροατήριον, the Religious Auditory of Religion. Vales.

* Psal. 44. v. 1.

[c] In the Med. M.S. I found this Scholion written at these words; καὶ· κατὰ τὰ αὐτὰ θεολογεῖς Εὐσέβιε πρὸ τῆς σωναιρχίας καὶ σωταιδίας, καὶ συμπαντὸς τοῦ ὅλων υἱοῦ τῷ Θεῷ. δεύτερον αὖτον ἀποκαλῶν ἄπιον καὶ ἀγαθῶν, σωτῆρα ἄπιον ὄντα καὶ συνδημιουργὸν τοῦ παντὸς καὶ ὅλων, καὶ ὡσαύτως; i. e. Thou deliverest no good divinity here (O Eusebius !) concerning the Son of God, who is coëqual in dominion, coëternal, and con-Creatour of all things [with the Father:] Thou stilest him the second Authour of all good, when as he is the same Authour and Framer of all things with the Father, and of the same substance with him. Also in the Maz. M. S. we met with this Scholion here, in a later hand, wherein Eusebius is also reproved, in regard he subjects the Son to the Father, and attributes to him the second place. Τί πρὸς ἄνθρωπε ὅτι κακῶ τῆς σωτῆρ θεολογεῖς κεφαλῆς. Τὸν δεξῆ καὶ δυνάμει καὶ οὐσία καὶ πάντα ὅμοιον τῷ πατρὶ ὑποβιβάζων καὶ ὑποπόδιος, καὶ τὰ διάφορα τὰ παντὸς ὀνείδων· ἐγκλία φρενῶν καὶ γεφύρων τοῖς ὁμοίοις τῷ πατρὶ τὸ υἱὸν δοξαζίσασιν ἄλλοις παλαιοῖς· ὧν συνήροφ ὑπ, εἰ ὡς περφανῶς ψεύδεται οἱ τὰς πρόξεις συγγεγραφότες αὐτῶν, that is; why doest thou utter this divinity (O man!) to thine own destruction? detracting from and subjecting him, who in glory, power, and essence is every way like the Father; and attributing to him the second place from the Father. Thy sentiments and writings do herein contradict those holy Fathers, who determined the Son to be coëssential with the Father. To whose opinion thou didst subscribe, unless they who wrote their Acts do declare a palpable untruth. Vales.

[d] In the Greek, these following lines (the translation whereof is contained within this parenthesis) seem to be Iambicks taken out of some Tragedian. The words are these;

Τῆς δ' ἐν κακοῖσιν εἶνεκεν σωτηρίας·
Ὀρᾷ τὰ δεινὰ δυστυχῆ δ' ἀνδρῶν·
Ἀλλοίας τε συμφορῆσιν ἰδίας ——κεφαλῆς) λύπας.

which verses are undoubtedly very elegant, and smel something of Æschylus, or Sophocles. But I think they ought rather to be blotted out of this place, for they disturb the sence. Vales.

CONSTANT. & LICIANUS.

through his earneſt compaſſion towards us (even beyond our hopes and expectations) preſerveth us, and imparteth to us an exuberancy of his Fathers good things. Tis he who is the Authour of life, the Introducer of light; our great Phyſician, King, Lord, and the Anointed of God. [e] But even then, when all mankind (by the wiles of deteſtable Devils, and the operations of ſpirits hated by God) lay buried in an obſcure night, and thick darkneſs, he [f] only by his appearance, with the rayes of his light diſſolv'd the manifold chains of our ſins, like melting wax. And now, when by reaſon of his ſo great love and beneficence [towards us] the † envious Devil, Enemy to all that is good, and the favourer of evil was in a manner burſt [with grief,] and marſhalled all his fatal forces againſt us; and when at firſt having (like a mad Dog who with his teeth gnaws the ſtones that were thrown at him, ſpending the fury he was put into, againſt thoſe that provoked him, upon the liveleſs things thrown at him,) turn'd his beaſtly rage upon the ſtones of the Oratories, and upon the ſenſleſs piles of the buildings, he thought with himſelf, that he had procur'd the utter deſolation of the Churches; alſo, when afterwards he ſent forth terrible hiſſings, and his ſerpentine expreſſions, one while by the menaces of impious Tyrants, at another time by the blaſphemous Decrees of profane Preſidents, and moreover belched forth the virulency of his death, and with his venemous and deadly potions, poiſoned thoſe ſouls that were captivated by him, and had in a manner deſtroyed them by the pernicious ſacrifices of dead Idols; when laſtly he had incited againſt us all thoſe that under the ſhape of men masked their ſavage cruelty, perſons of a diſpoſition every way barbarous and fierce: Then again the Angel of the great Council, that [g] Chief Commander of Gods Hoſts (after a ſufficient exerciſe in the Combat, which the moſt valiant Champions of his kingdom exhibited, by undergoing the ſevereſt hardſhips with patience and fortitude,) appearing on a ſudden, ſo utterly deſtroyed and reduc'd to nothing, all his Enemies and Adverſaries, that they ſeem as if they had never been named. But his friends and dependants he exalted to the higheſt pitch of glory, not only amongſt all men, but amongſt the celeſtial powers alſo, the Sun, the Moon the Stars, the whole Heaven, and the World. So that now (which thing never hapned before) the ſupream Emperours, ſenſible of that honour they have received from God, ſpit in the faces of the dead Idols, trample under foot the prophane Rites and ſervices of Devils, and deride that antient errour handed down to them by tradition from their Anceſtours: they acknowledge one only God, the common Benefactor to all men, and to them in particular; and they profeſs Chriſt the Son of God to be the ſupream Ruler of all things, they proclaim him Saviour in their inſcriptions upon Pillars, ingraving in Royal Characters his valiant exploits and victories (in order to their indelible Remembrance) over the impious, in the very midſt of that City which is Queen of the whole Earth. So that our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt is the only perſon amongſt all thoſe who have been ſince the world began, that is confeſſed to be (even by the Emperours themſelves, who are ſupream here upon earth,) not an ordinary King made ſuch by men, but is worſhipped as being the genuine Son of the ſupream God, and is [adored] as being [h] truly and in himſelf God; and that deſervedly. For what King had ever ſuch power, as that he could fill the tongues, and ears of all men upon earth [i] with his name? What King ever conſtituted ſuch pious and prudent Laws, and was able to confirm them in ſuch a manner, that they ſhould be perpetually read in the audience of all men from the one end of the whole earth to the oppoſite extremities thereof? What King hath ever by his mild and indulgent Laws, melted and ſoftened the ſavage and barbarous diſpoſitions of the inhumane Heathens? What King oppoſed by all men during the ſpace of ſo many whole Ages, ever demonſtrated ſuch a more than humane valour and ſtrength, that he flouriſhed dayly, and ſeem'd to grow young in every ſucceeding age? who hath planted a Nation (which heretofore was not ſo much as heard of) not in ſome ſecret unknown corner of the earth only, but even throughout the whole world [which lies] under the Sun? Who ever armed his Souldiers with the Arms of godlineſs in ſuch a manner, that in their conflicts with their Adverſaries they made it apparent that their minds were firmer than an Adamant? What King was ever ſo potent as to lead an Army after his death, and to erect Trophies againſt his Enemies, and to fill every Place, Countrey, and City, Grecian and Barbarian, with his Royal Palaces, and with the [k] Conſecrated fabricks of holy Temples, ſuch as are thoſe ſplended ornaments and conſecrated gifts belonging to this very Church. Which are in themſelves truly auguſt and magnificent, worthy of amazement and admiration, in regard they are [l] evident repreſentations of our Saviour's Kingdom. *For he now ſpake and they were made; he commanded, and they ſtood faſt: for what could withſtand the beck and will of the Word, who is the ſupream King and Governour of all things, and is himſelf God? But an accurate contemplation, and explication of theſe things particularly, require a peculiar diſcourſe and leiſure. Moreover, a peculiar leiſure would be requiſite to relate what, and how great the alacrity of the workmen was that laboured in this building, and how it was

[e] Here he firſt relates what Chriſt did in the days of old, for the ſalvation of mankind. Afterwards he ſets forth what miracles he lately wrought. Valeſ.

[f] In the Text we read [αὐτὸς μόνῳ ἐπιφανείς,] but we ſhould rather read [αὐτὸ μόνον] as we find it in the Med. Fuk. and Maz. M.SS. αὐτὸ μόνον ſignifies ſolummodo, only, or alone; which phraſe is frequent in Euſebius, and thus he is here to be underſtood: That Chriſt only, by his appearance and incarnation in times paſt, delivered men, who were enſlav'd by the Devil, from that grievous yoke of ſervitude. Valeſ.

† Τῷ μισονήλῃ φθόνῳ καὶ φιλοπονήρῳ δαίμονι; the import whereof, if rendered word for word, is this; Envy the hater of that which is good, and the Devil the lover of miſchief. But by the following words in the period he ſeems to ſpeak of the Devil only: upon which account we render it The envious Devil, &c. agreeable to Valeſius's Verſion.

[g] Upon theſe words in the Med. M. S. we find this Scholion in the margin. (vit.) this is wicked, Atheiſtical, and Blaſphemous, to call the Saviour Chriſt and God, the great Commander in chief of God's Hoſt. Valeſ.

[h] We ought to take ſpecial notice of this place; for it is the firſt wherein Euſebius calls Chriſt αὐτοθεὸς. This one place I think ſufficient to confute all their malicious calumnies, who believe that our Authour Euſebius was infected with Arianiſme. This word [αὐτοθεὸς] is made in imitation of Plato's word αὐτοαγαθὸν, which ſignifies that which in it ſelf is truly good: ſo αὐτοθεὸς is he who is truly originally and in himſelf God. Valeſ.

[i] By theſe words [τῆς ἀπὸ εὐσεβείας] may be meant the Chriſtians, who are called τῆς ἀπὸ εὐσεβείας after his own name: which name of Chriſtians was ſpread over all Nations, and known not amongſt the Romans only, but alſo amongſt the Barbarians. But if any would have theſe words [τῆς ἀπὸ εὐσεβείας] ſignifie Chriſt's own name; I will not much contradict it; for a little after our Authour ſpeaks of the Chriſtians: which certainly he would not have done, had he ſpoken of them before. Valeſ.

[k] Ἀφιέρωμα the term here, does not ſignifie the Conſecration of Churches, as Muſculus here tranſlates it; but rather the Donaria, things Offered and Conſecrated to God, and thus the following words [κοσμήματα καὶ ἀναθήματα, Ornaments and Dedicated (or Conſecrated) gifts,] declare. Certainly if Euſebius had here meant Conſecration, he would have us'd ἀφιέρωσις and not ἀφιέρωμα in this place; as he does in the third chapter of this tenth book. Valeſ.

[l] In the Kings M. S. at the ſide of this line I found this mark [ωρ.] ſet: which is an abbreviation of the word [ὡραῖον, i. e. polite, elegant.] In antient M. SS. 'tis uſually found placed at the more elegant paſſages. Valeſ.

was look't upon and esteemed of by that God himself, whom we extoll, who inspects the living temples of us all, and views the house built of living and [m] firm stones, well and securely placed upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone: who was rejected not only by those who were the Framers of that antient building, which endures now no longer, but also by those Architects of that Fabrick which now is, consisting of many persons; who were wicked Framers of evil works. But the Father having tryed [this stone] and approv'd of it, in times past, and now also, layed it as the head of the Corner of this Church which is common to us all. Into this living Temple therefore of the living God, which is made up of us, (I mean that most stately sacred Fabrick, truly worthy of God, whose inmost recesses are invisible to the vulgar, and are truly holy, and the holiest of holies) what man is he that dares look and divulge [what he there beholds?] Yea who is he that can with his eyes penetrate its sacred inclosures, but he alone, the great high Priest of all; whose only right and priviledge it is to make researches into the secrets of every rational soul? And perhaps the same is granted to [n] one other person in the next place after him, to wit, to this chief leader of his Host; whom the first and great high Priest himself hath honoured with the second place of the Priesthood in this sacred Temple, and has himself constituted him the shepherd of your holy flock, having this your people committed to his charge by the allotment and determination of the Father, as being his own Minister and Interpreter: a new Aaron, or Melchisedeck, made like to the Son of God, remaining, and by the publick prayers of you all preserved for ever by him. Unto this person alone therefore be it lawful next after the chief and principal High Priest, if not to have the first, yet at least the second place in looking into, and taking care of the very inmost recesses of your souls: for by [the help of] experience and length of time he hath both made accurate inquiries into every particular person amongst you; and also by his care and industry, hath instructed you all in modesty, and in the doctrine which is according to godliness: and he is abler than any one else to give such accounts of those [o] works (which by the assisting power of God he hath perfected) as are answerable to the works themselves. Indeed, our first and chief High Priest saith, * What things soever he seeth the Father do, these also doth the Son likewise. But this person, looking upon the first [High Priest,] as it were upon a Master, attentively with the unpolluted eyes of the mind; whatsoever things he seeth him do, them he maketh use of as his original patterns, and hath wrought the representations thereof into such a form, that they do express (as neer as 'tis possible to be done) an exact likeness thereto. Being nothing inferiour to that * Beseleel, whom God himself (having filled him with the spirit of Wisedom and understanding, and of other artificial and skilful knowledge,) made choice of to be the Framer of a Structure of celestial types of a † Temple by certain shadowed representations. After the same manner therefore, this our [Bishop] [p] bearing in his mind the perfect, whole, and intire representation of Christ, who is the Word, the Wisedom and the Light; it cannot be expressed with what a greatness of soul, * with what a rich and inexhaustible hand of his understanding, and with what an emulous liberality [proceeding from] you all, (who by your nobleness in contributing to the charge did most ambitiously contend, that you might in no wise seem to be inferiour to his vast design) he hath erected this magnificent Temple of the most high God which may be seen, naturally resembling (as neer as may be) the Model of that more glorious Structure which is invisible. And this very place, (for it is fit we should speak of this first,) which by the treacheries of our Enemies was overwhelmed with all manner of impure rubbish, he neglected not; nor did he in the least yield to the wickedness of them who had been authors of it; whenas he could have found out another place (whereof there are great numbers in this City) where he might have been eased of much of his labour, and freed himself from many troubles: yet, having first made ready himself to undertake this work; and afterwards corroborated all the people with an alacrity of mind, and gathered them all together into one great Band, he attempted this [q] first laborious enterprize: supposing it fitting that this very Church (which had been most battered by the Enemies, which had heretofore undergone great sufferings [upon our account,] which had endured persecutions both with and before us, which like a mother was bereaved of her children,) ought to enjoy together with us the magnificent bounty of our most good and gracious God. For, in as much as that great Shepherd hath vouchsafed to gather his children together again into one place, having driven away the wild beasts, Wolves, and all the savage and fierce kind of creatures, and (as the divine Scriptures say,) having broken the jaw-bones of the Lions, with good reason he reedified the Fold for his Flock, * That he might put to confusion the enemie and the avenger, and might bring a reproach upon the audacious and rebellious attempts of the impious against God. [r] Now therefore these persons, hated by God, are not, nor were they then. But after they had for a short space of time raised disturbances, and were

[m] I have translated these words [Ϛεϛηκότων λίθων] firm stones: Musculus translates them crescentes lapides, growing stones. Christoph. renders them incedentes in terra lapides, walking stones: but I cannot conceive, how the foundation could be firm, if the stones mov'd. Of these Versions the Reader may take which best pleaseth him; I do not here reject Christoph. version. But whereas Christoph. supposes these words [τοῦ θεολογικοῦ] which we translate [that God whom we praise] do signifie Christ; I cannot at all commend him: For our Authour speaks afterward of Christ; saying, that he is the chief corner stone of this Temple. Wherefore by [τὸ θεολογικὸν] it meant God the Father, the Overseer of this work. Hieronym. translates [Ϛεϛηκότας λίθους] in the second chapter of Haggai, lapides viventes qui nunc volvuntur super terram, living stones which are rolled upon the earth. Vales.

[n] After these words there is an Asterisk set in the Med. M. S. and in the margin are these words written [καὶ τοῦτο ἀσεβές. This also is blasphemous.] The Scholiast, who set this note here, seems to have thought that in this place Eusebius spake concerning Christ: but he speaks of Paulinus Bishop of Tyre, who (says he) has obtained the next place to Christ in the Government of believers. Now this cannot be stiled an impious expression, seeing that all Prelates do resemble Christ, and are his vicegerents in the Government of the Church. We confess indeed, that Eusebius attributes too much to Paulinus, in regard he gives him the second place, as if he were Christs Equal and Colleague; and in regard he terms him Melchisedech. Vales.

[o] He means as well the spiritual as material Fabrick of the Church at Tyre; of the form and model whereof Paulinus (says he) can give the best account, in regard by the assistance of divine power he framed that Structure. Vales.

* Jo. 5. 19.

† Eusebius here us'd Ναὸς improperly, making it to signifie a Tabernacle; whereas Ναὸς signifies properly, a Temple: we read in Exod. chap. 38. that Beseleel built the Tabernacle of the Lord, not the Temple. Vales.

[p] This word [ἀρχιμαστοφορέων] is a Metaphorical term, taken from the Heathen Priests, who carried the Images of their Gods upon their shoulders. Vales.

* Πλουσίᾳ τε καὶ ἀπλήστῳ διανοίᾳ χρεῖ. So 'tis worded in the original.

[q] He alludes to the Herculean Labours, or Combats. Vales.

* Psal. 8. v. 2.

[r] The phrase here is [καὶ νῦν οὐκ ἔστιν εἰσὶν οἱ θεομισεῖς, ἔτι μὴ δὲ ἦσαν] which Valesius renders thus, [Itaque illi deo invisi, nunc amplius non sunt, quando ne tum quidem erant:] and we thus, [Now therefore these persons, hated by God, are not, nor were they then.] It seems to be an imitation of Dionysius Alexandrinus his expression; who in his Epistle to Harmammon (part whereof is quoted by our Eusebius, at book 7. chap. 23.) speaks thus concerning Macrianus [ὁ μὲν οὐκ ἔστιν ἐπεὶ μὴ δὲ ἦν, now he is not, for he never was.] Vales.

themſelves alſo diſturbed, they ſuffered a moſt juſt puniſhment inflicted on them by divine vengeance, and irrecoverably ruin'd themſelves, their friends and families. So that thoſe predictions heretofore recorded in the Sacred Monuments [of the Scriptures] may now be acknowledged to be really certain, in which the word of God does both truly declare other things, and alſo ſpeaks expreſly concerning them, thus: * The ungodly have drawn out the ſword, they have bent their bow, to caſt down the poor and needy, and to ſlay ſuch as are of an upright converſation. Their ſword ſhall go through their own heart, and their bows ſhall be broken. And again, * Their memorial periſhed with a ſound, and † thou haſt put out their name for ever and ever. || For when they were in troubles they cryed, and there was none to ſave them, even unto the Lord did they cry, but he heard them not. ‡ They were bound and fell, but we aroſe and were ſet upright; This alſo which was foretold in theſe words (* Lord, thou in thy city ſhalt bring their image to nought) is manifeſted in the ſight of us all to be moſt true. Theſe men, who like the Giants rais'd a war againſt God, procured for themſelves the ſame fatal end of their lives that they did: But † She which was deſolate, and whoſe ſafety was deſpaired of by all men, has arived to ſuch a concluſion of her patient ſufferance upon God's account as we now behold, ſo that theſe words of the Prophecie of Iſaiah may ſeem to have been ſpoken to Her. * Rejoyce thou thirſty deſert; let the ſolitary place rejoyce, and flouriſh like a lilly: the deſerts ſhall flouriſh and be glad: be ye ſtrengthened ye languid hands, and feeble knees: be comforted you faint hearted, be ſtrong, and fear not: Behold our God doth repay judgment, and will repay it: he will come and ſave us. For (ſaith he) Water hath broke out in the deſert, and a valley in a thirſty land. The parched ground ſhall be changed into mooriſh places, and the fountain of water into a thirſty land. All this was formerly predicted in words, and laid up in the ſacred books; but the things themſelves, are now no longer delivered to us by hear-ſay, but [are exhibited] by actual performances. This ſame dry deſert, this diſconſolate Widow (* whoſe very gates they have cut down at once with Axes, like wood in the Forreſt, having broken Her in peices with the axe and the hammer: whoſe books they have ſpoiled, and have burnt the ſanctuary of God with fire: they have defiled the dwelling place of his name even unto the ground; * Whoſe grapes all that go by plucked of, (having firſt broken down her hedges,) whom the wild bore out of the forreſt hath rooted up, and the wild hog devoured;) by the miraculous power of Chriſt (it having now pleaſed him ſo to do) flouriſheth again like a lilly. Yea, at ſuch time as She was chaſtened, that [chaſtizement was inflicted on Her] by his appointment, as it were by a careful and indulgent Father. ‡ For whom the Lord loveth he chaſtiſeth, and ſcourgeth every Son whom he receiveth. When therefore She had been moderately and ſufficiently chaſtized, She is again commanded from Heaven to rejoyce; and She flouriſheth as a lilly, and breaths forth upon all men, a divine ſweet ſavour: for ſaith he, * Water guſhed out in the deſerts, [to wit,] the † fountain of that ſalutary laver of divine regeneration. And now, that land which a little before was deſolate, is changed into pools: And the fountain of living water hath guſhed out plentifully upon a thirſty land: thoſe hands which were formerly weak, are really ſtrong: And thoſe works [which you behold] are great and powerful inſtances of this ſtrength of the hands: moreover, thoſe knees which were formerly enfeebled and weak, having, now recovered their uſual firmneſs and faculty of walking, go ſtraight on in the way of divine knowledge of God, haſtning towards the genuine flock of that moſt good and gracious ſhepherd. And if any of them have had their ſouls benummed and ſtupified through the menaces of Tyrants, even theſe the ſaving Word doth not diſpiſe as incurable, but heals them carefully and tenderly, and excites them to be partakers of the divine conſolation, ſaying; Be comforted, ye faint hearted: be ſtrong, fear not. When therefore this our new and excellent Zorobabel (by the accuteneſs of his underſtanding) perceived that, according as the divine Word had foretold, She which had been brought to deſolation for God's ſake, ſhould enjoy theſe good things, after that bitter Captivity, and abomination of deſolation: He diſpiſed not this dead corps, but having in the firſt place with ſupplications and prayers (together with the joynt conſent of you all) propitiated the Father, and taking for his aſſiſtant, and fellow-labourer the only reviver of the dead, He raiſed up this fallen Church, having firſt purified Her, and healed Her of her Maladies. And now he hath put a Robe about Her, not that Old one, but ſuch a one as he had again received inſtructions about, from the divine Oracles, which expreſly teſtifie thus: * And the latter glory of this houſe ſhall far excell the former. Upon which account, having taken in a far larger compaſs of ground, he fortified the outward circuit with a wall on every ſide, which might ſerve for a ſtrong fence to the whole Structure. Then he raiſed a ſpacious, lofty, and ſtately Portico *againſt the rayes of the riſing Sun, which, to thoſe who ſtand at a ſufficient diſtance without the ſacred incloſure, does yield a full proſpect of this Structure within; and as it were, attracts the eyes of Infidels to look upon the firſt entrances, that ſo no perſon might paſs by, who ſhould not feel ſome pricks in his mind, both at the remembrance of the former deſolation, and alſo at [the ſight of] the ſtupendious miracle of the preſent Fabrick. Hence he hoped, that he who upon that account felt ſuch a compunction, might peradventure be drawn [towards it,] and at the very ſight thereof would be perſwaded to enter in. But after you are come within the gates, he has not permitted you to enter immediatly into the holy place, with impure and unwaſhen feet. he left open, that a view of Heaven might be taken, and that by it might be let in the clear air filled with the rays of Light. Here also he placed the Mysterious Symbols of the sacred Purgations, to wit, fountaines built opposite to the front of the Church, which afforded plenty of water for those who entred the sacred walls to wash in. And this first place of reception to those that entred, yielded both a beautiful and splendid prospect to all men, and also afforded a very commodious Mansion to those who yet wanted instruction in the first principles of Religion. Moreover, † after a view taken of these [buildings,] he made passages opening into the Church [adorned] with a great many more inward Porticoes. And again at the rays of the rising Sun he placed three gates in one and the same side. On the middlemost of which he thought fit to bestow much more of magnificence and spaciousness than on the other two placed on either side of it; and, having adorned it gloriously with plates of Brass bound on with Iron, and with variety of Sculpture, he adjoyned the other two as the Guards to Her, being as it were a Queen. When he had after the same manner made the number of the Porches equal to the Cloysters on both sides of the Church, over these Porches, he invented other copious conveyances of Light into the House, and adorned them with various and exceeding fine and small wooden Sculptures: but the Royal House it self he furnished with richer and more costly materials, liberally bestowing thereon most magnificent and vast expences. I think it here superfluous for me to describe the length and breadth of this building, and to treat particularly of the splendour [of the Structure,] of its unspeakable greatness, of the glittering show of the Works, of its height which equals heaven, and of the costly Cedars of Libanus that are laid hereupon: the mention of which even the holy Scripture hath not passed over in silence; wherein tis said * The trees of the Lord shall rejoyce, even the Cedars of Libanus which he hath planted. To what end should I make an exact narration here of the most ingenious and artificial composure of the whole Structure, and of the incomparable beauty of every particular part of it, when as the testimony of the Eyes excludeth all knowledge which entreth at the Eares? Moreover, after he had thus finished the Temple, and decently adorned it with the highest thrones in honour of the Prelates of Churches, and also with ‡ benches orderly placed all over the Church, at last he placed the Holy of Holies, the Altar, in the middest, and that the multitude might not come within these [sacred places,] he enclosed them with wooden rails made like Net-work, which were so curiously and artificially framed and carved, that they entertained those that viewed them with a wonderful and surprizing sight. Neither was the very Pavement neglected by him, but after he had beautified it most gloriously with Marble-stone, he proceeded to the out-buildings of the Temple; and with great Art and Skill erected most spacious * Exhedræ and Oeci on each side which in an uniform manner were joyned together at the sides (y.) of the Cathedral, and united to the y doors which lead into the middle of the Church. These buildings our most peaceful King Solomon (who erected this Temple of God) made for them, who want the Purification, and the sprinkling by water and the Holy Ghost. So that, that Propheſie before quoted is no longer a wordy Prediction, but is really accomplished: For now it is come to pass, that the glory of this latter House is truly greater than the former. For it was requisite and agreeable that (since her Pastor and Lord, for her sake once suffered death, and after his Passion changed that vile body, which for her sake he had put on, into brightness and glory; and translated that very corruptible flesh from corruption to immortality,) she also should likewise enjoy the z Dispensations of her Saviour. For although she (having received from him a promise of far more excellent things than she doth at present enjoy,) incessantly longeth to be for eternal ages partaker of a far greater glory of a Regeneration, at the Resurrection of the incorruptible body, with the Quire of the Angels of light, in the Palaces of God above the Heavens, together with Jesus Christ the Donour of all good things, and her Saviour: Yet during the interim of her abode in this present world, she (who was heretofore a widow and desolate,) being by the grace of God surrounded with these flowers, is (as the Propheſie saith) truly become like unto a Lilly. And, having put on her wedding Robe, and being encircled with a Crown of beauty, let us hear her Herself relate how she is taught to dance by Esaias, and with pleasant expressions to shout forth thanksgivings to her God and King: * Let my soul rejoyce in the Lord. For he hath cloathed me with the Garment of salvation, and the coat of gladness He hath encircled my head with a diadem like a bridegroom, and hath bedecked me like a bride with ornaments. And as the earth which multiplieth its flowers, and as a garden that causeth its seeds to spring forth; so the Lord hath caused righteousness to rise up, and joy in the sight of all † Παρεμπεσὼν τῶν τοιούτων ἴσαν, after you have seen these things, or after you have entertained your self with beholding these things. Musculus's version of it is, horum conspectu præterito, after you have passed seeing these things, which Version of Musculus's is rather to be follow'd then that long circumlocution of Christophorson's, by which he translates this place thus, Quinetiam quo ista res ad oculos capiendos magnâ operum varietate concinnè illustrarent: which translation agrees not with Eusebius's words. Vales.

* See Psal. 104. v. 16.

‡ For whom these βάθρα, benches or seats were made, 'tis some difficulty to resolve, (that is,) for what degree of order of men they were intended. Leo Allatius in his second Epist. De Templis Græcor: supposes these benches were made for the common use of the Laity, The same says Clemens, in his Constitut. Apost. B. 2. cap. 57. But Eusebius means another thing. For afterwards, where he explains the whole Fabrick of this Church Allegorically, he says that by the Thrones, the Bishops and Presbyters were meant: but by the Benches, the Deacons, and others that served in the Church. Wherefore these benches were rather designed for those who served in the Church, than for the Laicks. Indeed the Laity were not permitted to sit in the Church. So says Optatus in his fourth book, and which words of his we must so understand, that in a congregation in the Church, during the time of Divine Service, the Laicks were not permitted to sit down; but when the Service was ended, they had liberty to sit. So also says Athanas. in his Epist. Ad Solitar. Vales.

y Christophorson renders this place thus; atque adeo ad fenestras inferioris templi affixit, and therefore joyned them to the windows of the lower temple: the meaning of which Version I understand not. For I can't apprehend how the Exhedræ (i. e. the Vestries, or Lower buildings which stood on the sides of the Cathedral and were joyned to it) could be fixed to the windows. Christophorson supposed that εἰσόδοις (the term here used in the Greek) did signifie windows. Indeed, Eusebius, speaking a little above concerning the windows through which the light was conveyed into the Porches, uses this term [εἰσόδοις,] which Christophorson translates windows. But in this place, where εἰσόδοις is put by its self, without being joyned to any other word, it can't signifie windows. Either therefore Eusebius means, by this term here used, the doors of the Cathedral, which a little before he calls [παρόδους;] or else certain walks, through which there was a passage to the Cathedral; which Paulinus, in his twelfth Epist. calls Transennæ. But 'tis my judgment that the doors of the Cathedral are hereby meant. Further, by those Oeci, and Exhedræ, Eusebius means the Baptistery, the consistory, and the place where they saluted one another; which were joyned to the Cathedral. Vales.

z We observed before (see Book 1. Chap. 1. note b.) that οἰκονομία (the term that occurs here) signifies not only Christ's Incarnation; but that, whatever our Saviour did in the flesh in order to the procuring man's salvation, is in general termed οἰκονομία. See the authorities there quoted. This place also evidently demonstrates the same, where Eusebius terms not only the Death, but the Resurrection also of Christ, οἰκονομίας, dispensations, in the plural number. Vales.

all the Heathen. Thus doth ſhe ſing and dance. But in what expreſſions the Bridegroom, the celeſtial Word, Jeſus Chriſt Himſelf anſwereth her, hear the Lord ſpeaking: * Fear not becauſe thou haſt been ignominiouſly treated, neither be thou aſhamed, becauſe thou haſt ſuffered reproach. For thou ſhalt forget thine everlaſting ſhame, and thou ſhalt no longer remember the reproach of thy widowhood: the Lord hath called thee, not as a woman forſaken, and dejected in ſpirit, nor as a woman hated from thy youth: thy God hath ſaid; For a little while I have forſaken thee, but with great compaſſion I will have pitty upon thee. I turned my face from thee when I was a little angry; but with everlaſting mercy I will have mercy upon thee, ſaith the Lord who hath † redeemed thee. † Ariſe, ariſe, thou who haſt drunk from the hand of the Lord the cup of his wrath. For thou haſt drunk of, and emptied the cup of Deſtruction, the cup of my fury: and there was none of all thy ſons, whom thou haſt born to comfort thee: neither was there any to take thee by the hand: Behold I have taken out of thy hand the cup of deſtruction, the cup of my wrath, and thou ſhalt no longer drink it. And I will put it into the hands of them who have * injured thee, and debaſed thee. * Ariſe, ariſe, put on ſtrength, put on thy glory. Shake off the duſt, and ariſe: ſit down: looſe the chain of thy neck. ‖ Lift up thine eyes round about, and view thy children gathered together. Behold, they are gathered together, and come to thee. As I live ſaith the Lord, thou ſhalt put them all on as an ornament, and thou ſhalt put them about thee as a bride doth her bravery. For thy deſolate places, and thoſe that were waſted, and ruinous, ſhall now be too narrow for thy inhabitants. And they ſhall be removed far from thee, that devoured thee: for thy ſons which thou hadſt loſt ſhall ſay in thine ears: The place is too ſtraight for me: make a place for me that I may dwell. And thou ſhalt ſay in thine heart: who hath begotten me theſe? I am childleſs and a widow. Who hath nouriſhed theſe for me? I was left deſolate: theſe where had they been? All this Eſaias hath predicted. Theſe things were in times paſt recorded in the holy Scriptures concerning us. And it was requiſite that we ſhould now at length receive the truth of theſe words really and actually fullfilled. In regard therefore the bridegroom, the Word, hath ſpoken in this manner to his ſpouſe, the ſacred and holy Church, agreeably hereto hath this [a] Dreſſer of the Bride, (with the prayers of you all in common, reaching out to her your helping hands, by the appointment of God the ſupream King, and by the appearance and preſence of Jeſus Chriſt's power) raiſed and erected this deſolate [Church,] lying like a dead carcaſs [on the ground,] and deſpaired of by all men. And, having lifted her up after this manner, hath made her ſuch an one, as he was inſtructed to do by the delineation of the ſacred Scriptures. This [Fabrick] is indeed a ſtupendious miracle, and doth ſurpaſs all the degrees of admiration, eſpecially to them, who are only intent upon the outward appearance of things. But the original Examples and Primitive forms hereof, the ſpiritual and truely divine patterns are more admirable then all miracles, I mean, the reparations of that divine and rational building in our ſouls. Which [Structure] when the Son of God himſelf had framed according to his own Image, and had freely granted, that in all parts it ſhould bear the reſemblance of God, he beſtowed upon it a nature incorruptible, incorporeal, rational, different from all terrene matter, [and gave it] a [b] ſubſtance originally and of its ſelf intelligent; after he had once thus created it at the beginning out of nothing, He made it an holy Spouſe, and [framed it into] a moſt ſacred Temple for Himſelf and his Father. This he himſelf in expreſs words acknowledgeth, ſaying; * I will dwell in them and walk amongſt them, and I will be their God, and they ſhall be my people. Such indeed is the perfect and purified ſoul, which was ſo framed at the beginning that it bore the perfect Image of the celeſtial Word. But when through the envie and emulation of the malitious Devil, by its own voluntary choice, it began to be a follower of its own paſſions, and was inamored with vice, (God having withdrawn himſelf out of it,) being left deſtitute as it were of a Defender, it was eaſily captivated, and remained expoſed to their treacheries who for a long time had been enviers [of its glory,] and being now utterly battered down by the Engines and Machines of its inviſible Adverſaries, and ſpiritual enemies, it ſunk down into ſuch a total ruine, that not one ſtone of vertue was left ſtanding upon another: all the parts of it lay proſtrate on the ground, as dead, utterly deprived of all thoſe notions concerning God, which were naturally imprinted on it. But this ruinated building, which was framed after the Image of God, was not laid waſte by that wild bore out of the wood which is viſible to our eyes, but by ſome deſtructive Devil, and by intelligent and ſpiritual wild beaſts. Who, having put it into a flame by wicked paſſions (as it were with the [c] fiery darts of their malice) have burnt with fire the truely divine ſanctuary of God, and deſtroyed the tabernacle of his name even to the ground. Afterwards they buried it miſerable wretch under a vaſt heap of earth which they caſt up, and reduced it to an utter deſpaire of all manner of ſafety. But its Patron, the Divine and ſalutary Word (obeying the love of his moſt gracious Father ſhown towards mankind,) reſtored it again after it had ſuffered condign puniſhment for its ſins. In the firſt place therefore, having united to himſelf the minds of the Emperours, by means of thoſe moſt pious Princes, he cleanſed the whole world from all impious and pernicious men, and alſo from thoſe cruel and barbarous Tyrants, hated of God. Afterwards, he brought to light men very well known to him, perſons that [a] Νυμφοστόλος is here very well rendred by Chriſtoph. Exornator ſponſæ, the Dreſſer of the Bride. Muſculus renders it not amiſs Paranymphus, (i. e.) one who is to take care of all things that appertain to the Bride. Valeſ.

[b] Euſebius here calls the ſoul of Man, οὐσία αὐτοκινητὸς (i. e.) a ſelf intelligent ſubſtance, becauſe naturally and of it ſelf it underſtandeth. So the Philoſophers call ſpiritual ſubſtances, νοερὰς οὐσίας, ſuch as we call Intelligentias, Intelligences. But Chriſtoph. being groſly miſtaken, takes νοερὰ οὐσία in this place to be the ſame with νοητὴ οὐσία; and accordingly renders it, Subſtantia Solâ mentis intelligentiâ cognita, a ſubſtance which can only be comprehended by the underſtanding of the mind. But there is a difference betwixt νοητὸν (i. e.) intelligible, that which may be comprehended, or, underſtood, and νοερὸν (i. e.) intellectual, that which does underſtand, or comprehend. For example's ſake, Chimæra, and all ſuch Fictions of the underſtanding are νοητὰ, intelligible, but not νοερὰ, intellectual or *intelligent. that heretofore had been [d] consecrated Priests to him for ever, and were secretly concealed, and secur'd by his defence during the storm of Persecution, whom agreeable to their deserts he honoured with the magnificent gifts of the spirit: by these men he hath again purified and cleansed (by their poinant and reprehensive Preaching of the divine Precepts, as it were with shovels and spades,) those souls which a little before were defiled, and totally covered over with all manner of filthiness, and heaps of impious Injunctions. And when he had made the place of all your minds bright and clear, he delivered it up to this most prudent Prelate, most acceptable to God. Who being a man endowed with great judgment and reason in other things, and also, most acute in discerning and [e] distinguishing the disposition of the souls allotted to his care; from the very first day (as I may say) even to this present, he hath not ceased to build: cementing together in you all one while glistering gold, at other times purified and tryed silver, and precious and rich stones. So that by his workes towards you he hath again compleated that sacred and mystical Propheſie, the words whereof are these:

* Esai. c. 54. v. 11, 12, 13, 14. * Behold I prepare Carbuncle for thy stone, and Saphire for thy foundations, and for thy Bulwarks Jasper, and for thy gates stones of Christal, and for thy wall choice stones: and all thy children shall be taught of God, and great [shall be] the peace of thy children: and thou shalt be built in righteousness.

He therefore building in righteousness hath aptly and fitly differenced the strength of all the people. Some he hath incloſed with the outward wall onely, that is, he hath fortified them round with an unerring and strong faith; of this sort there is a great multitude, who cannot bear a more excellent structure. To others he committeth [the custody of] the entrances into the Temple, giving them in command [f] to watch at the Gates, and to conduct those in, that come thither; these may fitly be compared to the Porches of the Temple. Other some he hath set to support the chief Pillars, which are without, about the [g] Court quadrangular-wise. Bringing them within the first [h] Bolts of the literal sense of the four Gospels. Some he hath also placed about the sanctuary [i] on both sides, these are such as are * (atechumens as yet, and do make a good progress and increase in the faith; [k] but yet they are not far from inspecting those most secret Mysteries, which [priviledge] only the perfect believers do enjoy. Out of this number he hath taken those, whose immaculate souls have been purified like gold in the sacred Laver; some of whom he hath set to support Pillars far more noble then those outward ones, even the most intricate and Mysterious sentences of sacred Scripture; others of them he illuminateth to be [as it were] [l] windows to transmit light into the Temple. He hath also beautified the whole Temple with one most spacious Portico, that is, with the glorious worship of the one and only God, the supream King. He hath represented Christ and the Holy Ghost on each side of the Fathers preeminence and authority, as the [m] second rays of light. And he demonstrateth throughout the whole Cathedral a most copious and excellent light and evidence of the truth particularly [coucht] in the remaining [Articles of our faith.] Moreover, when he had from all parts selected living, firm, and strong stones of souls, of all them he framed a stately and Royal sanctuary, full of light and splendour both within and without: [n] in as much as not only in their souls and minds, but their bodies also, they are beautified with the glorious ornaments of Chastity and Modesty. There are also within this Temple, Thrones, a great many Benches, and Seats; which are in all those souls, whereon reside such gifts of the Holy Ghost, as were heretofore seen by the holy Apostles: † To whom appeared cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sate upon each of them. But on him that presides over all these, Christ himself ('tis likely) does entirely and wholly reside: and upon [o] those who are next to him in dignity, on every one of them proportionably, according as he is capable of receiving the distributions of the power of Christ, and of the Holy Ghost. The Benches also are the souls of certain Angels, the instruction and custody of every one whereof is committed to them. But the August, Great, and only Altar, what

[d] What was here meant by [διὰ βίε ἱερωμένοι αὐτῷ] which we render [Priests consecrated to him for ever] Translatours understood not; and have therefore misinterpreted it. There were two sorts of Priests, some annual; such were those the Jews had, under the Roman Governours; and such were almost all the Gentile Priests. Others were Perpetual, which they call'd διὰ βίε. This an old inscription in Gruter, (pag. 313.) does manifest. And also the old Coins of the Perpetui; which Jac. Sirmondus publish'd; where we met with 'IEPETΣ ΔIA BIOT Sacerdos perpetuus, a perpetual Priest. Hence 'tis that Eusebius calls the Priests of the Christians, ἱερωμένοι διὰ βίε· because their Priesthood was not yearly, but Perpetual: like the Priesthood of Christ: who is a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedech; as saith the Prophet. The word [ἱερωμένοι] our Authour uses frequently to signifie Priests: see the third chapter of this book; where we have ἱερεργίαι καὶ ἱερωμένων, the sacred Duties or performances of the Priests. In our Version of διὰ βίε we follow Velleius Paterculus, who calls those Magistrates, Perpetui, which the Athenians call διὰ βίε. Munatius Felix (in Gestis Purgationis Cæciliani) is call'd Flamen Perpetuus. This Dignity for brevities sake was commonly noted by these Characters, F L. P P. i. e. Flamen Perpetuus, a Perpetual Priest. These Priests are mentioned in the second Law Cod. Theod. Vales.

[e] Instead of φιλοκεινῶν we should rather read φυλοκεινῶν· as the old Maz. M. S. does (that is,) adjudging or attributing to every one his place. Mark what follows in the Chapter. But should any desire to retain the common reading I would not resist it much: for φιλοκεινεῖν (in Hesychius) is explain'd by διαιρεῖν, dividere, to divide. Vales.

[f] By συναυλεῖν καὶ πυλωρεῖν τοὺς εἰσιόντας (to watch at the Gates and conduct those that come in,) Eusebius here meanes the Sub-Deacons, who kept the Gates of the Church, and conducted all that came in to their particular places: (viz.) The Catechumens, Penitents and Possessed with evil spirits, into the Narthex (or Church Porch,) or into the Catechumenium, (or place where they Catechised;) but the believers into the Quire. See the 22 Canon of the Council of Laodicea, and Zonaras's and Balsamo's notes upon it. Vales.

[g] We have before noted in note (u,) of this chapter, that that void open place betwixt the Portico and the Church is call'd by the Latines Atrium the Court. The Greek's (as here) call the same place αὐλὴ: this word [αὐλὴ] frequently occurrs in the Gospel, and is always by the old Translatour render'd atrium. Vales.

[h] 'Tis difficult to render this word [περιβολαὶ] here used by any Latine word. Musculus renders it Propugnacula, Bulwarks. Christoph. Repagula, Bars. I have translated it Obices, Bolts. Vales.

[i] The word [περιβολαὶς] must be blotted out; for it troubleth the sense; it crept in here out of the upper line. Vales.

[k] By these words [ὑ μὴν πόρρω πω τῆς θεωρίας ἔτι πεφῶν not far removed from that clear inspection into the Mysteries which the believers enjoy] I say by these words Eusebius means those who amongst the antient Christians were called Competentes. These were certain holy Candidates of Baptism as it were. Eusebius here makes three degrees or ranks of the Catechumeni. The first were those who had learned the Creed: (i. e.) the Principles of Christian Religion. These he compares to the out wall of the Church. The second were those to whom a short Expositon of the Gospels was delivered. These he compares to the Pillars which were placed in the Court made like a Quadrangle. The next are the Competentes, who were next to the Perfect Believers. But if any one by the first rank would rather understand the promiscuous multitude of the Laicks, and by the second rank those of the Laity which were the more learned: I will not be much averse to that Explication. Vales.

[l] Ἀναίσματα, the term used at this place, may be render'd Gates, as well as windows. Vales.

[m] At these words we have (in the Maz. M. S.) a long Scholion in the Margin, inveighing against this Authour as being Heretical, and against this passage as being blasphemous, in regard it makes the Son inferiour to the Father, and attributes the [τὰ πρῶτα] first place to the Father, and the [τὰ δεύτερα] second to the Son. In the Med. M. S. we meet with this short Scholion at the Margin here [ᾗ τὸ δὲ Βλάσφημον,] and this also is Blasphemy. Vales.

[n] This place is eminent for the commendation of the Chastity and Continency of the Clergy: But its excellence lay heretofore undiscovered, because of the erroneous Version of Translatours: The cause of the mistake in them was the false punctation in Steph. Edit. and in the Kings M. S. but the Maz. and Med. M. SS. do with good reason reject that punctation. Vales.

† Acts c. 2. v. 3.

[o] He means the Presbyters, who had the second degree of the Priesthood. Here he compares the Bishop and Presbyters to the Thrones of the Church: and the Deacons to the Benches. Vales.

what can it be else but the most pure soul and holy of Holies of the Common Priest of all. On his right hand standeth the great High Priest of all, Jesus himself, the only begotten Son of God, who with a chearful countenance and * stretcht-forth hands receiveth from all that sweet smelling incense, and those unbloudy and immaterial sacrifices of prayers; and transmits them to his heavenly Father the supream God: whom in the first place he himself worshippeth, and he only exhibiteth due veneration to the Father; afterwards he beseecheth him for ever to continue favourable and propitious towards all us. Such is that August Temple, which the great Creatour of all things the Word [of God] hath built throughout all that world under the sun; he himself hath again framed upon earth this intellectual representation of those things beyond the Arches of Heaven: that by every creature, and by rational souls upon the earth his Father might be duely honoured and adored. P But that Region above the Heavens, and the things there, which are the originalls of what we here behold, that Jerusalem which is above, that * Celestial mount Sion, and that City of the living God, far above the world, in which are innumerable companies of Angels, and the Church of the first born which are written in heaven, who with praises unutterable, which we cannot understand, laud their Creatour and supream Prince; [the Blessedness of this Region, I say, and of its inhabitants] † no mortal is able deservedly to set forth. For * eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entred into the heart of man, the things that God hath prepared for them that love him. Of which things since we are now vouchsafed to be partakers in part, let us, both men, women and children, small and great, all together, with one spirit and one soul never cease to give thanks and praise to the Author of these our so great good things: † Who hath mercy on all our iniquities, and healeth all our infirmities. Who redeemeth our life from destruction, and crowneth us with mercy, and loving kindness; who filleth our desire with good things. For he hath not dealt with us according to our sins, neither hath he rewarded us according to our iniquities. For as far as the East is from the West, so far hath he removed our sins from us. As a father pittieth his own children, even so is the Lord merciful to them that fear him. Keeping these things fresh in our memories both now, and throughout all succeeding times, and moreover setting before [the eyes of] our mindes God the cause of this present days joyful solemnity, and the Master of this feast, both day and night, every hour, and (as I may say) every moment wherein we fetch our breath; let us love him and worship him, with all the strength of our souls. And let us now rise up, and with the loud voice of our affection beseech him, that he would continually save and defend us within his sheepfold, and that he would afford us his everlasting peace entire and immoveable in Jesus Christ our Saviour, by whom be glory to him throughout all Ages, Amen.

* Ὑπτίας χερσὶ, supinis manibus; so Valesius: pronis manibus; so Christophorson.

P Here Eusebius (having spoken largely concerning the double Fabrick of the Church (that is) the material and spiritual; and compared them together,) elegantly makes a transition to that heavenly Hierusalem which is the idea and original pattern of this Church on earth. But the translatours through their inadvertency took no notice of this elegant Apostrophe. Vales.

CHAP. V.

Copies of the Imperial Laws.

Let us therefore now annex the Copies of Constantine's and Licinius's Imperial Decrees translated out of Latine.

A Copy of the Imperial Edict translated out of Latine.

Having long since perceived, that a liberty of Religion ought not to be denied, but that licence should be permitted to every ones will and arbitrement of being careful about their Religious performances according to their own mind and judgment, We have Decreed, that as well all other persons, as those that are Christians should retain the faith [and observances] of their own Sect and Religion. But because in that Rescript wherein this liberty was granted them, [a] many and different sorts of Sects seemed to be expresly set down, for which reason peradventure some of them not long after desisted from such an observance. Wherefore when We Constantine, and Licinius, Augusti, came fortunately to Mediolanum, and had in debate all matters which might conduce to the good and utility of the publick; amongst other things which to us seem'd several ways profitable to all in general, (or rather which we judged ought to be decreed before any thing else) we supposed such constitutions were to be made, as therein should be contained the worship and veneration of the deity: that is, that we should allow a free choice both to Christians and all others of following what way of worship they please: that so by this meanes that Godhead and heavenly being, whatever it is, might be propitious to us, and to all that live under our Government. We have therefore proclaimed this our will and pleasure, after we had taken a most wholesome and deliberate consideration thereupon, that licence be denied to none at all of following or choosing the observances or Religion of the Christians: and that free power be granted to every one to apply his mind to that Religion, which he judgeth most congruous and agreeable to himself: that so God may in all things manifest his usual care and loving kindness towards us. It was also convenient that we should signifie to you this our pleasure; that all those Sects which were included in our former Rescript to your Devotion concerning the Christians should be quite left out, both that whatever seems hurtful and disagreeable to our clemency should be wholly removed, and also that in future all that have resolved to make choice of, and keep the observances of the Christian Religion, might observe them freely

[a] Because that first Rescript or Letter, mentioned here by Constantine, is lost, we cannot easily resolve what Constantine meanes when he says, that in that Edict were named many and several sorts of αἱρέσεις, Sects; for which reason many desisted from professing Christianity. Christoph. translates [διαφόρους αἱρέσεις] doubtful and controverted opinions; as if the sense or meaning of this first Edict had been ambiguous. So also Baronius understands Christoph. his words at the year of Christ 313. Langus and Musculus translate [αἱρέσεις] opiniones & hæreses, Heresies and opinions; far better then Christoph. For αἱρεσεις cannot signifie the sense, or [διανοια] meaning of a place: but it signifies an Opinion or Sect. When the Emperour Constantine therefore had in that former Edict permitted this Liberty of Conscience to all, he added, that that priviledge was not granted to the Christians only, but to all men of every Sect, (that is) to Jews, Samaritans, Marcionists, &c. and to all Sects of all Religions. This the Christians took to be no small injury to their Religion, that it should be reckon'd amongst Schismaticks, and unbelieving Jews. Constantine being advertised hereof by the Catholicks, corrected it in this latter Edict; that clause, which mention'd all Sects, being taken out: and this is that which is meant by these words a little further, ἵν' ἀφαιρεθεισῶν παντελῶς τῆς αἱρέσεων ἐκείνες τοῖς πρότερόις ἡμῶν γεγραμμένοις ἐνέχοιτο. (i. e.) that all those Sects which were in our former Rescript should be quite left out. Vales.

freely and firmly, without any molestation. These things we therefore determined fully to signifie to your carefullness; that you may be certified, that we have granted to the Christians a free and absolute liberty of being careful about the exercise of their Religion. [b] In as much as we have already freely and absolutely granted them this, your devotedness does hereby perceive that we have allowed a liberty to others also, who are desirous of following their own observances and Religion: Which, 'tis apparent, is agreeable to the tranquillity of our times, to wit, that every one should have a liberty and power of choosing and being careful about worshiping whatever Deity he has a mind to. And this we therefore did, that we might seem not in the least to have lessened or detracted from any manner of divine worship or Religion whatsoever. We have also further Decreed in favour of the Christians; that those their places (wherein they used to convene in times past (concerning which places there was [c] another Rule or Form appointed in our Rescript formerly sent to your devotedness,) in case it appears that they have been purchased by any persons, either of our Exchequer, or of any one else) be immediately and without all hesitancy restored to the Christians themselves, without money, and without any exaction of an * additional price or value: and if any have received these places by way of gift, that they in like manner forthwith restore them to the Christians. But if those, who have purchased, or had the grants of these places, have a desire to demand any thing of our goodness, let them make their Address to the Governour that presides as Judge in that Province, that by our bounty provision may be made for them: all which places it shall behove you to see forthwith restored to the Society of Christians by your care and diligence without the least delay. And in as much as the said Christians are known to have had possession not only of those places wherein they usually assembled themselves, but of others also, which did not particularly and apart belong to any private persons amongst them, but were the Right of a Society of them, that is, of the Christians; you shall give order that all these places (according to the [d] aforesaid Law) be without all manner of hesitancy restored to the said Christians, that is, to every Society and Assembly of them: The Rule aforesaid being observed, (viz.) that such as shall restore those places [to the Christian,] without a restitution of the price they gave for them, as we have said, may expect to be indemnified by our Gracious Liberality. Now it is your duty to act most vigorously in all these things in behalf of the aforesaid body of the Christians; both that our Mandate may with all speed be fulfilled; and also that in this matter provision may be made by our goodness for the common quiet and tranquility of the publick. For by this means, as is aforesaid, the divine care and goodness towards us, which we have already experienced in many affairs, will continue firm and lasting for ever. Moreover, to the end that the definitive determination of this our Law, and of our gracious indulgence may come to all mens knowledge, 'tis expedient that this Rescript of ours be proposed to publick view, and made known to all persons, that so no body may be ignorant of the establishment of this our gracious indulgence.

[b] This was Constantin's second Edict, directed to the Præfect of the Prætorium, the same person to whom was sent Constantin's first Edict for the Christians. The first Edict was signed or dated at Rome, Constantine II. and Licinius II. Coss. and it was immediately sent into the East, to Maximin; see book 9. chap. 9. But this second Edict was dated at Mediolanum on the year following. Vales.

[c] Concerning the Restitution of the publick places and Cœmiteria of the Christians, there is extant an Edict of Gallienus's in book 7. chap. 13. of this History, in which these places are commanded to be restored to the Christians. In the first Decree therefore, which Constantine and Licinius (after Maxentius was conquered,) published in favour of the Christians; a Copy of which they sent to Maximinus the Emperour into the East, they only Decreed that all places where the Christians used to assemble themselves, which had been heretofore taken from them, should be restored to them again; but they said nothing expresly concerning the restitution of the price: Neither in the Edict of Maximin, which was published soon after the Decree of Constantine and Licinius, was there any caution concerning repaying of the price, as we may see in book 9. chap. 9. of this History. It was necessary therefore that Constantine should Decree something more distinctly concerning that point. That the Christians might recover those places which had been taken from them or sold, or given by the Treasury, without repaying the price. Vales.

* Τῆς τιμῆς ὑποθέσεως. So he terms adjectiones, i. e. the additions to the prices in sales of Goods or Estates. These adjectiones (which Civilians in other words call additamenta pretii, accessions to the price) we in France call encheres. Vales.

[d] Ἐπὶ τῷ νόμῳ ὃν προεθέμην (according to the Decree aforesaid) (i. e.) according to that Edict signed at Rome. Constantine II. and Licinius II. Coss. which Edict Constantine mention'd before. That was Constantine's first Decree for the Christians. But Constantine, having in that Law shew'd himself too favourable towards the Christians in that in it he had extolled their Religion, and condemn'd all other Sects and Ceremonies, was forced in this second Edict to explain his mind, for fear, least the Heathens shou'd murmur at the prohibiting and abolishing the worship of their Gods. Wherefore Constantine saies, that he granted free liberty to every one to worship what Gods, and follow what Sect and Religion he pleased. This second Decree therefore is nothing else but an explication of the first. For in the first Edict there were some words with which the Gentiles and also the Schismatical Christians were not a little offended; in that they saw themselves named Hereticks. The Catholick Christians also resented it, because they were joyned in the same Decree with the Gentiles and Hereticks. Wherefore Constantine, that he might shew himself kind to all, desired that those words might be razed out. And this is the sense of those former words, ἵν' ἀγαιρεθεισῶν παντελῶς τῶν αἱρέσεων, &c. That the names of these Sects in our former Rescript might be wholly taken out, &c. Vales.

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

A Copy of another Imperial Edict which the Emmperours published again, to declare, that this their Beneficence was granted only to the Catholick Church.

God save You, dearest Anulinus! This is the manner of Our Goodness, We desire, that those things which appertain to anothers right should not only not be infested with inquietude, but should also be restored, dearest Anulinus! Wherefore our pleasure is, that, as soon as you receive this our Rescript, if any of those [estates] (which did belong to the Catholick Church of the Christians, in all our Cities, or in other places,) are now detained by the [c] Decurions, or by any other Persons, you cause them to be forthwith restored to their [respective] Churches: In as much as we have resolved that those [estates] which the said Churches have formerly possessed, shall revert and become their right again. Since therefore your Devotedness understandeth that this is the most evident purport of our Command, take care, that all [estates] which did formerly belong to the right of the said Churches, (whether gardens, houses, or whatever else) be immediately restored to them again: whereby we may be informed that you have with all diligence and accuracy obeyed this our Command. Farewell, dearest, and Our most beloved Anulinus.

[c] Instead of πολιτῶν, i. e. Citizens, in this place we read πολισυλῶν. The πολισυλαὶ are call'd by the Latines Decuriones; concerning whom see my notes on Amm. Marcellin. B. 22. p. 225. These Decurions in the time of persecution seized upon the places and Farmes which belonged to the Catholick Church, as being vacant. Vales.

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

Rome, and to [f] Mark. In regard ſeveral ſuch [g] Libels as theſe have been ſent me from the moſt Eminent Anulinus, Proconſul of Africa, wherein 'tis declared that Cecilianus Biſhop of the City of [h] Carthage is accuſed of many things by ſome of his Colleagues ordained [Biſhops] throughout Africa: and this matter ſeeming not a little grievous to us, that in thoſe very Provinces (which the providence of God delivered to our ſacredneſs by a [i] voluntary ſurrender, and where there is a great multitude of people) the populace being in a manner divided, ſhould be found to degenerate and become worſe, and differences ſhould be nouriſhed even amongſt Biſhops: It ſeemed good to us, that Cecilianus himſelf (together with ten Biſhops his ſuppoſed Accuſers, and ten other Biſhops, whom he ſhall judge neceſſary in behalf of his cauſe,) ſail to Rome; that there in your preſence, and alſo in the preſence of Reticius, Maternus, and Marinus your Collegues, (whom for this reaſon we have commanded to haſten to Rome) he may be heard in ſuch manner as, you know, is moſt agreeable with the moſt ſacred Law. Moreover, that you may have a moſt compleat and perfect knowledge of all theſe things, we have ſubjoyned to this our Reſcript Copies of the Libels which were ſent to us by Anulinus, and have tranſmitted them to your aforeſaid Collegues. Which Libels when your Gravity ſhall have read, you ſhall deliberate how the aforeſaid controverſie may with the greateſt accuracy be examined, and determined according to equity. For it is not unknown to your Aſſiduity that we bear ſo great a Reverence * to the moſt Legitimate Catholick Church, that we would have you leave no Schiſme or diſſenſion at all in any part of it. The Divinity of the ſupream God preſerve you ([k] Deareſt) many years.

* Τῇ ἐνθέσμῳ καθολικῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ.

A Copy of an Imperial Reſcript, by which [Conſtantine] Summons a ſecond Synod, to put an end to all Diſſenſion amongſt the Biſhops.

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

Conſtantinus Auguſtus, to Chreſtus Biſhop of Syracuſe. When as heretofore ſome began wickedly and perverſly to ſeparate from the holy Religion, the celeſtial power, and the Catholick Opinion; We deſirous that ſuch pertinacious contentions as theſe ſhould be pared off, took ſuch order that (ſome Biſhops being ſent out of France, and alſo thoſe ſummoned out of Africa, who being of contrary factions, pertinaciouſly and continually quarrelled * amongſt themſelves, the Biſhop of Rome being alſo preſent,) this [diſſenſion] which ſeemed to be raiſed after a moſt careful examination, might in their preſence be compoſed. But in regard (as it commonly happens) ſome perſons, forgetful both of their own ſalvation, and of the veneration due to the moſt holy Religion, ceaſe not as yet to improve their private grudges and animoſities, being unwilling to acquieſce in the ſentence already paſſed, but poſitively aſſerting, that they were but a few [Biſhops] who gave their Sentiments and Opinions; and that (before they had carefully enquired into all things which ought to have been firſt inſpected) they proceeded with too much haſt and precipitancy to paſs a definitive ſentence. From all this it happens that even they, whoſe duty it is to preſerve a brotherly and unanimous unity of mind, unworthily or rather impiouſly create Schiſmes amongſt one another; and alſo give an occaſion of ſcorn and deriſion to thoſe men, whoſe ſoules are alienated from the moſt holy Religion. Wherefore it was our chiefeſt care, that theſe [diviſions,] (which ought, after ſentence already given to have been terminated by a voluntary aſſent) might now at laſt be concluded in the preſence of many Biſhops. Since therefore we have ſummoned many Biſhops out of divers and innumerable places, to aſſemble themſelves on the Calends of Auguſt, at the City Orleans: we thought good to write to you alſo, that having received a publick Chariot from the moſt eminent Latronianus [l] Corrector of Sicily, and taking into your company two [m] of the ſecond Order, whom you ſhall think fit to chuſe, and alſo bringing along with you three ſervants which may miniſter to you in your journey, you meet on the very day appointed at the place aforeſaid, that both by your Gravity, and alſo by the unanimous and concordant prudence and perſpicacity of the reſt there aſſembled, this diſſenſion (which has ſhamefully been continued hitherto by certain deteſtable quarellings, after all things have been heard which ſhall be ſaid by the now diſagreeing parties, whom we have ſummon'd to appear alſo,) may now at laſt be reſtored to a fit and congruous [obſervancy of] Religion and faith, and to a Brotherly union. God Almighty preſerve you in health many years.

* In ſtead of [καλαλλήλως, mutually, it ſhould be undoubtedly καὶ ἀλλήλων, amongſt themſelves:] ſo 'tis corrected in the margin of the Geneva-Edition: and alſo Sir Henry Savill had mended it, in the margin of his copy. Valeſ.

[l] The Maz. Fuk. and Med. M. SS. read κονσήκλορος· but without doubt we ſhould read κονσηκλοτ-ῳ (that is) from Latronianus Corrector of Sicily, we find mention of this Latronianus in an old inſcription at Panormus, which is atteſted by Gualtherus, in Tabulis Siculis, number 164. D. N. FL. VALERIO LICINIO AUG. DOMITIUS LATRONIANUS V. C. CORR. P. S. DEVOTUS N. M. QUE EJUS. Gualtherus alſo in his Annotations upon this inſcription, quoteth and correcteth this place of Euſebius. Valeſ.

[m] By theſe words [ὁι ἐκ δευτέρου θρόνου] Euſebius meaneth the Presbyters, who were commonly called Sacerdotes ſecundi ordinis, (Prieſts of the ſecond order) which may be collected out of ſeveral good Authours, as Optatus Milevitanus, and Jacobus Sirmondus in his notes upon Sidonius page 78. Hieronymus, in his Epitaph on the bleſſed Paula, ſays, There were preſent the Biſhops of Hieruſalem and other Cities, and an innumerable company of Prieſts [inferioris gradus] of the lower order, &c. So alſo ſays Gregor. Nazianz. in Carm. Famb. de vitâ ſuâ pag. 6. Hence comes this diſtinction; the Biſhops in the Church, ſate in more lofty thrones, the Presbyters ſitting on both hands

[f] It is much controverted amongſt the Learned who this Mark is, whom Conſtantine here joyneth with Miltiades Biſhop of Rome. Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 313. Chap. 23. thinks the Text of Euſebius is faulty, and inſtead of [μάρκῳ] he would read [ἱερεῖ.] But this emendation cannot be admitted of, for whereas Miltiades is before call'd ὁπίσκοπος, Biſhop, 'tis ſuperfluous to adde ἱερεῖ, ſacred Magiſtrate. Moreover, Titles of honour are common words, but this here is an affected and unuſual term. Wherefore, rejecting this conjecture of Baronius's, I think this Mark was a Presbyter of the Church of Rome, whom Conſtantine had a deſire ſhould be preſent at this Synod with Miltiades. This alſo I think was that Mark who was Biſhop of Rome after Silveſter. This Epiſtle of Conſtantine to Miltiades was extant in the third Conference at Carthage; Chap. 319. But the latter part of this third Conference, which in my opinion is the moſt uſeful, is loſt. Valeſ.

[g] By τοιοῦτοι χάρται are meant two Libels, which contained the faults of Cecilianus Biſhop of Carthage, which being ſubſcribed by the faction of Majorinus, they gave them to Anulinus the Proconſul at Carthage on the 17th of the Calends of May. Conſtantine the Emperour being the third time, and Licinius the third time Conſuls. Theſe Libels Conſtantine calls [χάρτας,] becauſe they contained in them many papers, and many publick Acts, to prove the faults of Cecilianus. Chriſtoph. calls theſe χάρτας, Epiſtles but that is an ill term: for there was but one Epiſtle ſent by Anulinus to Conſtantine the Emperour, but there were ſeveral χάρται, or papers. Conſtantine alſo a little further calls them Libelli: ſo does Auguſtine alſo, in his 48 Epiſtle to Vincentius, call it Libellus: and ſaies it was thus ſuperſcribed; The Libell of the Catholick Church containing the faults of Cecilianus, put in by the faction of Majorinus. Valeſ.

[h] In our Text it is, χαρταγωνέων; in Niceph. χαρταγωνίων; in the Maz. and Med. M. SS. 'tis written χαρταγωνιῶν by a tranſpoſition of the aſpirate, which the Greeks uſually do in turning Latine proper names into Greek. Valeſ.

[i] Inſtead of [αὐθαιρέτῳ] we ſhould undoubtedly read [αὐθαιρέτως] in this place, thus, ἃς τῇ ἐμῇ καθοσιώσει αὐθαιρέτως ἡ θεία προνοια ἐνεχείρισε (i. e.) (thoſe Countries which Divine Providence gave into our hands by a voluntary ſurrender.) For when the head of Maxentius was ſent into Africa, all Africa at the ſight of the Tyrant's head, yielded to Conſtantine. And alſo before the overthrow of Maxentius ſome African Cities yielded themſelves voluntarily to Conſtantine, when he ſent ſome Sea-forces thither. Valeſ.

[k] Inſtead of [πιωτάτε] the reading in Nicephorus is [πιωτάτοι, deareſt] in the plural number. For ſince the Reſcript was written to Miltiades Biſhop of Rome, and to Mark, and ſince he always ſpeaks to them in the plural number; 'tis reaſonable that in the cloſe of the Reſcript it ſhould be [πιωτατοι.] Further, the Acts of this Synod at Rome are extant in Optatus, B. 1. The Authour of the Synodicon (whom we have often quoted) ſays this Synod was convened by Miltiades and Mark at Rome; he joyns Mark to Miltiades, as ſoon as he perceived from this Reſcript that Conſtantine mentioned them joyntly. Valeſ.

hands on lower seats, and the Deacons standing by in white garments, saith the same Greg. Naz. in his dream De Ecclesiæ Anastasiâ pag. 78. Eusebius also, in his description of the Church of Tyre, alloteth the thrones which were in the Church next the Altar, to the Bishop and Presbyters, but the benches to the Deacons, where also he calls the Presbyters, τοὺς μετὰ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον καθεζομένους, i. e. those which have the second places next the Bishop. See St Augustin's 148th Epistle. Vales.

CHAP. VI.

[a] Concerning the Estates belonging to the Christians.

[a] This Title [περὶ τῶν χριστιανῶν πατρωνίων· Concerning the Estates of the Christians] is here put in a wrong place: for the Epistle which follows, says not a word concerning the Estates of the Christians. This Title might better have been prefix't before Chap. 5. where we have two several Decrees of Constantin's concerning the Estates of the Christians. Therefore very well do the old Maz. and Fuk. M.SS. make no distinction of a Chapter in this place. Vales.

A Copy of the Emperour's Rescript, by which he granteth money to the Churches.

CONstantinus Augustus, to Cecilianus Bishop of Carthage. For as much as it was our pleasure that through all the Provinces of Africa, Numidia, and both Mauritania's, some thing should be allowed for necessary Expences to some Ministers of the most Holy and Legitimate Catholick Religion, who were expresly named, We wrote to the * most perfect Ursus Rationalist of Africa, and have intimated to him that he take care to pay to your Gravity three thousand [b] Folles. Therefore when you shall have received the sum aforesaid, command that it be distributed to all the forementioned Ministers according to a Breve directed to you from Hosius. But if you shall perceive there will be any thing wanting towards the fulfilling of our desire to all in this point, without making any scruples or delays you shall demand of Heraclas the Steward of our Estates whatsoever you shall judge requisite. For we ordered him when he was with us, that if your Gravity demanded any money of him, he should without the least hesitancy take care it should be told out to you. And because we have been informed that some men who are of an unsetled mind, make it their business to pervert the members of the most Holy Catholick Church by a certain impious and clancular falshood and corruption; We would have you understand, that We gave such orders to Anulinus our Proconsul, and also to Patricius [c] Deputy of the Prefects, when present, that amongst all other things they take an effectual and sufficient care about this business more especially, and that if any such thing be done, they should by no means suffer it to be neglected. If therefore you shall see any such men persisting in this madness, without any further doubtings you shall make your Address to the foresaid Judges; and disclose the matter to them, that they may correct them according to our Orders to them when present. The Deity of the Supream God preserve you many years.

* See B. 9. Chap. 9. note (f.)

[b] Φόλλις. Epiphanius mentions these Folles, at the close of his book De Mensur. & Ponderib. He speaks of two sorts of them; the first he calls the small Talent, consisting of 208 denarii. The value of the other, he says, is δύο λεπτὰ, duo minuta, two minutes, or mites. See the Learned Petavius's Diatriba concerning the Follis, at the end of his notes on Epiphan. pag. 431, &c. Edit. Paris. 1622.

[c] Concerning these Vicarii prætorum, Deputies of the Prefects, we have treated in our notes on the 14th book of Amm. Marcellinus; pag. 17. where we shewed that there was a difference between acting for a Prefect, and acting for the Prefects. He may be said to act for a Prefect, whom the Prefect of a City, or Prefect of the Prætorium orders to supply his place in any special business. But he may be said to act for the Prefects, who exercises a Deputies power ordine Codicillorum. See the place now cited in those notes. The title given to these Vicarii at this time was Perfectissimus, (see book 1. chap. 9. note f.) not Clarissimus, or Spectabilis. This we are informed of from Constantine the Emperours Rescript to Probianus Procunsul of Africa, which Augustine relates in his 68th Epistle; and in his 3d book against Cresconius, cap. 70. Vales.

[a] Concerning the Immunity of the Clergy.

[a] In the most ancient Maz. and Fuk. M. SS. this is called the Sixth Chatter; which is true, if I mistake not. See the foregoing chap. note (a.) Vales.

A Copy of the Emperour's Rescript by which he commandeth, that the Prelates of Churches be freed from bearing all Civil Offices.

WE Greet you most Honoured Anulinus. Since it is apparent from several circumstances, that the contempt of that true Religion, by which is preserved the Highest veneration of the Celestial Majesty, has brought imminent dangers upon the affairs of the publick; but when it was lawfully and rightly admitted and preserved, it conferred the greatest prosperity upon the * Roman Empire, and an eminent felicity on all humane affairs; (the divine Beneficence being the Donour hereof:) it seemed good to Us, ([b] Dearest Anulinus,) that those men, who with a due sanctity and an assiduous observance of this law give themselves wholly to the ministrations and services of this Sacred Religion, should receive the rewards of their labours. Wherefore Our pleasure is that those men within the Province committed to your care, who in the Catholick Church, over which Cecilianus Presides, do service to this Sacred Religion, commonly call'd by the name of Clergy-men, be always preserved exempt from all manner of Civil Offices: lest by any errour or sacrilegious misfortune, they should be drawn away from the service due to the Deity; but [our will is] that they should rather serve their own law without any the least inquietude. For when they performe the highest [acts of] worship to God, the greatest advantage seems to accrue to the publick Affairs. Farewell most Honoured and Dearest Anulinus.

* τῷ Ρωμαίκῳ ὀνόματι, nomini Romano, upon the Roman name.

[b] In the Med. Maz. Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. we read [πιστώτατε καὶ ποθεινότατε ἡμῖν Ἀνυλῖνε, most honoured and our dearest Anulinus.] We have the Relation of Anulinus in answer to this Rescript of Constantine's in Augustin's 68 Epistle. But Eusebius inserts these Rescripts in a preposterous kind of Order. For Constantin's Letter to Cecilianus the Bishop, and his Rescript to Anulinus ought in order to precede Constantin's Letter to Miltiades, Bishop of Rome. For all those Letters have a relation to the Roman Synod which was summoned upon the account of Cecilianus, when Constantine and Licinius were both the third time Consulls; in the year of Christ 313. Vales.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning Licinius's exorbitancies which afterwards ensued, and concerning his death.

SUch [gifts] therefore did the Divine and celestial Grace of our Saviours presence bestow upon us: and such an exuberance of prosperous successes was procured to all men by reason of the peace [restored] to us. This was the posture of our affairs, we spent the time in joy and publick festivities. But this spectacle was intollerable to the malice of the Devil, that hater of all goodness, and industrious Patron of mischief. Nor were the calamitous misfortunes which befell the forementioned Tyrants sufficient to instill a sober consideratenes into Licinius, who being honoured with a prosperous and successfull Government, and with the second place of dignity, that next to Constantine the Great, and innobled with an affinity contracted by marriage, and with a neer relation to a most August family, relinquished the imitation of good men; and became a zealous emulatour of the improbity and wickedness of impious Tyrants.

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

And he made choice of following their Councels, whoſe calamitous end himſelf had beheld with his own eyes, rather than to continue in the friendſhip and affection of the beſt of Princes. For being ſtimulated with Envie againſt his great Benefactour, he raiſed a moſt impious and nefarious war againſt him, in no wiſe revering the Laws of nature, forgetful of all oathes, affinity, and leagues. For Conſtantine, like a moſt curteous Emperour, that he might ſhew him the moſt convincing tokens of his ſincere kindneſs, envied him not his own affinity, nor did he deny him the illuſtrious marriage of his Siſter: but vouchſafed to make him partaker of the [a] Nobility he derived from his Anceſtours, and [communicated to him] his own antient lineage and Imperial blood; he alſo allowed him to enjoy an Authority over all the Roman Empire, as being his kinſman and colleague in the Empire; nor had he given him a leſs portion of the Roman Provinces to Rule over and Govern, [than he reſerved to himſelf.] But on the other hand, [Licinius] acted quite contrary hereto, daily inventing all kinds of ſtratagems againſt him that was his Better, deviſing all ways how to inſnare him, that with miſchiefs he might reward his Benefactour. At firſt therefore attempting to conceal his treacheries, he counterfeited a friendſhip, and having ſeveral times aſſailed [Conſtantine] by guile and deceit, he hoped to have eaſily obtained what he expected. But God was [Conſtantin's] Friend, Guardian, and Protectour: he brought to light and detected the intregues which were clancularly and ſecretly contrived againſt him. So powerfull a ſtrength is that great Armour of Godlineſs [endowed with,] that it is both prevalent to repulſe the enemy, and has alſo a power ſufficient for its own preſervation. With this Armour our moſt pious Emperour being fortified, eſcaped the many intricate ſnares of that accurſed Man. Licinius therefore, perceiving that his ſecret Plots did not ſucceed according to his expectation, (becauſe God diſcovered all his deceit and treachery to his beloved Emperour,) and knowing that he could lie no longer concealed, raiſeth open war. But in that he determined to war againſt Conſtantine, he likewiſe reſolved to Marſhal an army againſt Almighty God, whom he knew Conſtantine worſhipped. Afterwards he begun ſecretly and by little and little to attack thoſe pious men who lived under his Government, who never intended the leaſt moleſtation to his Dominions. And this he did [in regard] he was miſerably induced thereto, being blinded by his innate malice. Therefore he did not ſet before his eyes the Examples of thoſe who had been Perſecutors of the Chriſtians before him; nor yet of thoſe whoſe deſtroyer and puniſher he himſelf had been appointed, becauſe of the height of thoſe Impieties, to which they were arrived: but, declining from the way of ſober and right reaſon, or rather running perfectly mad, he reſolved upon engaging with God himſelf (becauſe he was Conſtantin's Aſſiſtant,) inſtead of [Conſtantine] who was aſſiſted by him. And firſt of all he baniſhed all Chriſtians out of his family, leaving himſelf deſtitute (miſerable wretch!) of their prayers to God for him; it being their commonly receiv'd Doctrine that prayer ſhould be made for all men. He afterwards gave command that all the Officers in the [b] Civil Milice ſhould be disbanded and turned out of their military preferments, except they were willing to ſacrifice to Devils. But theſe are but ſmall things, if compared with his greater villanies, which enſued. To what end ſhould we recount all and every particular fact, which this man, hated of God, committed? how he, who was the greateſt law breaker invented impious laws? For he made an Order, that no one ſhould charitably relieve the poor diſtreſſed Priſoners with meat, nor ſhow the leaſt compaſſion to thoſe, who through hunger pined away in their fetters: that is, that there ſhould no good man live, and that they who were led by [the dictates of] nature it ſelf to have compaſſion on their neighbours, ſhould be intapable of doing them any good. And this was clearly the moſt impudent, and cruel of of all laws, by far ſurpaſſing all that mildneſs and clemency implanted by nature: to which Law alſo there was a penalty annexed, that they who ſhewed compaſſion upon the [criminals] ſhould ſuffer the like afflictions with thoſe towards whom they ſhew'd mercy: and that ſuch as charitably miniſtered to thoſe in bonds and confined to priſon, ſhould ſuffer the ſame puniſhment with them. Such were Licinius's Ordinances. What need we reckon up his innovations concerning marriages, or his new laws about [c] dying perſons; whereby he preſumptuouſly abrogated the ancient, good and wiſely eſtabliſhed Roman Laws, and inſtead of them introduced certain barbarous and inhumane ordinances, and truly unjuſt and illegal? he alſo invented ſeveral ſorts of [d] Taxes to the great oppreſſion of the Subjects of his Provinces; and all ſorts of exactions of Gold and Silver; [e] ſurveying of lands; and that curſed way of getting lucre from Coun-

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

[a] Here we follow that emendation of this place which is ſet at the Margin of Turnebus's M. S. who inſtead of [συγγενείας affinity] in this place reads [εὐγενείας nobility.] For Conſtantine was extracted from a Royal deſcent; he derived his pedigree from Claudius the Emperour. Valeſ.

[b] The beſt Comment upon this place is the 54th chap. of book 1. of Conſtantin's Life. The Militia amongſt the Roman's was twofold: the Militia Caſtrenſis, or, the Militia imploy'd in all Martial Affaires; and the Militia civilis (which in Theodoſius's Code, is called the Militia Cohortalis, the militia imploy'd in Civil Affaires. Thoſe that were liſted into this Militia Cohortalis, were by the Latines commonly call'd Officiales, or Apparitores: and by the Greeks generally ὑπηρέται. See Themiſt. 1. Orat. pag. 38. Chryſoſt. Homily 1. upon the firſt Epiſt. to Corinth. pag. 8. and pag. 10. Moreover [ὑπηρεσία] by Chryſoſt. Hom. 1. upon Saint Matthew is us'd for Apparitoris Officio fungi, to execute an Apparitours Office. But the Greeks (ſometimes for diſtinction's ſake of the Militia Caſtrenſis) called theſe Apparitores, ὑπηρέται τῆς πόλεως, City Apparitours. So Euſebius in the place above quoted; and Themiſtius, in his 17th Orat. pag. 457. makes uſe of [ἀστικὸς ὑπηρέτης] which has the ſame import with [ὑπηρέτης τῆς πόλεως] here in Euſebius, (i. e.) the Apparitours of the Preſidents and Prefects of the Prætorium, who gathered the Tributes, which belonged to the Treaſury. Valeſ.

[c] This paſſage ὅτι τοῖς τὸν βίον μεταλλάξασιν is by Chriſtoph. and Langus render'd mortuos, the dead; but I cannot admit of this verſion. What Law this of Licinius's was, 'tis difficult to reſolve. It ſeems to have belonged to the Teſtaments of Dying people: it was abrogated by Conſtantine after Licinius was overcome by him. Valeſ.

[d] Euſebius uſes this terme [ὀπτικὴ ψῆφος] which occurs here, at book 8. chap. 14. (ſee note c. there) where he treats concerning Maximinus the Eaſtern Tyrant: but in his firſt book De vita Conſtant. he terms it σκήψεις, (i. e.) ways of getting money. The Ancient Greeks us'd πόροι and ποριαμοὶ in this ſence. There is extant a book of Xenophon's entitled περὶ πόρων. The modern Latine Authours call theſe taxes, tituli. Valeſ.

[e] The phraſe here us'd (viz.) ἀναμετρήσεις τε γῆς is very well rendred by Langus, iteratæ agrorum menſiones, the re-meaſuring of Lands. This Verſion Rufinus confirm's, who renders it cenſus innovare, to renew the Cenſus, or the prizing of every mans Eſtate. This Cenſus could not be renewed without the remeaſuring of Land. For the Cenſus amongſt the Romans conſiſted of two things, (i. e.) the meaſuring of Lands, and the numbering of the People, as I have elſewhere noted. We have the teſtimony of Aurel. Vict. and of Victor's Epitome in confirmation of what Euſebius ſays concerning Licinius's avarice. But what Euſebius ſays concerning Licinius's exactions, and oppreſſions of his Subjects, is confuted by the Teſtimony of two ancient Authors, (viz.) Aurel. Victor and Libanius: Victor ſays of Licinius that he was, Agrariis plane ac ruſticantibus, quia ab eo genere ortus altuſque erat, ſatis utilis, i. e. To the common ſort of people and Ruſticks, becauſe he was extracted from and maintained by that ſort of men, He was uſeful enough. Libanius in his Oration Pro Templis Gentilium, ſays ἐπ ἐκείνου ἀνθεῖν τὰς πόλεις, that the Cities flouriſhed under him (viz.) Licinius. trey trey men which were not alive, but long since dead. Besides these things, why should we reckon up the [f] proscriptions of innocent men which he, the Enemy of mankind, was the Inventer of? and the Imprisonments of men [g] nobly descended, and of an honourable repute? Whose youthfull wives he forced from them by violence, and delivered them to some of his impure slaves, that they might be most injuriously vitiated? What need we number the married Women, Virgins, and Maids, whom in his [h] decrepid age he abus'd, to the fulfilling of his own soul's insatiable lust? What need is there [I say] of enlarging upon these things, whenas the exorbitant grosness of his last actions evinceth his first to be trivial and almost nothing? In fine, he arrived to such an heighth of madness, that [he made an attempt] upon the Bishops: and looking upon them (in regard they were the servants of Almighty God) to be enemies to his practises; (but [daring not] as yet to use open violence, fearing his superiour,) he privily and craftily plotted against them: and by the treacheries of his Presidents destroyed the eminentest of them. The manner how he murthered them is strange, and such as was never before heard of. But his Actions at Amasia and the rest of the Cities of Pontus do far exceed the most superlative cruelty. Where some of Gods Churches were again thrown down from their vast height to the very ground, and others were shut up, least any of those that did usually frequent them should meet there, and render a due worship to God. For he did not suppose that prayers were offered up for him, being perswaded to entertain such thoughts as these by a consciousness of his own impieties. But he was of opinion that all we did was in behalf of the Pious Emperour, and to render God favourable to him. Upon which account he resolved to assail us with his utmost rage. Therefore, those Presidents that were his flatterers, being fully perswaded that this would be grateful to the Tyrant, [inflicted] the same punishment upon some Bishops that they usually imposed upon Malefactours. So that harmless and innocent men were haled away, and without the least pretext punished like murtherers. But others of them underwent a new kind of death, having their bodies cut with a sword (as Butchers do meat) into a great many pieces; and after this barbarous and most horrid spectacle, they were thrown into the depths of the Sea to be made food for the fishes. After this therefore, the worshippers of God betook themselves to flight; and the Fields, the Deserts, the Woods, and Mountains were the receptacles of Christ's servants. When the impious Tyrant had succeeded thus prosperously in these his attempts, he afterwards entertained some thoughts of raising a general Persecution against all the Christians. And he had undoubtedly been master of his desire, nor could there have been any obstacle to hinder him from effecting of it, had not God the Protectour of his own servants, (that he might prevent what would immediately have ensued,) caused Constantine his servant suddenly to appear as a Saviour and a great Light to all that were in a thick darkness and an obscure night, conducting him with a mighty Arm into these parts.

[f] I doubt not, but instead of [ἐξορκισμούς,] we should read [ἐξοδεισμούς, proscriptions:] for in the first book, De vita Constant. cap. 55. (where Eusebius repeats all these passages almost in the same words) instead of this term, he uses this phrase [ζημείας, punishments of exile.] Vales.

[g] Christoph. translates the term εὐπατριδῶν here used, Patricios, erroneously, as we before signified. They were termed nobiles, who were descended from those that had born any Office in Rome, or in the Towns incorporate. Vales.

[h] But Licinius died in the Sixtieth year of his age, as Victor affirms in his Epitome. Wherefore Eusebius, like an Oratour, aggravates the matter here. Vales.

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning Constantin's Victory, and concerning the prosperity procured by him to all those that live under the power of the Romans.

[a] ON this man therefore did [God] from above bestow Trophies of Victory over the ungodly, as being the worthy fruits of his piety. But the impious Tyrant, together with all his Counsellours and friends, he laid prostrate on their faces before the feet of Constantine. For when * he was arrived at the highest degree of Madness, the pious † Emperour supposing he was not to be longer born with, [b] entring into a prudent and sober consideration with himself, and having tempered the severity of Justice with [his own natural] clemency, resolves upon succouring of those that were oppressed by the Tyrant; and prepares to save a great part of mankind, by cutting off and removing out of the way a few Pestilent and destructive persons. For having before this made use of clemency only, and shewing pity on him who deserved no compassion; he did not profit him at all; for he desisted not from [the practise of his pristine] impieties, but rather increased his fury against the Subjects of his own Provinces. There was no hope of deliverance now remaining to those that were oppressed and afflicted by this cruel Beast. Wherefore [Constantine] the Protector of all good men (having tempered his hatred of impiety with his love of virtue) together with his Son Crispus a most mild and courteous Cæsar, marches forwards upon this expedition, reaching out a helping hand to all that were in distress. Both the Father therefore and the Son, having for their Captain and Assistant the supream King, and the Son of God the Saviour of all men, divided the Armie so, as on every side to encompass God's Enemies, and got an easie Victory; all things in that action having been rendred facil, and successfully expedited for them by God according to their wish. Immediately therefore even in the twinkling of an eye, they who yesterday and the day before breathed forth Death and menaces, became wholly extinct, the remembrance even of their very names not in the least surviving them. Their pictures also and other monuments [dedicated to their honour] received the deserved [spots of] ignominy; and the same [disgrace] which Licinius had with his own eyes beheld the impious Tyrants heretofore involved in, even he himself in like manner suffered. For he himself received not instruction, nor was he amended by his Neighbours stripes: but walking on in the same path of wickedness with them, deservedly wandred into the same precipice they did. Thus

[a] At these words we began the 9th chap. which conjecture of ours is confirmed by the old Mss. and Fuk. M. SS. And in those M. SS. this chapter is rightly call'd the eighth chapter as we remark't before. Vales.

[b] Τὸν σώφρονα σωφρονισμὸν λογισμῶν: these are the words in the original; which Valesius renders thus, modestam ac sobriam in se colligens mentem: Grynæus thus, rem hanc sapienter expendit: and we translate it after this manner, entring into a prudent and sober consideration with himself. 'Tis a phrase usual with our Eusebius. For so he expresses himself book 3. De Vita Constant. chap. 5. and 11.

was this perſon ſmitten and proſtrated. But Conſtantine the mighty Conquerour, gloriouſly adorned with all the vertues of Religion (together with his Son Criſpus, a Prince highly beloved of God, and in all things like his Father,) recovered his own Eaſt, and reunited the Roman Empire into one entire body as it heretofore was: ſubjecting under [c] their Peace the whole world [which reaches] from the riſing Sun to the utmoſt Weſtern Regions, together with the Provinces that lie round about as well towards the North as the South. Men therefore were now ſecure from all fear of them who formerly had oppreſſed them, and celebrated ſplendid and ſolemn days of Feſtivity. All things ſeemed to abound with fulneſs of light, and they who heretofore beheld each other with dejectedneſs and ſorrow, then lookt upon each other with ſmiling countenances, and chearful eyes. In [d] Dances alſo and Songs, in every City and in the Fields they firſt of all glorified God the King of Kings, (for thus they were inſtructed to do) and in the next place the pious Emperour, together with his children which were beloved of God. There was an oblivion of paſt afflictions, no remembrance of any impiety, but only an enjoyment of the preſent good things and expectations of more in future. In all places the Edicts of the Victorious Emperour, full of kindneſs and clemency, and his Laws containing manifeſt tokens of his great bounty and true piety, were proclaimed. All Tyranny therefore being thus extirpated, the Empire which did by right belong to Conſtantine and his Sons, was preſerved firm and ſecure from envie. Who (after they had cleanſed the world from the impiety of their Predeceſſours) being ſenſible of thoſe great benefits which had been procured for them by God, [e] did by a moſt apparent and convincing teſtimony of their deeds declare to all men their love of vertue and of the Deity, and alſo their piety and gratitude towards God.

CONSTANT. & LICINIUS.

[c] By this Phraſe here uſed [εἰρήνην αὐτῶν, their Peace] is meant the Peace which they reſtored. So Seneca in his book De Clementia brings in Nero ſpeaking thus: Hæc tot millia gladiorum quæ pax mea comprimit, ad nutum meum ſtringentur. Where by [pax mea] he means the Peace he had procured. So alſo Velleius Paterculus uſes this Phraſe, and on ſome Old Coines we find this inſcription; Pax Auguſti, i. e. the Peace procured by the Emperour. But Pax Romana is by the ſame Seneca (in his book De Clementia, and in that De Providentia) uſed in another ſence, to wit, pax ea quâ fruitur imperium Romanum, (i. e.) that Peace which the Roman Empire enjoyeth. Valeſ.

[d] This word [χορεῖαι dances] here uſed, when the diſcourſe is concerning the Chriſtians praiſing God, did not pleaſe Nicephb. And therefore inſtead of χορεῖαι he uſes παιᾶνες. Euſebius, in his ſecond book, De vita Conſtant. inſtead of χορεῖαι uſes χοροὶ which term indeed is more tolerable. But we may eaſily bear with this word χορεῖαι. For the Chriſtians uſed to dance on their Feſtivals of the Martyrs, which they kept in honour of them; and thus they celebrated their Conflicts and Victories as Greg. Naz. relates (in Carminibus ad mulieres ſeſe curioſius exornantes, pag. 152.) Baſilius Magnus (in his 14th Homily againſt drunkenneſs) has a ſharp invective againſt theſe Choreas, or Dances. Valeſ.

[e] The reading in the Kings M.S. (which Stephens almoſt every where follows) is this [διὰ τῆς ὑπὲρ Χριστιανῶν ἐνδείξασθαι νομοθεσίας, declared by their Law [publiſhed] in favour of the Chriſtians.] But in the Maz. Med. Fuk. and Savil. M. SS. this place is written far otherwiſe, thus [δι' ὧν εἰς πρῶτον ἅπασιν ἀνθρώποις παρέσχον ὄψιν, ἐπιδείξασθαι, did by a moſt apparent and convincing teſtimony of their deeds declare to all men:] which reading, being confirmed by the conſent of more, and thoſe ancienter copies, we with good reaſon ſuppoſed ought to be preferred before the other. Valeſ.

VALESIUS'S PREFACE

To the Studious READERS.

AFter Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea (whom we may deſervedly Stile the Father of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory,) many inflamed with a Pious Emulation, undertook to Treat of the ſame Subject. But Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret are in the Judgment of all Antiquity far more famous than all the other Writers: who beginning from thoſe times wherein Euſebius concluded his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, brought their work down to the Times of Theodoſius Junior. And at firſt I was reſolved to have publiſhed theſe three Writers together, that as they had proſecuted one and the ſame Subject in their Writings, ſo they might have alſo been comprehended and read in one and the ſame Volume. But in regard this would hereby have been too large a Volume, therefore I was forced to defer the Edition of Theodoret to another time. To which I will add Evagrius Epiphanienſis's Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, as alſo the Excerptions of Philoſtorgius and Theodorus Lector; that the Studious may in future read over the whole body of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, publiſht and explained by our Labour. In the interim you have here (Reader) joyned together in this Volume Socrates and Sozomen. Concerning what I have done about the Edition of theſe Authours, take this account in ſhort.

Above Eight years ſince, when by the Command and advice of the moſt Illuſtrious Prelates belonging to the Gallican Clergy, I publiſht the Hiſtory of Euſebius Cæſarienſis, I made it my buſineſs to perform three things moſt eſpecially in that Edition. For firſt, having from all places procured thoſe Manuſcript-Copies that were moſt remarkable and eminent, I amended and differenced thoſe paſſages which in the former Editions had been corrupted and diſguiſed. Secondly, in regard the former Tranſlatours had, either by reaſon of their want of Manuſcript-Copies, or on ſome other account, erred in many places, that their Verſions might not induce the Readers into miſtakes, I my ſelf have Elaborated a new Tranſlation, with which the Studious will, I hope, be in future content. Laſtly, I have added Annotations, that I might therein both give an account of mine Amendments, and alſo explain and illuſtrate all the more obſcure and difficult places. And this Edition being candidly received by all, is now in the hands of the Learned. Therefore, what I then (by the Divine Aſſiſtance) performed in the Hiſtory of Euſebius Cæſarienſis, the ſame I have attempted now to do in the Hiſtory of Socrates and Sozomen, by the Command and advice of the ſame Prelates I mentioned. For (that I may in the firſt place ſpeak concerning Socrates, who firſt betook himſelf to write) I have amended his Hiſtory by the help and aſſiſtance of three Manuſcript-Copies, to wit, the Sfortian, the Florentine, and the Allatian. The Sfortian-Manuſcript (which is the beſt and ancienteſt,) is at this time kept in the Vatican Library. This Copy the Learned Lucas Holſtenius had ſometime ſince (in favour to the moſt illuſtrious Carolus Monchallus Arch-Biſhop of Tolouſe) compared with the Geneva Edition; and had tranſmitted the various readings (together with the Emendations of Philoſtorgius tranſcribed from the Scoriacenſian M. S.) to the ſame Prelate, at ſuch time as the Gallican Clergy had committed to him the care of ſetting forth a new Edition of the Ancient Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory; ſo the ſaid Holſtenius informs us, in his Epiſtle to Peter Poſſinus a Divine of the Order of the Jeſuites. But afterwards, when by the entreaty of the ſame Arch-Biſhop of Tolouſe (who underſtood, that by reaſon of his too much other buſineſs, he could not be at leiſure to take care of this Edition) the Gallican Clergy had injoyned me that Province; the ſame Holſtenius ſent me the various readings of the fore mentioned Sfortian-Manuſcript, written out with his own hand at the margin of the Geneva Edition, together with thoſe amendments of Philoſtorgius; and had ſent me more, had a longer life been granted him. For a little before his death he ſent me ſome diſſertations concerning certain paſſages in the Nicene and Chalcedon Councills, and concerning Syneſius's Epiſcopate. Which diſſertations ſhall (God willing) be publiſhed by us in the third Tome of our Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, that the Learned part of the world may be no longer defrauded of that moſt Accompliſhed Perſons Labours. The Florentine-Manuſcript follows, tranſcribed about five hundred years ſince, which is now kept at Florence, in Saint Laurence's Library. The diſcovery and uſe of this Manuſcript I owe to Emericus Bigotius a moſt skilfull ſearcher into Old Libraries: by whoſe diligence it is contrived, that we ſitting ſtill and idle here enjoy the riches and treaſures of many and moſt remote Libraries. For at his entreaty, Michael Erminius, a Senatour of Florence, compared that Copy with the Geneva-Edition, and tranſmitted the various readings thereof to me; upon which account I do profeſs my ſelf much oblieged to both of them. The third Manuſcript belongs to Leo Allatius, a perſon every way learned, and one that has deſerved well of Eccleſiaſtick antiquity. This Copy contains the Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory of Theodorus Lector, comprized in two books; which Theodorus Lector had gathered out of three Writers of Eccleſiaſtick affairs, to wit, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, after the ſame manner that Caſsiodorus Senator has compoſed his Tripertite Hiſtory. But this Tripertite Hiſtory of Theodorus Lector comprehends only the affairs tranſacted in the Church during the Reign of Conſtantine and Conſtantius: whether the reaſon be, that Theodorus Lector continued his Collection no further, or that the other books of that work are loſt by the negligence of Antiquity. Out of this Copy therefore Leo Allatius had ſome time ſince Collected the various readings in the two former books of Socrates, and tranſmitted them being written out with his own hand to the moſt Illuſtrious Prelate Carolus Monchallus. Which I afterwards procured by the aſſiſtance of the moſt Eminent Dionyſius Talæus Advocate General to the Moſt Chriſtian King in the ſupream Court at Paris. Beſides theſe three Manuſcript Copies, I made uſe of the Kings M. S. (which is no very ancient one,) which Robert Stephens made uſe of only in his Edition. Upon which account it is leſs to be wondred at, that the common Editions of Socrates have hitherto been ſo faulty, ſeeing they were all derived from one only Copy, which alſo is a very modern one. Moreover, this Copy was taken out of the Kings Library, and courteouſly lent me by the moſt Illuſtrious and Reverend Prelate Nicolaus Colbertus Biſhop of Luſſon, a perſon endowed with eminent Learning, Virtue, and Dignity. Concerning whoſe praiſe I would ſpeak more in this place, did not his ſingular modeſty hinder me, who am very deſirous thereof. And theſe are the aſſiſtances of the Manuſcript Copies by the ſupports whereof I attempted this Edition of Socrates.

But in the Correcting of Sozomen's Hiſtory I had the benefit of fewer Manuſcript Copies. For beſides that Copy in the King's Library, which Robert Stephens followed in his Edition, and beſides that Copy belonging to Leo Allatius (whereof we made mention before,) which was an aſſiſtance to us only in the four firſt books of Sozomen, and in the beginning of the fifth; I had only the Fuketian Manuſcript. This Copy did at firſt belong to Carolus Monchallus Arch-Biſhop of Toloufe, a perſon very ſtudious of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. But afterwards it was put into the Fuketian Library, and lent to me by the moſt worthy Nicolaus Fuketius. Upon which account in my Annotations I have called this the Fuketian Manuſcript. But at length, when our Edition was compleated, this Copy (together with the other Manuſcripts belonging to the Fuketian Library) was transferred into the right and poſſeſſion of the moſt Illuſtrious and eminent perſon, on account both of his own and his fathers deſerts, Carolus Mauricius Tellerius, Abbot of Saint Benignus, who at this time is Coadjutor in the Arch-Biſhoprick of Rheimes. Indeed this is no very ancient Manuſcript, but 'tis of the beſt note, and is tranſcribed from a moſt correct Copy. The Titles of the Chapters, which in the King's Manuſcript, and in Robert Stephen's Edition, are prefixt before the Hiſtory of Sozomen, are wanting in this Copy. Nor is there any diſtinction of the Chapters throughout all the Books. From whence may be diſcerned the excellency and antiquity of that Manuſcript. For the Titles or Contents of the Chapters were made by Nicephorus Calliſtus, or rather by ſome other more modern Authour, and are wholly impertinent, and barbarouſly expreſſed. In ſo much that after I had lookt thereon with a greater accuracy, they ſeemed to have been compoſed by ſome other hand, rather than by Nicephorus. Moreover, that I may not defraud any perſon of his due praiſe, I acknowledge my ſelf indebted to Samuel Tennulius (a very Learned perſon, and one that is a great lover of me, at preſent an eminent Profeſſour of Litterature at Nimmeghen) for the various Readings in the Hiſtory of Sozomen and Theodoret, Collected out of the fore mentioned Allatian Manuſcript, that is, out of the Tripertite Hiſtory of Theodorus Lector. For whilſt he was at Rome, he tranſcribed them with his own hand from Leo Allatius's Copy, a perſon never praiſed enough; who by my entreaty and for my ſake had delivered thoſe various Readings to the ſaid Tennulius, that he might write them out. By the help of theſe Copies therefore I have amended, innumerable places both in Socrates and alſo in Sozomen, which were very corrupt before, I have ſupplied many defects, reſtored many punctations and diſtinctions, and laſtly I have added a new Verſion. Concerning which I will now ſpeak briefly.

What I have heretofore ſaid concerning Muſculus's and Chriſtophorſon's Tranſlation in my Preface to the Illuſtrious Prelates of the Gallican Church, which is prefixt before the Edition of our Euſebius, I need not now repeat. I will only add this; if after thoſe Tranſlatours now named the Hiſtory of Euſebius Cæſarienſis wanted a new Interpreter, a new Verſion of Socrates and Sozomen was much more neceſſary. For their Hiſtories have come to our hands far more faulty than Euſebius's. And that the judicious Reader will eaſily diſcern from Robert Stephens's Edition. For Robert Stephens, in his Edition of Euſebius, had the uſe of many Manuſcript Copies, which were taken out of the King's Library: but in his Impreſſion of Socrates's and Sozomen's Hiſtory, he had but one Copy of each of them. Therefore at the end of his Edition, he remarkt the various readings in the books of Euſebius taken out (as he ſays) of moſt ancient Copies. But at the cloſe of Socrates's and Sozomen's Hiſtory he put no various readings, becauſe he had gotten but one Copy of each of thoſe Writers. Alſo, the Copies of Euſebius, which Stephens made uſe of, were the beſt and ancienteſt, as he himſelf atteſts. But each Copy, as well that of Socrates's as the other of Sozomen's Hiſtory, which Robert Stephens followed in his Edition, was, as we perceive, very new, and did alſo abound with many faults. 'Tis therefore no wonder, that Learned men have been ſo often miſtaken in their Verſions of Socrates's and Sozomen's books, ſince they had ſuch faulty and maimed Copies before them, and were deprived of the aſſiſtance of Manuſcripts. For Muſculus had ſeen Robert Stephen's Edition only. Chriſtophorſon had indeed inſpected ſome Manuſcript Copies of Euſebius and Theodoret. But he had no Manuscripts of Socrates and Sozomen, as I have frequently observed in my Annotations. He had only seen the various readings and conjectures of Learned men set at the margin of Robert Stephens his Edition: of which sort many Copies came to our hands. But those readings were almost of no weight or authority at all, in as much as they had no remark annext of the ancient Copy out of which they were transcribed. But I, having got the best and ancientest Manuscripts, as well of Socrates, as Sozomen, and with great labour and industry compared them with the common Editions; afterwards took an easier and plainer way to their Translation. This Edition of ours therefore will (we hope) equally satisfie all persons, as well those that are skilled in the Greek Tongue, as them that are not. For, both those that are knowing in the Greek Language will read Socrates and Sozomen amended and throughly purged by our Labour; and such as are less skilled in the Greek will easier understand those Authours done into Latine by us.

Our Annotations follow; wherein, in the same manner as in our Notes on Eusebius, we have attempted to perform two things. The first is, to give an account of our Emendations, and to propose to the Readers judgment the various readings taken out of the Manuscript Copies. Then secondly, to illustrate (according to our ability) the more obscure and difficult places, which seemed to be able to involve the Readers judgment in doubts. Nor am I ignorant, that there are many delicate and fastidious persons, who may think that they have exhibited to them some exquisite observations onely, and common Places (as they are called,) composed for shew and ostentation; and who may suppose that that part of our Annotations, which contains emendations and various readings, is altogether trivial and despicable. To which persons I would make this return: although those Emendations and various Readings (which the Greeks term διπλοσεαφιας) may frequently be insipid, and seem troublesome to the Readers, yet they are highly usefull, and altogether necessary, especially in these Writers, whose books have come to our hands less correct. Now that Socrates's and Sozomens's Books are such, we have before mentioned And indeed our observations doe bear a greater shew of Learning: but an Emendation in my opinion requires more of wisedom and judiciousness. Neither is it for every man to give his opinion concerning the true and genuine reading of antique Writers: but he only is able to do this, who is furnished with a manifold stock of Learning, and has been long and much exercised in this art of judging.

And these are the particulars I thought necessary to advertize the Readers of in the beginning of this Work, that they might know at first sight what they were chiefly to expect in this Edition of ours, which could not be met with in the former Editions of this History. It remaines now, that we speak something concerning Socrates and Sozomen: who and what manner of persons they were, what course of Life they followed, what Religion they professed, and which of them first wrote his History.

CON-

CONCERNING THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF Socrates and Sozomen.

OUR Socrates therefore, for we will begin with him, had Cönſtantinople for his Countrey. In the fifth Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 24. he atteſts that he was born and educated in that City, and that he therefore Recorded thoſe matters chiefly which hapned in that City. When very young he was inſtructed in the Rules of Grammer, by Helladius and Ammonius, Grammarians, who at that time had left Alexandria, and betook themſelves to Conſtantinople. He that is deſirous to know the reaſon why theſe Grammarians departed from Alexandria, will find it related by Socrates, in the fifth Book and ſixteenth Chapter of his Hiſtory. For when the Heathen-Temples were demoliſhed at Alexandria, by the care and induſtry of Theophilus Biſhop of that City, Helladius and Ammonius, Grammarians (the one of whom was Jupiter's Prieſt, and the other Simius's at Alexandria,) diſpleaſed at the ignominy their Gods were expoſed to, having left the City Alexandria, went to Conſtantinople, and there took up their habitation. Moreover, the Heathen-Temples at Alexandria were deſtroyed when Timaſius and Promotus were Conſuls, (according to Marcellinus's relation in his Chronicon,) which was the Emperour Theodoſius's eleventh year. Whence it is apparent, that our Socrates was born about the beginning of Theodoſius's Reign. For boyes were uſually ſent to be inſtructed by Grammarians when they were about ten years old. After this Socrates ſtudied Rhetorick under the tuition of Troilus the Sophiſta, who about that time was an eminent Profeſſour of Eloquence at Conſtantinople. Our Socrates does not indeed ſay thus much in expreſs words. But the attentive and diligent Reader will eaſily collect from his words that which I have affirmed. For he does make ſuch frequent, and ſo honourable a mention of him, that he may ſeem to pay a reward to his Maſter. For he names his Country, Side, a City of Pamphylia. He alſo mentions not a few of his Schollars, to wit, Euſebius Scholaſticus, and Silvanus and Ablabius who were Biſhops. Laſtly, in his Seventh Book he relates that Anthemius the Prefect of the Prætorium (who, whilſt Theodoſius Junior was yet a Minor, was the chief Miniſter of State in the Empire) did chiefly make uſe of the Councels of Troilus the Sophiſta. Where he alſo gives him this Elogue: Ὃς μετὰ τῆς ἄλλης ἀκριβοῦς Φιλοσοφίας (for that muſt be the Reading, as we have intimated in our * notes) καὶ τὰ πολιτικὴν φρόνησιν τῷ Ἀνθεμίῳ ἐφάμιλλος ἦν; that is, who beſides the Philoſophy that was in him, was Anthemius's Equal in Political Knowledge. By theſe reaſons I have been induced to think that our Socrates had Troilus for his Rhetorick-Maſter. But concerning this matter we permit every one to determine according to his own arbitrement. Further, you muſt know that the Ancients were not ſo ſpeedy and haſty in [their learning the Rules of] Eloquence, as is now a daies uſual, but they applied their minds to thoſe Studies for a long time together. Gregory Nazianzen atteſts (in his Poem concerning his own Life) that he left Athens in the thirtieth year of his Age, as ſoon as he had learned the Precepts of the Art of Oratory in that City. After this, Socrates having left Troilus's School, betook himſelf to the Forum, and pleaded Cauſes at Conſtantinople. Whence he got the Surname of Scholaſticus. For ſo the Advocates were at that time called, as it has long ſince been remarked by others: * not becauſe they were reduced into Schools: but in regard, being young-men that had left the Schools of the Rhetoricians, they profeſſed this Art. But at length, having left off his practice in the Law, he applied his mind to Writing of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. In which work he has made uſe of a ſingular judiciouſneſs and diligence. His judiciouſneſs is manifeſted by his remarkes and ſentiments interwoven every where throughout his Books: than which there is (in my opinion) nothing more excellent. But his diligence is declared by many other inſtances, chiefly by this, in regard he frequently annexes a note of the times, times, that is, the Conſulates and Olympiades, eſpecially where he mentions ſuch matters as are more momentous. Nor has he careleſly or negligently written his Hiſtory, as Rufinus Aquileienſis did, who ſeems to me to have compoſed his two Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory (which he annexed to Euſebius's) without looking into any Records. Our Socrates did far otherwiſe, for having from all places got together the beſt monuments, that is, the Epiſtles of Prelates, the Acts of Synods, and the Books of Eccleſiaſtick Writers, agreeable to their authority he compoſed his Hiſtory. And whereas in the firſt Edition of his Work, having therein followed Rufinus, he had placed the Synod of Tyre, and the baniſhment of Athanaſius into the Gallia's in the Reign of Conſtantius Auguſtus, upon reading of Athanaſius's Books afterwards, he perceived his Errour. Wherefore he was neceſſitated to ſet forth a new Edition of his Hiſtory, wherein he both mended the miſtake I have mentioned, and alſo made an addition of ſome other things, which were wanting in the former Edition, as he himſelf atteſts at the beginning of his Second Book. Whence it appears how highly we ought to value Socrates's Hiſtory, to which the Writer himſelf put his laſt * hand. In the compoſure of his Hiſtory Socrates has made uſe of a plain and mean Stile; which was done by him on ſet purpoſe, that he might the eaſier be underſtood by all perſons, as himſelf atteſts at the beginning of his First and Third Book. For he lookt upon that Sublime and Eloquent manner of expreſſion to be more agreeable for Panegyrick-Orations, than an Hiſtory of Eccleſiaſtick affairs. Moreover, he has dedicated his Hiſtory to one Theodorus, whom in the beginning of his Second Book he Stiles a ſacred man of God, which is the ſame appellation our Euſebius gives to Paulinus Biſhop of Tyre at the beginning of his Tenth Book. But who this Theodorus was, it is to me unknown. For I cannot believe it was Theodorus Biſhop of Mopſueſtia, in regard Socrates wrote his Hiſtory after the death of Theodorus Mopſueſtenus. But it is now time for us to inquire concerning his Sect and Religion, as we promiſed at the beginning.

* See Socrat. Eccleſiaſt. Hiſt. Book. 7. Chap. 1. note (c.)

* Non quod in Scholas relati eſſent; ſo he words it; the expreſſion is ambiguous.

* That is, he himſelf Reviſed, and Corrected it.

Baronius in his Annalls, and Philippus Labbæus in his Book De Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis, do affirm that our Socrates was by Sect a † Novatian. The ſame was Nicephorus's opinion before it was theirs, who in the Proeme to his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory ſays thus: ὁ τὴν παροικίαν, ὃ μὴν δὲ γε κατὰ τὴν προαίρεσιν καθαρὸς Σωκράτης. That is, That Socrates ſurnamed * Catharus, but as to his mind he was not pure. Which words are not ſo to be underſtood, as if Socrates were Surnamed Catharus, but that it might be ſhown he was a Novatian. For the Novatians termed themſelves Cathari, as we are informed from the Eighth Canon of the Nicene Councill. The ſame Nicephorus (in his 11th Book and Chap. 14.) writes thus concerning Socrates: Socrates (who in this place plainly ſhews himſelf not to be a deteſter of the Novatian Principles) relates that theſe things were told him by a certain old man, &c. Now, why our Socrates was by many accounted a Novatian, the reaſons are not few, nor trivial. For firſt, he carefully Records the Series of the Novatian-Biſhops, who Preſided over their Church at Conſtantinople from the times of Conſtantine, and alſo remarks the Conſulates wherein every one of them departed out of this life. Secondly, he highly extols them all, eſpecially Agerius, Siſinius, Chryſanthus, and Paulus. By whoſe prayers, as he relates, a certain miracle was wrought at Conſtantinople. Laſtly, he proſecutes all matters belonging to the Novatian Sect with ſo great a care and diligence, that he may ſeem to have been addicted to this Sect. But ſhould any one examine theſe particulars with a greater accuracy, he will find nothing in them, that may evince our Socrates to have been a Novatian. For with the like diligence he enumerates the Arian-Biſhops, who governed their Church at Conſtantinople; and yet it is not ſaid he was an Arian. With no leſs carefulneſs alſo has he related all things that hapned to the Arians, Eunomians, and Macedonians at Conſtantinople, than he has Recorded what befell the Novatians. The reaſon hereof he himſelf has given, in Chap. 24. of his Fifth Book. Where he ſays, it was his deſign to Record thoſe things moſt eſpecially which hapned at Conſtantinople; both becauſe he himſelf lived in that City, wherein he had been born and educated; and alſo in regard the affairs tranſacted there were more eminent, and worthier to be Recorded. But ſhould any one object, that the Arian-Biſhops are not extolled by Socrates at the ſame rate that the Novatian-Biſhops are; the anſwer hereto is eaſie. For the Arian-Biſhops, who then lived at Conſtantinople, were far inferiour to the Novatian-Biſhops. For the Church of theſe Hereticks did in thoſe times abound with many and thoſe eminent Prelates: which Sozomen alſo confirms by his teſtimony, who Records their Elogues, exactly like thoſe given them by our Socrates. Wherefore, it muſt either be ſaid that Sozomen was alſo a Novatian, or elſe our Socrates muſt be diſcharged from that calumny. But 'tis manifeſt Sozomen was not a Novatian. For (to omit Theodorus Lector's teſtimony, who, in his Epiſtle prefixt before his Tripertite-Hiſtory, Stiles him Μακαριώτατον a moſt bleſſed perſon,) he himſelf in his 9th book relates, that he was preſent at a publick proceſſion, celebrated at Conſtantinople in honour of fourty Martyrs, at ſuch time as Proclus Preſided over the Church of that City. Whence 'tis manifeſtly concluded, that Sozomen was a perſon of the Catholick Communion, in regard he was preſent at the publick prayers together with the Catholicks. I confeſs indeed, that our Socrates does frequently favour the Novatians; for inſtance, when he recounts the Ringleader of the Novatian-Hereſie amongſt the number of the Martyrs; when he affirms, that the Novatians were joyned to the Catholicks in the ties of a moſt intimate friendſhip and love, and that they prayed together with them in the Church of God; and laſtly, when he commends Siſinius's Oration, which he made againſt this ſaying of Saint Cryſoſtom, Although thou haſt repented a thouſand times, approach. But † See Euſebius's Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 6. Chap. 43.

* That is, Pure.

'tis

'tis one thing to favour the Novatians; another to be a Novatian. Our Socrates might indeed be a favourer of the Novatians, either becauſe he was engaged in a friendſhip and familiarity with them, or in regard he approved of their diſcipline and abſtinence. For, as far as we can Collect from his Books, he was ſomething ſevere. But I can hardly perſwade my ſelf, that he was a Novatian; eſpecially when as I ſeem to have found the contrary from ſome places which occur in his Hiſtory. For firſt, in Chap. 38. of his Second Book, he frequently calls the Catholicks τὲς τῆς ἐκκλησίας, thoſe of the Church; and oppoſes them to the Novatians. Therefore he acknowledges that the Novatians were without the Church. Which he would certainly never have done, had he embraced that Hereſie. Beſides, in the 20. and 23. Chapters of his Fifth Book he reckons the Novatians amongſt the Hereticks, to wit, amongſt the Arians, Macedonians, and Eunomians. Laſtly, from Chap. 19. of the ſame Book it may be apparently concluded that Socrates was not a Novatian. For firſt, he always calls the Church ſimply and abſolutely the Catholick-Church: oppoſing it to the Churches of other Sects, concerning which he treats in the following Chapters, to wit, of the Arians, Novatians, and Eunomians. Then, he does not obſcurely reprehend that advice of Nectarius who abrogated the † Panitentiary-Presbyter. For he ſays that hereby Licence was given to Sinners, whenas there was no body that might reprove offenders. Which Opinion could not proceed from a Novatian, in regard thoſe Hereticks admitted neither of Repentance [after Baptiſm,] nor of a Penitentiary-Presbyter, as Socrates does there atteſt. Add hereto the teſtimony of Theodorus Lector, who, in his Epiſtle prefixt before his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, calls Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret ἀνδρας θεοφιλεῖς, that is, men that were pious and acceptable to God. Moreover, Theodorus Lector lived in the ſame City, and almoſt at the ſame time that Socrates did, to wit, in the Reign of the Emperour Anaſtaſius. Laſtly, Petrus Halloixius (in his notes on the life of Saint Irenæus, pag. 664.) is of the ſame Opinion with us. For, diſputing againſt Baronius, who at the year of Chriſt 159. had written thus; Theſe things Socrates the Novatian, who with the Jews celebrated Eaſter on the fourteenth day of the Moon, &c. he utters theſe words. And whereas Socrates is termed a Novatian, that may be taken in a double ſence: The one is, that he ſometimes favoured the Novatians; which alſo Bellarmine affirms (in his Book de Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis, at the year of our Lord 440.) both concerning him, and likewiſe concerning Sozomen. The other is, that he was [a follower] of the Novatian-Hereſie. In the now cited Chapter he neither ſhews himſelf to be a Novatian, nor a favourer of them. For he blames them, and detects their diſſenſions and vices; in ſo much that he may ſeem not to have been a friend, but an enemy, or rather neither of the two, but a declarer of the truth, which is the buſineſs of an Hiſtorian. Thus far concerning Socrates, we muſt now ſpeak of Sozomen.

† See Socrates's Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book. 5. Chap. 19. note (a.)

Hermias Sozomen was alſo a practiſer in the Law at Conſtantinople, at the ſame time with Socrates. His Anceſtours were not mean, they were originally Paleſtinians, Inhabitants of a certain Village neer Gaza called Bethelia. This Village did in times paſt abound with a numerous company of Inhabitants, and had moſt ſtately and ancient Churches. But the moſt glorious Structure of them all was the Pantheon, Scituated on an artificial Hill, which was the Tower as it were of Bethelia, as Sozomen relates in Chap. 15. of his fifth Book. The Grandfather of Hermias Sozomen was born in that Village, and firſt converted to the Chriſtian Faith by Hilarion the Monk. For when Alaphion an inhabitant of the ſame Village was poſſeſſed with a devil; and the Jews and Phyſitians, attempting to cure him, could do him no good by their Inchantments, Hilarion by a bare invocation of the Name of God caſt out the Devil. Sozomen's Grandfather, and Alaphion himſelf, amazed at this miracle, did with their whole families embrace the Chriſtian Religion. The Grandfather of Sozomen was eminent for his expoſitions of the ſacred Scriptures, being a perſon endowed with a polite wit, and an acuteneſs of underſtanding. Beſides, he was indifferently well skilled in Literature. Therefore he was highly eſteemed of by the Chriſtians inhabiting Gaza, Aſcalon, and the places adjacent, in regard he was uſefull and neceſſary for [the propagating of] Religion, and could eaſily unlooſe the knots of the ſacred Scriptures. But Alaphion's deſcendants excelled others for their Sanctity of Life, kindneſs to the indigent, and for their other Virtues: and they were the firſt that built Churches and Monaſteries there, as Sozomen atteſts in the place before cited. Where he alſo adds, that ſome holy perſons of Alaphion's Family were ſurviving even in his days, with whom he himſelf, when very young, was converſant, and concerning whom he promiſes to ſpeak more afterwards. Undoubtedly he means Salamanes, Phuſco, Malchio, and Criſpio brothers, concerning whom he ſpeaks in Chap. 32. of his Sixth Book. For he ſays that theſe brethren, inſtructed in the Monaſtick diſcipline by Hilarion, were during the Empire of Valens eminent in the Monaſteries of Paleſtine: and that they lived neer Bethelia, a Village in the Country of the Gazites. For they were deſcendants of a Noble Family amongſt them. He mentions the ſame perſons in his Eighth Book and Fifteenth Chapter, where he ſays Criſpio was Epiphanius's Arch-Deacon. 'Tis apparent therefore, that thoſe brethren I have mentioned were extracted from Alaphion's Family. Now Alaphion was related to Sozomen's Grandfather. Which I conjecture from hence, Firſt, becauſe the Grandfather of Sozomen is ſaid to have been converted (together with his whole Family) to the Chriſtian Religion upon account of Alaphion's wonderfull cure, whom Hilarion had healed, by calling on the name of the Omnipotent God. Further, this conjecture is confirmed by what Sozomon relates, to wit, that he, when very young, was familiarly converſant with the aged Monks that were of Alaphion's Family. And laſtly, in regard Sozomen took his name from thoſe perſons who were either the Sons or Grandchildren of Alaphion.

For

For he was called Salamanes Hermias Sozomenus (as Photius atteſts in his Bibliotheca) from the name of that Salamanes, who, as we obſerved before, was Phuſco's, Malchio's, and Criſpio's brother. Wherefore that miſtake of Nicephorus's, and others, muſt be amended, who ſuppoſe that Sozomen had the ſurname of Salaminius, becauſe he was born at Salamine a City of Cyprus. But we have before demonſtrated from Sozomen's own teſtimony, that he was not born in Cyprus, but in Paleſtine. For his Grandfather was not only a Paleſtinian, as is above ſaid, but Sozomen himſelf was alſo educated in Paleſtine, in the boſome (as I may ſay) of thoſe Monks that were of Alaphio's Family. From which education Sozomen ſeems to me to have imbibed that moſt ardent love of a monaſtick life and diſcipline, which he declares in many places of his Hiſtory. Hence 'tis, that in his Books he is not content to relate, who were the Fathers and Founders of Monaſtick Philoſophy; but he alſo carefully relates their Succeſſours and diſciples, who both in Egypt, Syria, and Paleſtine, and alſo in Pontus, Armenia, and Oſdroëna, followed this way of Life. Hence alſo it is, that in the Twelfth Chapter of the Firſt Book of his Hiſtory, he has propoſed to be read (in the beginning as it were) that gorgeous Elogue of Monaſtick Philoſophy. For he ſuppoſed, that he ſhould have been ungratefull, had he not after this manner at leaſt made a return of thanks to thoſe, in whoſe familiarity he had lived, and from whom, when he was a youth, he had received ſuch eminent examples of a good converſe. For that he himſelf intimates, in the Proeme to his Firſt Book. But it is collected that Sozomen was educated at Gaza, not onely from this place which I have mentioned, but alſo from Chap. 28. of his Seventh Book, where Sozomen ſays that he himſelf had ſeen Zeno Biſhop of Majuma. This Majuma is a Sea-Port belonging to the Gazites. Which Biſhop, although he was almoſt an hundred years old, yet was never abſent from the Morning and Evening Hymns, unleſs it hapned that he was detained by a diſeaſe. After this Sozomen applied himſelf to the profeſſion of the Law. He was a Student in the Civil Law at Berytus, a City of Phœnicia, not far diſtant from his own Country, where there was a famous Civil-Law-School. But he practiſed the Law at Conſtantinople, as himſelf atteſts in his Second Book and third Chapter: And yet he ſeems not to have been very much employed in pleading of Cauſes. For at the ſame time that he was an Advocate in Conſtantinople, he wrote his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory; which may be concluded from his own words. For thus he ſays (Book 2. Chap. 3.) οἷον δὲ Ἀκυλίνῳ ξυνήρξει, ἀνδρὶ εἰσετι νῦν ἡμῶν συνδιατρίβοντι, καὶ ἐν ταῖς αὐταῖς δικαστηρίοις δίκας ἀγορεύοντι τὰ μὲν παρ' αὐτοῦ ἀκούσας· τὰ δὲ καὶ θεασάμενος, ἀναγκαίως ἐρῶ· but what hapned to Aquilinus, a perſon at this time converſant with me, and one that Pleads Cauſes in the ſame Court of judicature, I will neceſſarily relate, partly as I heard it from him, and partly as I my ſelf ſaw it. Further, before he wrote his Nine Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, Sozomen compoſed a Breviary of Eccleſiaſtick affairs, from our Saviours aſcenſion to the depoſition of Licinius. Which work was comprized in two books, as himſelf atteſts in the Proeme to his Firſt Book. But thoſe two Books are loſt by length of time. In the compoſure of his Hiſtory, Sozomen has made uſe of a Stile neither too Low, nor too High, but between both: which Stile is moſt agreeable to a Writer of Eccleſiaſtick Affairs. Photius (in his Bibliotheca) prefers Sozomen's Stile before Socrates's. With whom we agree. But by how much Sozomen is ſuperiour for the Elegancy of his expreſſion, by ſo much Socrates exceeds upon account of his judiciouſneſs. For Socrates judges incomparably well, both of men, and alſo of Eccleſiaſtick buſineſs and affairs. There is nothing in him but what is grave and ſerious. Nothing that you can expunge as ſuperfluous. But on the contrary, ſome paſſages occur in Sozomen that are trivial and childiſh. Of this ſort is his digreſſion in his Firſt Book concerning the building of the City Hemona, and concerning the Argonauts, who carried the Ship Argo on their ſhoulders ſome furlongs. Alſo his deſcription of Daphne without the walls of the City Antioch, which occurs at Chap. 19. of his Sixth Book. And that obſervation of his concerning the beauty of the body, where he Treats of that Virgin, with whom the bleſſed Athanaſius abſconded a long while. Laſtly, his Ninth Book contains little elſe beſides warlike events, between which and an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory there is no agreement. Beſides, Sozomen's Stile, which Photius prefers before that of Socrates, wants not its faults. For I have obſerved, that the Periods are by Sozomen no otherwiſe joyned together, than by theſe particles δὲ and τέ; than which there is nothing more troubleſome. Should any one attentively read that Epiſtle wherein Sozomen Dedicates his Work to Theodoſius Junior, he will find that which I have ſaid to be certainly true, to wit, that Sozomen was no great Oratour.

It remains, that we inquire which of theſe * two Authours Wrote firſt, and which of them borrowed, or rather ſtole from the other. Certainly, in regard both of them Wrote almoſt the ſame things of the ſame Tranſactions, in as much as they both began at the ſame beginning, and concluded their Hiſtory at the ſame boundary, (both beginning from the Reign of Conſtantine, and ending at the Seventeenth Conſulate of Theodoſius Junior;) it muſt needs be true, that one of them robbed the others Desk. Which ſort of theft (as Porphyrius atteſts in Euſebius's Tenth Book of Evangelick Preparation) was committed by many of the Grecian Writers. But which was the Plagiary, Socrates or Sozemen, 'tis hard to ſay, in regard both of them Lived in the ſame times, and both Wrote their Hiſtory in the Empire of Theodoſius Junior. Therefore, in the diſquiſition of this queſtion, we muſt make uſe of conjecture. In ſuch a caſe as this Porphyrius in the before quoted book (when it was uncertain whether Hyperides ſtole from Demoſthenes, or Demoſthenes from Hyperides, becauſe both of them Lived at the ſame time,) openly declared that conjecture was to be made uſe of. Let us therefore ſee upon which of them falls the ſuſpicion of theft. Indeed this is my ſentiment, I do ſuppoſe that the inferiour does frequently ſteal from the Superiour, and the Junior from the Seniour. But Sozomen is in my judgment far inferiour to Socrates; and he betook himſelf to Writing his Hiſtory when he was younger then Socrates. For he Wrote it whilſt he was yet an Advocate, as I obſerved before. Now, the profeſſion of the Advocates amongſt the Romans was not perpetual, but temporary. Laſtly, He that adds ſomething to the other, and ſometimes amends the other, ſeems to have Written laſt. But Sozomen now and then adds ſome paſſages to Socrates, and in ſome places diſſents from him, as Photius has obſerved, and we have hinted in our Annotations. Sozomen therefore ſeems to have Written laſt. And this is the Opinion of almoſt all modern Writers; who place Socrates before Sozomen. So Bellarmine in his Book De Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis; who is followed by Miræus, Labbæus, and Voſſius: Amongſt the Ancients, Caſſiodorus, Photius and Nicephorus name Socrates in the firſt place. Although Caſſiodorus is found to have varied. For in his Preface to the Tripertite Hiſtory, in a clean contrary order he names Theodoret in the firſt place, Sozomen in the ſecond, and Socrates laſt. So alſo does Theodorus Lector recount them, in his Epiſtle which he prefixt before the Tripertite Hiſtory. Thus far concerning Sozomen.

THE

CHAP. I.

The Preface to the whole Book.

CONSTANT.

EUSEBIUS PAMPHILUS Having compil'd an Ecclesiastick History in Ten entire books, concluded it in the Reign of Constantine the Emperour: at which time also the [a] Persecution against the Christians ceased, [which had been begun] by Diocletian. The same Authour, in the books he wrote concerning the life of Constantine, has made but a [b] slight relation of the matters relating to Arius: for he was more carefull about the praises of the Emperour, and about a panagyrical sublimity in his expressions, as it is usually done in [the composition of] an Encomium, than about an accurate and exact account of what was done. But we, purposing to commit to writing the Ecclesiastick affaires from those times to these our own days, will begin our History [c] from those things which he has left untouch't: we shall not be over curious about the grandeur of our stile, but what things soever we have found upon Record, or have heard from such as were present at the transactions thereof, we will particularly relate. And because it is conducive to our designe, to declare after what manner Constantine was converted to the Christian Religion, according to our ability we will speak something of that matter. CONSTANT.

[a] In the Kings M.S. and Robert Stephens's Edit. it is [πόλεμος, the war:] but in the Florent. and Sfort. M. SS. we found it written [διωγμὸς, persecution.] Vales.

[b] Μετρίως here us'd does not (as usually) signifie singillatim, one by one, apart, but ἐν μέρει, partly: for Eusebius (in his books De vitâ Constantini) does indeed but partly touch the history of Arius; he prosecutes it not wholly, and particularly. Vales.

[c] Musculus renders these words [ἐξ ὧν ἐκεῖνος ἀπέλιπε] thus, we will begin our History where he left off: Christoph. does translate it almost after the same manner, but more barbarously, as to his Latine. We have rendred these words thus [ab iis rebus quas ille intactas reliquit, operis nostri sumemus exordium, i. e. we will begin our History from those matters which he has left untouch't] For Socrates's meaning is, that he will begin from the History of Arius, which Eusebius had but partly touch't upon, in his books concerning the life of Constantine: for Eusebius (says he) made it his business in those books, to enlarge upon the Emperours praises, rather than to give an exact account of the Ecclesiastick Affairs: but he himself, resolving to commit to writing the Affairs transacted in the Church, promises to give a more accurate relation of the Arian-Heresie, and to begin his History from those things which Eusebius had either purposely omitted, or but slightly touch't upon as not conducive to his design in hand. Indeed Socrates has not begun his History, where Eusebius left off. For Eusebius continues that work of his concerning Constantines Life to the death of Constantine. But Eusebius has continued the Series of his Ecclesiastick History down to the tumults raised by Arius, and to those affairs which preceded the Nicene-Council. If therefore we have a respect onely to Eusebius's Ten Books of his Ecclesiastick History, we may say that Socrates began where Eusebius ended. But if we also add his Books concerning the life of Constantine (as Socrates here does,) then that will not be true. Vales.

CHAP. II.

After what manner Constantine the Emperour was converted to the Christian Religion.

[a] WE will begin from those times, wherein Diocletian and Maximian sirnam'd Herculius, having by a mutual compact resign'd their Empire, embrac'd a private life: and Maximian sirnam'd Galerius, who had been Colleague in the Empire with them, came into Italy, and created two Cæsars, Maximin in the Eastern parts [of the Empire,] and Severus in Italy. [b] But in Brittaine Constantine was proclaimed Emperour, in the room of Constantius his Father, [c] who died in the first year of the two hundredth seventy first Olympiad, on the five and twentieth day of the month July. [Lastly] at Rome, Maxentius the Sun of Maximianus Herculius was by the Pretorian Souldiers advanced to be a Tyrant rather then an Emperour. Hereupon Herculius passionately desirous of reassuming his Imperiall Authority, endeavoured to destroy his Son Maxentius. But he was hindred from doing that by the Souldiers. Afterwards [d] he died at Tarsus a City of Cilicia.

[a] Vales. in his Latine translation begins this period not as Musculus and Christoph. do, and we have followed his judgment, as more agreeable with the continuation, and connexion of the sense.

[b] Socrates seems to have been of opinion, that Constantine and Maxentius began their Reign in the same year that Diocletian and Maximianus Herculius did Resign the Empire. This also was the opinion of the Authour of the Chronicle of Alexandria, and of others who attribute the years of Constantius's Reign to Constantine his Son. And hence it is that Constantine the Great is reported to have Reigned 32 years, when as really he Reigned but 30 years, and 10 months. Vales.

[c] Socrates does in the end of his Seventh Book (where he concludes his History) repeat this, in which place he says that he began his History in the first year of the 271 Olympiad, in which year Constantine the Great was proclaimed Emperour. This Olympiad does begin at the Solstice of the CCCV. year, being the year after the resignation of Diocletian. But Constantius died not this year, but in that following, when he was the sixth time Consul with Galerius Augustus, as we may read in Fastis Idatii. And therefore Constantius's death is to be reckoned on the second year of the aforesaid CCLXXI. Olympiad. Vales.

[d] Socrates is here in an error, for Maximianus Herculius, who was otherwise called Maximian the Elder, was by Constantin's command slain in Gallia, in the year of Christ 310. But Maximinus Cæsar, being two years after conquered by Licinius, died at Tarsus, as Aurelius Victor relates, and Eusebius in his Chronicle and other Authours. This is the common mistake of the Greek Historians; they make a confusion betwixt Maximianus and Maximinus, using them promiscuously. Vales.

CONSTANT. Severus Cæſar being ſent to Rome by [c] Galerius [c] Although in the Greek it be Galerius Maximinus; yet we muſt read Maximianus: the Greeks uſually confound theſe two names. In the beginning of this chapter (where the words are, Maximianus ſurnamed Galerius) the Sfort. M.S. has it written Maximinus. Valeſ.

Maximianus to take Maxentius, was betrayed by his own Souldiers and put to death. Laſt of all died Galerius Maximianus alſo, who was now [f] the ſupream perſon in the Empire, having before his death conſtituted Licinius Emperour; he was a Native of Dacia, and had for a long time been Galerius's fellow Souldier, and Confident. Maxentius in the mean while treated the Romans ſeverely, behaving himſelf like a Tyrant rather than an Emperour towards them: impudently debauching the wives of perſons gentilely extracted; killing many, and perpetrating ſuch like facts as theſe. Whereof when Conſtantine the Emperour had notice, he made it his buſineſs to deliver the Romans from that ſervitude he had preſſed them with; and immediately became ſollicitouſly inquiſitive how he might deſtroy the Tyrant: whilſt he was in this deep cogitation, he conſidered with himſelf what Deity he ſhould invoke to be his aſſiſtant and Tutelar God in this Expedition. It came into his mind that the ſtrict worſhip of the heathen Gods had not in the leaſt availed Diocletian; and he found that his Father Conſtantius having relinquiſhed the ſuperſtition of the Grecians, had led a more fortunate and proſperous life. Whilſt therefore he was [engaged] in this doubtfull deliberation, and upon the march with his Army ſome whither, there hapned to appear to him a wonderfull and unexpreſſible Viſion. For about noon, when the day began now to decline ſomewhat towards after noon, he ſaw in [the face of] the heavens a pillar of light, in figure like unto a Croſs, with this inſcription on it, By this be thou Conquerour. The Emperour ſtood amaz'd at this apparition. And, almoſt disbelieving his own eyes, he asked them that were preſent, whether they alſo ſaw the ſame ſight; which when they all had unanimouſly agreed in, [the mind of] the Emperour was corroborated by that Divine and wonderfull apparition. The night following Chriſt appeared to him in his ſleep, and ſaid unto him, make a ſtandard in figure like that which appeared [to thee] and make uſe of it, as an infallible and ready Trophy, againſt thine Enemies. In obedience to this [Heavenly] Oracle, he orders a Trophy to be made, in figure like a Croſs, which is kept in the Pallace to this day. After this he proceeded in the diſpatch of affairs with a greater vigour and alacrity of mind, and having engaged the Enemy before the very Gates of Rome, neer the Bridge called Milvius, he got the Victory; Maxentius being drown'd in the River. This was now the [g] ſeventh year of Conſtantin's Reign, when he got the Victory over Maxentius.

[f] This paſſage [πρῶτα Μαξιμιανὸς ὁ Γαλέριος, Maximianus Galerius, who was now the ſupream perſon in the Empire] muſt be underſtood favourably, for Galerius was not really chief and ſole Arbitratour of all things, whenas there were at the ſame time two other Auguſti, to wit, Conſtantine in the Gallia's, and Maxentius at Rome. But nevertheleſs he may be ſaid ſummam imperii adminiſtraſſe, becauſe he was the ſeniour Auguſtus, and was reſpected by the junior Auguſti, as a father. Valeſ.

[g] Conſtantine got this Victory over Maxentius in the year of Chriſt 312. when he and Licinius were in their ſecond Conſulate, this was the ſixth year of Conſtantin's Reign: for he begun his Reign on the 25th day of July, in the year of Chriſt 306. But if we ſay that Maxentius was conquered on the eighth of the Kalends of October in the year 312, (as Onufrius reckons in his Faſti, and Sigonius in his Second Book concerning the Weſtern Empire) then that which Socrates here affirms may be true; that Conſtantine ronted Maxentius in the ſeventh year of his Reign. But it ſeems ſomething odd to me, that Maxentius ſhould (in the Panagyrick of Nazarius) be ſaid to be ſlain in the end of his ſixth year, juſt the day before he began his ſeventh. Maxentius begau his Reign ſome days after Conſtantine, therefore if Maxentius died on the eighth of the Kalends of October, he muſt neceſſarily begin his Reign on the 7th. And by this computation Conſtantine came to the Empire two months before Maxentius. Which indeed does not ſeem probable to me. But Socrates does here accord with his own opinion. For whereas Conſtantine (according to him) began his Reign in the 305 year of Chriſt, he very well reckons this Victory in the ſeventh year of his Reign. Valeſ.

CONSTANT. After theſe [Atchievements] whilſt Licinius his Collegue (who was alſo his brother in law, by the marriage of his Siſter Conſtantia) reſided in the Eaſt, he alſo having received ſo many and ſuch great favours from God, offered thankſgivings to him his great benefactor; Which were of this ſort, he put a ſtop to the Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians; he recall'd thoſe that were in exile; he releaſed ſuch as were confined in Priſon, and reſtored their Eſtates to thoſe that had been proſcribed; he repaired the Churches, and all theſe things he did with great alacrity of mind. [h] About this time Diocletian, who had reſigned his Imperial power, died at Salona, a City of Dalmatia.

[h] Diocletian died at Salona the 3d of the nones of December, in the year of Chriſt 316. as Idatius does very well write in his Annals. The ſame alſo ſays the Authour of the Chronic. Alexand. but inſtead of Diocletian there is crept into the Text, Galerius Maximianus; 'tis alſo confirm'd by the authority of Zoſimus in the ſecond book of his Hiſtory, where he ſays that Diocletian died 3 years after the 3d Conſulſhip of Conſtantine and Licinius. For, having ſaid, that from the Conſulſhip of Chilon and Libo (in which the ſecular Games were celebrated) to the third Conſulſhip of Conſtantine and Licinius, it was above 110 years, he adds Διοκλητιανὸς μὲν τελευτᾷ τρισὶν ἐνιαυτοῖς ὕστερον (i.e.) three years after died Diocletian. But Joſeph Scaliger in his notes upon Euſebius, underſtood this paſſage of Zoſimus ſo, as if Zoſimus ſhould ſay that Diocletian died three years after the reſignation of his Empire, or after his ninth Conſulſhip. Valeſ.

CHAP. III.

How whilſt Conſtantine augmented [the proſperity of] the Chriſtians, Licinius his Collegue perſecuted them.

NOw Conſtantine the Emperour profeſſing himſelf a Chriſtian, did all things beſeeming his profeſſion; he erected the Churches and adorn'd them with moſt magnificent conſecrated gifts; Moreover, he ſhut up and demoliſhed the Temples of the Heathens, and † expoſed the images placed therein. But Licinius his Collegue, adhering to the Opinions of the Heathens, hated the Chriſtians: he forbore raiſing an open perſecution againſt them, becauſe he fear'd the Emperour Conſtantine: but in a clandeſtine manner he enſnared many of them: And at length proceeded to open violence againſt them. This Perſecution was locall: for it raged in thoſe parts only * where Licinius made his reſidence. But in regard Conſtantine was in no wiſe unacquainted with theſe, and other ſuch like his Tyrannous outrages, Licinius being ſenſible that he highly reſented theſe proceedings, betook himſelf to the making of his Apology before him; and having appeaſed him by his obſequiouſneſs, he hypocritically made an amicable league with him, binding himſelf by many oaths, that in future he would never attempt any thing that was Tyrannical. But at the ſame time that he ſwore, he was alſo perjured. For he deſiſted not from his Tyrannick [conſpiracies againſt Conſtantine] nor ceaſed he from perſecuting the Chriſtians. For by a Decree he prohibited the Biſhops from frequenting the houſes of Heathens, † Δημοσιευων τὰ ἐν αὐτοῖς ἀγάλματα, made common, or expoſed the Images placed therein; that is (as we ſuppoſe) he cauſed them to be deſecrated.

* Ἐνθα γὰρ ἦν Λικίνιος, ἐκεῖ μόνον ἐχώρει. the import whereof rendred word for word, is this, it hapned there only, where Licinius was: Valeſius renders the words thus, in iis enim duntaxat partibus graſſata eſt, quæ ſubditioni erant Licinii, it raged in thoſe parts only, which were under Licinius's juriſdiction.

CONSTANT. thens, that there might be no pretence of propagating the Christian Religion. This Persecution was at the same time open and secret. It was concealed and disguised in words; but in reality and deeds it was apparent. For those that lay under its pressures, endured most deplorable afflictions [and losses] in their bodies, and as to their Estates.

CHAP. IV.

That there was a War raised betwixt Constantine and Licinius upon account of the Christians.

THese proceedings rais'd the highest indignation in the Emperour Constantine [against Licinius:] and, the feigned league of friendship which was betwixt them being broken, they became enemies to each other. Not long after they entred into an actual War against one another: and having fought several set-battels both by Sea and Land, at length Licinius was vanquished at Chrysopolis of Bithynia, a Port-Town of the Chalcedonensians, and yielded himself. Constantine having taken him alive, treated him kindly: and would in no wise slay him, but commanded him to reside at Thessalonica peaceably and without making any disturbance. But having liv'd quietly a while, he afterwards gathered into a body some of the Barbarians, and attempted to recover his overthrow, and renew the War. Constantine being informed hereof, commanded that he should be put to death, and accordingly he was slain. Constantine having now the sole power and command over the whole [Roman Empire] and being proclaimed [a] Emperour and Augustus, endeavoured again to augment the affairs of the Christians: which he effected divers ways: and by his means Christianity enjoyed a profound and secure Peace. But an intestine War amongst the Christians themselves succeeded this so firm a Peace. What manner of War this was, and how it began, in the sequel according to my ability I will relate.

[a] In the Kings and Florentine M. SS. the particle [καὶ, and] is wanting; which Christoph. inserted. To me it seems not very necessary. If we do retain it, then [βασιλεὺς] must signifie [Augustus,] not King, as Christoph. renders it. Socrates alludes to the Souldiers acclamations, who after a signal Victory were wont to stile their Prince Emperour, and Augustus. The Citizens did the same, when the Victorious Prince made his entry into the City. Vales.

CHAP. V.*

Concerning Arius's Contest with Alexander the Bishop.

AFter Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, who suffer'd Martyrdom in the Reign of Diocletian, Achillas succeeded in that See. After Achillas [succeeded] Alexander, in the time of the forementioned Peace. He living in times that were more calm and secure, adorned and set his Church in order. Discoursing one day in the presence of his Presbyters, and the rest of his Clergy, too curiously concerning the [mystery of] the holy Trinity, he asserted this point of divinity, that there was an Unity in the Trinity. But Arius one of the presbyters placed under Alexander (a man of no mean skill in the faculty of reasoning, supposing that the Bishop design'd to introduce the opinion of * Sabellius the Libyan, desirous to be perverse and contentious, deflected to an opinion that was diametrically opposite to that of Sabellius, and as he thought, sharply and nimbly opposed the Bishop's assertions, arguing thus. If the Father begot the Son, he that was begotten hath a beginning of his existence. And from hence it is apparent, that there was a time, when the Son was not. Whence this is a necessary consequence; that he derives his existence from nothing. CONSTANT.

* See Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History book 7. chap. 6. note (b.)

CHAP. VI.

How from this contention there arose a division in the Church; and how Alexander Bishop of Alexandria deposed Arius and his Complices.

Arius having drawn this Conclusion from these new assertions, excited many to that question; and from this small spark was kindled a great fire. For the mischief having been begun in the Church of Alexandria overran all Ægypt, Libya and the upper Thebais; and at length consumed the rest of the Cities and provinces. Many there were that did patronize Arius's opinion, but more especially Eusebius was a maintainer of it, (not that Eusebius who was Bishop of Cæsarea, but another, who formerly had been Bishop of the Church of Berytus; but was then surreptitiously crept into the Bishoprick of Nicomedia in Bithynia.) Alexander hearing and seeing what was done, became highly enraged, and having convened a Council of many Bishops, he degraded Arius and those that embraced his Opinion; and wrote to the [Bishops] of every City, as followeth.

The Letter of Alexander [Bishop] of Alexandria.

To Our well Beloved and Dearest Fellow-Ministers of the Catholick Church in all places, Alexander [wisheth] health in the Lord. [a] Whereas there is one body of the Catholick Church, and 'tis commanded in the holy Scriptures that we keep the bond of Peace and Concord, it is requisite that we should Write, and inform one another of what things are done amongst us, to the end, that if one member suffer, or rejoyce, we may either joyntly rejoyce, or suffer together. In our Dioceſs therefore there are lately started up men that are impious and enemies of Christ, who teach such Apostacy, as any one may judge, and justly term the fore-runner of Antichrist. And this I would most gladly have buried in silence, that the mischief might have been consumed by being included amongst the Apostates only, least haply by its further progress into other places it should have infected the ears of the simple. But because Eusebius now Bishop of Nicomedia, supposing that the affairs of the Church are wholly at his dispose, (in regard, having deserted the Church of Berytus, he has sordidly coveted that of Nicomedia, and has not been prosecuted by any,) does Patronize even these Apostates, and has boldly attempted to write Letters up and down in commendation of them, that thereby he might seduce some ignorant persons into this worst and most displeasing Heresie to Christ: I thought it therefore necessary, being sensible of what is written in the Law, to be no longer silent, but to [a] Lucas Holstenius, a very learned person, heretofore wrote a dissertation upon this Epistle of Alexander's, which (together with some other pieces of his) he sent me a little before his death. In that Treatise he remarkes in the first place, that interpreters had not well rendred these words of Alexander [ἑνὸς σώματος ὄντος τῆς Καθολικῆς Ἐκκλησίας,] which they had translated thus [Cum unum sit Catholicæ corpus Ecclesiæ, whereas there is one body of the Catholick Church.] But he asserts, that the place should rather have been thus rendred [whereas the Catholick Church is one body, &c. or, consists of one body.] For that learned person is of opinion, that Alexander alludes to Saint Paul's Epistles, wherein the Church is frequently called Christ's body. But (by the favour of that great man and heretofore my dearest friend) this Version cannot be born with. For, if Alexander had thought, as Holstenius means, he would doubtless have expressed himself thus [ἑνὸς σώματος ὄντος τῆς Καθολικῆς Ἐκκλησίας.] which in regard he has not said, it is apparent, there can be no other sense of the words, than that expressed by Translatours. Besides, if Alexander would have said that the Church is the body of Christ, he would not have worded it thus [ἑνὸς σώματος, one body] but rather thus [σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, the body of Christ.] Vales.

CONSTANT. give you all notice, that you might know thoſe that are the Apoſtates, and likewiſe the deteſtable expreſſions of their hereſie, and that if Euſebius write to you, you ſhould give no heed to him. For he, at this time deſirous to renew his Priſtine Malevolence which ſeemed to have been ſilenced [and forgot] by length of time, pretends indeed to write Letters on their behalf, but in reality he declares, that he uſes his utmoſt diligence to do this upon his own account. Now theſe are the names of thoſe which are turn'd Apoſtates; Arius, Achillas, Aithales, Carpones, another Arius, Sarmates, Euzoïus, Lucius, Julianus, Menas, Helladius, and Gaius; Secundus alſo and Theonas, who were ſometimes ſtiled Biſhops. [b] And theſe are their Tenets which they have invented and do aſſert contrary to the authority of Scripture. God, they ſay, was not always a Father; but there was a time when God was not a Father. The word of God was not from everlaſting, but had his beginning from nothing. For God, who is, made him, who was not, of nothing. Therefore there was a time when he was not: for the Son is a Creature and a Work: neither is he like to the Father as to his Eſſence, nor is he by nature the genuine Word of the Father, nor his true Wiſdom. [c] But he is one of his Works, and one of his Creatures: and is only improperly ſtiled the Word and the Wiſedom: [d] for he himſelf exiſts by the proper Word of God, and by the Wiſedom that is in God, by which God made all things and him alſo. Wherefore he is by nature mutable and ſubject to change, as well as all other rational beings. So that the Word is different, diſagreeable, and ſeparate from the Eſſence of God; and the Father cannot be declared or ſet forth by the Son, and [e] is inviſible to him. For the Son does not perfectly and accurately know the Father, neither can he perfectly behold him: for the Son knows not his own Eſſence, what it is. For our ſakes he was made, that God might make uſe of him, as an inſtrument, in order to our Creation, nor had he ever exiſted, had it not pleas'd God to Create us. And when one asked them, if the Word of God could be changed, as the Devil was, they were not afraid to anſwer, yes certainly he may: for he is of a Nature ſubject to change, [f] in that he is begotten and created. We therefore with the Biſhops of Ægypt, and [g] Libya, neer a hundred in number, being met together, have * anathematized Arius, for theſe his Principles, and for his impudent aſſertion of them, together with all his adherents. But Euſebius has given them entertainment, endeavouring to mix falſhood with truth, and impiety with piety: but he ſhall not prevail: For truth getteth the victory: and light has no communion with darkneſs, nor hath Chriſt any agreement with Belial. For who ever heard the like? or what man if he ſhould now hear them would not be amazed thereat, and ſtop his ears, leaſt the filth of this Doctrine ſhould penetrate and infect them? What man is he, that when he hears theſe words of Saint John, In the beginning was the Word, will not condemn thoſe that affirm, there was a time when the Word was not? Or who is he that, when he hears theſe words of the Goſpel, The only begotten Son, and by him all things were made: will not abominate theſe men that ſay, the Son is one of the Creatures. [h] But how can he be one of thoſe things that were made by him? Or how can he be termed the Only begotten, who (according to their ſentiments of him) is reckon'd amongſt all the other creatures? How can he be made of nothing, whenas the Father himſelf ſaith, * My heart hath indited a good matter, and † Before the morning I have begotten thee in the womb? Or how can he be unlike the Father in Eſſence, whenas he is the ‡ perfect Image, and * the brightneſs of the Father, and whenas he himſelf teſtifieth, || He that hath ſeen me, hath ſeen the Father? Now if the Son be the Word and the Wiſedom of the Father, How can there be a time when he was not? For 'tis the ſame [abſurdity,] as if they ſhould ſay, there was a time when God was both without his Word and his Wiſedom. How can he be mutable and ſubject to change, who ſays concerning himſelf, * I am in the Father, and the Father in me, and † I and the Father are one? He [ſpake alſo] by the Prophet, || Behold me, for I am the Lord, and am not changed. And though ſome one may ſay, that this was ſpoken in reference to the Father, yet it will be more accommodate, to underſtand it now to be ſpoken in relation to the Word: becauſe although he became man, yet was he not changed: but, as the Apoſtle ſays, † Jeſus Chriſt the ſame yeſterday and to day, and for ever. But what motive could they have to ſay, that he was made for us, whenas Paul ſaith, * For him are all things, and by him are all things? *But concerning their Blaſphemy in affirming, that the Son doth not perfectly know the Father, it ought not to be wondred at. CONSTANT.

[b] In the Florence M. S. after theſe words [ὅτι ταῦτα, theſe are] follow theſe [πῶς φρονοῦσιν αἱρετικοὶ, the Tenets of the Arians,) which words ſhould rather be placed in the margin. In Gelaſius there occur likewiſe at this place theſe words, Ἄρειος αἵρεσις, Arius's Opinion. Valeſ.

[c] After theſe words [nor his true Wiſdom] there was a whole clauſe wanting, which from our three M. SS. the Florentine, Sforzian, and Allatian, and from Gelaſius Cyzicenus we have made good, thus, [ἀλλ' εἷς μὲν ἦν πνεύματος καὶ ἓν σοφίας. [But he is one of his Works, and one of his Creatures,] which words Epiph. Scholaſticus had found in his Copy, as it is apparent from his Verſion. For he has Tranſlated this whole place thus: Creatura eſt enim, & factura filius, neque ſimilis eſt patri ſecundum ſubſtantiam: neque verus eſt, neque vera ſapientia ejus eſt, neque verum naturaliter patris verbum eſt, ſed unus quidem creaturarum & facturarum eſt: For the Son is a Creature and a Work, neither is he like the Father as to his Eſſence: nor is he genuin, nor his true Wiſedom: nor is he by nature the true Word of the Father, but one of his Creatures and one of his Works. Hence it appears, that that Greek Copy of Socrates, which Epiph. Scholaſticus uſed, differed ſomething from our Manuſcripts. And yet Leo Allatius's Copy agrees exactly with that which Epiphanius followed. For thus it words this paſſage: ὅτε δὲ ἀληθινός ἐστιν, ὅτε ἀληθινὴ σοφία αὐτοῦ ἐστὶν· ὅτε ἀληθινὸς καὶ φύσει τοῦ πατρὸς υἱός ἐστιν· ἀλλ' εἷς μὲν ἦν πνεύματος καὶ ἓν σοφίας, ἐκτὸς δὲ λέγεται υἱός, καὶ, &c. So exactly do the Authours of the Greek and Latine Tripertite Hiſtory agree amongſt themſelves, that they ſeem to have borrowed from one another. Valeſ.

[d] In Leo Allatius's M. S. Copy, the reading of this place is thus, γνώσιμος καὶ αὐτὸς δὲ ὢν ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγῳ, καὶ ἐν τῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ σοφίᾳ. which reading Epiphan. Scholaſt. has followed; who tranſlates it thus; factus & ipſe & exiſtens in proprio Dei verbo, & in Dei ſapientia, be himſelf is made and exiſts in the proper Word of God, and in the Wiſedom of God. But we have rather followed the reading of the Kings, the Florentine, and the Sfortian M. SS. which is alſo confirmed by Gelaſius. Valeſ.

[e] In Leo Allatius's M.S. (which contains the Tripertite Hiſtory that Theodorus Lector compoſed in Greek out of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret) theſe words are added, καὶ ἀόρατός ἐστι, and is inviſible. So Epiph. Scholaſt. reads it, as appears from his verſion. Valeſ.

[f] Inſtead of γνωσὸς καὶ τρεπτὸς in the Greek, we with Gelaſius chuſe to read γνωπτὸς καὶ κτιστὸς, and accordingly Tranſlate it thus, begotten and created. This paſſage is thus Tranſlated by Epiph. Factus aiunt, & convertibilis eſt, they ſay that he is made, and is mutable. Valeſ.

[g] In Leo Allatius's M. S. the reading is καὶ λιβύην but in Gelaſius καὶ τὰς λιβύας which reading does pleaſe me. For there are two Libya's, we may alſo here take notice of this number (to wit) 100 Biſhops in Ægypt. The ſame number I remember I met with in Athanaſius's Second Apology, againſt the Arians: pag. 788. ἐπίσκοποι εἰσὶν ἐν αἰγύπτῳ καὶ λιβύῃ καὶ πενταπόλει, ἐγγὺς ἑκατὸν; there are in Ægypt, Libya, and Pentapolis, neer an hundred Biſhops. Valeſ.

[h] In Leo Allatius's M.S. and in Gelaſius Cyzicenus, this place is truer written, thus; πῶς γὰρ δύναται εἷς ἓν ἦν ἐξ οὗ ἐστὶ γνωσμάτων; which reading we have expreſſed in our Tranſlation. The reading in the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. is πῶς δὲ δύναται εἷς ἐστὶ τῶν ἓν ἦν ἐξ οὗ ἐστὶ γνωσμάτων, How can he be equal with thoſe things made by him. Valeſ.

But if it be impious to assert this, and if the Father knoweth the Son perfectly, it is perspicuous, that as the Father knoweth his own Word, so doth the Word know his own Father, whose Word he is. By asserting of these things, and explaining the sacred Scriptures we have frequently confuted them; but they, like* Chamæleons, have again been changed, pertinaciously contending to appropriate to themselves this that is written, † When the impious is arrived at the very extreams of wickedness, he despiseth. There have indeed been many Heresies before these persons, which by their too much audaciousness have fallen into imprudence and folly: But these men, who by all their discourses [i] attempt nothing less than the subversion of the Divinity of the Word, have to the utmost of their power made those [preceding] Heresies to be accounted just, in regard they approach neerer to Antichrist. Wherefore they are expelled out of the Church, and Anathematized. We are really troubled at the destruction of these men, and the rather because they were heretofore instructed in the Doctrine of the Church, but have now renounced it. Yet we do not look upon this as so strange a thing. For the same thing befell *2 Tim. 2. 17, 18. * Hymenæus and Philetus; and, before them, Judas, who though he had been our Saviour's Disciple, yet was afterwards his betrayer, and an Apostate. Neither have we continued unadvis'd of these very persons: for our Lord hath predicted, †Mat. 24. 4. Luk. 21. 8. † Take heed that no man deceive you: For many shall come in my name saying: I am [Christ,] and the time draweth neer, and they shall deceive many. Go ye not therefore after them. And Paul having learned these things from our Saviour, * 1 Tim. 4. 1. wrote thus, * That in the latter days, some shall depart from the sound faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, who detest the truth. Since therefore our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ hath himself commanded this, and also by his Apostle hath given us intimation concerning these men, we, being ear-witnesses of their impiety, have deservedly anathematized these men, as we said before, and openly declar'd them estranged from the Catholick Church and Faith. Moreover, we have signified thus much to your Piety, (beloved and dearest Fellow-Ministers) that if any of them should have the confidence to come to you, you might not entertain them, and that you should not be perswaded [to believe] Eusebius, or any one else that shall write to you concerning them. For it is our Duty, as we are Christians, to detest all those that speak or devise any thing against Christ, as the Enemies of God, and the corrupters of Souls, and * not to say to such men so much as God speed, lest we become partakers of their iniquities (as Saint John hath commanded us.) Salute the Brethren that are with you, they that are with us salute you.

† Prov. 18. 3. ὅταν ἔλθῃ ἀσεβὴς εἰς βάθος κακῶν, καταφρονεῖ· So the Septuagint words this Text; which words occur here in the original. But in our English Version of the Bible (which agrees with the Hebrew) this Text is thus rendred, when the wicked cometh, then cometh also contempt.

[i] The reading in Leo Allatius's M.S. and in Gelasius (which is thus, ἐπιχειρήσαντες τὰ εἰς ἀναίρεσιν, have attempted the subversion) pleases me better than this [ἐπιχειρήσαντες τῶς ἀναιρέσει.] Vales.

Alexander, having Written such Letters as this to all the Bishops in every City, the mischief grew worse; those to whom the Contents thereof were communicated, being hereby inflamed with a pertinacious contention. Some were of the same Opinion with, and subscrib'd to the Contents of these Letters; but others did the contrary. But Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia was in the highest degree incited to dissent, because Alexander had in his Letters made a reproachfull mention of him in particular. At that time Eusebius was a man of great interest, because the Emperour did then keep his Court at Nicomedia: for Diocletian had not long before built a Pallace there. For this reason therefore many Bishops were very obsequious to Eusebius. And he himself wrote frequently, sometimes to Alexander, [advising him] to suppress [k] the controversie raised [amongst them] and to readmit Arius and his Adherents into the Church: at other times [he wrote] to the Bishops of every particular City, [perswading them] that they should not consent to Alexander. Hence it came to pass that all places were filled with tumult and disturbances. For now a man might have seen not only the Prelates of the Churches in words contending with one another, but the populace also divided, some inclining to one party, some to another. And this matter grew to that height of indignity and insolency, that the Christian Religion became a Ridicule even in the publick Theaters. Those that were at Alexandria did * pertinaciously contend about the chiefest points of the Faith: they also sent Embassies to the Bishops of every particular Province. Likewise, those that were of the other party, were authours of the like stirs and discords. [l] There were mixed amongst the Arians the Melitians, who not long before had been separated from [the communion] of the Church. Now who these Melitians are, we must relate: one Melitius a Bishop of one of the Cities in Egypt, had been deposed by Peter Bishop of Alexandria (who suffered Martyrdom under Diocletian,) for several other reasons, but most especially for this, that in the time of Persecution he had denied the Faith and sacrific'd. This person being divested [of his Bishoprick,] and having got a great many followers, constituted himself the Ringleader of their Heresie, who in Ægypt are to this day from him called Melitians. Moreover, having no reasonable excuse at all for his separation from the Church, he barely said thus much, that he was injured, he did likewise revile and speak reproachfully of Peter. Peter having suffered Martyrdom in the Persecution, ended his life. But [Melitius] withdraws his reproaches [from Peter] and casts them first upon Achillas, Peter's successour, and afterwards upon Alexander who succeeded Achillas. During their being engaged in this dissention, Arius's controversie was started; and Melitius and his Complices became favourers of Arius, joyning with him in a conspiracy against the Bishop. Now those who lookt upon Arius's Opinion as absurd, approved of Alexander's condemnation of Arius, and thought the sentence pass'd against all that favour'd that Heresie was just and equitable. But Eusebius of Nicomedia, and as many as embraced

If the Melitians had joyn'd themselves with the Arians before the Council of Nice, the Fathers of that Council undoubtedly had not treated them so kindly as they did. Vales.

Letters from both the diſagreeing parties having been after this manner ſent to the Biſhop of Alexandria, there was a Collection made of theſe Epiſtles: Arius Collected thoſe which were written in his own defence, and Alexander thoſe that made againſt him. Hence thoſe Sects, (which do abound ſo numerouſly in theſe our days,) that is, the Arians, Eunomians, and thoſe that derive their denomination from Macedonius, took an occaſion of defending their own Tenets. For each of them quote the Epiſtles of their own party as a ſufficient evidence.

How Conſtantine the Emperour, griev'd at theſe diſturbances in the Church, ſent Hoſius a Spaniard to Alexandria, to exhort the Biſhop and Arius to a reconciliation.

WHen the Emperour had notice of theſe things, he was greatly perplexed in mind, and looking upon this as his own calamitous concern, without delay he made it his buſineſs to extinguiſh the miſchief newly hatch't, directing his Letters to Alexander and Arius by a perſon of known fidelity, nam'd Hoſius, who was Biſhop of Corduba a City in Spain; which man the Emperour had a great love and eſteem for. VICTOR CONSTANTINUS MAXIMUS AUGUSTUS, to ALEXANDER and ARIUS.

We underſtand that this was the ground of the preſent controverſie. For when You, Alexander, enquired of your Presbyters, what every particular man's [b] Opinion was concerning a certain Text of Scripture, or rather concerning a part of a fruitleſs controverſie: and whereas you Arius, inconſiderately vented ſuch ſentiments as you ought either not to have conceiv'd at firſt, or if you had had ſuch conceptions, it had been your duty, to have let them been buried in ſilence: upon this a diſſention has been raiſed between you, communion is refuſed: and the moſt Religious populace rent into two factions, is ſeparated from the harmonious unity of the whole body. Wherefore let both of you, mutually pardoning each other, quietly accept of what your fellow-ſervant doth reaſonably adviſe you to. But what is that? it was your duty neither to have asked ſuch queſtions at firſt, nor if propoſed, to have made any return thereto. For ſuch queſtions, as no law does neceſſarily limit or preſcribe, but are propoſed by the contentiouſneſs of an unprofitable vacancy from buſineſs (although they may be framed to exerciſe and imploy our natural parts about, yet) we ought to confine within our own breaſts, and not inconſiderately divulge them in publick aſſemblies, nor imadviſedly commit them to the ears of the vulgar. For what perſon amongſt a thouſand is ſufficiently qual fi'd either accurately to comprehend the full efficacy and nature of things ſo ſublime and profound, or to explicate them according to their worth and dignity? Or ſhould any man look upon this to be an eaſie performance, how ſmall a part of the Vulgar will he induce to be fully perſwaded hereof? Or what man can without danger of falling into groſs errours inſiſt upon the accurate diſcuſſions of ſuch nice controverſies? In queſtions therefore of this nature loquacity muſt be bridled and reſtrained; leaſt either through the frailty of our nature (we being not able to explicate what we propoſed,) or through the ſlowneſs of our Auditors underſtanding what they are taught (being unable accuratly to apprehend our diſcourſe,) leaſt [we ſay] from one of theſe cauſes the people be reduced to a neceſſity of Blaſphemy or Schiſme. Wherefore let an unwary queſtion, and an inconſiderate anſwer with both of you mutually pardon each other. For this conteſt is not kindled upon an occaſion of any principal or chief commandment of our law: neither have you introduc'd any new Hereſie concerning the worſhip of God. But you both hold one and the ſame Opinion; ſo that [you may eaſily cloſe in a] conſent of communion with each other. For whilſt you thus pertinaciouſly contend about trifles and things of no importance, [c] *'tis not convenient that ſo numerous a people of God ſhould be under your care and government, becauſe of your diſſention with one another: nor is it only misbecoming, but 'tis alſo judged to be altogether unlawfull. Now that I may advertiſe your prudence by a ſmaller inſtance, I will tell you: you know even the Philoſophers themſelves, how that they are all united in [the profeſſion of] one Sect, whenas notwithſtanding they frequently diſagree in ſome part of their aſſertions; but although they do ſometimes jarre * in the very perfection of knowledge, yet becauſe of the agreement and union of their Sect, they do again cloſe in a mutual conſent. Now if it be ſo [amongſt them,] it will certainly be much more reaſonable that you, who are the Miniſters of the moſt high God, ſhould in like manner be unanimous in the profeſſion of the ſame Religion. But let us now with more accuracy and greater attention inſpect and deliberate upon what has been ſaid: whether it be juſt and equitable, that becauſe of the trivial, vain, and pertinacious conteſts between you about words, brethren ſhould be ſet in array [as it were] againſt brethren; and that that venerable aſſembly ſhould upon your account, who contend with one another about things ſo ſlight and in no wiſe neceſſary, be rent aſunder by an impious variance. Theſe [conteſts] are poor and mean, and do become a childiſh ignorance, rather than agree with [the gravity] of Presbyters, and prudent men. Let us of our own accord depart from the tentations of the Devil. Our great God, the Saviour of all men, hath reached forth a light common to all men. By the aſſiſtance of whoſe providence, give*

CONSTANT.

CONSTANT. *us leave, who are his servant that we may successfully finish this our endeavour, that by our exhortation, diligence and earnest admonitions, we may reduce you to an unity of assembly. For in regard, as we have already said, you hold the same faith, and have the same sentiments of our Religion; and since the commandment of the law doth in all its parts inclose all in general in one consent and purpose of mind: Let not this thing, which has raised a mutual division between you, (in as much as it appertaineth not to the power and efficacy of Religion in general) by any means make a separation and a faction amongst you. These things we speak, not to necessitate you to be all of one Opinion concerning this foolish idle controversie, of what sort soever it be. For the pretious value of the assembly may be preserved entire amongst you, and one and the same Communion may be retained, although there be interchangeably amongst you a great diversity of sentiments in things of the smallest import. For we do not all * mean the same in all things, neither is there one disposition or opinion in all of us. Therefore, concerning the Divine Providence, let there be amongst you one faith, one meaning, and one covenant of the Deity. But as for these slender and light questions, which with so much niceness you dispute of and make researches into amongst your selves, although therein you do not all agree in the same opinion, yet 'tis your duty, to confine them to your own thoughts, and keep them within the secret repositories of your own minds. Let therefore an unutterable and excellent common friendship, a belief of the truth, the honour of God, and a Religious observance of his Law, remain amongst you firm and immoveable; return ye to a mutual friendship and charity: restore to the whole body of the people their usual embraces. And be you your selves (having as it were purifi'd your own souls,) acquainted again [and renew your familiarity] with one another. For friendship is frequently more sweet and pleasing, after the* [d] occasion of the enmity is laid aside, return to a reconciliation again. Restore therefore to us peaceable and serene days, and nights void of sollicitude, that during the residue of our Life we may have the pleasure of the pure light, and the joy of a quiet life reserved for us. Which if [we shall not obtain] we must necessarily groan, and be wholly surrounded with tears: nor shall we finish the residue of our Life without great disquietude. For whilst the people of God, (we mean our fellow servants,) are rent asunder by this pernitious and indiscreet dissention which they are now involved in, how is it possible for us in future to continue in a sedate temper of mind? And that you may be sensible of our excessive sorrow for this thing, be attentive [to what we shall tell you.] When we lately came to the City of Nicomedia, we had resolv'd forthwith to have made a journey into the East. But while we were hastning towards you, and had performed above half our journey, the news of this affair quite altered our resolution: least we should be necessitated to be a spectator of these things, which we could not endure even to hear. Do you therefore by your unanimity for the time to come, open the way for us into the East, which by your mutual discord you have stopped up. Give us leave with joy speedily to see you, and all the rest of the people, and that with an unanimous consent of praises we may offer up to God due thanks for the publick agreement and liberty. CONSTANT.

* Βελόμεθα, will, wish, or desire.

[d] In my Annotations at the second book of Eusebius's Life of Constantine, instead of [ὐπὸ τὸν τῆς ἔχθρας ἀποθέσιν, after the occasion of the enmity is laid aside] I have noted that the reading should be [τῆς ἔχθρας ἀποθέσιν, after the removing of the enmity;] as it is in some Copies. But, in as much as our M. SS. to wit, the Florent. Sfortian, and Allatian change not the reading here, we may bear with the common reading; which is also confirmed by Epiph. Scholasticus's Version: for thus he translates this passage; suaviores crebrò sunt amicitiæ post inimicitiarum causas ad concordiam restitutæ. Valef.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the Council held at Nicæa a City of Bithynia, and concerning the Faith there published.

SUch admirable and prudent advice did the Emperours Letter give them. But the mischievous difference was grown so strong and potent, that neither the Emperours industry, nor the authority of the Person who brought the Letters was able to do any good. For neither Alexander nor Arius were in the least mollifi'd by the Letter: amongst the populace also there was an irreconcileable discord, and a great disturbance. Moreover, before this broke out, there was another distemper in that place, which had caus'd disturbance in the Church, (to wit) a disagreement concerning the Feast of Easter; but this was only in the Eastern parts: where some made it their business to celebrate that Festival after the Jewish manner, others [in their solemnization thereof] imitated the rest of the Christians throughout the whole world. But though they differ'd thus concerning the Feast, yet they did not refrain from a mutual Communion. However, they clouded the joy of the Feast by this their dissention. The Emperour therefore seeing the Church disturbed by these two evils, convened a General Council, by his Letters requesting the Bishops from all parts to meet together at Nice a City of Bithynia. Accordingly the Bishops out of divers Provinces and Cities assembled; concerning whom Eusebius Pamphilus, in his third book of Constantin's Life, writeth thus word for word. The most eminent therefore amongst Gods Ministers of all those Churches which filled all Europe, Libya and Asia, were conven'd. And one sacred Oratory, enlarged as it were by God himself, included at the same time within its walls both Syrians and Cilicians, Phœnicians and Arabians, Palestinians, and Ægyptians also, Thebæans, Libyans, and those that came out of Mesopotamia. There was also at this Synod a Persian Bishop, neither was the Scythian absent from this Quire. * Pontus also, and Galatia, Pamphilia and Cappadocia, Asia, and Phrygia afforded their most select Divines. Moreover, there appeared here Thracians, and Macedonians, Achaians and Epirots, and such as dwelt far beyond these were nevertheless present. [Hosius also] that most fam'd Spaniard, (together with many of his Countreymen) was one that sate in this Council. The † Prelate of the Imperial City was supposed that by these words the Bishop of Constantinople was meant. With whom agrees Nicetas, (in Thesauro Arthodoxæ fidei. book 5. chap. 6.) and Epiphanius Scholasticus in book 2. Histor. Tripart. Musculus (as 'tis apparent from his rendition of these words) thought the Bishop of Rome was hereby meant: for he renders this place thus, Romanæ autem civitatis Episcopus propter senium decrat, i. e. The Bishop of Rome by reason of his age, was absent. Valesius is of the same opinion with Musculus. For (in his Annotations on Chap. 7. of the third Book of Eusebius's Life of Constantine) he says, that at such time as this Council was convened, Constantinople was not adorned with the name of The Imperial City. See Sozomen, book 1. chap. 16. and Theodoret, book 1. chap. 7.

* These words of Eusebius occur at the third Book of his Life of Constantine, Chap. 7. Socrates has not quoted them word for word as they are there: we (following herein Valesius, Musculus, and Grynæus) have rendred them as they are in the forecited place of Eusebius.

CONSTANT. abſent by reaſon of his age. But his Presbyters were there, and ſupplied his place. The Emperour Conſtantine was the only perſon of all the Princes ſince the foundation of the world, who (after he had platted ſuch a Crown as this by the Bond of Peace) dedicated it to Chriſt his Saviour as a divine preſent and acknowledgment for the Victories he had obtained over his Enemies and Adverſaries, having conſtituted this Synod convened in our days to be a lively repreſentation of * See Acts 2. 5. that Apoſtolick Quire. For it is * Written that in the Apoſtles days there were gathered together devout men out of every nation under heaven, amongſt whom were Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, and the inhabitants of Meſopotamia, Judæa and Cappadocia, of Pontus and of Aſia, of Phrygia and Pamphilia; of Ægypt, and of the parts of Libya adjacent to Cyrene: ſtrangers alſo of Rome, Jews and Proſelytes, Cretians and Arabians. This was the only thing wanting, that Meeting [in the Apoſtles times] did not conſiſt of the Miniſters of God only. But in this preſent aſſembly the number of the Biſhops exceeded [a] three hundred. And the Presbyters that accompanied them, the Deacons, * Acoluthi, and the many other * Ἀκολούθων, Followers, or Attendants. perſons were almoſt innumerable. Of theſe Miniſters of God, ſome were eminent for their Wiſdom and Eloquence; others for their ſober and diſcreet Lives, others for their patient ſufferance [of hardſhips,] and others were adorned with [b] modeſty and a courteous behaviour. Some of them were highly reſpected by reaſon of their great age, and others were eminent for their youthfull vigour both of body and mind. Some were newly initiated into the Order of the Miniſtry. To all theſe the Emperour commanded a plentifull proviſion of food to be daily allowed. † Thus much ſaies Euſebius concerning thoſe there Aſſembled.

[a] The Ancients are not agreed concerning the number of Biſhops that were at the Nicene Council. Euſebius (in his third book, chap. 8. concerning the life of Conſtantine) ſays they were Two hundred and fifty. Euſtathius Biſhop of Antioch (in his Homily on thoſe words of Solomon, The Lord created me, &c.) affirms they were about 270; but ſays he had not caſt up their number exactly. The more conſtant account (which is confirmed by the conſent of all modern Authours) is, that there ſate in that Synod 318 Biſhops, which is confirmed by theſe Ancients. viz. Athanaſius, in his Epiſtle to the African Biſhops, neer the beginning; Hilarius, in his book againſt Conſtantius; Jerome, in his Chronicon; and Rufinus. See Valeſius's notes on Chap. 8. of Book 3. of Euſebius, de Vitâ Conſtant.

[b] Τῷ μέσῳ τρόπῳ καλεκομιδίλο. Many ſenſes may be given of theſe words. For firſt [μέσῳ τρόπῳ] may be taken for [modeſty and a curteous behaviour;] ſuppoſing [μέσῳ] to be put for [μετρίῳ:] this ſenſe we have followed in our Verſion. Secondly, [μέσῳ τρόπῳ] may be meant concerning them, who were not the eminenteſt perſons amongſt the Biſhops for Learning or Piety of Life; but did not come much behind them. So the Ancients called thoſe medios principes ac duces, middle Princes or Captains, who were neither the beſt, nor the worſt, but between both. Laſtly, this phraſe may be uſed concerning them, who deſerved to be praiſed on both accounts, to wit, for their learning and ſanctity: and thus Sozomen interprets this place of Euſebius, as may be ſeen from his words in his firſt book chap. 16. See Valeſius's notes on chap. 9. of the third book of Euſebius, de Vitâ Conſtant.

† In the Allat. M. S there are ſome words added here; in which Copy the reading is [ὡσεὶ περὶ σωφελδύλων ὁ Παμφίλε διεξῆλθεν Εὐσέβιος, concerning thoſe there aſſembled Euſebius Pamphilus has thus at large diſcourſed;] which reading has a greater Emphaſis. Valeſ.

When the Emperour had ended his triumphal ſolemnities for his Victory over Licinius, he himſelf came alſo to Nice. The moſt eminent amongſt the Biſhops were theſe two, Paphnutius Biſhop of the upper Thebais, and Spyridion Biſhop of Cyprus: but for what reaſon we have made mention of theſe two particularly, ſhall in the ſequel be declared. There were alſo preſent a great many Laicks, well skilled in Logick, ready to aſſiſt each their own party. Now the Patrons of Arius's Opinion were theſe. Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, (whom we mentioned before,) Theognis, and Maris: the firſt was Biſhop of Nice, CONSTANT. and Maris was Biſhop of Chalcedon in Bithynia. Againſt theſe Athanaſius (who was then but a Deacon of the Church of Alexandria) contended vigorouſly. But Alexander the Biſhop had an high eſteem for him: upon which account he became the ſubject of envy, as we ſhall declare in the ſequel. A little before the convention of the Biſhops in one place, the Logicians exerciſed themſelves by engaging in ſome skirmiſhing diſputes with ſeveral perſons: and when many had been enticed to take a delight in diſputing, a Laick, one that was a Confeſſour, an honeſt well meaning man, oppos'd theſe Diſputants, and told them thus: that neither Chriſt nor his Apoſtles taught us the art of diſputing, nor vain ſubtileneſs, or fallacies, but a plain [c] Opinion which is to be guarded by faith and good works. All that ſtood by, hearing him ſpeak theſe words, admired him, and approved of what he ſaid: and the Logicians themſelves, having heard this plain and honeſt declaration of the truth, did in future more patiently acquieſce: and thus was that tumult, which had been raiſed by diſputing, compoſed. The next day after this all the Biſhops were conven'd in one place; after whom came the Emperour. Who when he came in, ſtood in the midſt of them, and would not take his ſeat till ſuch time as the Biſhops had by bowing of their heads ſignified to him, that it was their deſire he ſhould ſit down: ſo great a reſpect and reverence had the Emperour for thoſe men. After ſuch a ſilence was made, as was agreeable to the occaſion, the Emperour from his Chair of State began to ſpeak to them in kind perſwaſive words, exhorting them to unanimity and concord. He alſo advis'd them to paſs by all private animoſities. For many of them had brought in accuſations againſt one another: and ſome of them the day before had preſented petitionary Libells to the Emperour. But he, adviſing them to proceed to the buſineſs before them for which they were conven'd, gave command that the Libells ſhould be burnt, adding only this [maxim;] Chriſt commands him, who deſires to obtain forgiveneſs, to forgive his brother. Therefore, after he had at large diſcourſed upon Concord and Peace, he referred it to their power and arbitrement with a greater accuracy to make a further inſpection into the points of our Religion. It will be very opportune to hear Euſebius's relation of theſe affairs, in his third book of Conſtantin's Life. His words there are theſe: * Many Queſtions being propoſed by both parties, and a great controverſie raiſed even at the firſt beginning [of their debate,] the Emperour heard them all very patiently, and with an intent mind deliberately received their propoſitions; by turns he aſſiſted the aſſertions of both parties, and by degrees reduced them, who pertinaciouſly oppoſed each other, to a more ſedate temper of mind; by his gratious ſpeeches to every perſon, which he ſpoke in the Greek tongue, (for he was not unskilled in that Language) he rendred himſelf moſt pleaſant, acceptable, and delightfull; inducing ſome to be of his Opinion

[c] I prefer the reading in the Allat. M. S, in which, inſtead of [γυμνὴν γνώμην, a plain Opinion] it is [γυμνὴν γνῶσιν, &c. plain knowledge, &c.) Epiph. Scholaſticus followed this latter reading, as appears from his Verſion of this place. Socrates ſeems to have had this narration out of Rufinus's tenth book, where he treats concerning the Nicene Council. But Socrates on ſet purpoſe altered ſome things. Gelaſius, treating on this Subject, enlarges upon it, relating the queſtions of each of the Philoſophers, and the Biſhops anſwers thereto. All which paſſages of his look more like fables, than an Hiſtory of what was done. Valeſ.

CONSTANT. Opinion by the force of his Arguments; wooing others by intreaties; praising those who spoke well, and exciting all to an accommodation; at length he reduc'd them all to an unanimity and conformity in Opinion concerning all points that were in debate. So that there was not only an universal agreement about [the Articles] of Faith, but also a set time generally acknowledg'd for the celebration of the Salutary Feast [of Easter.] Moreover, the Decrees ratified by a common consent were engrossed and confirm'd by the subscription of every person. These are Eusebius's own words concerning these things, which he has left us in his Writings: we thought it not unseasonable to make use of them; and have inserted them into our History, relying upon the testimony of what has been said by him: that in case any should condemn this Council of Nice as erroneous in the [matters of] Faith, we might take no notice of them, nor credit [d] Sabinus the Macedonian, who terms all those that were convened in this Council, idiots and simple persons. For Sabinus (Bishop of those Macedonians which dwell at Heraclea a City of Thrace) who made a Collection of the Canons which several Synods of Bishops published, reviles the Bishops of the Council of Nice as being Idiots, and Ignorant fellows, being insensible that he does also at the same time accuse Eusebius himself as an Idiot, who after a most exquisite search into it made a confession of that Faith. Some things he hath designedly omitted: othersome he has depraved and changed: but he has interpreted all passages according to his own sense and design. He does indeed commend Eusebius Pamphilus as a witness worthy to be credited: he does also praise the Emperour for his judgment and skill in the Principles of Christianity, but he complains of the Creed published at the Council of Nice, as being set forth by Idiots and men that understood nothing. And that same mans words, whom he calls a wise and faithfull witness, he voluntarily contemns. For Eusebius testifieth, that of those Ministers of God that were present at the Council of Nice, some were eminent for their prudent Eloquence; others for their gravity and solidness of life; and that the Emperour being present reduced them all to an agreement, and made them to be of the same mind and opinion. But of Sabinus (whersoever necessity requires) we shall hereafter make mention. Now the agreement in [the Articles of] our Faith [e] published with loud acclamations, by the great Council of Nice, was this.

[d] This Sabinus was Bishop of the Macedonians in Heraclea a City of Thrace; he made a Collection of the Synodical Acts; a very usefull work; the testimony whereof Socrates does frequently make use of in this his History. But Socrates reproves him in many places; both because he was unfaithfull in his Collection of those Acts, (studiously relating what conduced to the strengthening of his own Heresie, and omitting the contrary,) and also in regard he always shews himself incensed against the Orthodox Bishops. An instance whereof is this relation of Socrates's here, where he says that Sabinus termed the Fathers of the Nicene-Council ignorant and simple fellows. But 'tis usual for Hereticks to calumniate the holy Fathers and Doctors of the Church. Vales.

[e] In the Allat. M.S. the reading here is [ἡ δὲ ἐν νικαίᾳ πίστις τῆς μεγάλης συνόδου καὶ ὑπὸ Εὐσεβίου μεγαλοφώνως ἐπαινεθεῖσα συμφωνία, &c. now the agreement in the faith with loud acclamations approved of by the great Synod at Nice, and by Eusebius, &c.] Epiphan. Scholast. followed the same reading. Vales.

[f] This following Creed is wanting in all our M.SS. viz. the Kings Sforzian; and Florent: but Christophorson did very well in placing it here; for 'tis plain both from Epiphanius Scholast. as also by those following words, [πιστεύομεν εἰς ἕνα θεὸν πατέρα παντοκράτορα, &c. we believe in one God the Father Almighty, &c.] That it was placed here by the Historian himself. But all the M. SS. did omit it in this place because 'tis repeated a little after in Eusebius Pamphilus's Epistle. Vales.

[f] We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible: and in one Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, begotten of the Father, the only begotten, that is of the substance of the Father: God of God and Light of Light, very God of very God: begotten not made; of the same substance with the Father: by whom all things were made, that are in heaven and in earth: who for the sake of us men, and for our salvation descended, and was incarnate, and was made man, and he suffered and arose again the third day, ascended into the Heavens, he shall come to Judge the quick and the dead: [We also believe] in the Holy Ghost. But the holy Catholick and Apostolick Church doth anathematize those that aver, that there was a time when the Son of God was not, and that he was not before he was begotten, and that he was made of nothing, Or that say he was made of another substance or essence, or that he is either created, or convertible, or mutable.

This Creed three hundred and eighteen Bishops approved of and embraced: and (as Eusebius testifies) being unanimous in their suffrages and sentiments, they subscribed it. There were only [g] five that refused to allow of it, who misliked the word * Homoüsios: these were Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia, Theognis Bishop of Nice, Maris of Chalcedon, Theonas of Marmarica, and Secundus of Ptolemais. For in regard they asserted, that that is * Consubstantial which is from another either by Partition, or by Derivation, or by Eruption: by Eruption, as the Branch from the Root: by Derivation, as Children from their Parents: by Partition, as two or three pieces of Gold from the whole Mass: but that the Son of God is [from the Father] by none of these three ways. Therefore they said, they could not give their assent to this [draught of] the Creed. Therefore after a tedious cavil about the term * Homoöusios, they deny'd to subscribe the degradation of Arius. Upon which account the Synod anathematized Arius and all those that were of his opinion, adding this besides, that he should be prohibited from entring into Alexandria. The Emperour also did by his Edict banish Arius, Eusebius, and Theognis. Eusebius and Theognis soon after their banishment exhibited their penetentiary Libells, and assented to the belief of Homoöusios, as we shall declare in the procedure of our History. At the same time Eusebius sirnam'd Pamphilus, Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine (having made some small Hesitancy in the Synod, and considered with himself whether he might securely admit of this form of Faith,) at length together with all the rest gave his assent, and subscrib'd: he also sent a Copy of the form of Faith to the people within his Dioceſs, and explain'd to them the term Homoöusios, lest any one should have an ill opinion of him, because of his Hesitancy: Thus therefore he wrote word for word. It is very probable (beloved) that you may have heard what hath been done concerning the Ecclesiastick Faith in the great Council convened at Nice, in regard report doth usually outrun an accurate Narrative of the matters Transacted. But [fearing] lest by such a bare report the matter might be represented to you otherwise then really it is, we thought it requisite to send to you; first that form of Faith which we our selves proposed [to the Council,] and likewise that other published [by

CONSTANT.

[g] There were only two Bishops Secundus and Theonas which refus'd to subscribe to the Nicene Creed, as Theodoret does very well testifie in the first book of his Ecclesiastick History, and (before him) Hieronymus in his Dialogue against the Luciferiani. The Synodical Epistle also of the Council of Nice, which is here related by Socrates does plainly confirm this. Vales.

CONSTANT. [by the Biſhops] who made ſome additions to ours. That form of Faith drawn up by us, (which was read in the preſence of our moſt pious Emperour, and appeared to all to be ſound and Orthodox,) runn's thus. As we have receiv'd by tradition from our Predeceſſours the Biſhops, then when we were inſtructed in the firſt principles of the Faith, and received Baptiſm; as we have learnt from the divine Scriptures, and as (during our continuance in the Presbyterſhip, and alſo ſince we have been intruſted with a Biſhoprick) we have believed and taught, ſo we alſo now believe, and do make a publick declaration to you of our Faith: which is this.

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of all things viſible and inviſible; and in one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Word of God, God of God, Light of Light, Life of Life, the only begotten Son, the firſt born of every creature, begotten of God the Father before all worlds; by whom alſo all things were made: who for our ſalvation was incarnate, and converſed amongſt men: who ſuffer'd, and roſe again the third day, he aſcended unto the Father, and ſhall come again in Glory to Judge the quick and the dead. We alſo believe in one Holy Ghoſt: We believe that each of theſe [Perſons] is, and doth ſubſiſt: that the Father is truely the Father, the Son really the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt really the Holy Ghoſt: as our Lord alſo, when he
* Matt. 28. 19. ſent his Diſciples out to Preach, ſaid. * Go ye, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. Concerning which [Articles] we do aver, that we thus maintain and hold them, that theſe are our ſentiments of them, that this was our Opinion formerly, that this Opinion we will till death retain, that we will perſevere in this belief, and anathematize every impious Hereſie. We call God Almighty, and Jeſus Chriſt our Lord to witneſs, that theſe were ſincerely and heartily our ſentiments, ever ſince we were capable of knowing our ſelves, and that we do now think and ſpeak what is moſt true: and we are ready to demonſtrate to you, by moſt infallible proofs, and to perſwade you, that both in times paſt we thus believ'd, and likewiſe thus Preached.

When this Creed was propos'd by us, there was no body that could oppoſe it. Moreover, our moſt pious Emperour, did himſelf firſt atteſt its truth: he proteſted that he himſelf was of the ſame Opinion, and exhorted all to aſſent to, and ſubſcribe theſe very Articles, and unanimouſly to agree [in the profeſſion] of them; [h] this one only word Homoöuſios being inſerted; which term the Emperour himſelf thus explained, ſaying, he ſuppos'd that the word Homoöuſios was not to be taken in ſuch a ſenſe as is agreeable to the affections of the body, and therefore that the Son had not his ſubſiſtance from the Father either by Diviſion, or Abſciſſion. For it is impoſſible [ſaid he] that an immaterial intellectual and incorporeal nature, ſhould be ſubject to any corporeal affection: but our ſentiments of ſuch things muſt be expreſſed in divine and myſterious terms. Thus did our moſt wiſe and pious Emperour Philoſophize. But the CONSTANT. Biſhops upon the occaſion of adding this word Homoöuſios drew up this form [of the Creed [i].]

[h] Euſebius ſeems to affirm, that the Emperour Conſtantine was the occaſion of adding the word Homoöuſios to the Creed. But this is very improbable. For Conſtantine was not ſo learned; being as yet but a Catechumen. Euſebius's relation therefore muſt be thus underſtood, that the Biſhops (after the Creed propoſed by Euſebius Cæſarienſis,) judged that the word Homoöuſios ought to be added to it; and that Conſtantine confirmed their Opinion. But Euſebius, who made it his buſineſs to clear and excuſe himſelf to thoſe of his Dioceſs, becauſe he hath ſubſcribed that form of the Creed publiſhed by the Council, (as Athanaſius, in his book De Decret. Synod. Nicen. and in his book De Synod. Arimini and Seleuciæ, atteſts,) does deſignedly make the buſineſs intricate, and aſcribes that to the Emperour Conſtantine, which ſhould rather be aſcribed to the Biſhops. Valeſ.

[i] After theſe words, before the Nicene Creed, in the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. are added theſe words [τὸ μάθημα.] So the Greeks call the Creed, becauſe the Catechumens got it by heart. Socrates (in his third book chap. 25.) has theſe words, πιστεύομεν εἰς ἕνα θεὸν πατέρα παντοκράτορα, καὶ τὰ λοιπὰ τὰ μαθήματα, We believe in one God the Father Almighty, and the reſt of the Articles of the Creed. See Leontius Biſantius, in his book De ſectis, pag. 466. Valeſ.

The Creed.

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of all things viſible and inviſible: and in one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Son of God, the only begotten of the Father, (that is) of the ſubſtance of the Father; God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten not made: of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father; by whom all things were made, that are in heaven and that are in earth. Who for us men, and for our ſalvation deſcended, and was incarnate, was made man, ſuffered, and roſe again the third day: he aſcended into heaven. He ſhall come to judge the quick and the dead. [We alſo believe] in the Holy Ghoſt. But thoſe who hold, that there was a time when he was not, or that he was not, before he was begotten, or that he was made of nothing, and thoſe that affirm he is of any other ſubſtance or eſſence, or that the Son of God is created, or convertible, or obnoxious to change, [all ſuch] God's Holy Catholick and Apoſtolick Church doth anathematize.

When this form of Faith was appointed by the Biſhops, we did not inconſiderately omit making an enquiry, what their meaning was of thoſe terms, of the ſubſtance of the Father, and of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father. Hence therefore aroſe ſeveral Queſtions and Anſwers; and the true import of thoſe words was with great accuracy examined. And it was acknowledged by them, that theſe words, To be of the ſubſtance, did only ſignifie thus much, that the Son is of the Father, but not as a part of the Father. It ſeem'd to us altogether reaſonable and ſafe to give our aſſent to this meaning of this ſacred Doctrine, which aſſerteth, that the Son is of the Father, but is not a part of his ſubſtance. Wherefore we our ſelves alſo gave our aſſent to this import [of thoſe words;] nor do we reject the terme Homoöuſios, having peace before our eyes as the marke at which we aime, and [being cautious] leſt we ſhould fall from a right apprehenſion [of the Faith] For the ſame reaſons alſo we have admitted of theſe words, begotten not made. For made, ſaid they, is a common term attributed to all other creatures which were made by the Son; of whom the Son hath no reſemblance. Wherefore he is no creature, like to thoſe, which were created by him: but he is of a far more excellent ſubſtance then any creature. which ſubſtance, as the ſacred Oracles do inſtruct us, is begotten of the Father, but by ſuch a manner of Generation as is ineffable, and inexpreſſible by any created Being. Thus alſo this propoſition, that the Son is of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father, was diſcuſſed, to wit, that this is not [to be underſtood] according to the manner of bodies, nor [in a ſenſe] agreeable to mortal Creatures. For this [Conſubſtantiality] cannot [be] either by Diviſion of the Subſtance, or by Abſciſion, or Mutation of the Paternal Eſſence and Power. For all theſe things are inconſiſtent with the uncreated nature of the Father. But this [propoſition] to be of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father doth expreſly CONSTANT. expressly represent to us no more than this, viz. that the Son of God hath no community with, or resemblance to, created Beings; but that in every respect he is like to the Father onely, who hath begotten him; and that he does exist of no other substance or essence, but of the Father. To this [Opinion] therefore thus explain'd we thought good to give our assent: more especially, because we also knew that some of the Ancient Learned and eminent Bishops, and Writers, have made use of this term Homoöusios, in their explications of the Divinity of the Father and of the Son. Thus much therefore we have said concerning the Creed published [at Nice,] to which we all agreed, not inconsiderately and without examination, but according to the senses given, [k] which were discussed in the presence of our most pious Emperour, and for the forementioned reasons, received with an unanimous consent. Moreover, as concerning the * Anathematism published by the Fathers after the Creed, we judged it not in the least troublesome, in regard it does prohibit the use of terms that occur not in the Scriptures, from the use of which terms came almost all the confusion and disturbance that hath been raised in the Church. Since therefore, no part of the Scripure given by divine inspiration hath made use of these terms, to wit, of things which exist not, and there was a time when he was not: it seem'd disagreeable to reason that these [assertions] should be either mentioned, or taught. To this good and sound Opinion we also have assented, in as much as in former times we have never made use of such expressions. These things (beloved) we thought requisite to send to you, that we might most apparently evidence to you the considerateness as well of our examination and researches [into all points,] as of our assent: and [that you might also know] with what good reason we did at first make a resistance even to the last houre, as long as some things written in a manner different from what they should have been, offended us: but at length without further contention we embraced those points which were not offensive, when after a candid enquiry into the import of the terms we found them to be agreeable with what we our selves had made confession of, in that form of the Creed we at first proposed.

Thus wrote Eusebius Pamphilus to Cesarea in Palestine. Also, by the common consent and approbation of the Council, this following Synodicall Epistle was written to the Chruch of Alexandria, and to the inhabitants of Ægypt, Libya, and Pentapolis.

k In the Greek Text of Socrates (as it is publiished by Valesius) there is at this place a great errour. For these words [ἐπ' αὐτῶ τῶ θεοφιλεστάτυ βασιλέως ἐξεταζόμενα, which were discussed in the presence of our most pious Emperour] are quite omitted; and instead thereof, these [καὶ τοῖς εἰρημένοις λογισμοῖς συνομολογηθέντας, and for the forementioned reasons received with an unanimous consent] are twice printed. We supplied this defect from Robert Stephens's Greek Edit. with which our Translation agrees; as it likewise doth with Valesius's Latine Version, and with that of Musculus, Christophorson, and Grynæus.

* That is, the Curse.

CHAP. IX.

The Epistle of the Synod, concerning those matters determined by it, and how Arius was degraded, together with them that embraced his sentiments.

TO the Holy (by the Grace of God) and great Church of the Alexandrians, and to our beloved brethren the inhabitants of Ægypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; The Bishops Assembled at Nice, who fill up that great and holy Synod, send Greeting in the Lord.

For as much as by the Grace of God, and [the Summons] of the most pious Emperour Constantine (who hath call'd us together out of diverse Cities and Provinces,) a great and holy Synod has been convened at Nice, it seem'd altogether necessary, that a Letter should be written to you in the name of the sacred Synod; whence you might understand what things were there propos'd, and what taken into examination, as also what were Decreed and established. First of all therefore, the impiety and iniquity of Arius and his complices was inquired into in the presence of the most pious Emperour Constantine: and the Councils determination (which was confirmed by the suffrages of all) was, that his impious Opinion, and execrable terms and names should be anathematized, which [terms and names] he blasphemously used, [a] affirming that the Son of God had his Being of nothing, and that there was a time when he was not; as also saying, that the Son of God had a freedom of will, [whereby he was] capable either of vertue or vice: and calls him a Creature, and a Work. All these [Tenets] the holy Synod hath anathematized, not enduring so much as patiently to hear this impious opinion, or rather madness, and these blasphemous expressions. But what issue the proceedings against him are arrived at, you have either heard already, or will hear; lest we should seem to insult over a man who hath receiv'd a condign recompence for his own wickedness. But his impiety was grown so prevalent, that he drew into the same pit of perdition [with himself] Theonas Bishop of Marmarica, and Secundus Bishop of Ptolemais. For the same sentence [that had been given against him] was pronounced against them. But after the Grace of God had delivered us from that mischievous Opinion and from impiety and blasphemy, and from those persons who were so audacious as to make divisions and [sow] discord amongst a people heretofore peaceable; there yet remain'd the perverse stubborness of Melitius, and those that had been by him admitted into sacred Orders: and we now relate to you (beloved brethren) the judgment of the Synod concerning this particular. It pleas'd therefore the Synod (which dealt more kindly with Melitius; for in the strictest sense and rigour of the law he did not [b] deserve the least favour) that he should continue in his City, but have no jurisdiction, neither to Ordain, (the phrase that occurs here) imports the rigour or extremity of the Law: to which ὀπιεικεία, equity is opposed. The Fathers therefore of the Nicene Council say, that the Synod dealt with Melitius, not according to the rigour and extremity of the Law, nor according to the exact rule and discipline, but (συνκαταβατικῶς) by way of dispensation. For in the strictest sense of the Law Melitius deserved no kindness or pardon, in regard he challenged ordinations which in no wise belong to him, and had made a Schism in Egypt. For that is evidently declared by these words of this Epistle, viz. Τὸς δὲ χρεὶν Θεῶ ἐν μηδενὶ κλήρω ὑποκειμένους εὑρεθέντας, those that by Gods grace have not been found [engaged] in any Schism. By reason therefore of his rashness and insolency, Melitius deserved to be deposed and excommunicated. But yet the holy Fathers had a mind to treat him kindly, depriving him of all power, and leaving him only the name of a Bishop. Now, why Melitius was thus kindly used, many reasons may be alleadged. The first (which the holy Fathers intimate in this Epistle) is, because they had before unsheathed and made use of their sharpest severity and censure against Arius and his followers. Now it was but equal, that after so sad and heavy a sentence pronounc't against them, there should be a place afterwards left for clemency; especially, since Melitius had been convicted of no Heresie, but was only accused to have made a Schism. Secondly, there were many persons amongst the Melitians, that were good men, and eminent for their pious lives. Of which sort was Paphnutius the [a] This Epistle is extant in Theodoret, in chap. 6. of the first book of his Ecclesiastick History; but is in some places different from Socrates's Edition of it here. For Theodoret omits the word [λέγοντα, affirming,] together with the following clause, and joyns all this with the preceding period. In Leo Allatius's M. S. the word [λέγοντα] is also wanting, and that which follows, to wit, [ὀνομάζοντα, calls:] and instead of [ἄπαντα] the reading there is [ταῦτα πάντα.] Vales.

Anchoret, and John the Biſhop; whom Epiphanius mentions, in Hæreſ. Melitian. Laſtly, they did thus to promote peace, whereby the members of the Church, which before had been rent in ſunder, might cement and unite: therefore the Nicene Fathers received the Melitians into communion. And this is a moſt illuſtrious example of Eccleſiaſtick diſpenſation. Valeſ.

* See note (f) in this chapter.

[c] I like not Chriſtophorſons Verſion, who thought theſe words were meant of the Preſbyters ordained by Melitius. For Melitius ordained not only Preſbyters and Deacons throughout Egypt, but Biſhops alſo, as Epiphanius atteſts. Yea, he had ordained far more Biſhops, than Presbyters; as may be Collected from that Catalogue, which Alexander ('tis ſaid) required of him, after the Nicene Synod. Wherein are reckoned twenty eight Biſhops of Melitius's party; but five Presbyters, and three Deacons. This Catalogue is extant in Athanaſius's Second Apology againſt the Arians. Since therefore Melitius had Ordained ſo many Biſhops, if the Nicene Fathers had made no determination concerning the Biſhops by him Ordained, their ſentence had been imperfect; in regard they would have Decreed, what ſhould be done with the Presbyters made by Melitius, but would have made no mention of the Biſhops. Wherefore I think theſe words muſt be taken in ſuch a ſenſe, as to include both Biſhops, and alſo Presbyters. Valeſ.

or to * propoſe the names of thoſe that were to be Ordained, or to appear in any Village, or City upon this pretence: but that he ſhould barely enjoy his appellation and title only. And as for [c] thoſe that had been Ordain'd by him to any function, being confirm'd by a [d] more ſacred Ordination, they ſhould afterwards be admitted into Communion, and upon this condition they may continue poſſeſt of their preferment and function, but yet they are to acknowledge themſelves always inferiour to all thoſe that had been approved of in every Dioceſs and Church, who had been [e] Ordained before by our deareſt colleague in the ſacred Function, Alexander. So that beſides, they ſhall have no power [f] to propoſe, or nominate whom they pleaſe, or to act in any thing at all without the knowledge and conſent of ſome Catholick [g] Biſhop, who is one of Alexanders ſuffragans. But thoſe that by the grace of God and your prayers have not been found [engaged] in any Schiſm, but have continued in the Catholick Church blameleſs; let ſuch have power to nominate and elect thoſe that are worthy of the ſacred Function, and act in all things according to the eſtabliſhed Law and Sanctions of the Church.

[d] In the firſt place the Synod Decreed, that the Biſhops and Clergy, which had been Ordained by Melitius, ſhould be confirmed by a more holy conſecration, that is, ſhould receive impoſition of hands from the Biſhop of Alexandria. For, in regard they had been Ordained without his conſent, it was the pleaſure of the Synod, that they ſhould be Ordained by the Alexandrian Biſhop, according to the ancient uſage, by which it was cuſtomary, that all the Biſhops of the Dioceſs of Egypt ſhould be Subject to the Prelate of Alexandria. But the Synod required not the re-ordination of Melitius, becauſe he had been rightly Ordained before. Valeſ.

[e] Inſtead of [προχειρισμένων] it ſhould rather be [προκεχειρισμένων, ordained before] as it is in Theodoret, book 1. chap. 6. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. For προχειρίζεσθαι ſignifies another thing, as we ſhall ſhew hereafter. (ſee the following note.) Sozomen (in his firſt book chap. 24. where he epitomizes this Epiſtle) ſuppoſed theſe words were meant of the Clergy, not of the Biſhops. Valeſ.

[f] In our Annotations on the third book of Euſebius concerning the Life of Conſtantine, we remarked, that προχειρίζεσθαι, ſignifies to propoſe the names of ſuch perſons as are to be ordained. So the Synod Decreed above concerning Melitius, μήτε χειροθετεῖν, μήτε προχειρίζεσθαι, that he ſhould neither ordain, nor propoſe the names of thoſe that were to be ordained. In the ſame ſence Nicetas uſed this term, in his Life of Ignatius Patriarch of Conſtantinople, where he mentions his Election: his words are theſe, πολλῶν πισφῶν εἰς προκαθεδρίαν τῆς ἐκκλησίας προχειριζομένων, &c. when therefore the names of many perſons were propoſed to Preſide over that Church, &c. Therefore the following words [ἢ ὑποδείκνυσιν ὀνόματα, or to nominate] are only an explication of the foregoing term. In the ſame ſenſe Sozomen took this word, in his fore-cited 24 chapt. Moreover, we muſt note, that Melitius was more ſeverely dealt with, (as being the authour of a Schiſm,) than the Melitiani. For the Nicene Fathers deprived Melitius of all Epiſcopal juriſdiction, and left him only the name of a Biſhop. But they permitted the Melitians to exerciſe their Functions in the Church. That is, that the Deacons ſhould Miniſter in the Order of Deacons, and that the Presbyters ſhould Conſecrate and Baptize, as ſhould alſo the Biſhops. They only took from them their power of Voting in Elections: which was prudently done of the Nicene Fathers, leaſt the Melitians ſhould clandeſtinely promote ſome men of their own party to the Eccleſiaſtick preferments Valeſ.

[g] It ſhould rather be [τῶν Ἐπισκόπων, Biſhops,] as it is in Theodoret, and in the Allat. M. S. Valeſ.

And if it ſhall happen that ſome of thoſe who now hold Eccleſiaſtick preferments, die, then let thoſe that are newly admitted and receiv'd [into the Church] be prefer'd to the dignities of the deceaſed, [h] provided that they ſhall appear worthy, and that the people ſhall freely elect them, provided alſo that the Biſhop of Alexandria doth by his ſuffrage ratifie and confirm [the peoples Election.] This ſame Priviledge is alſo granted to all. But concerning Melitius in particular we otherwiſe Decree, that (becauſe of his former irregularity, raſhneſs, and giddineſs of diſpoſition,) no juriſdiction or authority ſhall be allowed him, he being a man able to revive the ſame diſturbances that were before. Theſe things are ſuch as moſt eſpecially and particularly relate to Ægypt, and [concern] the moſt holy Church of Alexandria. But if there ſhall be any other Canon or Decree made; being our Lord, and our moſt Reverent fellow Miniſter and Brother Alexander is preſent, he at his arrival will give you a more particular account, in regard he is the Authour of, and conſcious to, what ever is done. We alſo ſend you the good news concerning the unanimous conſent of all in reference to the celebration of the moſt ſolemn Feaſt of Eaſter; for this difference alſo hath been made up by the aſſiſtance of your prayers; ſo that all the brethren in the Eaſt, who formerly celebrated this Feſtival at the ſame time the Jews did, will in future conform to the Romans and to us, and to all who have of old obſerved our manner of celebrating Eaſter. Do you therefore (rejoycing at the good ſucceſs of affairs, and at the unanimous Peace and Concord [amongſt all men,] and alſo becauſe all Hereſie is wholly extirpated,) with a greater honour, and more ardent love receive our Fellow Miniſter (but your Biſhop) Alexander, whoſe preſence here hath greatly rejoyced us, and who in this his infirm age hath endured ſo great labours, that Peace might be reſtored amongſt you. Pray for us all that thoſe good determinations which are made, may remain firm and inviolable, through Almighty God, and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, together with the holy Ghoſt; to whom be glory for ever, Amen.

CONSTANT.

[h] These words do plainly confirm what we ſaid before, to wit, that not only the Preſbyters and Deacons, but the Biſhops alſo (who had been Ordained by Melitius) are here ſpoken of. For, if they here treated concerning the Presbyters only that were to ſucceed in the places of other Presbyters, why ſhould the Nicene Fathers uſe ſo great caution, require ſo many and great things for this reaſon, that one of the Melitian Presbyters ſhould be put into the place of a defunct Preſbyter of the Catholick Church? For the holy Fathers expreſly prohibit, that any of the Melitians ſhall ſucceed in the place and dignity of the defunct, unleſs he ſeem worthy of that honour, unleſs the people Elect him, and unleſs his Election be confirmed by the Biſhop of Alexandria. What need of ſo great caution and diligence in the promotion of a Presbyter? 'Tis therefore apparent, that theſe words do rather belong to the Biſhops. In the Elections of whom moſt eſpecially, the peoples ſuffrages were neceſſary; and whoſe Election muſt beſides be confirmed by the Biſhop of Alexandria, in regard he was the Metropolitane of all Egypt. Valeſ.

In this Synodical Epiſtle 'tis apparent, that the Nicene Fathers did not only anathematize Arius and his followers, but the very terms of his Opinion alſo: and that (in regard they had amongſt themſelves agree'd concerning the celebration of Easter,) they received into Communion [i] the Arch-Heretick Melitius, allowing him indeed the liberty of retaining the dignity of a Biſhop; but they deprived him of the power of doing any thing as a Biſhop. And upon this account I ſuppoſe it is, that the Melitians in Ægypt are to this day ſeparated from the Church, becauſe the Synod took away all [Epiſcopal] power from Melitius. Moreover, nor Athanaſius (in his 2 Apology) nor Epiphanius, accuſe Melitius of any Hereſie; they only affirm, he was the Authour of a Schiſm. But when the Melitians had afterwards joyned themſelves to the Arians, (which, as I remarkt before, hapned after the Nicene Synod, and Melitius's death,) they turned their Schiſm into an Hereſie, as Auguſtine writes concerning the Donatiſts. In this ſenſe therefore Melitius may be termed an Arch-Heretick. Valeſ.

[i] Socrates does undeſervedly ſtile Melitius an Arch-Heretick. For neither do the Nicene Fathers, you

CONSTANT. you must know, that Arius wrote a book concerning his own Opinion, which he intitled Thalia. The stile of the book [and the Doctrine contained in it] was loose and dissolute, much resembling the Songs [k] or Verses of * Sotades. This piece of his also the Synod did at the same time condemn. Nor was the Synod only sollicitous about writing Letters concerning the Peace restored [to the Church:] but the Emperour Constantine also [signified the same] by his own Letters, who wrote to the Church of Alexandria as followeth.

[k] The Sfortian & Florentine, M. SS. add these words [ἤτοι μέτροις, or Verses;] which Christophorson found in his Copy, as appears from his Version.

* He was a Maronite, a most obscene Greek Poet.

Concerning Arius's Thalia see Athanasius, in his second Oration against the Arians. When Socrates says, that this book of Arius's was condemned by the Synod, we must not so understand him, as if the Poem it self were particularly condemned, but the Doctrine only contained in that Poem. Vales.

The Emperours Letter.

Constantinus Augustus, to the Catholick Church of Alexandria. God save you beloved Brethren. We have receiv'd the greatest blessing from the divine Providence, that being released from all Errrour, We can now embrace and profess one and the same Faith. The Devil hath no longer a dominion over us: for all the Machinations he design'd against us are now totally destroyed. The bright lustre of truth has (according to the commandment of God) defeated those dissentions, those Schisms, those Tumults, and (if I may so term them) those fatal poysons of discord. We therefore do all adore one God in Name, and we believe that he is. Moreover, that this might be effected, by the admonition of God we conven'd a great many Bishops at the City of Nice: together with whom we our selves, one of your number, who rejoyce exceedingly in that we are your fellow-servant, undertook the disquisition of the truth. We did therefore enquire into and accurately discuss all things, which seem'd to yield the least occasion of ambiguity, or dissention. And (may the divine Majesty pardon us!) how great and horrid Blasphemies have some indecently uttered concerning our * Great Saviour, concerning our Hope and Life, speaking and openly professing that they believe things contrary to the divinely inspired Scriptures, and to the sacred Faith? Whenas therefore three hundred Bishops and upwards, admirable both for their moderation and acuteness of understanding, had unanimously confirmed one and the same Faith, (which, according to the verity and accurate disquisition of the Divine Law, can only be the Faith) Arius, vanquished by a diabolical force, was found to be the only person, who with an impious mind disseminated this mischief, first amongst you, and afterwards amongst others. Let us therefore embrace that Opinion, which Almighty God hath delivered. Let us return to our beloved brethren, from whom this impudent servant of the Devil hath separated us. Let us with all diligence imaginable hasten to the common body, and to our own natural members. For this doth well become your prudence, Faith, and Sanctity, that since his Error (who has been evidently prov'd to be an Enemy of the Truth) is confuted, you should return to the Divine Grace. For that which was approv'd of by three hundred Bishops, can be [judged] nothing else but the determination of God; especially, since the holy Ghost, residing in the minds of such great and worthy personages, hath discloſed to them the will of God. Wherefore let none of you continue dubious, let none of you make delays: but do you all with great alacrity return to the right way: that when we come to you, which shall be as soon as possible, we may together with you return due thanks to God who inspects all things, because, having revealed the pure Faith, he hath restored you that mutual love which was the subject of all mens prayers. God preserve you, beloved Brethren.

* In the Allat. M.S. the reading is concerning our Saviour; which I like better than this, concerning our Great Saviour. Vales.

Thus wrote the Emperour to the people of Alexandria, demonstrating to them that the determination of the Faith was not imprudently, or unadvisedly made; but that it was dictated with a great deal of disquisition and diligent examination: nor [does he say] that some things were spoken [in that Council,] and others passed over in silence: but that all that was fitting to be said in confirmation of the opinion, was produced and urged: and that the controversie was not inconsiderately determined, but was with great accuracy first discussed. In so much that, all things whatever, which seemed to produce matter of ambiguity or dissention, were wholly removed and destroyed. In short, he terms the determination of all those there assembled, the will of God, and does confidently aver that the unanimity of so many and such eminent Prelates was procured by the holy Ghost. But Sabinus, the Ring-leader of the Macedonian Heresie, does wittingly and on set purpose oppose their [authorities:] and Stiles the Fathers there assembled Idiots and men of no knowledge; and he does in all appearance asperse even Eusebius Cæsariensis with [the imputation of] ignorance: but he does not in the least consider with himself, that, although those convened in that Synod were Idiots, yet in regard they were illuminated by God, and the Grace of the holy Ghost, they could in no wise err from the Truth. But let us hear, what the Emperour, by another Letter which he sent to all the Bishops every where, and to the people, Decreed against Arius and those that embraced his Opinion.

Another Letter of Constantines.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to the Bishops and People.

[1] In as much as Arius has followed the Practices of wicked and profane persons, 'tis but just that he should undergo the same ignominy with them. Therefore, as Porphyrius, that Enemy of true Piety, found a just recompence for composing impious Volumes against Religion, and such a recompence as has rendred him ignominious to posterity, covered him with infamy and many reproaches, and his impious writings have been utterly destroyed: so it also now seemes reasonable to term Arius and those that embrace his Opinion Porphyrians, that they may derive their denomination from him, whose morals they have so exactly imitated. Moreover, if any book written by Arius shall be found extant, we do hereby Order, that it be immediately burnt: that by this means not only his wicked Doctrine may be wholly destroyed, but also that there might not be left to posterity the

[1] This Epistle of Constantine the Emperour is not rightly placed by our Author. It should rather be placed immediately after Constantin's Letter to the Churches which is the next in this chapter. For certainly those Letters which concern the Council of Nice should regularly be placed first. But this Letter does not concern that Council, nor does it in the least mention the Council. Athanasius in his Epistle ad Solitar. alludes to this Letter of Constantin's, where he speaks thus concerning the Emperour, διὰ τί τοὺς Ἀρειανοὺς ὡς ἐκεῖνος προφυειανοὺς ὠνόμασε, τοὺς δὲ εἰς ἐκκλησίαν εἰσγαγεῖν σπεύδεις, (i. e.) Why does he (to wit, Constantine) endeavour to reduce the Arians into the Church, whom he himself calls Porphyrians? Vales.

For immediately upon his being found guilty of this fact, he ſhall undergo a capital puniſhment. God preſerve you.*

Another Letter.

Conſtantinus Auguſtus, to the Churches.

Having ſufficiently experienced, by the flouriſhing poſture of the publick affairs, how great the benignity of the divine power has been towards us; we judged it our chiefeſt concern and aim [to labour] for the Preſervation of one Faith, a ſincere charity, and one univerſally acknowledged Religion towards Almighty God amongſt the moſt bleſſed Congregations of the Catholik Church. But ſince this could not be otherwiſe firmly conſtituted and eſtabliſhed, unleſs all, or at leaſt the greateſt part of the Biſhops were conven'd in one place, and every particular that concerns the moſt ſacred Religion were by them firſt diſcuſſed: upon this account, when as many of the Clergy, as could poſſibly be got together, were aſſembled, and we alſo, as one of you, were preſent with them (for we will not deny, what we account our greateſt glory, that we are your fellow ſervant) all things were ſufficiently diſcuſſed ſo long, untill a determination acceptable to God the Inſpector of all things, was publiſhed in order to an univerſal agreement and union: ſo that there is now no place left for diſſention, or controverſie about [matters] of Faith. Where alſo, after a diſquiſition made concerning the moſt Holy day of Eaſter, it was by a general conſent concluded to be the beſt courſe, for all men in all places to celebrate that Feſtival upon one and the ſame day. For what can be more comely and commendable, or what more grave and decent, then that this Feſtival, from which we have received the hopes of immortality, ſhould be unerringly kept by all men in one and the ſame order, and in a manner apparently and expreſly agreeable? And in the firſt place, all men lookt upon it as an unworthy thing and miſbecoming the dignity of that moſt ſacred Feſtival, to follow the Jewiſh uſage in the celebration thereof. For the Jews, perſons who have defiled themſelves with a moſt abominable ſin, are deſervedly impure and blind as to their underſtandings. Having therefore rejected their uſage, we may by a more certain and infallible order propagate that day to future ages for the completion of this ſolemnity, which we have kept from the firſt day of the paſſion even to this preſent time. Let us then have nothing in common with that moſt hoſtile multitude of the Jews. We have received another way from our Saviour. For there is propoſed to us a lawful and decent leading to our moſt ſacred Religion. Let us therefore (deareſt Brethren) with one accord conſtantly perſiſt in this courſe, and * withdraw our ſelves from that moſt adverſe Society and their conſciouſneſs. For it is really moſt abſurd for them to make their bragges, that we are not capable of our ſelves, without their inſtruction to obſerve theſe things. But of what are they able to paſs a right judgment, who after that parricide of theirs, the murther of our Lord, were ſtruck with madneſs, and are led, not by the conduct of reaſon, but by an ungovernable * impetus, whitherſoever their innate rage ſhall drive them? Hence therefore it is that even in this particular they diſcern not the Truth, [m] but always wandring at the greateſt diſtance from a decent and agreeable amendment, they celebrate Eaſter twice within the ſpace of one and the ſame year. What reaſon have we therefore to follow theſe men, who, it is acknowledged, are diſtempered with an abominable Errour? We muſt never endure the keeping of two Eaſters in one year. But although what we have ſaid were not ſufficient, yet nevertheleſs, it behooves your prudence to make it your greateſt care, and the matter of your conſtant prayers, that the purity of your ſouls ſhould not in the likeneſs of any thing ſeem to be joyned or mixed with the uſages of moſt wicked men. Beſides, this is to be conſidered, that it is a moſt impious thing, that there ſhould be any diſagreement in a matter of ſo great concern, and in ſuch a ſolemnity of Religion. For our Saviour left us but one day [to be celebrated in commemoration] of our Redemption, that is the day of his moſt ſacred Paſſion: and he alſo deſired that his Catholick Church ſhould be one. The members of which Church (although they are much diſperſed in divers places, yet nevertheleſs) are cheriſhed by one ſpirit, that is, by the will of God. Let the prudence of your ſanctity conſider, how grievous and undecent a thing it is, that on the ſelf ſame daies ſome ſhould keep ſtrict Faſts, and others celebrate Feaſts: and that on the days after Eaſter, ſome ſhould be converſant in feaſtings and a vacantneſs from labours, and others devote themſelves to ſet Faſts. Wherefore it pleaſed divine Providence that theſe things ſhould be ſeaſonably redreſſed, and reduced to one and the ſame form, as we ſuppoſe you are all ſenſible. Since therefore it was expedient to make ſuch an emendation in this point, as that we might not ſeem to hold the leaſt Communion with thoſe Parricides, and Murderers of of our Lord, the Jews: and ſince this is the moſt decent and becoming order, which all the Churches of the Weſtern, Southern and Northern parts of the world, and alſo ſome in the Eaſtern parts do obſerve: for theſe reaſons all perſons have at preſent judged it good and expedient; (and we our ſelves alſo promiſed that it would not be ungrateſull to your wiſdom,) that that which with ſuch an univerſal unanimity is obſerved in the City of Rome, and all over Italy and Africa, throughout all

* In book 3. chap. 18. of Euſebius's Life of Conſtantine (where we have this Epiſtle of the Emperour,) the reading is [τῆς αἱρέσεως ἐκείνης συνηθείας] which Valeſius at that place, and here, renders thus [ab illâ turpiſſimâ ſocietate & conſcientiâ, from that moſt abominable ſociety and their conſciouſneſs.] Of this his Verſion, he gives this reaſon: they who celebrate Eaſter with the Jews, ſeem to be conſcious of that wickedneſs which they committed againſt our Lord. See his Annotat. at the book and chapter now cited.

[m] Inſtead of [ὡς δεῖ] in the Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. the reading is [ὡς ἀεὶ, always:] which reading Theodoret confirms. In book 3. chap. 18. of Euſebius's Life of Conſtantine, it is [ὡς δεῖ] whereas the Jewiſh Paſchal Neomenia (or new Moon) began from the fifth day of March, and was concluded at the third of April, hence it ſometimes hapned, that their Paſſover began before the Æquinox. So that they celebrated two Paſſovers in one year, (ſuppoſing you mean the Solar and Julian year) that is, accounting from the Vernal Æquinox of this year, to the Vernal Æquinox of the year following. Ambroſius aſſerts the ſame in his Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Æmilia, where he relates, that the Jews ſometimes celebrated their Paſſover in the twelfth month, that is, acording to the Latines, and Eaſtern men. For the Jews never kept their Paſſover on their own twelfth month, but on the fourteenth day of their firſt month. Moreover, this celebrating of their Paſſover twice in one year, which Conſtantine objects againſt the Jews, ſeems to me not at all momentous. For the Jews might have returned the objection upon the Chriſtians, to wit, that they celebrated Eaſter twice in the ſame year. For, ſuppoſe Eaſter is this year kept on the tenth of the Calends of May; (that is, on the 22d of April) next year it muſt neceſſarily be kept ſooner. And ſo there will occur two Eaſters amongſt the Chriſtians within the ſpace of one year current. But this will not happen, if you reckon the year from the Æquinoctial Cardo to the Vernal Æquinox of the year following. See Epiphan. pag. 824. Edit Petav. and Petav. Animadverſ. pag. 294, 295. See alſo Ægidius Buchervius de Paſchali Judæorum Cycle, chap. 3.

CONSTANT. all Ægypt, Spain, France, Brittain, Libya; over all Greece, and the Provinces of Asia and Pontus, and throughout Cilicia, would also be most willingly received and embraced by you. Let this also be seriously considered, that not only the number of the Churches in the forementioned places is far the greater; but also that it is most just and equal that all mens wills should universally concur in that which strict reason seems to require, and which has no Communion with the perjury of the Jews. But, that we may speak more summarily and briefly, it was by a general consent agreed that the most sacred Festival of Easter should be solemniz'd upon one and the same day. For it is undecent that there should be any diversity in so great and holy a solemnity: and it is far better to adhere to that Opinion, in which there is no mixture of strange and absurd errour and impiety. Since therefore these things are thus ordered, do you with joy receive this celestial and truly divine Commandment. For whatsoever is transacted [and determined] in the sacred assemblies of the Bishops, must be attributed to the Divine will. Wherefore, when you have imparted to all our beloved brethren what has been prescribed, it is your duty to embrace, and establish the forementioned rule and observation of the most holy day: that when we shall come into the presence of your love (which we were long since desirous of,) we may celebrate the sacred Festival with you, on one and the same day: and that we may rejoyce together with you for all things, beholding the cruelty of the Devil totally removed by the divine power and our endeavours; whilst your Faith, Peace, and Concord does every where flourish. God preserve you, Beloved Brethren.

[n] This Letter of the Emperour to Eusebius, and also the two next are misplaced. For they have no relation to the Council of Nice; neither do they make the least mention of Arius or the Arians. [n] Another Letter to Eusebius.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Eusebius.

We really believe and are absolutely perswaded (Dearest Brother) that, in regard an impious desire and tyrannick violence hath persecuted the servants of God our Saviour even to this present time, the edifices of all Churches, have either by neglect gone to ruine, or through fear of the imminent dangerousness [of the times] have been adorned with less of statelines. But now, since Liberty is restored, and that Serpent, [o] that Persecutor Licinius, is by Almighty God's Providence and our instrumental endeavours forced out of the Administration of publick Affairs, we suppose that the divine power hath been sufficiently manifested to all men: and that all who either through fear or unbelief have fallen into any sins, [p] having now acknowledged the only true God, will in future return to the true and right course of life. Do you therefore remind as well all [persons belonging to] the Churches over which you preside, as also all other Bishops presiding in other places, together with the Presbyters and Deacons, whom you know, that they use their utmost diligence about the structures of the Churches; either about repairing those that are still standing, or about inlarging others, or in building new ones, wheresoever it shall be found requisite. And you your self, and the rest by your mediation may ask necessaries [for that work] both from our Presidents of the Provinces, and also from the [q] Office of the Prætorian Prefecture. For they are already impowred by our Rescripts to be diligently observant about all your Holinesses Orders. God preserve you, Beloved Brother. Thus wrote the Emperour to the Bishops throughout every particular Province, concerning the building of the Churches: But what he wrote to Eusebius of Palestine about providing [some Copies of] the sacred Scriptures we may easily collect from these his Letters.

CONSTANT.

[o] We meet with this Letter of the Emperours to Eusebius at book 2. chap. 46. of Eusebius's Life of Constantine; where these three words [that Persecutor Licinius] are wanting; being added here, instead of a Scholion by Socrates, or some other Scholiast. He terms Licinius a serpent by reason of his craftiness, and age. Hence we may conjecture, that this Letter was written soon after Licinius's deposition. See Valesius's notes on book 2. chap. 46. of Eusebius's Life of Constantine.

[p] Here we made choice of this reading [ἐπιγνόντας ἤδη, &c. having now acknowledged, &c.] By the term [fear] in the foregoing clause he means the Christians, who through fear of persecution had neglected the Churches, or renounced the faith. The term [Unbelief] belongs to the Heathens, who had demolished the Churches, and divers ways vexed the Christians. See Valesius's notes, at the Book and Chapter before cited.

[q] τάξις, the term here used, signifies an Office, or company of Apparitours attending on a Magistrate; i. e. a certain number of Souldiers waiting on the Judges. ἔπαρχοι are the Præfects of the Prætorium; so termed, because they were ἐπὶ τοῖς ἄρχουσιν, over the Presidents and Rectours of Provinces. Therefore ἐπαρχικὴ τάξις (the phrase here used) imports the Office of the Prætorian Præfecture, concerning which consult the Notitia Imperii Romani. Further, the Office (or Attendants) of the Præfect of the Prætorium was more honourable than the Offices of all the other Magistrates. For as the Præfect of the Prætorium excelled all the other judges, as well Military as Civil, in dignity; so his Officials or attendants, were lookt upon to be more honourable then the other officials. Hence, in the Chalcedon Council, Action. 3, the Office of the Præfects of the Prætorium is called μεγίστη τάξις. See Valesius's notes, at the before cited book and Chapter.
